called the Lake of Károon, where they withstood his authority; and he pursued them to Cairo; but could not prevail against them, on account of their descending into that lake; for it was guarded by a talisman. He then returned overcome, and could not open the treasure of Esh-Shamardal by reason of the sons of the Red King. So when your father was unable to prevail against them, he came to me, and complained to me. I therefore made for him an astrological calculation, and saw that his treasure could not be opened save by the good fortune of a young man of the sons of Cairo, named Joodar the son of 'Omar; for that he would be the means of the seizure of the sons of the Red King. Also, that the said young man would be a fisherman, that the meeting with him would be by the Lake of Károon, and that the charm would not be dissolved unless Joodar should bind behind his back the hands of the person whose lot it was to accomplish this, and throw him into the lake; whereupon he would contend with the sons of the Red King; and whosoever have the fortune to do so would seize the sons of the Red King. But he saw that he who should not be fortunate would perish, and his feet would appear from the water; and that he who should be safe, his hands would appear; and it would be requisite that Joodar should cast over him the net, and take him forth from the lake.

Upon this, [two of] my brothers said, We will go, though we perish. And I said, I will go also. But as to our brother who is in the garb of a Jew, he said, I have no desire. So we agreed with him that he should repair to Cairo in the disguise of a Jewish merchant, in order that if one of us should die in the lake, he might receive the mule and the saddle-bags from Joodar, and give him a hundred pieces of gold. And when the first came to thee, the sons of the Red King slew him; and they slew my second brother; but they could not prevail against me: so I seized them.

Upon this, Joodar said, Where are they whom thou seizedst? The Maghrabee replied, Didst thou not see them? I have imprisoned them in the two little boxes. — Joodar said, These are fishes. The Maghrabee however replied, These are not fishes: verily they are 'Efreetts in the form of fishes. But, O Joodar, know that the opening of the treasure cannot be accomplished save by thy good fortune. Wilt thou then comply with my desire, and go with me to the city of Fás and Miknás,¹⁹ and open the treasure? If so, I will give thee what thou shalt desire. Thou hast become my brother by a covenant before God, and thou shalt return to thy family with a comforted heart. — Joodar said to him, O my master the pilgrim, I have in my charge my mother and my two brothers, and I am he who provideth for them; and if I go with thee, who will give them bread to eat? But the Maghrabee replied, This is a vain pretext; and if it be on account of the money required for expenses, we will give thee a thousand pieces of gold which thou shalt give to thy mother that she may expend of it until thou shalt return to thy country; and if thou go away, thou shalt return before four months. And when Joodar heard the mention of the thousand pieces of gold, he said, Give me, O pilgrim, the thousand pieces of gold, and I will leave them with my mother, and will go with thee. So the Maghrabee took forth and gave him the gold, and he took it, and went to his mother, and acquainted her with that which had happened between him and the Maghrabee, saying to her, Take these thousand pieces of gold, and expend of them upon thyself and upon my two brothers, while I journey with the Maghrabee to the west, and I shall be absent four months, and abundant good fortune will betide me: so pray for me, O my mother. She replied, O my son, thou wilt render me desolate, and I fear for thee. But he said, O my mother, no harm will befall him whom God preserveth; and the Maghrabee is a good man. And he proceeded to praise to her his state. So she replied, May God incline his heart to thee! Go with him, O my son. Perhaps he will give thee something.

He therefore bade farewell to his mother, and went, and when he came to the Maghrabee 'Abd-Es-Samad, the latter said to him, Hast thou consulted thy mother? He answered, Yes, and she prayed for me. And the Maghrabee said to him, Mount behind me. So he got upon the back of the mule, and they journeyed from noon until the time of afternoon-prayers, when Joodar was hungry, and he saw not with the Maghrabee any thing to be eaten; wherefore he said to him, O my master the pilgrim, probably thou hast forgotten to bring for us any thing to eat on the way. The Maghrabee said, Art thou hungry? Joodar answered, Yes. And upon this the Maghrabee alighted from the mule, with Joodar, and said, Put down the pair of saddle-bags. So he put it down. Then the Maghrabee said to him, What thing dost thou desire, O my brother? Joodar answered him, Any thing. The Maghrabee however replied, I conjure thee by Allah that thou tell me what thing thou desirest. Joodar said, Bread and cheese. But the Maghrabee replied, O poor man, bread and cheese are not suitable to thy condition: therefore demand something good. — In my estimation, said Joodar, at this time every thing is good. And the Maghrabee asked him, Dost thou like browned chickens? ²⁰ He answered, Yes. And the Maghrabee said, Dost thou like rice with honey? He answered, Yes. And the Maghrabee said, Dost thou like such a dish, and such a dish? — until he had named to him four and twenty different dishes of food.

Then Joodar said within himself, Is he mad? Whence will he bring me the dishes of food that he hath named, when he hath neither kitchen nor cook? But say to him, It is enough. — So he said to him, It is enough. Dost thou make me desire the dishes when I shall see nothing? — The Maghrabee however replied, Welcome to thee, O Joodar! And he put his hand into the saddle-bag, and took forth a dish of gold containing two browned, hot chickens. Then he put his hand a second time, and took forth a dish of gold containing kebáb.²¹ And he ceased not to take forth from the pair of saddle-bags until he had taken forth the four and twenty dishes that he had mentioned, entire and complete; whereupon Joodar was confounded. He then said to him, Eat, O poor man. And Joodar said, O my master, dost thou put in this pair of saddle-bags a kitchen and people to cook? So the Maghrabee laughed, and replied, This is enchanted, having a servant: were we to demand every hour a thousand dishes, the servant would bring them and make them ready instantly. Joodar therefore said, An excellent thing is this pair of saddle-bags! Then they ate until they were satisfied, and what remained they threw upon the ground; after which the Maghrabee replaced the dishes, empty, in the saddle-bags, and, having put in his hand, took forth a ewer; and they drank, and performed the ablution, recited the afternoon-prayers, and replaced the ewer in the pair of saddle-bags.

The Maghrabee then put into them the two little boxes, placed the saddle-bags on the mule, and mounted, saying, Mount, that we may journey on. And he said, 'O Joodar, knowest thou what space we have traversed from Cairo unto this place? Joodar answered him, By Allah, I know not. And the Maghrabee said to him, We have traversed a space of a whole month's journey. — And how so? asked Joodar. The Maghrabee answered him, O Joodar, know that the mule which is beneath us is one of the Márids of the Jinn, that will travel in a day a year's journey; but for thy sake it proceeded leisurely. — They then journeyed on until sunset; and when they halted in the evening, the Maghrabee took forth from the saddle-bags the supper; and in the morning he took forth the breakfast. Thus they continued to do for a period of four days, journeying until midnight, and alighting and sleeping, and proceeding in the morning; and all that Joodar desired he demanded of the Maghrabee, who produced it to him from the pair of saddle-bags. And on the fifth day, they arrived at Fás and Miknás.

They entered the city; and when they entered, every one who met the Maghrabee saluted him and kissed his hand. Thus he proceeded until he came to a door; whereupon he knocked at it, and, lo, the door opened, and there appeared from it a damsel like the moon, to whom he said, O Rahmeh,²² O my daughter, open for us the pavilion. She replied, On the head and the eye, O my father. And she entered, wriggling her sides,²³ so that Joodar's reason fled, and he said, This is none other than the daughter of a King! Then the damsel opened the pavilion, and the Maghrabee took the pair of saddle-bags from the back of the mule, and said to it, Depart: God bless thee! And, behold, the ground clove asunder, and the mule descended, and the ground became again as it was. So Joodar said, O Excellent Protector! Praise be to God, who delivered us upon its back! — The Maghrabee however said, Wonder not, O Joodar: for I told thee that the mule is an 'Efreet: but come up with us into the pavilion.

And when they entered that pavilion, Joodar was amazed at the abundance of the rich furniture, and at what he beheld in it of rarities, and articles of jewels and minerals; and after they had seated themselves, the Maghrabee ordered the damsel, saying to her, O Rahmeh, bring such a wrapper. She therefore arose and brought a wrapper, which she put down before her father; and he opened it and took forth from it a dress worth a thousand pieces of gold, and said, Put it on, O Joodar. Welcome to thee! — So he put on the dress, and became like one of the Kings of the West; after which the Maghrabee placed the saddle-bags before him, and, having put his hand into them, took forth from them dishes containing varieties of viands until they composed a table of forty different dishes, when he said, O my lord, advance and eat, and be not displeased with us. We know not what viands thou desirest: therefore tell us what thou wouldst have, and we will place it before thee without delay. — Joodar replied, By Allah, O my master the pilgrim, I love all viands, and hate not aught: then ask me not respecting any thing; but bring all that occur to thy mind, and I have nothing to do but eat. — Then he resided with him twenty days. Every day the Maghrabee clad him with a dress, and the food was from the pair of saddle-bags; the Maghrabee not buying any thing, either of meat or bread, nor cooking; but taking forth all that he required from the saddle-bags, even the different kinds of fruit.

After this, the Maghrabee, on the one and twentieth day, said, O Joodar, arise with us; for this is the day decreed for the opening of the treasure of Esh-Shamardal. So he arose with him, and they walked to the extremity of the city. Then they went forth from it, and Joodar mounted a mule and the Maghrabee mounted a mule, and they ceased not to journey on until noon, when they came to a river of running water. There 'Abd-Es-Samad alighted, and he said, Alight, O Joodar. And he alighted; and 'Abd-Es-Samad said, Quick! — making a sign with his hand to the two slaves [who accompanied him]; whereupon they took the two mules, and each slave departed by one way, and they were absent a little while; after which, one of them approached with a tent, which he pitched; and the other approached with a mattress, which he spread in the tent, placing around it cushions and pillows. Then one of them went and brought the two little boxes in which were the two fishes; and the other brought the pair of saddle-bags. Upon this, the Maghrabee arose and said, Come, O Joodar. So he came, and seated himself by his side; and the Maghrabee took forth from the saddle-bags the dishes of viands, and they dined; after which, the Maghrabee took the two little boxes, and recited a charm over them, whereupon those who were within them began to say, At thy service, O diviner of the world! Have mercy upon us! — They prayed for help, while he recited his charm over them, until the two little boxes burst, and became broken in pieces, the fragments flying about, and there appeared from them two beings with their hands bound behind them, saying, Quarter! O diviner of the world! What dost thou desire to do unto us? — He answered, My desire is, either to burn you, or that ye promise me to open the treasure of Esh-Shamardal. And they replied, We promise thee, and we will open for thee the treasure; but on the condition that thou bring here Joodar the fisherman; for the treasure cannot be opened but by his good fortune, and no one can enter it except Joodar the son of 'Omar. So he said to them, Him whom ye mention I have brought, and he is here, hearing you and beholding you.

They therefore promised him to open the treasure, and he released them.

Then he took forth a tube, and some tablets of red carnelion, which he placed upon the tube; and he took a perfuming-vessel, put in it some charcoal, and blew it with a single puff, wherewith he kindled it; and, having made ready the incense, he said, O Joodar, I will recite the charm, and throw on the incense, and when I have begun the charm I cannot speak; for the charm would be frustrated; and I desire to inform thee how thou shalt act to attain thy wish. So Joodar replied, Inform me.

The Maghrabee therefore said, Know that when I have recited the charm, and thrown on the incense, the water will dry up from the bed of the river, and there will appear to thee a door of gold, of the size of the city-gate, with two rings of metal. Descend to the door, and knock it lightly, and wait a while: then knock a second time, with more force than the first time: after that, give three knocks without intermission, one after another. Thereupon thou wilt hear a speaker say, Who knocketh at the door of treasures and knoweth not how to solve the mysteries? And do thou answer, I am Joodar the fisherman, the son of 'Omar. Then he will open to thee the door; and there will come forth to thee a person with a sword in his hand, who will say to thee, If thou be that man, stretch forth thy neck that I may smite off thy head. And stretch thou forth to him thy neck, and fear not; for when he raiseth his hand with the sword and smiteth thee, he will fall down before thee, and after a while thou wilt see him a body without a soul, and thou wilt not suffer pain from the blow, nor will aught befall thee: but if thou oppose him, he will slay thee.—And after that, when thou hast annulled his talisman by obedience, enter on until thou seest another door, which knock. There will come forth to thee a horseman riding upon a horse, and having upon his shoulder a spear, and he will say, What hath brought thee into this place, which no one entereth, either of mankind or of the Jinn? And he will shake at thee the spear: but open to him thy bosom, and he will smite thee, and will fall down instantly, and thou wilt see him a body without a soul. If thou oppose him, however, he will slay thee.—Then enter the third door. There will come forth to thee a son of Adam having in his hand a bow and arrows, and he will shoot at thee with the bow: but open thou to him thy bosom, and he will smite thee, and will fall down before thee a body without a soul: but if thou oppose him, he will slay thee.—Next enter the fourth door. There will come forth to thee a huge lion, who will rush upon thee, opening his mouth, and shewing thee that he desireth to devour thee: yet fear thou not, nor flee from him; but when he cometh up to thee, give him thy hand, and when he biteth at thy hand he will fall down instantly, and nought will befall thee.—After this, enter the fifth door. There will come forth a black slave, who will say to thee, Who art thou? Answer him, I am Joodar. And he will say to thee, if thou be that man, enter the sixth door.—Advance therefore to that door, and say, O 'Eesà, tell Moosà to open the door. Thereupon the door will be opened, and do thou enter. Thou wilt find two serpents; one of them on the left, and the other on the right. Each of them will open its mouth, and they will dart upon thee instantly: but stretch thou forth to them thy two hands, and each of them will bite at a hand: if thou oppose, however, they will kill thee. — Then enter on to the seventh door, and knock it. [The semblance of] thy mother will come forth to thee, and will say to thee, Welcome, O my son! Advance, that I may salute thee. — But do thou reply, Keep far from me, and pull off thine apparel. She will thereupon say to thee, O my son, I am thy mother, and I have a claim upon thy duty for suckling and rearing thee. How then wouldst thou strip me of my clothing? — Do thou, however, say to her, If thou pull not off thy clothing, I will slay thee. And look on thy right side: thou wilt see a sword suspended on the wall: so take it, and draw it upon her, and say to her, Pull off. Then she will endeavour to beguile thee, and will humble herself unto thee: yet pity her not; but every time that she pulleth off to thee any thing, say to her, Pull off the rest. And cease not to threaten her with slaughter until she pulleth off to thee all that is upon her, and falleth down. — Upon this, the mysterious contrivances will have become dissolved, and the talismans annulled, and thou wilt be secure. So enter: thou wilt find the gold in heaps within the treasury: pay no regard, however, to aught of it: but thou wilt see a private chamber at the upper end of the treasury, with a curtain over its entrance. Remove the curtain, and thou wilt see the diviner Esh-Shamardal lying upon a couch of gold, having at his head something round, shining like the moon; and it is the celestial planisphere. He is also equipped with the sword, hung upon his side; and upon his finger is a seal-ring; and upon his neck is a chain, to which is attached a kohl-pot. Bring therefore the four repositied things; and beware of forgetting aught of the things with which I have acquainted thee; and act not contrary to the directions; for thou wouldst repent, and fear would be entertained for thee. — Then he repeated to him the charge, a second and a third and a fourth time, until he said, I have it in my memory; but who is able to face these talismans that thou hast mentioned, and to endure these great horrors? The Maghrabee replied, O Joodar, fear not; for they are bodies without souls. And he proceeded to tranquillize him. So Joodar said, I rely upon God.

Then the Maghrabee 'Abd-Es-Samad threw on the incense, and continued a while reciting the charm; and, lo, the water had gone, and the bottom of the river appeared, and the door of the treasure. Joodar therefore descended to the door, and knocked it; and he heard a speaker say, Who knocketh at the doors of the treasures and knoweth not how to solve the mysteries? So he answered, I am Joodar the son of 'Omar. And upon this, the door opened, and the person came forth to him, and drew the sword, saying to him, Stretch forth thy neck. Accordingly, he stretched forth his neck, and the person smote him, and fell down. In like manner did Joodar at the second door, and so on until he had annulled the talismans of [six of] the seven doors. Then [the semblance of] his mother came forth to him, saying to him, Salutations to thee, O my son! And he said to her as the Maghrabee had directed him; but after she had long remonstrated with him, and done nearly all that he had commanded her, she said to him, O my son, is thy heart stone? Is not this unlawful? — And he replied, 'Thou hast spoken truth. So when he had uttered these words, she cried out and said, He hath erred: therefore beat ye him! And there fell upon him blows like the drops of rain: the servants of the treasure assembled around him, and they inflicted upon him a beating that he forgot not during his life; after which they pushed him, and cast him forth outside the door of the treasure, and the doors of the treasure became closed as they were before. So when they cast him outside the door, the the Maghrabee took him up instantly, and the waters flowed as before. Then 'Abd-Es-Samad the Maghrabee recited over Joodar a charm, until he recovered from his intoxication, when he said to him, What hast thou done, O poor man? Joodar therefore told him what had happened; whereupon the Maghrabee replied, Did I not say to thee, Act not contrary to the directions? Thou hast done ill to me and to thyself. But now thou must remain with me till the next year, to the like of this day. — And he called out immediately to the two slaves, who forthwith struck the tent and carried it away, and, after they had been absent a little while, returned with the two mules; and the Maghrabee and Joodar each mounted a mule, and they returned to the city of Fás.

Joodar remained with the Maghrabee, eating well and drinking well, and every day the latter clad him in a rich dress, until the year had ended, and that day arrived; when the Maghrabee said to him, This is the appointed day; so repair with us. Joodar replied, Well. The Maghrabee therefore took him outside the city, and they saw the two slaves with the two mules, and rode until they arrived at the river; whereupon the two slaves pitched the tent, and spread the furniture in it, and the Maghrabee took forth the table of viands, and they dined. After this, the Maghrabee took forth the tube and the tablets, as on the first occasion, kindled the fire, made ready his incense, and said, O Joodar, I desire to charge thee. He replied, O my master the pilgrim, if I have forgotten the beating, I may have forgotten the charge. So the Maghrabee said to him, Dost thou retain the charge in thy memory? He answered Yes. And the Maghrabee said, Keep thy self-possession, and imagine not that the woman is thy mother; for she is only a talisman in the form of thy mother, and her desire is to make thee err; and if the first time thou camest forth alive, this time, if thou err, they will cast thee forth slain. He replied, If I err, I shall deserve their burning me. Then the Maghrabee put the incense and recited the charm, and the river dried up.

So Joodar advanced to the door and knocked it; whereupon it opened, and he annulled all the talismans until he came to [the semblance of] his mother, who said to him, Welcome, O my son! But he replied, How should I be thy son, O accursed? Pull off! — And she endeavoured to beguile him; but he insisted; and when she had done as he commanded her, she became a body without a soul. He therefore entered, and saw the gold in heaps, but paid no regard to aught of it. Then he came to the private chamber, and beheld the diviner Esh-Shamardal lying, with the sword on his side, and the seal-ring upon his finger, and the kohl-pot upon his bosom; and he saw the celestial planisphere over his head. So he advanced, and loosed the sword, and took the seal-ring and the celestial planisphere and the kohl-pot, and went forth; and, lo, a set of musical instruments sounded in honour of him, and the servants [of the treasure] began to call out, Mayest thou enjoy that which thou hast obtained, O Joodar! The instruments ceased not to sound until he went forth from the treasure, and came to the Maghrabee, who thereupon ceased from the recitation of the charm, and the fumigation, and, rising, pressed him to his bosom, and saluted him; and Joodar gave him the four repositied articles. So the Maghrabee took them, and called out to the two slaves, who forthwith took the tent, and restored it to its place; after which they returned with the two mules, and the Maghrabee and Joodar mounted them, and entered the city of Fás. The Maghrabee then brought the pair of saddle-bags, and proceeded to take forth from it the dishes containing the various viands until a complete table was before him, when he said, O my brother, O Joodar, eat. He therefore ate until he was satisfied, and the Maghrabee emptied the remains of the viands into other dishes, and put back the empty dishes into the saddle-bags.

Then the Maghrabee 'Abd-Es-Samad said, O Joodar, thou quittedst thy land and thy country on our account, and hast accomplished our affair; wherefore thou hast a claim upon us for some object of desire; so demand of us what thou wishest; for God (whose name be exalted!) giveth thee, and we are [merely] the means. Require then what thou wilt, and be not abashed, since thou deservest. — He therefore replied, O my master, I desire of God, and then of thee, that thou give me this pair of saddle-bags. And the Maghrabee said [to his slave], Bring the pair of saddle-bags. Accordingly he brought it; and he said to Joodar, Take it; for it is thy due; and hadst thou desired something else, we had given it to thee. But, O poor man, this will not profit thee save in food, and thou hast wearied thyself with us, and we promised thee that we would restore thee to thy country with a comforted heart; wherefore thou shalt eat from this pair of saddle-bags, and we will give thee another pair of saddle-bags, full of gold and jewels, and have thee conveyed to thy country; so thou shalt become a merchant, and clothe thyself and thy family, and not stand in need of money for thy expenses. Eat thou and thy family from this pair of saddle-bags; and the mode of acting with it is this: that thou put forth thy hand into it, and say, By the great names that have influence over thee, O servant of this pair of saddle-bags, bring me such a dish! Thereupon he will bring thee what thou demandest, even if thou demand every day a thousand different dishes of food.

Then he caused a slave to come with a mule, and filled for Joodar a pair of saddle-bags, one half with gold, and the other half with jewels and minerals, and said to him, Mount this mule, and the slave will walk before thee; for he will acquaint thee with the way until he conveyeth thee to the door of thy house; and when thou hast arrived, take the two pairs of saddle-bags, and give him the mule, and he will bring it back. But let not any one know thy secret. And now we commit thee unto God. — So Joodar replied, May God increase thy prosperity! He put the two pairs of saddle-bags upon the back of the mule, and mounted; and the slave walked before him. The mule followed the slave that day, and all the following night; and on the second day, in the morning, he entered the Báb en-Nasr,²⁴ and beheld his mother sitting and saying, Something for the sake of God! So his reason fled, and, having alighted from the back of the mule, he threw himself upon her; and when she saw him, she wept. Then he mounted her upon the mule, and walked by her stirrup until he arrived at the house, when he set down his mother, took the two pairs of saddle-bags, and left the mule to the slave, who took it and departed to his master: for the slave was a devil and the mule was a devil.

But as to Joodar, the fact of his mother's begging was grievous to him; and when he entered the house, he said to her, O my mother, are my two brothers well? She answered, Well. And he said, Wherefore dost thou beg in the way? She answered, O my son, in consequence of my hunger. He replied, I gave thee, before I departed, a hundred pieces of gold the first day, and a hundred pieces of gold the second day, and I gave thee a thousand pieces of gold on the day that I departed. — O my son, she said, they have cheated me, and taken them from me, saying, We desire to purchase with them merchandise. And they took them, and turned me out: so I betook myself to begging in the way, by reason of the violence of my hunger. — He then said, O my mother, no harm shall befall thee now that I have come: therefore suffer no anxiety. This is a pair of saddle-bags full of gold and jewels, and good things are abundant. — And she replied, O my son, thou art fortunate! May God be well pleased with thee, and increase his favours to thee! Arise, O my son; bring for us some bread; for I have passed the night in violent hunger, without supper. — Upon this, he laughed, and said to her, Welcome to thee, O my mother! Demand then whatever thou desirest to eat, and I will present it to thee immediately. I need not to purchase from the market, nor need I any one to cook. — So she said, O my son, I see not with thee any thing. He replied, I have with me, in the pair of saddle-bags, of every kind of viands. And she said, O my son, whatever is ready will stay hunger. — Thou hast spoken truth, he replied; for when plenty is wanting, man is content with the smallest thing; but when plenty is at hand, man desireth to eat of what is good; and I have plenty; therefore demand what thou desirest. And she said to him, O my son, some hot bread, and a piece of cheese. But he replied, O my mother, this is not suitable to thy condition. So she said to him, Thou knowest my condition; wherefore, what is suitable to my condition, thereof give me to eat. And he said, O my mother, suitable to thy condition are browned meat, and browned chickens, and boiled rice with butter and salt and pepper; and suitable to thy condition are sausages, and stuffed gourds, and stuffed lamb, and stuffed ribs of lamb, and kunáfeh with broken almonds and hazel-nuts, and honey and sugar, and katáïf, and bakláweh.²⁵ His mother therefore thought that he was laughing at her, and making jest of her: so she said to him, Yooḥ! Yooḥ! ²⁶ What hath happened unto thee? Dost thou dream, or hast thou become mad? — He asked her, Whence learnedst thou that I had become mad? She answered him, Because thou mentionest to me all kinds of excellent dishes; and who can afford their price, or who knoweth how to cook them? And he replied, By my life, I must give thee to eat of all that I have mentioned to thee, immediately. She said, I see not aught. And he said to her, Bring me the pair of saddle-bags.

She therefore brought him the pair of saddle-bags, and, feeling it, found it to be empty; and she put it before him. And he proceeded to stretch forth his hand and to take out filled dishes until he had produced to her all that he had mentioned. So his mother said to him, O my son, verily the pair of saddle-bags is small, and it was empty, with nothing in it; yet thou hast taken forth from it all these things: then where were these dishes? And he answered, O my mother, know that the Maghrabee gave me this pair of saddle-bags, and it is enchanted, and hath a servant: if a man desire anything, and recite over it the names, and say, O servant of this pair of saddle-bags, bring me such a dish! — he will bring it. Upon this, his mother said to him, Shall I stretch forth my hand and demand of him? He answered, Stretch forth thy hand. And she did so, saying, By the names that have influence over thee, O servant of this pair of saddle-bags, bring me stuffed ribs of lamb! And she saw that the dish had come into the bag: so she put forth her hand and took it, and found in it delicate stuffed ribs. Then she demanded the bread, and demanded every thing that she desired, of various kinds of viands. And he said to her, O my mother, after thou shalt have finished eating, empty the rest of the viands into other dishes than these, and put back the empty dishes into the saddle-bags; for the charm is on this condition: and take care of the pair of saddle-bags. She therefore removed the pair of saddle-bags, and took care of it. And he said to her, O my mother, conceal the secret, and keep it; and whenever thou wantest any thing, take it forth from the saddle-bags, and give alms, and feed my two brothers, whether in my presence or in my absence.

After this, he began to eat with her, and, lo, his two brothers came in to him. The news had been given to them by a man of the sons of his quarter, who said to them, Your brother hath come, mounted on a mule, with a slave before him, and wearing a dress of which the like existeth not. So they said, one to the other, Would that we had not distressed our mother! She will doubtless acquaint him with that which we have done unto her. Oh, how we shall be disgraced by him! — But one of them said, Our mother is tender-hearted; and if she inform him, our brother is more tender-hearted than she towards us; and when we excuse ourselves to him, he will accept our excuse. — Then they went in to him; and he rose to them upon his feet, and saluted them with the best salutation, and said to them, Sit and eat.

So they sat and ate; and they were weak from hunger; wherefore they ceased not to eat until they were satiated. And Joodar said to them, O my brothers, take the remainder of the food, and distribute it to the poor and needy. They replied, O our brother, leave it that we may make our supper of it. But he said to them, At the time of supper there will be brought to you more than this. They therefore took forth the rest of the viands, and to every poor person who passed by them they said, Take and eat—until nothing remained. Then they took back the dishes, and Joodar said to his mother, Put them into the saddle-bags.

And in the evening, he entered the saloon, and took forth from the saddle-bags a table of forty different dishes; after which, he went up [into another apartment]; and when he sat between his two brothers, he said to his mother, Bring the supper. So when she entered the saloon, she saw the dishes full; and she placed the table, and brought the dishes, one after another, until the forty dishes were all put. They then supped; and after the supper, Joodar said, Take ye, and feed the poor and the needy. Accordingly they took the rest of the viands, and distributed them. And after they had supped, Joodar produced to them sweetmeats, of which they ate; and what remained of them, Joodar told them to give to the neighbours to eat. On the following day they breakfasted in the same manner, and they ceased not to remain in this state for a period of ten days.

Then Sálím said to Seleem, What is the cause of this thing, that our brother produceth to us a feast in the morning, and a feast at noon, and a feast at sunset, and, at the end of the night, sweetmeats, and that every thing that remaineth he distributeth to the poor? This is the action of Sultáns. And whence came to him this prosperity? ²⁷ We never see him buy any thing, nor doth he light a fire, nor hath he either kitchen or cook. Shall we not inquire respecting these various viands, and respecting these sweetmeats?—His brother replied, By Allah, I know not. But knowest thou any one who will acquaint us with the truth of this matter?—None, said Sálím, will acquaint us except our mother.—They therefore contrived for themselves a stratagem, and, going to their mother during the absence of their brother, they said, O our mother, we are hungry. So she replied, Rejoice at good news. And she entered the saloon, demanded of the servant of the pair of saddle-bags, and brought out to them hot viands; whereupon they said, O our mother, this food is hot, and thou hast not cooked, nor blown [a fire]. She replied, It is from the pair of saddle-bags. And they said to her, What is this pair of saddle-bags? She answered them, It is enchanted, and the demand is obtained by virtue of the charm. And she acquainted them with the case, and said to them, Conceal the secret. They replied, The secret is concealed, O our mother; but teach us the mode of this. She therefore taught them; and they proceeded to put forth their hands, and to take out the things that they demanded. And their brother had no knowledge thereof.

to Seleem, O my brother, how long shall we remain with Joodar like servants, and eat his alms? Shall we not employ a stratagem against him, and take this pair of saddle-bags, and enjoy it? — How, said Seleem, shall the stratagem be contrived? Sálím answered, We will sell our brother to the Captain of the Sea of Es-Suweys.²⁸ — And how shall we manage, asked the other, that we may sell him? — I will go with thee, answered Sálím, to that Captain, and we will invite him to an entertainment with two of his company; and what I shall say to Joodar, do thou declare me to be veracious therein; and at the close of the night, I will show thee what I will do.

Thus they agreed to sell their brother. They went to the house of the Captain of the Sea of Es-Suweys, and Sálím and Seleem both went in to the Captain and said to him, O Captain, we have come to thee on account of an affair that will rejoice thee. So he replied, Good. And they said to him, We are two brothers, and we have a third brother, a profligate, in whom is no good; and our father died, leaving to us a sum of money. Then we divided the money, and he took what fell to his lot of the inheritance, and expended it in debauchery and vice; and when he was reduced to poverty, he domineered over us, and proceeded to complain against us to the oppressors, and to say, Ye two have taken my property, and the property of my father — and we referred our case to the judges, and lost the property. After this, he suffered us a while, and complained against us a second time, so that he brought us to poverty, and he desisted not from oppressing us; wherefore we have become impatient of him, and desire that thou purchase him of us. — So he said to them, Can ye employ a stratagem against him, and bring him to me here? If so, I will send him quickly to the sea. — They answered, We cannot bring him; but thou shalt be our guest, and bring with thee two; no more; and when he sleepeth, we five will assist one another against him, and seize him, and put a gag in his mouth, and take him under the covering of the night. Then thou shalt carry him forth from the house, and do with him as thou wilt. — And he said, I hear and obey. Will ye sell him for forty pieces of gold? — They answered him, Yes: and after the time of the afternoon-prayers, thou shalt come to such a quarter, where thou wilt find one of us waiting for thee. And he replied, Go ye.

They therefore sought Joodar; and after they had waited a while, Sálím advanced to him, and kissed his hand. So Joodar said to him, What dost thou want, O my brother? And he answered him, Know that I have a friend, who invited me to entertainments many times in his house during thine absence, and he is entitled to a thousand kindnesses from me, and he always treateth me with honour, as my brother knoweth. Now I saluted him to-day, and he invited me; but I said to him, I cannot quit my brother. He therefore said, Bring him with thee. And I replied, He will not consent to that; but if thou and thy brothers will be my guests — for his brothers were sitting by him; so I invited them, thinking that I should invite them and they would refuse. But when I invited him and his brothers, he consented, and said, Wait for me at the door of the Záwiyeh,²⁹ and I will come with my brothers. Therefore I fear that he will come, and am abashed at thee. Wilt thou then comfort my heart, and entertain them this night? Thy good things are abundant, O my brother. But if thou consent not, give me leave to take them into the neighbours' house. — And Joodar said to him, Wherefore shouldst thou take them into the neighbours' house? Is our house then narrow, or have we not aught wherewith to give them a supper? Shame upon thee to consult me. Thou hast nothing to require but nice viands and sweetmeats in such quantities that there shall remain of them; and if thou bring people and I be absent, demand of thy mother, and she will produce to thee viands more than enough. Go: bring them. Blessings have betided us. — So he kissed his hand, and went and sat at the door of the Zâwiyeh till after the time of afternoon-prayers; and, lo, they approached him.

He therefore took them and conducted them into the house; and when Joodar saw them, he said to them, Welcome to you! And he seated them, and made himself familiar with them, not knowing what was secretly purposed to betide him from them. Then he demanded of his mother the supper, and she proceeded to take forth from the pair of saddle-bags, while he said, Bring such a dish — until there were before them forty different dishes. So they ate until they were satisfied, and the table was removed; the sailors thinking that this hospitable entertainment proceeded from Sâlim. And when a third of the night had passed, Joodar caused the sweetmeats to be brought to them; and Sâlim was the one who served them. Joodar and Seleem sat until they expressed a desire to sleep; when Joodar arose and laid himself down, and the others lay down until he was inadvertent; whereupon they arose, and assisted each other against him, and he awoke not until the gag was in his mouth. They bound his hands behind him, carried him away, and took him forth from the pavilion under the covering of the night, and sent him to Es-Suweys, where they put shackles upon his feet, and he served in silence, and ceased not to serve in the manner of captives and slaves for a whole year. — Such was the case of Joodar.

But as to the case of his two brothers, when they arose in the morning, they went in to their mother, and said to her, O our mother, our brother Joodar hath not awoke. So she replied, Wake ye him. They asked her, Where is he lying? And she answered them, With the guests. They said, Probably he hath gone with the guests while we were asleep, O our mother. It seemeth that our brother hath tasted absence from his country, and desired to enter the hidden treasures: for we heard him speaking with the Maghrabees, and they said to him, We will take thee with us, and we will open for thee the treasure. — Hath he, she said, been with the Maghrabees? They replied, Were they not guests with us? And she said, Probably he hath gone with them; but God will direct him right. This is a fortunate person; he will certainly come back with abundant riches. — And she wept, and his separation was grievous unto her. So they said to her, O accursed, dost thou love Joodar with all this love, when, if we are absent or present, thou neither rejoicest in us, nor mournest for us? Are we not thy sons as Joodar is thy son? — She answered, Ye are my sons; but ye are wicked wretches, and ye are entitled to no favour from me; for from the day that your father died I have not experienced from you any good; and as to Joodar, I have experienced from him abundant good, and he hath comforted my heart, and treated me with honour: therefore it behooveth me to weep for him; for his kindness was shewn to me and to you.

And when they heard these words, they reviled her and beat her; and they entered, and proceeded to search for the pair of saddle-bags until they found it; and they took the jewels from the one half [of one pair of saddle-bags], and the gold from the other half, and the enchanted pair of saddle-bags also, saying to her, This was the property of our father. She replied, No, by Allah; but it is the property of your brother Joodar, who brought it from the country of the Maghrabees. They said to her, Thou liest: this was the property of our father, and we will dispose of it. So they divided it [that is, the jewels and gold,] between them; but a dissension ensued between them respecting the enchanted pair of saddle-bags. Sálím said, I will take it. And Seleem said, I will take it. And opposition took place between them. Their mother therefore said, O my sons, the pair of saddle-bags, in which were the jewels and the gold ye have divided, and this cannot be divided, nor can its value be given in money, and if it be cut in twain, its charm will be annulled; but leave it with me, and I will take forth for you what ye shall eat on every occasion, and will be content to take with you a morsel: if, moreover, ye clothe me with anything, it will be of your favour; and each of you shall establish for himself a traffic with the people. Ye are my sons, and I am your mother; then let us remain in our present state lest your brother come, in fear of disgrace. — But they accepted not her proposal. They passed the next night contending together; and a man heard them, a kowwás³⁰ belonging to the guards of the King, being a guest in a house adjoining the house of Joodar, a window of which was open. So the kowwás looked from the window, and heard the whole of the dispute, and the words that they uttered, and the division. And when the morning came, this kowwás went in to the King, whose name was Shems-ed-Dóleh,³¹ the King of Egypt in that age; and when the kowwás went in to him, he acquainted him with that which he had heard; whereupon the King sent to the two brothers of Joodar, and brought them, and subjected them to torture. So they confessed; and he took the two pairs of saddle-bags from them, and put them in prison. Then he assigned to the mother of Joodar such allowances every day as would suffice her. — Thus did it happen unto them.

Now again as to Joodar, he remained a whole year serving at Es-Suweys, and after the year, he and others were in the ship, and there rose against them a wind which cast the ship wherein they were upon a mountain, and it broke in pieces, and all that was in it was submerged. None reached the shore except Joodar; and the rest died. And when he had reached the shore, he journeyed until he came to an encampment of Arabs by water and pasture; and they asked him respecting his state; wherefore he informed them that he was a sailor in a ship, and he related to them his story. Now there was in the encampment a merchant, of the people of Juddeh; ³² and he pitied him, and said to him, Wilt thou serve us, O man of Cairo? If so, I will clothe thee, and take thee with me to Juddeh. — So he served him, and journeyed with him until they arrived at Juddeh; and the merchant treated him with much favour. Then his master the merchant desired to perform the pilgrimage, and took him with him to Mekkeh: so when they entered it, Joodar went to perform the compassings in the Temple; ³³ and while he was compassing, lo, he found his friend the Maghrabee 'Abd-Es-Samad compassing also. Therefore when the Maghrabee saw him, he saluted him, and asked him respecting his state. And he wept, and acquainted him with that which had befallen him.

And upon this the Maghrabee took him with him until he entered his house, where he treated him honourably, and clad him in a dress of which there existed not the equal; and he said to him, Evil hath quitted thee, O Joodar. He then performed for him an operation of geomancy, whereupon that which had befallen Joodar's two brothers appeared to him, and he said, Know, O Joodar, that such and such things have befallen thy two brothers, and they are confined in the prison of the King of Egypt: but thou shalt be welcome [as my guest] until thou hast accomplished thy rites of sacrifice; ³⁴ and nothing shall betide but good fortune. So Joodar said to him, O my master, wait until I go and take leave of the merchant with whom I have been living, and come back unto thee. And the Maghrabee said, Dost thou owe money? He answered, No. The Maghrabee therefore said, Go; take leave of him, and come back immediately; for bread imposeth obligation in the estimation of the ingenuous.³⁵ Accordingly he went and took leave of the merchant, and said to him, I have met my brother. And the merchant said to him, Go; bring him, and we will make for him an entertainment. But Joodar replied, It is not necessary; for he is of the people of affluence, and hath many servants. And the merchant gave him twenty pieces of gold, saying to him, Acquit me of responsibility.³⁶ So he took leave of him, and went forth from him, and, seeing a poor man, he gave him the twenty pieces of gold.

He then repaired to 'Abd-Es-Samad the Maghrabee, and he remained with him until they had accomplished the rites of the sacrifice of the pilgrimage; whereupon the Maghrabee gave him the seal-ring that he had taken forth from the treasures of Esh-Shamardal, and said to him, Take this seal-ring; for it will cause thee to attain thy desire, since it hath a servant whose name is Er-Raad el-Kásif, and whatever thou shalt require of the things of the world, rub the seal-ring, and thy servant will appear to thee [and he will bring it thee]; and whatever thou shalt command him to do, he will do it for thee. And he rubbed it before him; whereupon the servant appeared to him, calling out, At thy service, O my master! What dost thou demand? It shall be given thee. Wilt thou then render flourishing a ruined city, or ruin a city that is flourishing, or slay a King, or rout an army? — The Maghrabee replied, O Raad, this hath become thy master; and act thou well to him. Then he dismissed him, and said to Joodar, Rub the seal-ring, and its servant will appear before thee, and do thou command him to do what thou desirest: for he will not disobey thee. Repair to thy country, and take care of the ring; for thou wilt delude with it thine enemies; and be not ignorant of the potency of this ring. — Joodar therefore replied, O my master, with thy permission I will repair to my country. And the Maghrabee said to him, Rub the seal-ring: thereupon the servant will appear to thee, and mount thou upon his back; and if thou say to him, Convey me this day to my country, — he will not disobey thy command.

Joodar, upon this, bade 'Abd-Es-Samad farewell, and rubbed the seal-ring, and Er-Raad el-Kásif presented himself before him, saying to him, At thy service! Demand: it shall be given thee. — So he said to him, Convey me to Cairo this day. And he replied, That shall be done for thee. He took him up, and flew with him from the time of noon until midnight, when he alighted with him in the court of the house of his mother, and departed. He therefore went in to his mother; and when she saw him, she arose and wept, and saluted him, and informed him of that which had been done to his two brothers by the King, how he had beaten them, and taken the enchanted pair of saddle-bags and the pair of saddle-bags containing the gold and jewels. And when Joodar heard that, the state of his brothers was not a light matter to him; but he said to his mother, Grieve not for that which hath escaped thee; for instantly I will shew thee what I will do, and I will bring my brothers. Then he rubbed the seal-ring, and the servant appeared to him, saying, At thy service! Demand: it shall be given thee. — And he said to him, I command thee to bring me my two brothers from the King's prison. So he descended into the earth, and came not up save in the midst of the prison. Now Sálím and Seleem were in the most violent distress, and in great affliction, by reason of the misery of imprisonment: they had wished for death, and one of them was saying to the other, By Allah, O my brother, our trouble hath become wearisome to us, and how long shall we remain in this prison? Death in it would be ease to us.

And while they were in this state, lo, the earth clove asunder, and Er-Raad el-Kásif came forth to them, and, taking them both up, descended into the earth. They swooned in consequence of the violence of their fear; and when they recovered, they found themselves in their house, where they saw their brother sitting with his mother by his side. And he said to them, Salutations to you, O my brothers! Ye have cheered me by your presence. — Upon this, they inclined their faces towards the ground, and began to weep. But he said to them, Weep not; for the Devil and covetousness forced you to do that. How could you sell me? But I will console myself by remembering Yoosuf; for his brothers did unto him what was worse than your deed, since they cast him into the pit. Turn ye, however, with repentance unto God, and beg his forgiveness, and He will forgive you; for He is the Abundant in forgiveness, the Merciful. I have pardoned you. Welcome to you! No harm shall befall you. — And he proceeded to appease their minds until he had soothed their hearts; and he related to them all that he had suffered at Es-Suweys [and afterwards] until he met with the sheykh 'Abd-Es-Samad, informing them also of the seal-ring. So they said, O our brother, be not angry with us this time. If we return to our former conduct, do with us what thou wilt. — He replied, No harm: but tell me what the King did unto you. And they said, He beat us and threatened us, and took the two pairs of saddle-bags from us.

Thereupon he said, Will he not care? And he rubbed the seal-ring. So the servant presented himself before him. And when his brothers beheld him, they feared him, and imagined that Joodar would order the servant to slay them. They therefore went to their mother, and began to say, O our mother, we throw ourselves upon thy generosity! O our mother, intercede for us! — And she replied, O my sons, fear not. — Then Joodar said to the servant, I command thee to bring me all that is in the treasury of the King, of jewels and other things, and to leave not in it aught: also, that thou bring me the enchanted pair of saddle-bags, and the pair of saddle-bags containing the jewels [and gold], which the King took from my two brothers. So he replied, I hear and obey. And he went immediately, collected what was in the treasury, brought the two pairs of saddle-bags with the enclosed deposits, and placed all that was in the treasury before Joodar, saying, O my master, I have not left in the treasury any thing. Upon this, Joodar ordered his mother to take care of the pair of saddle-bags containing the jewels [and gold], put the enchanted pair of saddle-bags before him, and said to the servant, I command thee to build for me, during this night, a lofty palace, and to decorate it with liquid gold, and spread it with magnificent furniture, and let not morning come before thou hast completed the whole of it. The servant replied, That shall be done for thee. And he descended into the earth.

Then Joodar took forth the viands, and they ate, and enjoyed themselves, and slept. — But as to the affair of the servant, he collected his 'Óns, and gave orders to build the palace. So some of them began to hew the stones, and some to build, and some to whitewash, and some to paint, and some to spread the furniture; and the daylight came not before the order of the palace was perfect. The servant thereupon went up to Joodar, and said, O my master, the palace is finished, and its order is perfect; if then thou wilt go forth and divert thyself with a view of it, go forth.

He therefore went forth with his mother and his two brothers, and saw this palace to be one of which there existed not the like, confounding the minds by the beauty of its order. So Joodar was delighted with it, while he was yet passing along the beaten track; and with all this, he had expended nothing upon it. He then said to his mother, Wilt thou reside in this palace? She answered him, O my son, I will reside in it. And she prayed for him. Then he rubbed the seal-ring; whereupon the servant appeared, saying,

At thy service! And he said to him, I command thee to bring me forty white and beautiful slave-girls, and forty black slave-girls, and forty memlooks, and forty male black slaves. The servant replied, That shall be done for thee. And he repaired with forty of his 'Ôns to the countries of India and Es-Sind and Persia; and whenever they beheld a beautiful damsel they carried her off; and when they saw a young man, they carried him off. He sent also forty others, who brought elegant black slave-girls; and forty others brought male black slaves. All came to the abode of Joodar, and they filled it. Then he displayed them to Joodar, and they pleased him; and he said, Bring for each person a dress, of the most magnificent apparel. The servant replied, Ready. And Joodar said, Bring a dress for my mother to put on, and a dress for myself to put on. So he brought all, and clad the female slaves, and said to them, This is your mistress: therefore kiss her hand, and disobey her not, but serve her, white and black. The memlooks also clad themselves, and kissed the hand of Joodar; and his two brothers clad themselves; and Joodar became like a king, and his two brothers like wezeers. His house was ample: so he lodged Sâlim and his female slaves in one part, and Seleem and his female slaves in another part; and he and his mother resided in the new palace; each being in his abode like a king. — Such was their case.

But as to the Treasurer of the King, he desired to take some things from the treasury: so he entered, and saw not in it aught, but found it as the poet hath said, —

The chambers were like a bee-hive well stocked: when their bees quitted them, they became empty.

Upon this he uttered a great cry, and fell down in a swoon; and when he recovered, he went forth from the treasury, leaving its door open, and, going in to the King Shems-ed-Dóleh, he said, O Prince of the Faithful,⁸⁷ what we tell thee is this, that the treasury hath become empty during this night. So the King said, What hast thou done with my riches that were in my treasury? He answered, By Allah, I have not done with them aught, nor do I know the cause of their being exhausted. Yesterday I entered the treasury, and beheld it filled; and to-day I entered it, and beheld it empty, with nothing in it: yet the doors were locked, and it hath not been broken through, nor hath its wooden lock been broken, nor hath a thief entered it. And the King said, Have the two pairs of saddle-bags gone from it? The Treasurer answered, Yes. And upon this, the reason of the King fled from his head, and he rose upon his feet, and said to the Treasurer, Go before me. So he went; and the King followed him until they came to the treasury, and he found not in it aught. The King therefore was vexed, and he said, Who hath assaulted my treasury, and not feared my authority? And he was violently enraged. He then went forth, and held a court, and the great officers of the army came, every one of them imagining that the King was incensed against him; and the King said, O soldiers, know that my treasury hath been plundered during this night, and I know not who hath done this deed and assaulted me and not feared me. So they said, And how hath this happened? He replied, Ask the Treasurer. They therefore asked him, and he answered, Yesterday it was full, and to-day I entered it and beheld it empty: yet it hath not been broken through, nor hath its door been broken.

Now all the soldiers wondered at these words, and no reply had been given by them, when the kowwás, who, on a former occasion, betrayed Seleem and Sálím, came in to the King, and said, O King of the age, all the night I have been amusing myself with the sight of builders building, and when daylight came, I saw a palace constructed, the like of which existeth not. I therefore asked, and it was said to me, that Joodar had come and built this palace, and with him were memlooks and black slaves; that he had brought abundant riches, and delivered his two brothers from the prison, and was in his mansion like a Sultán. — So the King said, Examine the prison. And they examined it, and saw not Sálím and Seleem. They therefore returned, and acquainted him with that which had happened; whereupon the King said, My offender hath become manifest; for he who delivered Sálím and Seleem from the prison, and took the two pairs of saddle-bags,³⁸ is the person who took my property. And the Wezeer said, O my lord, who is he? The King answered, Their brother Joodar: but, O Wezeer, send to him an Emeer with fifty men to seize him and his two brothers, and to put seals upon all his property, and to bring them to me that I may hang them. And he was violently enraged, and said, Oh! quickly send to them an Emeer to bring them to me that I may put them to death. But the Wezeer said to him, Be clement, for God is clement: He is not hasty towards his servant when he disobeyeth Him. He who hath built a palace in one night, as they have said, no one in the world can be compared with him; and I fear for the Emeer that some trouble may befall him from Joodar. Have patience, therefore, that I may contrive for thee some plan, or till thou see the truth of the case; and what thou desirest thou wilt attain, O King of the age: — So the King said, Contrive for me a plan, O Wezeer. The Wezeer replied, Send to him the Emeer, and invite him to an entertainment. Then I will pay all attention to him for thee, and make a show of friendship to him, and ask him respecting his state. After that, thou shalt see: if his courage be strong, we will employ some stratagem against him; and if his courage be weak, seize thou him, and do with him as thou desirest. — And the King said, Send and invite him.

Accordingly he ordered an Emeer, whose name was the Emeer 'Osmán, to go to Joodar and invite him, and say to him, The King summoneth thee to an entertainment. And the King said to him, Return not but with him. Now that Emeer was stupid, and haughty in mind; and when he descended, he saw before the door of the palace [of Joodar] a eunuch sitting upon a chair; and when the Emeer 'Osmán arrived at the palace, the eunuch rose not to him, but remained as though no one were approaching him: yet there were with the Emeer 'Osmán fifty men. And the Emeer 'Osmán came up, and said to him, O slave, where is thy master? He answered him, In the palace. And he proceeded to speak to him in a reclining posture. So the Emeer 'Osmán was enraged, and said to him, O ill-omened slave, art thou not abashed at me, that when I speak to thee thou liest down like those who have no shame? But he replied, Go along. Be not loquacious.— And the Emeer heard not from him these words before he became infused with rage, and, drawing forth his mace, he was about to beat the eunuch, not knowing that he was a devil. When the eunuch, however, saw that he had drawn forth the mace, he arose and rushed upon him, took the mace from him, and struck him four blows; and when the fifty men saw it, the beating of their master displeased them: they therefore drew their swords, and desired to slay the slave. But he said to them, Do ye draw the swords, O dogs? And he fell upon them, breaking the bones of every one whom he smote with the mace, and drowning him in blood.

So they were routed before him, and ceased not to flee, while he still beat them until they were far from the door of the palace, when he returned, and seated himself again upon his chair, not caring for any one. But as to the Emeer 'Osmán and his company, they returned routed and beaten until they stood before the King Shems-ed-Dóleh, and they acquainted him with that which had happened unto them, the Emeer 'Osmán saying to the King, O King of the age, when I arrived at the door of the palace, I saw a eunuch sitting at the door, upon a chair of gold, and he was haughty: when he beheld me approaching him, he laid himself down, after he had been sitting, and despised me, not rising to me; and I began to speak to him; but he replied to me still lying down. So passion seized me, and I drew forth the mace upon him, and was about to beat him; but he took the mace from me, and beat me with it. He beat also my party, breaking their heads, and we fled from before him, and could not prevail against him.— Upon this, the King was enraged, and he said, Let a hundred men go down to him. They therefore went down to him, and approached him; but he rose against them with the mace, and ceased not to deal his blows among them until they fled from before him; whereupon he returned, and seated himself again upon the chair. So the hundred men went back; and when they came to the King, they informed him, saying to him, O King of the age, we have fled from before him in our fear of him. Then the King said, Let two hundred go down. And they went down; but he routed them, and they returned. Therefore the King said to the Wezeer, I require thee, O Wezeer, to go down with five hundred men, and to bring me this eunuch quickly, together with his master Joodar and his two brothers. He replied, O King of the age, I need not soldiers; but I will go alone to him, without weapons. And the King said, Go, and do what thou shalt see fit.

So the Wezeer threw down the weapon, clad himself in a white vesture,³⁹ and, taking in his hand a string of beads, walked alone, without a second person, until he arrived at the palace of Joodar, and saw the slave sitting. And when he saw him, he approached him without weapon, and seated himself by his side in a polite manner. Then he said, Peace be on you! And the slave replied, And on you be peace, O human being! What dost thou desire? — When the Wezeer therefore heard him say, O human being — he knew that he was of the Jinn, and he trembled by reason of his fear, and said to him, O my master, is thy master Joodar here? The slave answered, Yes, in the palace. And the Wezeer said to him, O my master, go to him and say to him, The King Shems-ed-Dóleh inviteth thee, and maketh for thee a banquet, and greeteth thee with peace, saying to thee, Honour my abode, and eat of my banquet. So the slave replied, Stay thou here until I consult him. Accordingly the Wezeer stayed, in a respectful posture, and the Márid went up into the palace, and said to Joodar, Know, O my master, that the King sent unto thee an Emeer, and I beat him; and there were with him fifty men, and I routed them. Then he sent a hundred men, and I beat them. Then he sent two hundred men, and I routed them. Then he sent unto thee the Wezeer, without weapons, inviting thee to visit him and to eat of his banquet. What then sayest thou? — Joodar replied, Go, bring the Wezeer hither. So he descended from the palace, and said to him, O Wezeer, answer the summons of my master. And he replied, On the head!

He ascended, and went in to Joodar, and he saw him to be greater than the King, sitting upon furniture the like of which the King could not spread. His mind was confounded by the beauty of the palace, and by its painting and its furniture, which made the Wezeer seem in comparison with him to be a pauper. And he kissed the ground, and prayed for him; and Joodar said to him, What is thy business, O Wezeer? — O my master, he answered, the King Shems-ed-Dóleh, thy friend, greeteth thee with peace, and is desirous of beholding thy face, and he hath made for thee a banquet. Wilt thou then comfort his heart? — Joodar replied, Since he is my friend, salute him, and tell him to come unto me. So the Wezeer said to him, On the head. Then Joodar took forth the seal-ring, and rubbed it, and the servant presented himself; and Joodar said to him, Bring me a dress, of the best of apparel. He therefore brought him a dress; and Joodar said, Put on this, O Wezeer. And he put it on. Joodar then said to him, Go: acquaint the King with that which I have said. And he descended, wearing that dress, the like of which he had never before worn, and, going in to the King, informed him of the state of Joodar, and praised the palace with the things that it contained; and he said, Joodar hath invited thee.

Upon this, the King said, Rise, O soldiers! So all of them rose upon their feet. And he said, Mount your horses, and bring unto me my courser, that we may go to Joodar. Then the King mounted, and took the troops, and they repaired to Joodar's palace. — Now as to Joodar, he said to the Márid, I desire that thou bring us some 'Efreet of thy 'Óns, in the form of human beings, to be as soldiers, and to stand in the court of the palace, that the King may see them, and that they may terrify him and inspire him with dread, so that his heart may tremble, and he may know that my power is greater than his. He therefore brought two hundred in the garb of soldiers, equipped with magnificent arms; and they were strong and bulky.—So when the King arrived, he beheld the strong and bulky troop, and his heart feared them. Then he went up into the palace, and entered into the presence of Joodar, whom he saw sitting in a state in which no king nor sultán had sat; and he saluted him, and raised his hands to his head before him. But Joodar rose not to him, nor paid him honour, nor did he say to him, Sit:—he left him standing till fear seized him, and he became unable either to sit or to go forth, and began to say within himself, Were he in fear of me, he had not left me unheeded, and probably he will do me some hurt, on account of that which I did with his brothers. Then Joodar said, O King of the age, it is not the proper business of such as you to tyrannize over men and to take their goods. So he replied, O my master, blame me not; for covetousness constrained me to do so, and destiny took effect; and were it not for offence, there were no such thing as forgiveness. And he proceeded to excuse himself to him for his former conduct, and to seek of him pardon and lenity, to such a degree that among his expressions of apology he recited to him these verses:—

O thou of noble ancestors and gentle disposition, blame me not for that which hath proceeded from me.

If thou be an oppressor, we pardon thee: and if I be an oppressor, thou wilt pardon me.⁴⁰

And he ceased not to humble himself before him until he said to him, May God pardon thee!—and ordered him to sit. So he sat; and Joodar invested him with the garments of mercy,⁴¹ and ordered his two brothers to spread the table. Then, when they had eaten, he clad the King's company, and treated them with honour; and after that, he ordered the King to depart.

He therefore went forth from the abode of Joodar; and every day after, he used to go thither, and used not to hold his court save in Joodar's abode. Their mutual familiarity and friendship increased, and they continued a while in this state. But after that, the King had a private interview with his Wezeer, and said to him, O Wezeer, I fear lest Joodar should slay me, and take the kingdom from me. The Wezeer however replied, O King of the age, as to the act of taking the kingdom, fear it not; for the state which Joodar enjoyeth is more exalted than the state of the King, and the taking of the kingdom would be a lowering of his dignity; but if thou fearest that he will slay thee, thou hast a daughter: so marry her to him, and thou and he will be of one condition. And he replied, O Wezeer, thou shalt be an intermediary between me and him. The Wezeer therefore said to him, Invite him to an entertainment in thy palace; then we will sit up at night in a saloon, and command thou thy daughter to deck herself in the most magnificent manner, and to pass by him from the door of the saloon; for as soon as he seeth her, he will be enamoured of her; and when we perceive in him that result, I will incline towards him and inform him that she is thy daughter, and I will keep up a conversation with him as though thou hadst no knowledge of the matter, so that he shall demand her of thee in marriage.

When thou shalt have married to him the damsel, thou and he will be one, and thou wilt be secure from any injury on his part; and if he die, thou wilt inherit largely from him. — So the King replied, Thou hast spoken truth, O my Wezeer. And he prepared the entertainment, and invited him.

Joodar therefore came to the Sultán's palace, and they sat in the saloon in an exceeding sociableness until the close of the day. The King had sent to his wife, desiring her to deck the damsel in the most magnificent manner, and to pass with her by the door of the saloon. And she did as he had said. She passed by with the damsel, and Joodar saw her; and she was endowed with beauty and loveliness, having no equal. So when Joodar took an accurate view of her, he said, Ah! — and his limbs became loosened, passion and desire became violent in him, ecstasy and distraction seized him, and his complexion became sallow. The Wezeer therefore said to him, May no harm befall thee, O my master! Wherefore do I see thee changed and in pain? — And he said, O Wezeer, whose daughter is this damsel? for she hath captivated me, and deprived me of my reason. So he answered, This is the daughter of thy friend the King; and if she please thee, I will speak with the King, that he may marry her to thee. And Joodar said, O Wezeer, speak to him, and I, by my life, will give thee what thou shalt desire, and will give to the King what he shall desire as her dowry, and we will become friends and connexions. The Wezeer replied, Thy desire must be accomplished. Then the Wezeer spoke to the King privately, saying to him, O King of the age, Joodar is thy friend, and desireth affinity to thee, and he hath requested thee, by me, to marry to him thy daughter, the lady Asiyeh: therefore disappoint me not, but accept my intercession; and whatever thou shalt demand as her dowry, he will give thee. And the King replied, The dowry hath been paid me,⁴² and the damsel is a slave-girl in his service: I will marry her to him, and he will do a favour by accepting her.

They passed that night, and the King arose in the morning and held a court, at which he caused the high and the low to be present, and the Sheykh el-Islám⁴³ was there also. Then Joodar demanded the damsel in marriage, and the King said, The dowry hath been paid. So they performed the ceremony of the marriage-contract; and Joodar sent desiring that the pair of saddle-bags containing the jewels [and gold] should be brought, and he gave it to the King as the dowry of the damsel. The drums were beaten and the pipes were sounded, the festal necklaces were strung, and Joodar took the damsel as his wife. Thus he and the King became as one, and they remained together for a period of days. Then the King died, and the troops desired Joodar as Sultán, and they ceased not to urge him, while he refused to comply with their request, until at last he consented. So they made him Sultán; and he gave orders to build a congregational mosque over the sepulchre of the King Shems-ed-Dóleh, and endowed it; and it is in the district of El-Bundukáneeyeen.⁴⁴ The house of Joodar was in the quarter of El-Yemáneeyeh; and when he became Sultán, he constructed buildings and a congregational mosque, and the quarter hath been named after him, its name having become — the Quarter of El-Joodareeyeh.⁴⁵ He continued as King some time, and made his two brothers wezeers; Sálím the wezeer of his right hand, and Seleem the wezeer of his left; and they remained thus one year, and no more.

After this, Sálím said to Seleem, O my brother, how long shall this state last? Shall we pass our lives entirely as servants of Joodar, and shall we not enjoy dominion nor prosperity so long as Joodar is living? — And how shall we manage to kill him, said Seleem, and to take from him the seal-ring and the pair of saddle-bags? Thou art more knowing than I: therefore contrive for us a stratagem in order that we may kill him thereby. — Sálím said, If I contrive for thee a stratagem by which to kill him, wilt thou consent that I shall be Sultán, and that thou shalt be wezeer of the right hand, and that the seal-ring shall be mine and the pair of saddle-bags thine? Seleem answered, I consent. So they agreed to kill Joodar, on account of the love of the world and of dominion. Then Seleem and Sálím contrived a stratagem against Joodar, and said to him, O our brother, we desire that we may glory in thee, and that thou wouldst enter our houses, and eat of our banquet, and comfort our heart. And they proceeded to beguile him, saying to him, Comfort our heart, and eat of our banquet. So he replied, No harm. In the house of which of you will be the banquet? — Sálím answered, In my house; and after thou shalt have eaten of my banquet, thou shalt eat of the banquet of my brother. And he said, No harm: — and went with him to his house.

Then his brother placed the food for him, and put into it poison; and when he had eaten, his flesh fell to pieces with his bones. So upon this, Sálím arose to take the seal-ring from his finger; but it resisted his attempt: therefore he cut off his finger with a knife. He then rubbed the ring, and the Márid presented himself to him, saying, At thy service! Demand then what thou wilt. — And he said to him, Seize my brother, and slay him, and take up the two, the poisoned and the slain, and throw them before the troops. Accordingly he took Seleem and slew him, and took up the two, and, going forth with them, cast them before the great officers of the army. They were sitting at the table in the mak'ad of the house, eating; and when they beheld Joodar and Seleem killed, they raised their hands from the food, and fear disturbed them, and they said to the Márid, Who hath done these deeds with the King and the Wezeer? So he answered them, Their brother Sálím.

And, lo, Sálím approached them, and said, O soldiers, eat, and enjoy yourselves; for I have obtained possession of the seal-ring from my brother Joodar, and this Márid is the servant of the ring; he who is before you. I ordered him to slay my brother Seleem, that he might not contend with me for the kingdom, because he was treacherous, and I feared that he would act treacherously towards me. And now this Joodar hath been put to death, and I have become Sultán over you. Do ye accept me, or shall I rub the ring, and shall its servant slay you, great and small? — They answered him,

We accept thee as King and Sultán. Then he gave orders to bury his two brothers, and held a court; and some of the people attended the funeral, while others walked before him in the state-procession. And when they came to the court, he seated himself upon the throne, and they swore allegiance to him as King; after which he said, I desire to perform the contract of my marriage to the wife of my brother. They replied, When the period of widowhood ⁴⁶ shall have expired. But he said to them, I know not a period of widowhood nor anything else. By my head, I must take her as my wife this night. — So they performed the ceremony of the contract for him, and sent and informed the wife of Joodar, the daughter of Shems-ed-Dóleh; and she replied, Invite him to come in. And when he came in to her, she made a show of joy to him, receiving him with expressions of welcome. But she put poison for him in the water, and destroyed him. Then she took the seal-ring and broke it, that no one might thereafter possess it; and she rent the pair of saddle-bags; after which she sent and informed the Sheykh el-Islám, and sent a message to him and the people, saying to them, Choose for yourselves a King to be Sultán over you.

This is what hath come down to us of the Story of Joodar, entire and complete.⁴⁷

JULLANÁR, PRINCESS OF THE SEA

THERE was, in olden time, and in an ancient age and period, in the land of the Persians, a King named Sháh-Zemán,¹ and the place of his residence was Khurásán. He had a hundred concubines; but he had not been blest, during his whole life, with a male child by any of them, nor a female; and he reflected upon this, one day, and lamented that the greater portion of his life had passed, and he had not been blessed with a male child to inherit the kingdom after him as he had inherited it from his fathers and forefathers. So the utmost grief, and violent vexation, befell him on this account.

Now while he was sitting one day, one of his memlooks came in to him, and said to him, O my lord, at the door is a slave-girl with a merchant: none more beautiful than she hath been seen. And he replied, Bring to me the merchant and the slave-girl. The merchant and the slave-girl therefore came to him; and when he saw her, he found her to resemble the Rudeynée² lance. She was wrapped in an izár of silk embroidered with gold, and the merchant uncovered her face, whereupon the place was illuminated by her beauty, and there hung down from her forehead seven locks of hair reaching to her anklets, like the tails of horses. She had eyes bordered with kohl, and heavy hips, and slender waist: she was such as would cure the malady of the sick, and extinguish the fire of the thirsty, and was as the poet hath said in these verses: —

I am enamoured of her: she is perfect in beauty, and perfect also in gravity and in dignity.

She is neither tall nor short; but her hips are such that the izár is too narrow for them. Her stature is a mean between the small and the large: so there is neither tallness nor shortness to find fault with.

Her hair reacheth to her anklets [and is black as night,] but her face is ever like the day.

The King, therefore, wondered at the sight of her, and at her beauty and loveliness, and her stature and justness of form; and he said to the merchant, O sheykh, for how much is this damsel to be sold? The merchant answered, O my lord, I purchased her for two thousand pieces of gold of the merchant who owned her before me, and I have been for three years travelling with her, and she hath cost, to the period of her arrival at this place, three thousand pieces of gold; and she is a present from me unto thee. Upon this, the King conferred upon him a magnificent robe of honour, and gave orders to present him with ten thousand pieces of gold. So he took them, and kissed the hands of the King, thanking him for his bounty and beneficence, and departed. Then the King committed the damsel to the tire-women, saying to them, Amend the state of this damsel, and deck her, and furnish for her a private chamber, and take her into it. He also gave orders to his chamberlains that every thing which she required should be conveyed to her. The seat of government where he resided was on the shore of the sea, and his city was called the White City.³ And they conducted the damsel into a private chamber, which chamber had windows overlooking the sea; and the King commanded his chamberlains to close all the doors upon her after taking to her all that she required.

The King then went in to visit the damsel; but she rose not to him, nor took any notice of him. So the King said, It seemeth that she hath been with people who have not taught her good manners. And looking at the damsel, he saw her to be a person surpassing in beauty and loveliness, and in stature and justness of form; her face was like the disk of the moon at the full, or the shining sun in the clear sky; and he wondered at her beauty and loveliness, and stature and justness of form, extolling the perfection of God, the Creator: lauded be his power! then the King advanced to the damsel, and seated himself by her side, pressed her to his bosom, and seated her upon his thigh; and he kissed her lips, which he found to be sweeter than honey. After this, he gave orders to bring tables of the richest viands, comprising dishes of every kind; and the King ate, and put morsels into her mouth until she was satisfied; but she spoke not a single word. The King talked to her, and inquired of her her name; but she was silent, not uttering a word, nor returning him an answer, ceasing not to hang down her head towards the ground; and what protected her from the anger of the King was the excess of her beauty and loveliness, and her tenderness of manner. So the King said within himself, Extolled be the perfection of God, the Creator of this damsel! How elegant is she, saving that she doth not speak! But perfection belongeth unto God, whose name be exalted! — Then the King asked the female slaves whether she had spoken; and they answered him, From the time of her arrival to the present moment she hath not spoken one word, and we have not heard her talk.

The King therefore caused some of the female slaves and concubines to come, and ordered them to sing to her, and to make merry with her, thinking that then she might perhaps speak. Accordingly the female slaves and concubines played before her with all kinds of musical instruments, and enacted sports and other performances, and they sang so that every one who was present was moved with delight, except the damsel, who looked at them and was silent, neither laughing nor speaking. So the heart of the King was contracted. He however inclined to her entirely, paying no regard to others, but relinquishing all the rest of his concubines and favourites.

He remained with her a whole year, which seemed as one day, and still she spoke not; and he said to her one day, when his love of her, and his passion, were excessive, O desire of souls, verily the love I have for thee is great, and I have relinquished for thy sake all my female slaves, and the concubines and the women and the favourites, and made thee my worldly portion, and been patient with thee a whole year. I beg God (whose name be exalted!) that He will, in his grace, soften thy heart towards me, and that thou mayest speak to me. Or, if thou be dumb, inform me by a sign, that I may give up hope of thy speaking. I also beg of God (whose perfection be extolled!) that He will bless me by thee with a male child that may inherit my kingdom after me; for I am single and solitary, having none to be my heir, and my age hath become great. I conjure thee then by Allah, if thou love me, that thou return me a reply. — And upon this, the damsel hung down her head towards the ground, meditating. Then she raised her head, and smiled in the face of the King, whereat it appeared to the King that lightning filled the private chamber; and she said, O magnanimous King, and bold lion, God hath answered thy prayer; for I am about to bear thee issue, and the time is [almost] come. But I know not whether the child is male or female. And were it not for my being in this state, I had not spoken to thee one word. — And when the King heard what she said, his face brightened up with joy and happiness, and he kissed her head and her hands by reason of the violence of his joy, and said, Praise be to God who hath favoured me with things that I desired; the first, thy speaking, and the second, thy information that thou art about to bear me issue.

Then the King arose and went forth from her, and seated himself upon the throne of his kingdom in a state of exceeding happiness; and he ordered the Wezeer to give out to the poor and the needy and the widows and others a hundred thousand pieces of gold as a thank-offering to God (whose name be exalted!) and an alms on his part. So the Wezeer did as the King had commanded him. And after that, the King went in to the damsel, and sat with her, and embraced her and pressed her to his bosom, saying to her, O my mistress, who ownest me as thy slave, wherefore hath been this silence, seeing that thou hast been with me a whole year, night and day, awake and asleep, yet hast not spoken to me during this year, except on this day? What then hath been the cause of thy silence?

The damsel answered, Hear, O King of the age, and know that I am a poor person, a stranger, brokenhearted: I have become separated from my mother and my family and my brother. And when the King heard her words, he knew her desire, and he replied, As to thy saying that thou art poor, there is no occasion for such an assertion; for all my kingdom and my goods and possessions are at thy service, and I also have become thy memlook: and as to thy saying, I have become separated from my mother and my family and my brother — inform me in what place they are, and I will send to them, and bring them to thee. So she said to him, Know, O fortunate King, that my name is Jullanár⁴ of the Sea. My father was one of the Kings of the Sea, and he died, and left to us the kingdom; but while we were enjoying it, one of the Kings came upon us, and took the kingdom from our hands. I have also a brother named Sáleh,⁵ and my mother is of the women of the sea; and I quarrelled with my brother, and swore that I would throw myself into the hands of a man of the inhabitants of the land. Accordingly I came forth from the sea, and sat upon the shore of an island in the moonlight, and there passed by me a man who took me and conducted me to his abode, and desired to make me his concubine; but I smote him upon his head, and he almost died; wherefore he went forth and sold me to this man from whom thou tookest me, and he was an excellent, virtuous man, a person of religion and fidelity and kindness. But had not thy heart loved me, and hadst thou not preferred me above all thy concubines, I had not remained with thee one hour; for I should have cast myself into the sea from this window, and gone to my mother and my people. I was ashamed, however, to go to them in the state in which I am; for they would imagine evil of me, and would not believe me, even though I should swear to them, were I to tell them that a King had purchased me with his money, and had made me his worldly portion, and chosen me in preference to his wives and all that his right hand possessed. This is my story, and peace be on thee!

And when he heard her words, he thanked her, and kissed her between her eyes, and said to her, By Allah, O my mistress, and light of my eyes, I cannot endure thy separation for one hour; and if thou quit me, I shall die instantly. How then shall the affair be? — She answered, O my master, the time of the birth is near, and my family must come. — And how, said the King, do they walk in the sea without being wetted? She answered, We walk in the sea as ye walk upon the land, through the influence of the names engraved upon the seal of Suleymán the son of Dáood, upon both of whom be peace! But, O King, when my family and my brethren come, I will inform them that thou boughtest me with thy money, and hast treated me with kindness and beneficence, and it will be meet that thou confirm my assertion to them. They will also see thy state with their eyes, and will know that thou art a King, the son of a King. — And thereupon the King said, O my mistress, do what seemeth fit to thee, and what thou wishest; for I will comply with thy desire in all that thou wilt do. And the damsel said, Know, O King of the age, that we walk in the sea with our eyes open, and see what is in it, and we see the sun and the moon and the stars of the sky as on the face of the earth, and this hurteth us not. Know also, that in the sea are many peoples and various forms of all the kinds that are on the land; and know, moreover, that all that is on the land, in comparison with what is in the sea, is a very small matter. — And the King wondered at her words.⁶

Then the damsel took forth from her shoulders two pieces of Kamáree⁷ aloes-wood, and took a bit of them, and, having lighted a fire in a perfuming-vessel, threw into it that bit, and she uttered a loud whistle, and proceeded to speak words which no one understood; whereupon a great smoke arose, while the King looked on. After this, she said to the King, O my lord, arise and conceal thyself in a closet, that I may shew thee my brother and my mother and my family without their seeing thee; for I desire to bring them, and thou shalt see in this place, at this time, a wonder, and shalt wonder at the various shapes and strange forms that God (whose name be exalted!) hath created. So the King arose immediately, and entered a closet, and looked to see what she would do. And she proceeded to burn perfume and repeat spells until the sea foamed and was agitated, and there came forth from it a young man of comely form, of beautiful countenance, like the moon at the full, with shining forehead, and red cheek, and hair resembling pearls and jewels; he was, of all the creation, the most like to his sister, and the tongue of the case itself seemed to recite in his praise these verses: —

The moon becometh perfect once in each month; but the loveliness of thy face is perfect every day.

Its abode is in the heart of one sign at a time; but thine abode is in all hearts at once.

Afterwards, there came forth from the sea a grizzly-haired old woman, and with her five damsels, resembling moons, and bearing a likeness to the damsel whose name was Jullanár. Then the King saw the young man and the old woman and the damsels walk upon the surface of the water until they came to the damsel Jullanár; and when they drew near to the window, and Jullanár beheld them, she rose to them and met them with joy and happiness. On their seeing her, they knew her, and they went in to her and embraced her, weeping violently; and they said to her, O Jullanár, how is it that thou leavest us for four years, and we know not the place in which thou art? By Allah, the world was contracted unto us, by reason of the distress occasioned by the separation, and we had no delight in food nor in drink a single day, weeping night and day on account of the excess of our longing to see thee. — Then the damsel began to kiss the hand of the young man her brother, and the hand of her mother, and so also the hands of the daughters of her uncle, and they sat with her a while, asking her respecting her state, and the things that had happened to her, and her present condition.

So she said to them, Know ye, that when I quitted you, and came forth from the sea, I sat upon the shore of an island, and a man took me, and sold me to a merchant, and the merchant brought me to this city, and sold me to its King for ten thousand pieces of gold. Then he treated me with attention, and forsook all his concubines and his women and his favourites for my sake, and was diverted by his regard for me from every thing that he possessed and what was in his city. — And when her brother heard her words, he said, Praise be to God who hath reunited us with thee! But it is my desire, O my sister, that thou wouldst arise and go with us to our country and our family.

So when the King heard the words of her brother, his reason fled in consequence of his fear lest the damsel should accept the proposal of her brother, and he could not prevent her, though he was inflamed with love of her; wherefore he became perplexed, in violent fear of her separation. But as to the damsel Jullanár, on hearing the words of her brother, she said, By Allah, O my brother, the man who purchased me is the King of this city, and he is a great King, and a man of wisdom, generous, of the utmost liberality. He hath treated me with honour, and he is a person of kindness, and of great wealth, but hath no male child nor a female. He hath shewn favour to me, and acted well to me in every respect; and from the day when I came to him to the present time, I have not heard from him a bad word to grieve my heart; but he hath not ceased to treat me with courtesy, and hath done nothing without consulting me, and I am living with him in the best of states, and the most perfect of enjoyments. Moreover, if I quitted him, he would perish: for he can never endure my separation even for a single hour. I also, if I quitted him, should die, by reason of the violence of my love for him in consequence of the excess of his kindness to me during the period of my residence with him; for if my father were living, my condition with him would not be like my condition with this great, glorious King. Ye have seen, too, that I am about to bear him issue; and praise be to God who hath made me to be a daughter of a King of the Sea, and my husband the greatest of the Kings of the Land. God (whose name be exalted!) afflicted me not, but compensated me well; and as the King hath not a male child nor a female, I beg God (whose name be exalted!) to bless me with a male child that may inherit of this great King these buildings and palaces and possessions of which God hath made him owner.

And when her brother, and the daughters of her uncle, heard her words, their eyes became cheerful thereat, and they said to her, O Jullanár, thou knowest the place which thou hast in our estimation, and art acquainted with our affection for thee, and thou art assured that thou art the dearest of all persons to us, and art certain that we desire for thee comfort, without trouble or toil. Therefore if thou be not in a state of comfort, arise and accompany us to our country and our family; but if thou be comfortable here, in honour and happiness, this is our desire and wish; for we desire not aught save thy comfort in every respect. — And Jullanár replied, By Allah, I am in a state of the utmost comfort and enjoyment, in honour and desirable happiness. So when the King heard these words from her, he rejoiced, and his heart became tranquillized, and he thanked her for them; his love for her increased, and penetrated to his heart's core, and he knew that she loved him as he loved her, and that she desired to remain with him to see his child which she was to bear him.

Then the damsel Jullanár of the Sea gave orders to the female slaves to bring forward the tables and the viands of all kinds; and Jullanár herself was the person who superintended the preparation of the viands in the kitchen. So the female slaves brought to them the viands and the sweetmeats and the fruits; and she ate with her family. But afterwards they said to her, O Jullanár, thy master is a man who is a stranger to us, and we have entered his abode without his permission and without his knowledge of us, and thou praisest to us his excellence, and hast also brought to us his food, and we have eaten, but have not had an interview with him, nor seen him, nor hath he seen us, nor come into our presence, nor eaten with us, that the bond of bread and salt might be established between us. And they all desisted from eating, and were enraged at her, and fire began to issue from their mouths as from cressets.⁸ So when the King beheld this, his reason fled, in consequence of the violence of his fear of them. Then Jullanár rose to them, and soothed their hearts; after which she walked along until she entered the closet in which was the King her master; and she said to him, O my master, didst thou see, and didst thou hear my thanks to thee, and my praise of thee in the presence of my family; and didst thou hear what they said to me, that they desired to take me with them to our family and our country?

The King answered her, I heard and saw. May God recompense thee for us well! By Allah, I knew not the extent of the love that thou feelest for me until this blessed hour, and I doubt not of thy love for me. — She replied, O my master, is the recompense of beneficence aught but beneficence? Thou hast treated me with beneficence, and bestowed upon me great favours, and I see that thou lovest me with the utmost love, and thou hast shewn me every kindness, and preferred me above all whom thou lovest and desirest. How then could my heart be happy to quit thee, and to depart from thee; and how could that be when thou bestowest benefits and favours upon me? Now I desire of thy goodness that thou come and salute my family, and see them, and that they may see thee, and that pleasure and mutual friendship may ensue. But know, O King of the age, that my brother and my mother and the daughters of my uncle have conceived a great love for thee in consequence of my praising thee to them, and they have said, We will not depart from thee to our country until we have an interview with the King, and salute him. So they desire to behold thee, and to become familiar with thee. — And the King said to her, I hear and obey; for this is what I desire. He then rose from his place, and went to them, and saluted them with the best salutation; and they hastened to rise to him; they met him in the most polite manner, and he sat with them in the pavilion, ate with them at the table, and remained with them for a period of thirty days. Then they desired to return to their country and abode. So they took leave of the King, and the Queen Jullanár of the Sea, and departed from them, after the King had treated them with the utmost honour.

After this, Jullanár fulfilled her period, and she gave birth to a boy, resembling the moon at the full, whereat the King experienced the utmost happiness, because he had not before been blessed with a son nor a daughter during his life. They continued the rejoicings, and the decoration [of the city], for a period of seven days, in the utmost happiness and enjoyment; and on the seventh day, the mother of the Queen Jullanár, and her brother, and the daughters of her uncle, all came, when they knew that Jullanár had given birth to her child. The King met them, rejoicing at their arrival, and said to them, I said that I would not name my son until ye should come, and that ye should name him according to your knowledge. And they named him Bedr Básim;⁹ all of them agreeing as to this name. They then presented the boy to his maternal uncle, Sáleh, who took him upon his hands, and, rising with him from among them, walked about the palace to the right and left; after which, he went forth with him from the palace, descended with him to the sea, and walked on until he became concealed from the eye of the King. So when the King saw that he had taken his son, and disappeared from him at the bottom of the sea, he despaired of him, and began to weep and wail. But Jullanár, seeing him in this state, said to him, O King of the age, fear not nor grieve for thy son; for I love my child more than thou, and my child is with my brother; therefore care not for the sea, nor fear his being drowned. If my brother knew that any injury would betide the little one, he had not done what he hath done; and presently he will bring thee thy son safe, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted!

And but a short time had elapsed when the sea was agitated and disturbed, and the uncle of the little one came forth from it, having with him the King's son safe, and he flew from the sea until he came to them, with the little one in his arms, silent, and his face resembling the moon in the night of its fulness. Then the uncle of the little one looked towards the King, and said to him, Perhaps thou fearedst some injury to thy son when I descended into the sea, having him with me. So he replied, Yes, O my master, I feared for him, and I did not imagine that he would ever come forth from it safe. And Sáleh said to him, O King of the land, we applied to his eyes a collyrium that we know, and repeated over him the names engraved upon the seal of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!); for when a child is born among us, we do to him as I have told thee. Fear not therefore, on his account, drowning nor suffocation, nor all the seas if he descend into them. Like as ye walk upon the land, we walk in the sea.

He then took forth from his pocket a case, written upon, and sealed; and he broke its seal, and scattered its contents, whereupon there fell from it strung jewels, consisting of all kinds of jacinths and other gems, together with three hundred oblong emeralds, and three hundred oblong large jewels, of the size of the eggs of the ostrich, the light of which was more resplendent than the light of the sun and the moon. And he said, O King of the age, these jewels and jacinths are a present from me unto thee; for we never brought thee a present, because we knew not the place of Jullanár's abode, nor were acquainted with any trace or tidings of her. So when we saw thee to have become united to her, and that we all had become one, we brought thee this present; and after every period of a few days, we will bring thee the like of it, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! For these jewels and jacinths with us are more plentiful than the gravel upon the land, and we know the excellent among them, and the bad, and all the ways to them, and the places where they are found, and they are easy of access to us. — And when the King looked at those jewels and jacinths, his reason was confounded and his mind was bewildered, and he said, By Allah, one of these jewels is worth my kingdom! Then the King thanked Sáleh of the Sea for his generosity, and, looking towards the Queen Jullanár, he said to her, I am abashed at thy brother; for he hath shewn favour to me, and presented me with this magnificent present, which the people of the earth would fail to procure. So Jullanár thanked her brother for that which he had done; but her brother said, O King of the age, thou hadst a prior claim upon us, and to thank thee hath been incumbent on us; for thou hast treated my sister with beneficence, and we have entered thine abode, and eaten of thy provision; and the poet hath said, —

Had I wept before she did, in my passion for Soadà, I had healed my soul before repentance came.

But she wept before I did: her tears drew mine; and I said, The merit belongs to the precedent.

Then Sáleh said, If we stood serving thee, O King of the age, a thousand years, regarding nothing else, we could not requite thee, and our doing so would be but a small thing in comparison with thy desert. — The King therefore thanked him eloquently. And Sáleh remained with the King, he and his mother and the daughters of his uncle, forty days; after which he arose and kissed the ground before the King, the husband of his sister. So the King said to him, What dost thou desire, O Sáleh? And he answered, O King of the age, thou hast conferred favours upon us, and we desire of thy goodness that thou wouldst grant us a boon, and give us permission to depart; for we have become desirous of seeing again our family and our country and our relations and our homes. We will not, however, relinquish the service of thee, nor that of my sister nor the son of my sister; and by Allah, O King of the age, to quit you is not pleasant to my heart; but how can we act, when we have been reared in the sea, and the land is not agreeable to us? — So when the King heard his words, he rose upon his feet, and bade farewell to Sáleh of the Sea and his mother and the daughters of his uncle, and they wept together on account of the separation. Then they said to the King, In a short time we shall be with you, and we will never relinquish you, but after every period of a few days we will visit you. And after this, they flew towards the sea, and descended into it, and disappeared.

The King treated Jullanár with beneficence, and honoured her exceedingly, and the little one grew up well; and his maternal uncle, with his grandmother and the daughters of his uncle, after every period of a few days used to come to the residence of the King, and to remain with him a month, and two months, and then return to their places. The boy ceased not, with increase of age, to increase in beauty and loveliness until his age became fifteen years; and he was incomparable in his perfect beauty, and his stature and his justness of form. He had learned writing and reading, and history and grammar and philology, and archery; and he learned to play with the spear; and he also learned horsemanship, and all that the sons of the Kings required. There was not one of the children of the inhabitants of the city, men and women, that talked not of the charms of that young man; for he was of surpassing loveliness and perfection; and the King loved him greatly. Then the King summoned the Wezeer and the emeers, and the lords of the empire, and the great men of the kingdom, and made them swear by binding oaths that they would make Bedr Básim King over them after his father; so they swore to him by binding oaths, and rejoiced thereat; and the King himself was beneficent to the people, courteous in speech, of auspicious aspect, saying nothing but what was for the good of the people.

And on the following day, the King mounted, together with the lords of the empire and all the emeers, and all the soldiers walked with him through the city and returned; and when they drew near to the palace, the King dismounted to wait upon his son, and he and all the emeers and the lords of the empire bore the gháshiyeh¹⁰ before him. Each one of the emeers and the lords of the empire bore the gháshiyeh a while; and they ceased not to proceed until they arrived at the vestibule of the palace; the King's son riding. Thereupon he alighted, and his father embraced him, he and the emeers, and they seated him upon the throne of the kingdom, while his father stood, as also did the emeers, before him. Then Bedr Básim judged the people, displaced the tyrannical and invested the just, and continued to give judgment until near midday, when he rose from the throne of the kingdom, and went in to his mother Jullanár of the Sea, having upon his head the crown, and resembling the moon. So when his mother saw him, and the King before him, she rose to him and kissed him, and congratulated him on his elevation to the dignity of Sultán; and she offered up a prayer in favour of him and his father for length of life, and victory over their enemies. He then sat with his mother and rested; and when the time of afternoon-prayers arrived, he rode with the emeers before him until he came to the horse-course, where he played with arms till the time of nightfall, together with his father and the lords of his empire; after which he returned to the palace, with all the people before him. Every day he used to ride to the horse-course; and when he returned, he sat to judge the people, and administered justice between the emeer and the poor man. He ceased not to do thus for a whole year; and after that, he used to ride to the chase, and to go about through the cities and provinces that were under his rule making proclamation of safety and security, and doing as do the Kings; and he was incomparable among the people of his age in glory and courage, and in justice to the people.

Now it came to pass that the old King, the father of Bedr Básim, fell sick one day, whereupon his heart throbbed, and he felt that he was about to be removed to the mansion of eternity. Then his malady increased so that he was at the point of death. He therefore summoned his son, and charged him to take care of his subjects and his mother and all the lords of his empire and all the dependants. He also made them swear and covenanted with them, that they would obey his son, a second time; and he confided in their oaths. And after this he remained a few days, and was admitted to the mercy of God, whose name be exalted! His son Bedr Básim, and his wife Jullanár and the emeers and wezeers and the lords of the empire mourned over him; and they made for him a tomb, and buried him in it, and continued the ceremonies of mourning for him a whole month. Sáleh, the brother of Jullanár, and her mother, and the daughters of her uncle, also came, and consoled them for the loss of the King; and they said, O Jullanár, if the King hath died, he hath left this ingenuous youth, and he who hath left such as he is hath not died. This is he who hath not an equal, the crushing lion, and the splendid moon. — Then the lords of the empire, and the grandees, went in to the King Bedr Básim, and said to him, O King, there is no harm in mourning for the King; but mourning becometh not any save women; therefore trouble not thy heart and ours by mourning for thy father; for he hath died and left thee, and he who hath left such as thou art hath not died. They proceeded to address him with soft words, and to console him, and after that they conducted him into the bath; and when he came forth from the bath, he put on a magnificent suit woven of gold, adorned with jewels and jacinths, and he put the royal crown upon his head, seated himself upon the throne of his kingdom, and performed the affairs of the people, deciding equitably between the strong and the weak, and exacting for the poor man his due from the emeer; wherefore the people loved him exceedingly. Thus he continued to do for the space of a whole year; and after every short period, his family of the sea visited him; so his life was pleasant, and his eye was cheerful: and he ceased not to live in this state for a length of time.

KING BEDR BÁSİM AND QUEEN JÓHARAH OF THE SEA

After this it happened that his maternal uncle came in one night to Jullanár, and saluted her; whereupon she rose to him and embraced him, and seated him by her side, and said to him, O my brother, how art thou, and how are my mother and the daughters of my uncle? He answered her, O my sister, they are well, in prosperity and great happiness, and nothing is wanting to them but the sight of thy face. Then she offered him some food, and he ate; and, conversation ensuing between them, they mentioned the King Bedr Básim, and his beauty and loveliness, and his stature and justness of form, and his horsemanship and intelligence and polite accomplishments. Now the King Bedr Básim was reclining; and when he heard his mother and his uncle mentioning him and conversing respecting him, he pretended that he was asleep, and listened to their talk. And Sáleh said to his sister Jullanár, The age of thy son is seventeen years, and he hath not married, and we fear that something may happen to him, and he may not have a son. I therefore desire to marry him to one of the Queens of the Sea, that shall be like him in beauty and loveliness. — So Jullanár replied, Mention them to me; for I know them. Accordingly he proceeded to enumerate them to her, one after another, while she said, I approve not of this for my son, nor will I marry him save to her who is like him in beauty and loveliness, and intelligence and religion, and polite accomplishments and kindness of nature, and dominion and rank and descent. And he said to her, I know not one more of the daughters of the Kings of the Sea, and I have enumerated to thee more than a hundred damsels, yet not one of them pleaseth thee: but see, O my sister, whether thy son be asleep or not. She therefore felt him, and she found that he bore the appearance of sleep: so she said to him, He is asleep: what then hast thou to say, and what is thy desire with regard to his sleeping?

He answered her, O my sister, know that I have remembered a damsel, of the damsels of the Sea, suitable to thy son; but I fear to mention her, lest thy son should be awake, and his heart should be entangled by love of her, and perhaps we may not be able to gain access to her: so he and we and the lords of his empire would be wearied, and trouble would befall us in consequence thereof. The poet hath said, —

Love, at its commencement, is like running saliva; but when it hath gained ascendancy, it is like a wide sea.

— And when his sister heard his words, she replied, Tell me what is the condition of this damsel, and what is her name; for I know the damsels of the Sea, the daughters of Kings and of others; and if I see her to be suitable to him, I will demand her in marriage of her father, though I expend upon her all that my hand possesseth. Acquaint me therefore with her, and fear not aught; for my son is asleep. — He said, I fear that he may be awake; and the poet hath said, —

I loved her when her qualities were described; for sometimes the ear loveth before the eye.

But Jullanár replied, Say, and be brief, and fear not, O my brother. And he said, By Allah, O my sister, none is suitable to thy son except the Queen Jóharah,¹¹ the daughter of the King Es-Semendel,¹² and she is like him in beauty and loveliness and elegance and perfection, and there existeth not in the sea nor on the land any one more graceful or more sweet in natural endowments than she. For she hath beauty and loveliness, and handsome stature and just form, and red cheek and bright forehead, and hair like jewels,¹³ and large black eye, and heavy hips and a slender waist, and a lovely countenance. When she looketh aside, she putteth to shame the wild cows¹⁴ and the gazelles; and when she walketh with a vacillating gait, the willow-branch is envious; and when she displayeth her countenance, she confoundeth the sun and the moon, and captivateth every beholder: she is sweet-lipped, gentle in disposition. — And when she heard the words of her brother, she replied, Thou hast spoken truth, O my brother. By Allah, I have seen her many times, and she was my companion when we were little children; but now we have no acquaintance with each other, because of the distance between us; and for eighteen years I have not seen her. By Allah, none is suitable to my son except her.

Now when Bedr Básim heard their words and understood what they said from first to last in description of the damsel that Sáleh mentioned, Jóharah the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, he became enamoured of her by the ear; but he pretended to them that he was asleep. A flame of fire was kindled in his heart on her account, and he was drowned in a sea of which neither shore nor bottom was seen. Then Sáleh looked towards his sister Jullanár, and said to her, By Allah, O my sister, there is not among the Kings of the Sea any one more stupid than her father, nor is there any of greater power than he. Therefore acquaint not thy son with the case of this damsel until we demand her in marriage for him of her father; and if he favour us by assenting to our proposal, we praise God (whose name be exalted!); and if he reject us, and marry her not to thy son, we will remain at ease, and demand in marriage another. — And when Jullanár heard what her brother Sáleh said, she replied, Excellent is the opinion that thou hast formed. Then they were silent; and they passed that night.

In the heart of the King Bedr Básim was a flame of fire, kindled by his passion for the Queen Jóharah; but he concealed his case, and said not to his mother nor to his uncle aught respecting her, though he was tortured by love of her as though he were on burning coals. And when they arose in the morning, the King and his uncle entered the bath, and washed: then they came forth, and drank some wine, and the attendants placed before them the food: so the King Bedr Básim and his mother and his uncle ate until they were satisfied, and washed their hands. And after that, Sáleh rose upon his feet, and said to the King Bedr Básim and his mother Jullanár, With your permission, I would go to my mother; for I have been with you a period of days, and the hearts of my family are troubled respecting me, and they are expecting me. But the King Bedr Básim said to his uncle Sáleh, Remain with us this day. And he complied with his request.

Bedr Básim then said Arise with us, O my uncle, and go forth with us to the garden. So they went to the garden, and proceeded to divert and recreate themselves; and the King Bedr Básim seated himself beneath a shady tree, desiring to rest and sleep; but he remembered what his uncle Sáleh had said, describing the damsel and her beauty and loveliness, and he shed many tears, and recited these two verses: —

Were it said to me, while the flame is burning within me, and the fire blazing in my heart and bowels, Wouldst thou rather that thou shouldst behold them, or a draught of pure water? — I would answer, Them.

Then he lamented and groaned and wept, and recited these two other verses: —

Who will save me from the love of a charming gazelle, with a face like the sun: nay, more lovely?
My heart was at ease, free from love of her; but now burneth with passion for the daughter of Es-Semendel.

So when his uncle Sáleh heard what he said, he struck hand upon hand, and said, There is no deity but God: Mohammad is the Apostle of God: and there is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Then he said to him, Didst thou hear, O my son, what I and thy mother said respecting the Queen Jóharah, and our mention of her qualities? Bedr Básim answered, Yes, O my uncle, and I became enamoured of her from hearsay, when I heard what ye said. My heart is devoted to her, and I have not patience to remain absent from her. — Sáleh therefore said to him, O King, let us return to thy mother and acquaint her with the case, and I will ask her to permit me to take thee with me and to demand in marriage for thee the Queen Jóharah. Then we will bid her farewell, and I will return with thee; for I fear that, if I took thee and went without her permission, she would be incensed against me; and she would be right, as I should be the cause of your separation, like as I was the cause of her separation from us. The city, too, would be without a King, its people having none to govern them, and to see to their cases: so the state of the empire would become adverse unto thee, and the kingdom would depart from thy hand. — But when Bedr Básim heard the words of his uncle Sáleh, he replied, Know, O my uncle, that if I return to my mother and consult her on this subject she will not allow me to do it; therefore I will not return to her, nor consult her ever. And he wept before his uncle, and said to him, I will go with thee, and I will not inform her, and then I will return. So when Sáleh heard the words of his sister's son, he was perplexed at his case, and said, I beg aid of God (whose name be exalted!) in every circumstance.

Then Sáleh, seeing his sister's son in this state, and knowing that he desired not to return to his mother, but would go with him, took from his finger a seal-ring on which were engraved some of the names of God (whose name be exalted!), and handed it to the King Bedr Básim, saying to him, Put this upon thy finger, and thou wilt be secure from drowning and from other accidents, and from the noxiousness of the beasts of the sea and its great fishes. So the King Bedr Básim took the seal-ring from his uncle Sáleh, and put it upon his finger; after which, they plunged into the sea, and ceased not in their course until they arrived at the palace of Sáleh, when they entered it, and Bedr Básim's grandmother, the mother of his mother, saw him, as she sat, attended by her relations. When they went in to them, they kissed their hands; and as soon as Bedr Básim's grandmother saw him, she rose to him and embraced him, kissed him between the eyes, and said to him, Thine arrival is blessed, O my son! How didst thou leave thy mother Jullanár? — He answered her, Well; in prosperity and health; and she saluteth thee and the daughters of her uncle. Then Sáleh acquainted his mother with that which had occurred between him and his sister Jullanár, and that the King Bedr Básim had become enamoured of the Queen Jóharah, the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, from hearsay. He related to her the story from beginning to end, and said, He hath not come but for the purpose of demanding her in marriage of her father, and marrying her.

But when the grandmother of the King Bedr Básim heard the words of Sáleh, she was violently incensed against him, and was agitated and grieved, and she said to him, O my son, thou hast erred in mentioning the Queen

Jóharah, the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, before the son of thy sister; for thou knowest that the King Es-Semendel is stupid, overbearing, of little sense, of great power, niggardly of his daughter Jóharah towards those who demand her in marriage; for all the Kings of the Sea have demanded her of him, and he refused, and approved not one of them, but rejected them all, and said to them, Ye are not equal to her in beauty nor in loveliness, nor in other qualities than those. And we fear to demand her in marriage of her father; for he would reject us as he hath rejected others; and we are people of kindness; so we should return broken-hearted. — And when Sáleh heard what his mother said, he replied, O my mother, what is to be done? For the King Bedr Básim became enamoured of this damsel when I mentioned her to my sister Jullanár, and he said, We must demand her in marriage of her father though I should give away all my kingdom. And he hath asserted that if he marry her not he will die of love and desire for her.

Then Sáleh said to his mother, Know that the son of my sister is more beautiful and more lovely than she, and that his father was King of all the Persians, and he is now their King, and Jóharah is not suitable to any but him. I have resolved that I will take [to her father] some jewels, consisting of jacinths and other gems, and convey a present befitting him, and demand her of him in marriage. If he allege as a pretext to us that he is a King, so also is he a King, the son of a King. And if he allege as a pretext to us her loveliness, he is more lovely than she. Again, if he allege as a pretext to us the extent of dominions, he hath more extensive dominions than she and than her father, and hath more numerous troops and guards; for his kingdom is greater than the kingdom of her father. I must endeavour to accomplish this affair of the son of my sister, though my life be lost thereby, since I was the cause of this event; and as I cast him into the seas of her love, I will strive to effect his marriage to her; and may God (whose name be exalted!) aid me to do that! — So his mother said to him, Do as thou wilt, and beware of speaking rudely to him when thou addressest him; for thou knowest his stupidity and his power, and I fear lest he make a violent attack upon thee, since he knoweth not the dignity of any one. And he replied, I hear and obey.

He then arose, and took with him two leathern bags full of jewels and jacinths, and oblong emeralds, and precious minerals of all kinds of stones, and, having made his young men carry them, he proceeded with them, he and the son of his sister, to the palace of the King Es-Semendel. He asked permission to go in to him, and permission was given him; and when he entered, he kissed the ground before him, and saluted with the best salutation. And when the King Es-Semendel saw him, he rose to him, treated him with the utmost honour, and ordered him to sit. So he sat, and after he had been seated a while, the King said to him, Thine arrival is blessed. Thou hast made us desolate by thine absence, O Sáleh. What is thy want, that thou hast come unto us? Acquaint me with thy want, that I may perform it for thee. — And upon this he rose, and kissed the ground a second time, and said,

O King of the age, my want respecteth God, and the magnanimous King, and the bold lion, the report of whose good qualities the caravans have borne abroad, and whose fame hath been published in the provinces and cities, for liberality and beneficence, and pardon and clemency and obliging conduct. Then he opened the two leathern bags, and took forth from them the jewels and other things, and scattered them before the King Es-Semendel, saying to him, O King of the age, perhaps thou wilt accept my present, and shew favour to me, and comfort my heart by accepting it from me. Upon this, the King Es-Semendel said to him, For what reason hast thou presented to me this present? Tell me thine affair, and acquaint me with thy want; and if I be able to perform it, I will perform it for thee this instant, and not oblige thee to weary thyself; but if I be unable to perform it, God imposeth not upon a person aught save what he is able to accomplish.¹⁵

Then Sáleh rose, and kissed the ground three times, and said, O King of the age, verily the thing that I require thou art able to perform, and it is in thy power, and thou art master of it. I impose not upon the King a difficulty, nor am I mad, that I should ask of the King a thing that he is unable to do; for one of the sages hath said, If thou desire that thy request should be complied with, ask that which is possible. Now as to the thing that I have come to demand, the King (may God preserve him!) is able to do it. — So the King said to him, Ask the thing that thou requirest, and explain thine affair, and demand what thou desirest. And he said to him, O King of the age, know that I have come to thee as a marriage-suitor, desiring the unique pearl, and the hidden jewel, the Queen Jóharah, the daughter of our lord; then disappoint not, O King, him who applieth to thee.

But when the King heard his words, he laughed so that he fell backwards, in derision of him, and replied, O Sáleh, I used to think thee a man of sense, and an excellent young man, who attempted not aught but what was right, and uttered not aught but what was just. What hath happened to thy reason, and urged thee to this monstrous thing, and great peril, that thou demandest in marriage the daughters of Kings, the lords of cities and provinces. Art thou of a rank to attain to this high eminence, and hath thy reason decreased to this extreme degree that thou confrontest me with these words? — So Sáleh said, May God amend the state of the King! I demanded her not in marriage for myself; yet if I demanded her for myself, I am her equal; nay more; for thou knowest that my father was one of the Kings of the Sea, if thou art now our King. But I demanded her not in marriage save for the King Bedr Básim, lord of the provinces of Persia, whose father was the King Sháh-Zemán, and thou knowest his power. If thou assert that thou art a great King, the King Bedr Básim is a greater King: and if thou boastest that thy daughter is lovely, the King Bedr Básim is more lovely than she, and more beautiful in form, and more excellent in rank and descent; and he is the horseman of his age. So if thou assent to that which I have asked of thee, thou wilt, O King of the age, have put the thing in its proper place; and if thou behave arrogantly towards us, thou treatest us not equitably, nor pursuest with us the right way. Thou knowest, O King, that this Queen Jóharah, the daughter of our lord the King, must be married; for the sage saith, The inevitable lot of the damsel is either marriage or the grave; — and if thou design to marry her, the son of my sister is more worthy of her than all the rest of men.

But when the King Es-Semendel heard the words of the King Sáleh, he was violently enraged; his reason almost departed, and his soul almost quitted his body, and he said to him, O dog of men, doth such a one as thyself address me with these words, and dost thou mention my daughter in the assemblies, and say that the son of thy sister Jullanár is her equal? Who then art thou, and who is thy sister, and who is her son, and who was his father, that thou sayest to me these words, and addressest me with this discourse? Are ye, in comparison with her, aught but dogs? — Then he called out to his young men, and said, O young men, take the head of this young wretch!

So they took the swords and drew them, and sought to slay him; but he turned his back in flight, seeking the gate of the palace; and when he arrived at the gate of the palace, he saw the sons of his uncle, and his relations and tribe and young men, who were more than a thousand horsemen, buried in iron and in coats of mail put one over another, and having in their hands spears and bright swords. On their seeing Sáleh in this state, they said to him, What is the news? He therefore told them his story. And his mother had sent them to his assistance. So when they heard his words, they knew that the King was stupid and of great power, and they alighted from their horses, and drew their swords, and went in to the King Es-Semendel. They saw him sitting upon the throne of his kingdom, heedless of these people, and violently enraged against Sáleh; and they saw his servants and his young men and his guards unprepared; and when he beheld them, with the drawn swords in their hands, he called out to his people, saying, Oh! wo to you! Take ye the heads of these dogs! — But there had not elapsed more than a little while before the party of the King Es-Semendel were routed, and betook themselves to flight; and Sáleh and his relations had seized the King Es-Semendel, and bound his hands behind him.

Now Jóharah, awakening from sleep, was informed that her father was taken a captive, and that his guards had been slain. So she went forth from the palace, and fled to one of the islands, where she repaired to a lofty tree, and she concealed herself upon it. And when these two parties contended together, some of the young men of the King Es-Semendel fled, and Bedr Básim, seeing them, asked them respecting their case; whereupon they acquainted him with that which had happened. Therefore, on his hearing that the King Es-Semendel had been seized, he turned his back in flight, fearing for himself, and said in his heart, Verily this disturbance originated on my account, and none is the object of search but myself. He turned back in flight, seeking safety, and knew not whither to go. But the destinies fixed from all eternity drove him to that island upon which was Jóharah, the daughter of the King Es-Semendel; and he came to the tree, and threw himself down like one slain, desiring to take rest by his prostrate position, and not knowing that every one who is an object of search resteth not; and none knoweth what is hidden from him in the secrets of destiny. And when he lay down, he turned up his eyes towards the tree, and his eye met that of Jóharah: so he looked at her, and saw her to be like the moon when it shineth; and he said, Extolled be the perfection of the Creator of this surprising form! and He is the Creator of every thing, and is Almighty! Extolled be the perfection of God, the Great, the Creator, the Maker, the Former! By Allah, if my imagination tell me truth, this must be Jóharah the daughter of the King Es-Semendel. I suppose that when she heard of the conflict happening between the two parties, she fled, and came to this island, and hid herself upon this tree; but if this be not the Queen Jóharah, this is more beautiful than she.

Then he proceeded to meditate upon her case, and said within himself, I will rise and lay hold upon her, and ask her respecting her state; and if this be she, I will demand her in marriage of herself, and this is the thing I seek. So he stood erect upon his feet, and said to Jóharah, O utmost object of desire, who art thou, and who brought thee unto this place? And Jóharah, looking at Bedr Básim, saw him to be like the full moon when it appeareth from behind the black clouds, of elegant stature, comely in his smile. She therefore said to him, O thou endowed with comely qualities, I am the Queen Jóharah, the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, and I have fled to this place because Sáleh and his troops have fought with my father and slain his troops, and made him a captive, together with some of his troops: so I fled, in fear for myself. Then the Queen Jóharah said to the King Bedr Básim, And I came not to this place save in flight, fearing slaughter; and I know not what fortune hath done with my father. And when Bedr Básim heard her words, he wondered extremely at this strange coincidence, and said, No doubt I have attained my desire by the capture of her father. He then looked at her, and said to her, Descend, O my mistress; for I am a victim of thy love, and thine eyes have captivated me. On account of me and thee were this disturbance and these conflicts. Know that I am the King Bedr Básim, the King of Persia, and that Sáleh is my maternal uncle, and he is the person who came to thy father and demanded thee of him in marriage. I have left my kingdom on thine account, and our meeting now is a wonderful coincidence. Arise then, and descend to me, that I may go with thee to the palace of thy father, and ask my uncle Sáleh to release him, and marry thee lawfully.

But when Jóharah heard the words of Bedr Básim, she said within herself, On account of this base young wretch hath this event happened, and my father hath been made a captive, and his chamberlains and his attendants have been slain, and I have become separated from my palace, and come forth an exile from my country to this island. If now I employ not some stratagem with him, thereby to defend myself from him, he will gain possession of me, and attain his desire; for he is in love; and the lover, whatever he doth, is not to be blamed for it. — Then she beguiled him with words, and with soft discourse, and he knew not what artifices she had devised against him; and she said to him, O my master, and light of mine eye, art thou the King Bedr Básim, the son of the Queen Jullanár? So he answered her, Yes, O my mistress. And she said, May God cut off my father, and deprive him of his kingdom, and not comfort his heart, nor restore him from estrangement, if he desire a person more comely than thou, and aught more comely than these charming endowments! By Allah, he is of little sense and judgment! — She then said to him, O King of the age, blame not my father for that which he hath done. If the measure of thy love for me be a span, that of my love for thee is a cubit. I have fallen into the snare of thy love, and become of the number of thy victims. The love that thou hadst is transferred to me, and there remaineth not of it with thee aught save as much as the tenth part of what I feel. — Then she descended from the tree, and drew near to him, and came to him and embraced him, pressing him to her bosom, and began to kiss him.

So when the King Bedr Básim saw what she did to him, his love for her increased, and his desire for her became violent. He imagined that she was enamoured of him, and he confided in her, and proceeded to embrace her and kiss her. And he said to her, O Queen, by Allah, my uncle Sáleh did not describe to me the quarter of the tenth part of thy loveliness, nor the quarter of a keerát of four and twenty keeráts.¹⁶ Then Jóharah pressed him to her bosom, and uttered some words not to be understood; after which, she spat in his face, and said to him, Be changed from this human form into the form of a bird, the most beautiful of birds, with white feathers, and red bill and feet. And her words were not ended before the King Bedr Básim became transformed into the shape of a bird, the most beautiful that could be of birds; and he shook, and stood upon his feet, looking at Jóharah. Now she had with her a damsel, one of her female slaves, named Marseeneh,¹⁷ and she looked at her and said, By Allah, were it not that I fear on account of my father's being a captive with his uncle, I had slain him, and may God not recompense him well; for how unfortunate was his coming unto us; all this disturbance having been effected by his means! But, O slave-girl, take him, and convey him to the Thirsty Island, and leave him there that he may die of thirst. — So the slave-girl took him, and conveyed him to the island, and was about to return from him; but she said within herself, By Allah, the person endowed with this beauty and loveliness deserveth not to die of thirst. Then she took him forth from the Thirsty Island, and brought him to an island abounding with trees and fruits and rivers, and, having put him upon it, returned to her mistress, and said to her, I have put him upon the Thirsty Island. — Such was the case of Bedr Básim.

But as to Sáleh, the uncle of the King Bedr Básim, when he had got possession of the King Es-Semendel, and slain his guards and servants, and the King had become his captive, he sought Jóharah, the King's daughter; but found her not. So he returned to his palace, to the presence of his mother, and said, O my mother, where is the son of my sister, the King Bedr Bâsim? She answered, O my son, by Allah, I have no knowledge of him, nor know I whither he hath gone; for when he was told that thou hadst fought with the King Es-Semendel, and that conflicts and slaughter had ensued between you, he was terrified, and fled. So when Sâleh heard the words of his mother, he grieved for the son of his sister, and said, O my mother, by Allah, we have acted negligently with respect to the King Bedr Bâsim, and I fear that he will perish, or that one of the soldiers of the King Es-Semendel may fall upon him, or that the King's daughter, Jóharah, may fall upon him, and shame will betide us from his mother, and good will not betide us from her; for I took him without her permission. Then he sent guards and spies after him, through the sea and in other directions, but they met with no tidings of him; wherefore they returned, and informed the King Sâleh thereof; and his anxiety and grief increased, and his bosom became contracted on account of the King Bedr Bâsim.—Thus was it with them.

Next, with regard to Bedr Bâsim's mother, Jullanár of the Sea, when her son had descended into the sea with his uncle Sâleh, she waited expecting him; but he returned not to her, and tidings of him were long kept from her. So she remained many days expecting him; after which she arose, and descended into the sea, and came to her mother; and when her mother saw her, she rose to her, and kissed her and embraced her, as did also the daughters of her uncle. She then asked her mother respecting the King Bedr Bâsim, and her mother answered her, O my daughter, he came with his uncle, and his uncle took jacinths and jewels, and went with them, he and Bedr Bâsim, to the King Es-Semendel, and demanded in marriage his daughter: but the King assented not to his proposal, and he was violent to thy brother in his words. I therefore sent to thy brother about a thousand horsemen, and a conflict ensued between them and the King Es-Semendel; but God aided thy brother against them, and he slew his guards and his troops, and made the King Es-Semendel a captive. So tidings of this event reached thy son, and apparently he feared for himself; wherefore he fled from us without our will, and he returned not to us after that, nor have we heard any tidings of him.—Then Jullanár inquired of her respecting her brother Sâleh, and she informed her, saying, He is sitting upon the throne of the kingdom in the place of the King Es-Semendel, and he hath sent in every direction to search for thy son and the Queen Jóharah.

So when Jullanár heard the words of her mother, she mourned for her son violently, and her anger was fierce against her brother Sâleh, because he had taken her son and descended with him into the sea without her permission. She then said, O my mother, verily I fear for our kingdom; for I came to you and informed not any one of the people of the empire, and I dread, if I remain long away from them, that the kingdom will be alienated from us, and that the dominion will depart from our hands. The right opinion is, that I should return, and govern the empire until God shall order for us the affair of my son; and forget not ye my son, nor neglect his case; for if mischief befall him, I perish inevitably; since I regard not the world save in connection with him, nor delight save in his life. — So her mother replied, With feelings of love and honour will I comply, O my daughter. Inquire not what we suffer by reason of his separation and absence. — Then her mother sent to search for him, and Bedr Básim's mother returned with mourning heart and weeping eye to the empire. The world had become straight to her, her heart was contracted, and her case was grievous.

Now again as to the King Bedr Básim, when the Queen Jóharah had enchanted him, and sent him with her female slave to the Thirsty Island, saying to her, Leave him upon it to die of thirst — the slave-girl put him not save upon a verdant, fruitful island, with trees and rivers. So he betook himself to eating of the fruits, and drinking of the rivers; and he ceased not to remain in this state for a period of days and nights, in the form of a bird, not knowing whither to go, nor how to fly. And while he was one day upon that island, lo, there came thither a fowler, to catch something wherewith to sustain himself; and he saw the King Bedr Básim in the form of a bird; with white feathers and with red bill and feet, captivating the beholder, and astonishing the mind. So the fowler looked at him, and he pleased him, and he said within himself, Verily this bird is beautiful: I have not seen a bird like it in its beauty, nor in its form. Then he cast the net over him, and caught him, and he went with him into the city, saying within himself I will sell it, and receive its price. And one of the people of the city met him, and said to him, For how much is this bird to be sold, O fowler? The fowler said to him, If thou buy it, what wilt thou do with it? The man answered, I will kill it and eat it. But the fowler said to him, Whose heart would be pleased to kill this bird and eat it? Verily I desire to present it to the King, and he will give me more than the sum that thou wouldst give me as its price, and will not kill it, but will divert himself with beholding it, and observing its beauty and loveliness; for during my whole life, while I have been a fowler, I have not seen the like of it among the prey of the sea nor among the prey of the land. If thou be desirous of it, the utmost that thou wouldst give me as its price would be a piece of silver; and I, by Allah the Great, will not sell it. — Then the fowler went with him to the palace of the King; and when the King saw him, his beauty and loveliness pleased him, and the redness of his bill and his feet; so he sent to the fowler a eunuch to purchase him of him; and the eunuch came to the fowler, and said to him, Wilt thou sell this bird? He answered, No; it is for the King, as a present from me unto him.

The eunuch therefore took him, and went with him to the King, and acquainted him with that which he had said; whereupon the King took the bird, and gave to the fowler ten pieces of gold; and he received them, and kissed the ground, and departed. The eunuch then brought the bird to the King's pavilion, put him in a handsome cage, hung it up, and put with him what he might eat and drink. And when the King came down, he said to the eunuch, Where is the bird? Bring it that I may see it. By Allah, it is beautiful! — So the eunuch brought him, and put him before the King; and he saw that, of the food that was with him, he had not eaten aught; wherefore the King said, By Allah, I know not what it will eat, that I may feed it. Then he gave orders to bring the repast. The tables therefore were brought before him, and the King ate of the repast; and when the bird looked at the flesh-meats and other viands, and the sweetmeats and fruits, he ate of all that was upon the table before the King, and the King was amazed at him, and wondered at his eating, as did also the other persons who were present. And upon this the King said to the eunuchs and memlooks who were around him, In my life I have never seen a bird eat like this bird.

The King then commanded that his wife should come to divert herself with the sight of him. So the eunuch went to bring her; and when he saw her, he said to her, O my mistress, the King desireth thy presence, in order that thou mayest divert thyself with the sight of this bird that he hath bought; for when we brought the repast, it flew from the cage, and pitched upon the table, and ate of all that was upon it. Arise then, O my mistress; divert thyself with the sight of it; for it is beautiful in appearance, and it is a wonder among the wonders of the age. — Therefore when she heard the words of the eunuch, she came quickly; but as soon as she looked at the bird, and discovered him, she veiled her face, and turned back. So the King rose and followed her, and said to her, Wherefore didst thou cover thy face, when there are not in thy presence any but the female slaves and the eunuchs who serve thee, and thy husband? And she answered, O King, verily this is not a bird; but it is a man like thee. But when he heard the words of his wife, he said to her, Thou utterest falsehood. How much dost thou jest! How can it be aught but a bird? — She replied, By Allah, I jested not with thee, nor did I tell thee any thing but truth. Verily this bird is the King Bedr Básim, the son of the King 'Sháh-Zemán, lord of the countries of the Persians, and his mother is Jullanár of the Sea. — And how, said he, hath he become transformed into this shape? She answered him, The Queen Jóharah, the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, hath enchanted him.

Then she related to him what had happened to him from first to last, telling him that he had demanded Jóharah in marriage of her father, and that her father consented not thereto, and that his maternal uncle Sáleh had fought with the King Es-Semendel, and that Sáleh had overcome him, and made him a captive. And when the King heard the words of his wife, he wondered extremely. Now this Queen, his wife, was the most skilful in enchantment among the people of her age. The King therefore said to her, By my life, I conjure thee to free him from his enchantment, and not leave him tormented. May God (whose name be exalted!) cut off the hand of Jóharah! How vile is she, and how little is her religion, and how great are her deceit and her artifice! — His wife replied, Say to him, O Bedr Bâsim, enter this closet. So the King ordered him to enter the closet; and when he heard the King's words, he entered it. Then the wife of the King arose, and, having veiled her face, took in her hand a cup of water, and entered the closet; and she uttered over the water some words not to be understood, and [sprinkling him with it] said to him, By virtue of these great names, and excellent verses [of the Kur-ân], and by the power of God (whose name be exalted!), the Creator of the heavens and the earth, and the Reviver of the dead, and the Distributor of the means of subsistence and the terms of life, quit this form in which thou now art, and return to the form in which God created thee! And her words were not ended when he shook violently, and returned to his original form, whereupon the King beheld him a comely young man, than whom there was not upon the face of the earth one more beautiful.

When the King Bedr Bâsim beheld this thing, he said, There is no deity but God: Mohammad is the Apostle of God! Extolled be the perfection of the Creator of all creatures, and the Ordainer of their means of subsistence and their terms of life! — Then he kissed the hands of the King, and prayed for long life for him; and the King kissed the head of Bedr Bâsim, and said to him, O Bedr Bâsim, relate to me thy story from beginning to end. So he related to him his story, not concealing from him aught; and the King wondered thereat, and said to him, O Bedr Bâsim, God hath delivered thee from the enchantment; what then doth thy good pleasure demand, and what dost thou desire to do? He answered him, O King of the age, I desire of thy beneficence that thou wouldst prepare for me a ship, and a company of thy servants, and all that I require; for I have been absent a long time, and I fear that the empire may depart from me. Moreover, I imagine not that my mother is alive, on account of my separation. What seems most probable to me is, that she hath died in consequence of her mourning for me; since she knoweth not what hath happened to me, nor whether I be living or dead. I therefore beg thee, O King, to complete thy beneficence to me by granting that which I have requested of thee. — And when the King considered his beauty and loveliness and his eloquence, he replied and said to him, I hear and obey. He then prepared for him a ship, transported to it what he required, and despatched with him a company of his servants. So he embarked in the ship, after he had bidden farewell to the King, and they proceeded over the sea.

The wind aided them, and they ceased not to proceed for ten days successively; but on the eleventh day, the sea became violently agitated, the ship began to rise and pitch, and the sailors were unable to manage her. They continued in this state, the waves sporting with them, until they drew near to one of the rocks of the sea, and the ship fell upon that rock, and broke in pieces, and all who were in her were drowned, except the King Bedr Bâsim; for he mounted upon one of the planks, after he had been at the point of destruction.¹⁸ The plank ceased not to bear him along the sea, and he knew not whither he was going, nor had he any means of checking the motion of the plank; it carried him with the water and the wind, and continued to do so for a period of three days. But on the fourth day, the plank was cast with him upon the shore of the sea, and he found there a city, white as a very white pigeon, built upon an island by the shore of the sea, with lofty angles, beautiful in construction, with high walls, and the sea beat against its walls. So when the King Bedr Básiim beheld the island upon which was this city, he rejoiced greatly; and he had been at the point of destruction by reason of hunger and thirst. He therefore landed from the plank, and desired to go up to the city; but there came to him mules and asses and horses, numerous as the grains of sand, and they began to strike him, and to prevent his going up from the sea to the city. So he swam round behind that city, and landed upon the shore, and he found not there any one; wherefore he wondered, and said, To whom doth this city belong, not having a King nor any one in it, and whence are these mules and asses and horses that prevented me from landing? And he proceeded to meditate upon his case as he walked along, not knowing whither to go.

Then, after that, he saw a sheykh, a grocer; and when the King Bedr Básiim saw him, he saluted him; and the sheykh returned the salutation, and, looking at him, saw him to be a comely person: so he said to him, O young man, whence hast thou come, and what brought thee to this city? He therefore related to him his story from beginning to end; and he wondered at it, and said to him, O my son, didst thou not see any one in thy way? He answered him, O my father, I only wonder at this city seeing that it is devoid of people. And the sheykh said to him, O my son, come up into the shop, lest thou perish. So Bedr Básiim went up, and seated himself in the shop. And the sheykh arose, and brought him some food, saying to him, O my son, come into the inner part of the shop. Extolled be the perfection of Him who hath preserved thee from this she-devil! — The King Bedr Básiim therefore feared violently. He then ate of the food of the sheykh until he was satisfied, and washed his hands, and, looking at the sheykh, said to him, O my master, what is the reason of these words? For thou hast made me to be frightened at this city and its people. — And the sheykh answered him, O my son, know that this city is the City of the Enchanters, and in it is a Queen who is an enchantress, like a she-devil; she is a sorceress, a great enchantress, abounding in artifice, exceedingly treacherous, and the horses and mules and asses that thou sawest, all these are like me and thee of the sons of Adam; but they are strangers; for whoever entereth this city and is a young man like thyself, this infidel enchantress taketh him, and she remaineth with him forty days, and after forty days she enchanteth him, and he becometh a mule or a horse or an ass, of these animals that thou hast seen upon the shore of the sea. Therefore when thou desiredst to land, they feared for thee lest she should enchant thee like them, and they said to thee by signs, Land not, lest the enchantress see thee — in pity for thee; for perhaps she might do unto thee as she did unto them. — And he said to him, She got possession of this city from her family by enchantment: and her name is the Queen Láb; the meaning of which in Arabic is Esh-Shems¹⁹ (that is, The Sun).

Now when the King Bedr Básim heard these words from the sheykh, he feared violently, and began to tremble like the reed that is shaken by the wind, and he said to him, I believed not that I had escaped from the calamity in which I was involved by enchantment, and now destiny casteth me into a situation more abominable than that! And he proceeded to reflect upon his case, and upon the events that had happened to him; and when the sheykh looked at him, he saw that his fear was violent; so he said to him, O my son, arise and sit at the threshold of the shop, and look at those creatures and at their dress and their forms,²⁰ and the states in which they are through enchantment; but fear not; for the Queen, and every one in the city, loveth me and regardeth me, and agitateth not my heart, nor wearieth my mind. Therefore when the King Bedr Básim heard these words of the sheykh, he went forth and sat at the door of the shop, diverting himself; and there passed by him people, and he beheld creatures not to be numbered. And when the people saw him, they advanced to the sheykh, and said to him, O sheykh, is this thy captive, and a prey that thou hast taken during these days? But he answered them, This is the son of my brother. I heard that his father had died; so I sent for him, and caused him to come, that I might quench the fire of my desire by his company. — They replied, Verily this young man is a comely youth; but we fear for him on account of the Queen Láb, lest she turn upon thee with treachery and take him from thee; for she loveth the comely young men. The sheykh however said to them, Verily the Queen will not thwart me; she regardeth me favourably, and loveth me; and when she knoweth that he is the son of my brother, she will not offer him any injury, nor afflict me with respect to him, nor trouble my heart on his account. — And the King Bedr Básim remained with the sheykh for a period of months, eating and drinking, and the sheykh loved him greatly.

After this, Bedr Básim was sitting at the shop of the sheykh one day as was his custom, and, lo, a thousand eunuchs, with drawn swords in their hands, clad in various kinds of apparel, having upon their waists girdles adorned with jewels, riding upon Arab horses, and equipped with Indian swords; and they came to the shop of the sheykh, and saluted him, and passed on. Then, after them, came a thousand damsels, like moons, clad in various dresses of silk and satin embroidered with gold and adorned with varieties of jewels, and all of them were armed with spears; and in the midst of them was a damsel riding upon an Arab mare, upon which was a saddle of gold set with varieties of jewels and jacinths. They ceased not to proceed until they arrived at the shop of the sheykh, when they saluted him, and passed on. And, lo, the Queen Láb approached in a magnificent procession, and she ceased not to approach until she came to the shop of the sheykh; whereupon she saw the King Badr Básim sitting at the shop, resembling the moon at the full. So when the Queen Láb beheld him, she was confounded at his beauty and loveliness, and amazed, and she became distracted with love of him. She came to the shop, and alighted, and, having seated herself by the King Badr Básim, she said to the sheykh, Whence obtainedst thou this comely person? He answered, This is the son of my brother; he came to me a short time ago. And she said, Let him be with me to-night, that I may converse with him. The sheykh said to her, Wilt thou take him from me and not enchant him? She answered, Yes. He said, Swear to me. And she swore to him that she would not hurt him nor enchant him.

Then she gave orders to bring forward to him a handsome horse, saddled, and bridled with a bridle of gold, and all that was upon him was of gold set with jewels; and she presented to the sheykh a thousand pieces of gold, saying to him, Seek aid for thyself therewith. The Queen Láb then took the King Bedr Básim, and departed with him; and he was like the moon in its fourteenth night. He proceeded with her; and the people, as often as they looked at him, and observed his beauty, were pained for him, and said, By Allah, this young man doth not deserve that this accursed woman should enchant him! And the King Bedr Básim heard the words of the people; but he was silent, and had committed his case to God, whose name he exalted!

He ceased not to proceed with the Queen Láb and her retinue until they arrived at the gate of the palace; when the emeers and eunuchs and the great men of the empire alighted. She had commanded the chamberlains to order all the great men of the empire to depart; so they kissed the ground and departed. And the Queen, with the eunuchs and the female slaves, entered the palace; and when the King Bedr Básim looked at the palace, he beheld a palace of which he had never seen the like. Its walls were constructed of gold, and in the midst of it was a great pool, abounding with water, in a great garden; and the King Bedr Básim looked at the garden, and saw in it birds warbling with all varieties of tongues and voices, mirth-exciting and plaintive, and those birds were of all forms and colours. The King Bedr Básim beheld great majesty, and he said, Extolled be the perfection of God for his bounty and his clemency! He sustaineth the person who worshippeth other than Himself! ²¹ — The Queen seated herself at a lattice-window overlooking the garden. She was on a couch of ivory, upon which was magnificent furniture; and the King Bedr Básim sat by her side; and she kissed him, and pressed him to her bosom. Then she ordered the female slaves to bring a table; whereupon there was brought a table of red gold set with large pearls and with jewels, and upon it were dishes of all kinds of viands.

So they ate until they were satisfied, and washed their hands. The female slaves next brought vessels of gold and silver and crystal, and they brought also all kinds of flowers, and plates of dried fruits; after which the Queen gave orders to bring singing-women; and there came ten damsels like moons, with all kinds of musical instruments in their hands. Then the Queen filled a cup, and drank it; and she filled another, and handed it to the King Bedr Básim, who took it and drank it; and they ceased not to do thus, drinking until they were satisfied; when the Queen ordered the female slaves to sing. So they sang all kinds of melodies, and it seemed to the King Bedr Básim as though the palace danced with delight at the sounds. His reason was captivated, and his bosom was dilated, and he forgot his estrangement from his country, and he said, Verily this Queen is a comely damsel! I will never henceforth quit her; for her kingdom is larger than mine, and she is preferable to the Queen Jóharah. — He ceased not to drink with her until it was evening, and the lamps and candles were lighted, and the attendants gave vent to the fumes of the sweet-scented substances in the censers; and they gave not over drinking until they were both intoxicated, while the female singers continued singing. And when the Queen Láb was intoxicated, she arose from her place, and slept upon a couch, having commanded the female slaves to depart; and she ordered the King Bedr Básim to lie down by her side. Then, on the following morning, she entered the bath in the palace, and he did the same; and when they had come forth, she caused him to be clad in the most beautiful apparel, and gave orders to bring the drinking-vessels. Accordingly the female slaves brought them, and they drank; after which the Queen arose, and took the hand of the King Bedr Básim, and they sat upon the throne, and she gave orders to bring the food; so they ate, and washed their hands. The female slaves then brought to them the drinking-vessels, and the fresh fruits and the flowers and the dried fruits; and they ceased not to eat and drink, while the female slaves sang various melodies, till evening.

They continued eating and drinking, and delighting themselves, for a period of forty days; after which she said to him, O Bedr Básim, is this place the more pleasant, or the shop of thine uncle the grocer? He answered her, By Allah, O Queen, this is pleasant; for my uncle is a poor man who selleth beans. And she laughed at his words. Then they slept: but in the morning, the King Bedr Básim awoke from his sleep and found not the Queen Láb by his side: so he said, Whither can she have gone? He became sad on account of her absence, and perplexed respecting his case; and she had been absent from him a long time, and had not returned; wherefore he said within himself, Whither hath she gone? He then put on his clothes, and proceeded to search for her; but he found her not; and he said within himself, Perhaps she hath gone to the garden. He therefore went to the garden, and he saw in it a running river, by the side of which was a white bird, and on the bank of that river was a tree, whereon were birds of various colours. So he looked at the birds; but they saw him not; and, lo, a black bird alighted by that white bird, and began to feed her with his bill like a pigeon; and after a while, the latter bird became changed into a human form, at which he looked attentively, and, lo, she was the Queen Láb. He therefore knew that the black bird was an enchanted man, and that she loved him, and for that reason transformed herself by enchantment into a bird; in consequence of which, jealousy seized him, and he was incensed against the Queen Láb, on account of the black bird. Then he returned to his place, and laid himself upon his bed; and after a while, she returned to him, and began to kiss him and to jest with him; but he was violently incensed against her, and uttered not to her a single word. So she knew what he felt, and was convinced that he saw her when she became a bird. She however did not manifest to him anything; but concealed her feelings.

After this, he said to her, O Queen, I desire thee to permit me to go to the shop of my uncle; for I have conceived a desire to visit him, and for forty days I have not seen him. And she replied, Go to him; but be not long absent from me, since I cannot part with thee, nor endure to be away from thee for one hour. So he said to her, I hear and obey. He then mounted and went to the shop of the sheykh, the grocer, who welcomed him and rose to him and embraced him, and said to him, How art thou with this infidel woman? He therefore answered him, I was well, in prosperity and health; but she was this last night sleeping by my side, and I awoke and saw her not. So I put on my clothes, and went about searching for her, until I came to the garden. — And he informed him of that which he had seen, of the river, and the birds upon the tree. And when the sheykh heard his words, he said to him, Beware of her, and know that the birds that were upon the tree were all young men, strangers, whom she loved, and she transformed them by enchantment into birds; and that black bird that thou sawest was of the number of her memlooks. She used to love him greatly; but he cast his eye upon one of the female slaves; so she transformed him by enchantment into a black bird; and whenever she desireth to visit him, she transformeth herself by enchantment into a bird; for she still loveth him greatly. And when she knew that thou wast acquainted with her case, she meditated evil against thee; and she doth not offer thee a sincere affection. But thou shalt suffer no harm from her so long as I have a care for thee; therefore fear not; for I am a Muslim, and my name is 'Abd-Allah,²² and there is not in my age any one more skilled in enchantment than I, yet I make not use of enchantment save when I am constrained to do so. Often do I annul the enchantment of this accursed woman, and deliver people from her; and I care not for her, since she hath no way of injuring me: on the contrary, she feareth me violently, as also doth every one in the city who is an enchanter like her, after this manner: they all fear me, and all of them are of her religion, worshipping fire instead of the Almighty King. But to-morrow come to me again, and acquaint me with that which she shall do to thee; for this night she will exert herself to destroy thee, and I will tell thee what thou shalt do with her that thou mayest save thyself from her artifice.

Then the King Bedr Básim bade farewell to the sheykh, and returned to her, and found her sitting expecting him. And when she saw him, she rose to him and seated him, welcoming him; and she brought him food and drink. So they ate till they were satisfied, and washed their hands; after which, she gave orders to bring the wine. It was therefore brought, and they drank until midnight, when she served him with the cups, and she continued to ply him until he was intoxicated, and lost his sense and his reason. And when she saw him in this state, she said to him, By Allah I conjure thee, and by the Object of thy worship, if I ask thee concerning a thing, tell me, wilt thou inform me thereof truly, and reply to my question? So he answered her, being in a state of intoxication, Yes, O my mistress. And she said to him, O my master, and light of mine eye, when thou awokest from thy sleep, and foundest me not, thou searchedst for me and camest to me in the garden, and sawest the blackbird. Now I will acquaint thee with the truth of the case of this bird. He was one of my memlooks, and I loved him greatly; but he cast his eye one day upon one of my female slaves; so jealousy came upon me, and I transformed him by enchantment into a blackbird. And as to the slave-girl, I killed her. But now I cannot bear to be absent from him one hour; and whenever I desire to visit him, I transform myself by enchantment into a bird, and go to him. Art thou not on this account incensed against me, although I, by the fire and the light and the shade and the heat, have increased in love for thee, and made thee my worldly portion? — So he said, being intoxicated, Verily what thou hast understood, as to my anger being on that account, is true; and there is no cause for my anger except that.

And she embraced him and kissed him, and made a show of love to him; after which she slept, and he slept by her side. And when it was midnight, she rose from the bed; and the King Bedr Básim was awake; but he pretended that he was asleep, and kept stealing looks, and observing what she did; and he found that she had taken forth, from a red bag, something red, which she planted in the midst of the palace; and, lo, it became a stream running like a large river. She then took a handful of barley, scattered it upon the dust, and watered it with this water; whereupon it became eared corn: and she took it and ground it into fine flour, after which she put it in a place, and returned and slept by Bedr Básim until the morning.

So when the morning came, the King Bedr Básim arose, and, having washed his face, asked permission of the Queen to go to the sheykh; and she gave him permission. He therefore repaired to the sheykh, and acquainted him with that which she had done, and what he had beheld; and when the sheykh heard his words, he laughed, and said, By Allah, this infidel enchantress hath formed a mischievous scheme against thee; but never care thou for her. He then produced to him as much as a pound of saweek,²³ and said to him, Take this with thee, and know that when she seeth it she will say to thee, What is this, and what wilt thou do with it? Answer her, A superfluity of good things is good: — and do thou eat of it. And when she produceth her saweek, and saith to thee, Eat of this saweek — pretend to her that thou eatest of it, but eat of this, and beware of eating aught of her saweek, even one grain; for if thou eat of it even one grain, her enchantment will have power over thee, and she will enchant thee, saying to thee, Quit this human form. So thou wilt quit thy form, and assume whatsoever form she desireth. But if thou eat not of it, her enchantment will be frustrated, and no harm will result to thee from it; wherefore she will become in a state of the utmost abashment, and will say to thee, I am only jesting with thee. And she will make profession of love and affection to thee; but all that will be hypocrisy and artifice in her. Do thou, however, make a show of love to her, and say to her, O my mistress, and light of mine eye, eat of this saweek, and see how delicious it is. And when she hath eaten of it, if only one grain, take some water in thy hand, and throw it in her face, and say to her, Quit this human form — and tell her to assume whatsoever form thou desirest. Thereupon, leave her, and come to me, that I may contrive for thee a mode of proceeding.

Bedr Básim then bade him farewell, and pursued his way until he went up into the palace and entered into her presence; and when she saw him, she said to him, A friendly and free and an ample welcome! She rose to him and kissed him, and said to him, Thou hast wearied me by thy delay, O my master. He replied, I was with my uncle. And he saw with her some saweek, and said to her, And my uncle hath given me to eat of this saweek, and we have saweek better than it. Then she put his saweek into a dish, and hers into another, and said to him, Eat of this, for it is nicer than thy saweek. So he pretended to her that he ate of it; and when she believed that he had eaten of it, she took in her hand some water, and sprinkled him with it, and said to him, Quit this form, O young wretch, O villain, and assume the form of a one-eyed mule of hideous appearance! But he changed not. So when she saw him in his proper state, unchanged, she rose to him, and kissed him between the eyes, and said to him, O my beloved, I was only jesting with thee; therefore be not changed in mind towards me on that account. And he replied, By Allah, O my mistress, I am not at all changed towards thee; but I am convinced that thou lovest me: eat then of this my saweek. She therefore took a morsel of it, and ate it; and when it had settled in her stomach, she was agitated; and the King Bedr Básim, having taken some water in his hand, sprinkled her with it upon her face, saying to her, Quit this human form, and assume the form of a dapple mule. And she saw not herself save in that form; whereupon her tears began to run down upon her cheeks, and she rubbed her cheeks upon his feet. He then betook himself to bridle her; but she allowed not the bridle to be put.

He therefore left her, and repaired to the sheykh, and acquainted him with what had happened; upon which the sheykh rose and produced to him a bridle, and said to him, Take this bridle, and bridle her with it. So he took it and went to her; and when she saw him, she advanced to him, and he put the bit in her mouth, and having mounted her, went forth from the palace, and repaired to the sheykh 'Abd-Allah, who, on seeing her, rose to her, and said to her, May God (whose name be exalted!) abase thee by affliction, O accursed woman! Then the sheykh said to Bedr Bâsim, O my son, thou hast no longer an abode in this city; so mount her, and proceed with her to whatsoever place thou wilt, and beware of giving up the bridle to any one. The King Bedr Bâsim therefore thanked him, and bade him farewell, and departed.

He ceased not in his journey for three days; after which he came in sight of a city, and there met him a sheykh, of comely hoariness, who said to him, O my son, whence art thou come? He answered, From the city of this enchantress. The sheykh then said to him, Thou art my guest this night. And he consented, and proceeded with him along the way. And, lo, there was an old woman, who, when she saw the mule, wept, and said, There is no deity but God! Verily this mule resembleth the mule of my son, which hath died, and my heart is troubled for her. I conjure thee by Allah, then, O my master, that thou sell her to me.—He replied, by Allah, O my mother, I cannot sell her. But she rejoined, I conjure thee by Allah, that thou reject not my petition; for my son, if I buy not for him this mule, will inevitably die. Then she urged her request in many words; whereupon he said, I will not sell her but for a thousand pieces of gold. And Bedr Bâsim said within himself, How can this old woman procure a thousand pieces of gold? But upon this she took forth from her girdle a thousand pieces of gold. So when the King Bedr Bâsim saw this, he said to her, O my mother, I am only jesting with thee, and I can not sell her. The sheykh, however, looked at him and said to him, O my son, no one may utter a falsehood in this city; for every one who uttereth a falsehood in this city they slay. The King Bedr Bâsim therefore alighted from the mule, and delivered her to the old woman; and she drew forth the bit from her mouth, and, having taken some water in her hand, sprinkled her with it, and said, O my daughter, quit this form, and return to the form in which thou wast! ²⁴ And she was transformed immediately, and returned to her first shape; and each of the two women approached the other, and they embraced each other.

So the King Bedr Bâsim knew that this old woman was the mother of the Queen, and that the stratagem had been accomplished against him, and he desired to flee. But, lo, the old woman uttered a loud whistle; whereupon there presented himself before her an 'Efreet like a great mountain; and the King Bedr Bâsim feared, and stood still. The old woman mounted upon his back, took her daughter behind her, and the King Bedr Bâsim before her, and the 'Efreet flew away with them, and there elapsed but a short time before they arrived at the palace of the Queen Lâb; after which, when she had seated herself upon the throne of her kingdom, she looked at the King Bedr Bâsim, and said to him, O young wretch, I have arrived at this place, and attained what I desired, and I will shew thee what I will do with thee and with this sheykh, the grocer. How many benefits have I conferred upon him, and he doth evil unto me! And thou hadst not attained thy desire but by his means.—Then she took some water, and sprinkled him with it, saying to him, Quit this form in which thou now art, and assume the form of a bird of hideous appearance, the most hideous of birds! And he was transformed immediately, and became a bird of hideous appearance; upon which she put him into a cage, and withheld from him food and drink.

But a slave-girl looked at him, and had compassion on him, and she fed him, and gave him drink, without the knowledge of the Queen. Then the slave-girl found her mistress inadvertent one day, and she went forth and repaired to the sheykh, the grocer, and acquainted with the case, saying to him, The Queen Láb is resolved upon the destruction of the son of thy brother. So the sheykh thanked her, and said to her, I must surely take the city from her, and make thee Queen in her stead. He then uttered a loud whistle, and there came forth to him an 'Efreet who had four wings, and he said to him, Take this slave-girl, and convey her to the city of Jullanár of the Sea, and to her mother Farásheh;²⁵ for they two are the most skilful in enchantment of all existing upon the face of the earth. And he said to the slave-girl, When thou hast arrived there, inform them that the King Bedr Básim is a captive in the hands of the Queen Láb. The 'Efreet therefore took her up, and flew away with her, and but a short time had elapsed when he alighted with her upon the palace of the Queen Jullanár of the Sea. So the slave-girl descended from the roof of the palace, and, going in to the Queen Jullanár, kissed the ground, and acquainted her with the events that had happened to her son from first to last; upon which, Jullanár rose to her, and treated her with honour, and thanked her. The drums were beaten in the city to announce the good tidings, and she informed her people, and the great men of her empire, that the King Bedr Básim had been found.

After this Jullanár of the Sea, and her mother Farásheh, and her brother Sáleh, summoned all the tribes of the Jánn, and the troops of the sea; for the Kings of the Jánn had obeyed them after the captivity of the King Es-Semendel. Then they flew through the air, and alighted upon the city of the enchantress, and they plundered the palace, and slew all who were in it. They also plundered the city, and slew all the infidels who were in it in the twinkling of an eye. And Jullanár said to the slave-girl, Where is my son? The slave-girl therefore took the cage, and brought it before her, and, pointing to the bird that was within it, said, This is thy son. So the Queen Jullanár took him forth from the cage, and she took in her hand some water, with which she sprinkled him, saying to him, Quit this form, and assume the form in which thou wast! And her words were not ended when he shook, and became a man as he as before; and when his mother beheld him in his original form, she rose to him and embraced him, and he wept violently, as did also his maternal uncle Sáleh, and his grandmother Farásheh, and the daughters of his uncle; and they began to kiss his hands and his feet. Then Jullanár sent for the sheykh 'Abd-Allah, and thanked him for his kind conduct to her son; and she married him (the sheykh) to the slave-girl whom he had sent to her with the news of her son. So he took her as his wife; and Jullanár made him King of that city. And she summoned those Muslims who remained of the inhabitants of the city, and made them vow allegiance to the sheykh 'Abd-Allah, covenanting with them, and making them swear, that they would obey and serve him; and they said, We hear and obey.²⁶

They then bade farewell to the sheykh 'Abd-Allah, and departed to their city; and when they entered their palace, the people of their city met them with the drums to celebrate the good news, and with rejoicing. They decorated the city for three days, on account of their exceeding joy at the arrival of their King Bedr Básim, rejoicing greatly at his return. And after that, the King Bedr Básim said to his mother, O my mother, it remaineth only that I marry, and that we all be united. So she replied, O my son, excellent is the idea that thou hast formed; but wait until we inquire for a person suitable to thee among the daughters of the Kings. And his grandmother Farásheh, and the daughters of his uncle, and his maternal uncle, said, We, O Bedr Básim, will all immediately assist thee to attain what thou desirest. Then each of those females arose, and went to search through the countries, and Jullanár of the Sea also sent her female slaves upon the necks of the 'Efreetes, saying to them, Leave not a city, nor one of the palaces of the Kings, without attentively viewing all who are in it of the beautiful damsels. But when the King Bedr Básim saw the pains that they were taking in this affair, he said to his mother Jullanár, O my mother, leave this affair, for none will content me save Jóharah the daughter of the King Es-Semendel, since she is a jewel as her name importeth. So his mother replied, I know thy desire. She then sent immediately persons to bring to her the King Es-Semendel, and forthwith they brought him before her; whereupon she sent to Bedr Básim, and when he came, she acquainted him with the arrival of the King Es-Semendel. He therefore went in to him; and as soon as the King Es-Semendel saw him approaching he rose to him and saluted him and welcomed him. Then the King Bedr Básim demanded of him in marriage his daughter Jóharah; and he replied, She is at thy service, and she is thy slave-girl, and at thy disposal.

And the King Es-Semendel sent some of his companions to his country, commanding them to bring his daughter Jóharah, and to inform her that her father was with the King Bedr Básim, the son of Jullanár of the Sea. So they flew through the air, and were absent a while; after which they came back accompanied by the Queen Jóharah; who, when she beheld her father, advanced to him and embraced him. And he looked at her and said, O my daughter, Know that I have married thee to this magnanimous King, and bold lion, the King Bedr Básim, the son of the Queen Jullanár, and that he is the handsomest of the people of his age, and the most lovely of them, and the most exalted of them in dignity, and the most noble of them in rank: he is not suitable to any but thee, nor art thou suitable to any but him. And she replied, O my father, I cannot oppose thy wish: therefore do what thou wilt; for anxiety and distress have ceased, and I am unto him of the number of servants.

So thereupon they summoned the Kádees and the witnesses, and they performed the ceremony of the contract of the marriage of the King Bedr Básim, the son of the Queen Jullanár of the Sea, to the Queen Jóharah. The people of the city decorated it, sent forth the announcers of the glad tidings, and released all who were in the prisons; and the King clothed the widows and the orphans, and conferred robes of honour upon the lords of the empire and the emeers and other great men. Then they celebrated a grand festivity, made banquets, and continued the festivities evening and morning for a period of ten days; and they displayed her to the King Bedr Básim in nine different dresses. After this, the King Bedr Básim conferred a dress of honour upon the King Es-Semendel, and restored him to his country and his family and his relations; and they ceased not to pass the most delightful life, and the most agreeable days, eating and drinking, and enjoying themselves, until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions.

This is the end of their story. — The mercy of God be on them all!

XXIV

PRINCE SEYF-EL-MULOOK AND HIS MARVELOUS JOURNEY IN SEARCH OF BEDEEA-EL-JEMÁL PRINCESS OF THE JÁNN ¹

THERE was, in olden times, and in an ancient age and period, in Egypt, a King named 'Ásim the son of Safwán.² He was a liberal, munificent King, reverend and dignified: he possessed many countries, and castles and fortresses, and troops and soldiers, and he had a Wezeer named Fáris the son of Sáleh;³ and they all worshipped the sun and fire instead of the Almighty King, the Glorious, the Mighty in dominion. Now this King became a very old man: old age, and sickness and decrepitude, had rendered him infirm; for he had lived a hundred and eighty years; and he had not a male child nor a female; on account of which he was in a state of anxiety and grief night and day. And it happened that he was sitting one day upon the throne of his kingdom, with the emeers and wezeers and the chief officers and the lords of the empire serving him according to their custom and according to their ranks; and whosoever of the emeers came in to him having with him a son, or two sons, the King envied him, and he said within himself, Every one is happy and rejoicing in his children; but I have not a son, and to-morrow I shall die, and leave my kingdom and my throne and my lands and my treasures and my riches, and the strangers will take them, and no one will ever remember me: there will not remain any memory of me in the world. Then the King 'Ásim became drowned in the sea of solicitude; and in consequence of the rapid succession of griefs and solitudes in his heart, he wept, and descended from his throne, and sat upon the floor, weeping and humbling himself. So when the Wezeer and the assembly of the great men of the empire who were present saw him do thus with himself, they called out to the people and said to them, Go ye to your abodes and rest until the King recover from the state in which he is.

They therefore departed, and there remained not any except the King and the Wezeer; and when the King recovered, the Wezeer kissed the ground before him and said to him, O King of the age, what is the cause of this weeping? Inform me who of the Kings, and the lords of the castles, or of the emeers and the lords of the empire, hath become thine enemy, and inform me who opposeth thee, O King, that we may all attack him, and take his soul from between his sides. — But the King spoke not, nor raised his head. Then the Wezeer kissed the ground before him a second time, and said to him, O King of the age, I am like thy son and thy slave; nay, I have reared thee; and I know not the cause of thy grief and thine anxiety and thy distress and the state in which thou art. Who then beside me can know, and stand in my stead before thee? Acquaint me therefore with the cause of this weeping and mourning. — Yet he spoke not, nor opened his mouth, nor raised his head; but ceased not to weep, and he cried out with a loud voice, and wailed exceedingly, and cried. Ah! — while the Wezeer regarded him patiently. And after that, the Wezeer said to him, If thou tell me not the cause of this, I will kill myself before thee immediately while thou lookest on, rather than see thee in anxiety.

So the King 'Ásim thereupon raised his head, and wiped away his tears, and said, O faithful Wezeer, leave me in my anxiety and my grief; for the sorrows in my heart are sufficient for me. But the Wezeer replied, Tell me, O King, what is the cause of this weeping: perhaps God may give thee relief by my means. And the King said to him, O Wezeer, my weeping is not on account of wealth nor on account of horses nor on account of any thing but this, that I have become an old man, and my age is about a hundred and eighty years, and I have not been blest with a male child nor a female; so when I die, they will bury me; then will every trace of me be obliterated, and my name will become extinct, and strangers will take my throne and my kingdom, and no one will ever remember me. To this the Wezeer replied, O King of the age, I am older than thou by a hundred years, and have never been blest with a child, and I cease not to suffer anxiety and grief night and day; and what shall we do, I and thou? But I have heard of the fame of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), and that he hath a mighty Lord, able to accomplish every thing. It is meet therefore that I repair unto him with a present, and have recourse to him, that he may petition his Lord: perhaps He may bless each of us with a child. — The Wezeer then prepared for the journey, took a magnificent present, and repaired with it to Suleymán the son of Dáood, on both of whom be peace! — Such was the case of the Wezeer.

Now as to Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!) spoke in revelation unto him, and said, O Suleymán, verily the King of Egypt hath sent to thee his chief Wezeer, with presents and rarities, which are such and such things. Send thou therefore unto him thy Wezeer Ásaf the son of Barkhiyà to meet him with honour and with provisions at the halting-places; and when he presenteth himself before thee, say to him, Verily the King hath sent thee to demand such and such things, and thine affair is so and so. Then propose to him the faith. — So upon this Suleymán ordered his Wezeer Ásaf to take with him a company of his dependents, to meet them with honour and with sumptuous provisions at the halting-places. Accordingly, Ásaf went forth, after he had prepared all things necessary, to meet them, and he proceeded until he came to Fáris, the Wezeer of the King of Egypt.

He met him and saluted him, and treated him and those who accompanied him with exceeding honour, and proceeded to present to them the provisions and the provender at the halting-places; and he said to him, A friendly and free and an ample welcome to the coming guests! Rejoice ye at the information of the accomplishment of your affair, and let your hearts be glad and your eyes be cheerful and your bosoms be dilated! — So the Wezeer said within himself, Who acquainted them with this? Then he said to Ásaf the son of Barkhiyà, And who informed you of us and of our desires, O my lord? Ásaf answered him, Verily Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), he it was who informed us of this. — And who, said the Wezeer Fáris, informed our lord Suleymán? He answered him, The Lord of the heavens and the earth, and the God of all creatures, informed him. And the Wezeer Fáris replied, This is none other than a mighty God! So Ásaf the son of Barkhiyà said to him, And do ye not worship Him? Fáris the Wezeer of the King of Egypt answered, We worship the sun, and prostrate ourselves to it. Ásaf therefore replied, O Wezeer Fáris, verily the sun is a star, of the number of the stars created by God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!), and far be it from being a Lord! for the sun appeareth at times, and is absent at times, and our Lord is always present, never absent, and He is able to effect every thing.

They then journeyed on a little until they came near to the seat of government⁴ of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), when Suleymán ordered his troops of mankind and of the Jinn and other creatures to range themselves in their way in ranks. So the wild creatures of the sea, and the elephants and the leopards and the lynxes, all stationed themselves, and ranged themselves in the way in two ranks. The species of each kind collected themselves into separate bodies, and in like manner did the Jánn; each of which appeared to the eyes unhidden, in a terrible form; and they were of various descriptions. They all stood in two ranks; and the birds spread their wings over the other creatures to shade them, warbling one to another with all tongues and with all notes. Therefore when the people of Egypt came to them, they dreaded them, and dared not to proceed: but Ásaf said to them, Enter amid them and pass on, and fear them not; for they are the subjects of Suleymán the son of Dáood, and none of them will hurt you. Then Ásaf entered among them, and all the people entered behind him, the party of the Wezeer of the King of Egypt being among them; but they were in fear. They ceased not to proceed until they arrived at the city, when they lodged them in the mansion of entertainment, treated them with the utmost honour, and brought to them sumptuous banquets during a period of three days.

After this, they brought them before Suleymán, the Prophet of God (peace be on him!); and when they went in to him, they desired to kiss the ground before him; but he prevented their doing so, and said, It is not meet that a man prostrate himself upon the ground⁵ save unto God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!), the Creator of the earth and the heavens and all other things; and whoever among you desireth to stand let him stand; but none of you shall stand in attendance upon me. They therefore complied, and the Wezeer Fáris sat, and some of his servants; but some of the inferiors stood waiting upon him; and when they had sat a while, the servants spread for them the tables, and the people all ate of the repast until they were satisfied.⁶ Then Suleymán commanded the Wezeer of Egypt to mention his affair, that it might be accomplished, and said to him, Speak, and conceal not aught of that on account of which thou hast come; for thou hast not come save for the accomplishment of an affair, and I will inform thee thereof. It is thus and thus: the King of Egypt who sent thee is named 'Ásim, and he hath become a very old man, decrepit, infirm; and God (whose name be exalted!) hath not blessed him with a male child nor a female. He hath therefore been in a state of grief and anxiety and solicitude night and day, until it happened to him that he was sitting upon the throne of his kingdom one day, and the emeers and wezeers, and the great men of his empire, came in to him, and he saw some of them having two sons each, and some having one son, and some having three sons, and they came in accompanied by their sons, and stood in attendance upon him.

So he meditated in himself, and said, by reason of the excess of his sorrow, Who will take my kingdom after my death? And will any but a stranger take it? Thus I shall be as though I had never been. — He became drowned in the sea of solicitude on account of this, and ceased not to remain in solicitude and sorrow until his eyes overflowed with tears, and he covered his face with the handkerchief, and wept violently. Then he rose from his throne and sat upon the floor, weeping and lamenting, and none knew what was in his heart except God (whose name be exalted!), while he thus sat upon the floor. — And when the Prophet of God, Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), had informed the Wezeer Fáris of the sorrow and weeping of the King, and what had happened between him and his Wezeer from first to last, he said after that to the Wezeer Fáris, Is this which I have told thee, O Wezeer, true? So the Wezeer Fáris answered, O Prophet of God, verily that which thou hast said is true and correct; but, O Prophet of God, when I was conversing with the King respecting this matter, there was not with us any one, and not one of the people knew our case. Who then informed thee of all these things? — He replied, My Lord, who knoweth the furtive glance and what the bosoms conceal, informed me. So thereupon the Wezeer Fáris said, O Prophet of God, this is none other than an excellent, mighty Lord, able to accomplish every thing. And the Wezeer Fáris, embraced El-Islám, he and they who were with him.⁷

The Prophet of God, Suleymán, then said to the Wezeer, Verily thou hast with thee such and such rarities and presents. The Wezeer replied, Yes. And Suleymán said to him, I accept from thee all of them; but I give them unto thee: and rest thou, and those who are with thee, in the place where ye took up your quarters, that the fatigue of the journey may quit you, and to-morrow, if it be the will of God (whose named be exalted!), thine affair shall be accomplished in the most complete manner, by the will of God, the Lord of the earth and the heaven, and the Creator of all creatures. Then the Wezeer Fáris went to his place; and he repaired to the Lord Suleymán on the following day; whereupon the Prophet of God, Suleymán, said to him, When thou hast come unto the King of 'Ásim the son of Safwán, and hast an interview with him, do ye both ascend such a tree, and sit silent; and when it is the period between the two prayers,⁸ and the mid-day heat hath become assuaged, descend ye to the foot of the tree, and look ye there: ye will find two large serpents coming forth; the head of one being like the head of the ape, and the head of the other like the head of an 'Efreet. When ye see them, smite ye them with arrows, and kill them; then [cut off and] throw away, from the head-part of each of them, as much as one span's length, and of the tail-part of each of them likewise: so their flesh will remain, and do ye cook it, and cook it well, and feed your two wives with it, and ye will obtain by them, by the permission of God (whose name be exalted!), male children.

Then Suleymán (on whom be peace!) caused to be brought a seal-ring and a sword, and a wrapper containing a tunic⁹ ornamented with jewels, and he said, O Wezeer Fáris, when the two sons of you twain shall have grown up, and attained to manhood, give ye to each one of them one of these things. And after this, he said to the Wezeer, In the name of God! May God (whose name be exalted!) accomplish thine affair! And now there remaineth not aught for thee to do but that thou set forth on thy journey, relying upon the blessing of God (whose name be exalted!); for the King is night and day expecting thine arrival, and his eye is constantly gazing upon the way. — So upon this the Wezeer Fáris advanced to the Prophet of God, Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), and bade him farewell, and went forth from him, after he had kissed his hands.

He journeyed on during the rest of that day, full of joy on account of the accomplishment of his affair, and he prosecuted his journey with diligence night and day, and ceased not to travel on until he came near to Egypt, when he sent one of his servants to acquaint the King 'Ásim therewith. So when the King 'Ásim heard of his arrival and of the accomplishment of his affair, he rejoiced exceedingly, he and his chief officers, and the lords of his kingdom and all his troops, and especially at the safety of the Wezeer Fáris. And when the King and the Wezeer met each other, the Wezeer alighted, and kissed the ground before him, and gave the King the glad tidings of the accomplishment of his affair in the most complete manner; after which he proposed to him the true faith and El-Islám; whereupon the King 'Ásim embraced El-Islám, with all his subjects,¹⁰ and said to the Wezeer Fáris, Go to thy house and rest thyself this night, and rest thyself also for a week, and enter the bath: after that come to me, that I may inform thee of a thing respecting which we must deliberate. So the Wezeer kissed the ground and departed, he and his dependents and his young men and his servants, to his house, and he rested eight days: after which he repaired to the King, and related to him all that had occurred between him and Suleymán, the son of Dáood, on both of whom be peace! He then said to the King, Arise thou alone, and come with me. He therefore arose with the Wezeer, and they took two bows and two arrows, ascended the tree, and sat silent until the period of mid-day had passed, and ceased not to remain so until near the time of afternoon-prayers, when they descended, and looked, and saw two large serpents come forth from the foot of the tree.

The King looked at them, and liked them; for they excited his admiration when he saw them with collars of gold; and he said, O Wezeer, verily these two serpents are adorned with collars of gold! By Allah, this is a wonderful thing! Let us take them and put them into a cage, and divert ourselves with the sight of them. — But the Wezeer replied, These hath God created for their use: so smite thou one with an arrow, and I will smite one with an arrow. Accordingly they both shot at them with the arrows, and slew them; and they cut off from the head-part of each of them a span, and from the tail-part of each a span, and threw away these pieces. They then went with the rest to the King's palace, demanded the cook, and gave him that meat, saying to him, Cook this meat nicely, with onion-sauce¹¹ and spices, and ladle it out into two saucers, and bring them hither at such a time and at such an hour, and delay not. So the cook took the meat, and went with it to the kitchen, and he cooked it well, with excellent onion-sauce; after which he ladled it out into two saucers, and brought them before the King and the Wezeer. The King therefore took a saucer, and the Wezeer a saucer, and they fed with them their two wives; and by the good pleasure of God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!), and his power and will, it happened, that night, as the Prophet of God, Suleymán, had said.

The King remained, after that, three months disturbed in heart, saying within himself, I wonder whether this thing be true or not true. Then his wife was sitting one day, and she felt symptoms of becoming a mother, and she was pained, and her complexion changed. So she summoned one of the eunuchs who were with her, and he was one of the chief of them, and she said, Go to the King, wherever he is, and say to him, O King of the age, I give thee the glad tidings that our mistress hath felt symptoms of her becoming a mother. The eunuch therefore went forth quickly, full of joy, and he saw the King alone, with his hand upon his cheek, meditating on this subject; so the eunuch approached him, and kissed the ground before him, and informed him of this fact. And when he heard the words of the eunuch, he rose upon his feet, and, in the excess of his joy, he kissed the hand of the eunuch, and his head, and, having pulled off the apparel that was on himself, gave it to him; and he said to those who were present in his hall of assembly, Whosoever loveth me, let him bestow favours upon him. They therefore gave him, of riches and jewels and jacinths and horses and mules and gardens, what could not be numbered nor calculated.

Then the Wezeer came in at that time to the King, and said, O King of the age, I was just now sitting alone in the house, troubled in heart, meditating upon the state of my wife, and saying within myself, I wonder whether it be true, and whether Khátoon¹² will bear me a child or not — when, lo, the eunuch came in to me, and gave me the glad tidings that my wife Khátoon had felt symptoms of becoming a mother, and that her complexion was changed; whereupon, in my joy, I pulled off all the apparel that was upon me, and gave it to the eunuch; and I gave him a thousand pieces of gold, and made him the chief of the eunuchs. Then the King 'Ásim said, O Wezeer, verily God (blessed be He, and exalted be his name!) hath favoured us, in his bounty and goodness and liberality and beneficence, with the right religion, and honoured us in his graciousness and bounty, and brought us out from darkness into light; and I desire to relieve the people, and to rejoice them. So the Wezeer replied, Do what thou desirest. And he said, O Wezeer, go down immediately, and take forth every one who is in the prison, of the criminals and debtors; and whosoever shall be guilty of an offence after that, we will requite him with that which he shall deserve. We will also take off from the people the taxes for three years, and do thou set up, around this city, kitchens, around the walls, and order the cooks to suspend there all kinds of cooking-pots, to cook all kinds of viands, and to continue the cooking night and day; and all who are in this city, and in the surrounding tracts, near and distant, shall eat and drink and carry to their houses. Order them also to make merry, and to decorate the city seven days, and not to shut their shops night nor day.¹³

So the Wezeer went forth immediately, and did as the King 'Ásim had commanded him. They decorated the city and the castle and the towers in the most beautiful manner, and clad themselves in the best of apparel; and the people passed their time in eating and drinking and play and merriment until the period of the delivery of the King's wife, after the fulfilment of her days, when she gave birth to a male child like the moon in the night of its fulness, and the King named him Seyf-el-Mulook.¹⁴ Likewise the wife of the Wezeer gave birth to a boy like a lamp, and he named him Sá'ed.¹⁵ When they had attained to years of discretion,¹⁶ the King 'Ásim, whenever he beheld them, rejoiced in them exceedingly; and when their age had become twenty years, the King summoned his Wezeer Fáris to a private interview, and said to him, O Wezeer, a thing hath occurred to my mind, and I desire to do it; but I will consult thee respecting it. The Wezeer replied, Whatever hath occurred to thy mind, do it; for thy judgment is blessed. And the King 'Ásim said, O Wezeer, I have become a very old, decrepit man; for I am far advanced in years; and I desire to reside in a Záwiyeh,¹⁷ to worship God (whose name be exalted!), and give my kingdom and my empire to my son Seyf-el-Mulook; since he is now a comely young man, perfect in horsemanship and intellect, and polite literature, and gravity, and the art of government. What then sayest thou, O Wezeer, of this idea? — The Wezeer answered, Excellent is the idea that thou hast formed. It is a blessed and fortunate idea; and if thou do this, I also will do like thee, and my son Sá'ed shall be Wezeer unto him; for he is a comely young man, a person of knowledge and judgment. Thus the two shall be together, and we will arrange their affair, and will not be negligent respecting their case, but guide them to the right way.

Then the King 'Ásim said to his Wezeer, Write the letters, and send them by the couriers to all the provinces and districts and fortresses and castles that are under our authority, and order their chiefs to be present in such a month in the Horse-course of the Elephant.¹⁸ The Wezeer Fâris therefore went forth immediately, and wrote to all the governors and the commanders of the castles, and others who were under the authority of the King 'Ásim, commanding them all to be present in that month; and he ordered that every one who was in the city should be present, the distant and the near.

Then the King 'Ásim, after the expiration of the greater part of the interval, commanded the farrâshes to pitch the tents in the midst of the horse-course, and to decorate them in the most sumptuous manner, and to set the great throne upon which the King sat not save on the occasions of festivals. So they did immediately all that he commanded them: they set the throne, and the lieutenants and chamberlains and emeers went forth. The King also went forth, and commanded to proclaim among the people, In the name of God! Come forth to the horse-course! — Accordingly the emeers and wezeers, and the governors of the provinces and the cultivated tracts, came forth to that horse-course, and betook themselves to the service of the King as was their custom, and they all remained in their several places: some of them sat, and some stood, until all the people had collected, when the King gave orders to spread the table.¹⁹ They therefore spread it, and they ate and drank, and prayed for the King. Then the King commanded the chamberlains to proclaim among the people that they should not depart. So they proclaimed, and said in their proclamation, Not one of you shall go until he heareth the words of the King!

They then raised the curtains,²⁰ and the King said, Whoso loveth me, let him remain until he heareth my words. Wherefore all the people sat with tranquil souls, after they had been fearful. And the King rose upon his feet, and made them swear that none of them would rise from his place; and he said to them, O emeers and wezeers and lords of the empire, great and small, and whosoever is present of all the people, do ye know that this kingdom was an heritage unto me from my fathers and forefathers? They answered him, Yes, O King: all of us know that. And he said to them, I and ye all worshipped the sun and the moon, and God (whose name be exalted!) blessed us with the true faith, and delivered us from darkness into light, and God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!) guided us unto the religion of El-Islâm. Know also that I have now become a very old man, decrepit, feeble; and I desire to sit in a Zâwiyeh, there to worship God (whose name be exalted!), and to beg his forgiveness of past offences; and this my son, Seyf-el-Mulook, shall be ruler. Ye know that he is a comely young man, eloquent, acquainted with the affairs of the world, intelligent, excelling in science, just. I therefore desire at this present time to give him my kingdom, and to make him King over you in my stead, and seat him as Sultán in my place. - So I will retire to worship God (whose name be exalted!) in a Záwiyeh, and my son Seyf-el-Mulook will be invested with the sovereignty, and judge between you. What then do ye all say? — And upon this, they all rose, and, having kissed the ground before him, answered, We hear and obey. And they said, O our King and our defender, shouldst thou set over us one of thy slaves, we would obey him, and attend to thy words, and comply with thy command: how then in the case of thy son Seyf-el-Mulook? We accept him and approve of him, on the eye and the head.

So thereupon the King 'Ásim the son of Safwán arose, and descended from his throne, and, having seated his son on the great throne, took the crown from his own head, and put it on the head of his son, and he girded his waist with the royal girdle.²¹ The King 'Ásim seated himself upon the throne of his kingdom, by the side of his son; and the emeers and wezeers, and the great men of the empire, and all the people, arose and kissed the ground before him, and stood saying one to another, He is worthy of the sovereignty, and he is more worthy of it than any other. They made proclamation of safety, and offered up prayers in his favour for victory and good fortune; and Seyf-el-Mulook scattered gold and silver over the heads of all the people, conferred robes of honour, and gave and bestowed. Then, after a moment, the Wezeer Fáris arose, and kissed the ground, and said, O emeers, O lords of the empire, do ye know that I am Wezeer, and that my office of Wezeer commenced of old, before the King 'Ásim the son of Safwán was invested with the sovereignty, who hath now divested himself of the sovereignty and invested his son in his stead? They answered, Yes: we know that thou hast inherited thine office of Wezeer from father after grandfather. And he said, And now I divest myself, and invest this my son Sá'ed; for he is intelligent, sagacious, knowing. What then say ye all? — And they answered, None is fit to be Wezeer to the King Seyf-el-Mulook except thy son Sá'ed; for they are suited, each to the other. So thereupon the Wezeer Fáris arose, and took off his Wezeer's turban, and put it on the head of his son Sá'ed, and he put the Wezeer's inkhorn before him also. And the chamberlains and emeers said, Verily he deserveth the office of Wezeer. Then the King 'Ásim and the Wezeer Fáris arose, and opened the treasuries, and conferred sumptuous robes of honour upon the kings and emeers and wezeers, and the great men of the empire, and all the people; gave salaries and benefactions, and wrote for them new diplomas and mandates with the signature of Seyf-el-Mulook and the signature of the Wezeer Sá'ed the son of the Wezeer Fáris; and the people [of the provinces] remained in the city for a week, after which each of them journeyed to his district and his place.

The King 'Ásim then took his son Seyf-el-Mulook, and Sá'ed the son of the old Wezeer, and they entered the city, went up to the palace, and, having summoned the Treasurer, ordered him to bring the seal-ring and the sword and the wrapper; and the King 'Asim said, O my sons, come: each of you shall choose something from this present and take it. And the first who put forth his hand was Seyf-el-Mulook, who took the wrapper and the seal-ring; and Sá'ed put forth his hand, and took the sword;²² after which they kissed the hands of the old King, and departed to their dwelling-places. Now when Seyf-el-Mulook took the wrapper, he did not open it, nor look at what was in it, but he threw it upon the couch on which he slept at night together with his Wezeer Sá'ed; for it was their custom to sleep together. They spread their bed, and the two lay down together upon it, the candles shedding their light upon them; and they remained until midnight. Then Seyf-el-Mulook awoke from his sleep, and, seeing the wrapper at his head, he said within himself, I wonder what is in this wrapper which the King hath given us among the rarities. So he took it, and took a candle, and descended from the couch, leaving Sá'ed asleep; and he entered a closet, and opened the wrapper; whereupon he saw in it a tunic of the fabric of the Jánn. He then opened the tunic, and spread it out, and found upon the lining of the back part of it the portrait of a damsel, delineated in gold; but her loveliness was wonderful. When he saw this portrait, his reason fled from his head: he became mad with love of it, and fell upon the floor in a fit, and began to weep and wail, and to slap his face and his bosom, and to kiss the portrait. Then he recited these two verses:—

Love, at its commencement, is like running saliva. Destiny bringeth it and exciteth it. But when the youth plungeth into the abysses of love, events occur too great for him to bear.

He ceased not to wail and weep, and to slap his face and his bosom, until the Wezeer Sá'ed awoke, and looked at the bed, and saw not Seyf-el-Mulook; but he saw a candle; and he said within himself, Whither is Seyf-el-Mulook gone? He then took the candle, and proceeded to search through all the palace until he came to the closet in which Seyf-el-Mulook was, when he saw him weeping violently and wailing. So he said to him, O my brother, for what reason is this weeping? What hath happened to thee? Tell me, and acquaint me with the cause of this. — But Seyf-el-Mulook spoke not to him, nor raised his head: he still wept and wailed, and struck his hand upon his bosom. Therefore when Sá'ed saw him in this state, he said, I am thy Wezeer and thy brother, and I was reared with thee; and if thou do not discover to me thine affairs, and make me acquainted with thy secret, to whom wilt thou reveal thy secret, and whom wilt thou make acquainted with it? And Sá'ed ceased not to humble himself and to kiss the ground for some time, while Seyf-el-Mulook looked not towards him, nor spoke to him a single word; but continued weeping. And when his state alarmed Sá'ed, and his case wearied him, he went forth from him, and, taking a sword, entered the closet in which was Seyf-el-Mulook, and put the point of the sword to his own bosom, and said to Seyf-el-Mulook, Rouse thyself, O my brother! If thou tell me not what hath happened to thee, I will slay myself, rather than see thee in this state. — So upon this, Seyf-el-Mulook raised his head towards his Wezeer Sá'ed, and said to him, O my brother, I was ashamed to tell thee, and to acquaint thee with that which hath happened to me. But Sá'ed replied, I conjure thee by Allah, the Lord of lords, and the Liberator of necks, and the Cause of causes, the One, the Gracious, the Bountiful, the Liberal, that thou tell me what it is that hath happened to thee, and be not abashed at me; for I am thy slave and thy Wezeer and thy counsellor in all affairs. And Seyf-el-Mulook said, Come, look at this portrait.

And when Sá'ed saw that portrait, he contemplated it for some time, and saw inscribed upon the head of it, in pearls arranged, This is the portrait of Bedeea-el-Jemál the daughter of Shahyál²³ the son of Shárookh, one of the Kings of the believing Jánn, who sojourn in the city of Bábil, and dwell in the Garden of Irem of the son of 'Ad the Greater.²⁴ — Upon this, the Wezeer Sá'ed said to the King Seyf-el-Mulook, O my brother, knowest thou who among women is the original of this portrait, that we may search for her? Seyf-el-Mulook answered, No, by Allah, O my brother: I know not the original of this portrait. And Sá'ed replied, Come, read this inscription. So Seyf-el-Mulook advanced, and read the inscription that was upon the crown, and knew its purport; and thereupon he uttered a loud cry from the bottom of his bosom, and said, Ah! Ah! Ah! — But Sá'ed said to him, O my brother, if the original of this portrait be in existence, and her name be Bedeea-el-Jemál, and she be in the world, I will hasten to seek her, without delay, that thou mayest attain thy desire. I conjure thee then by Allah, O my brother, that thou relinquish weeping, in order that thou mayest introduce the people of the empire to wait upon thee; and when the morning cometh, summon the merchants and the poor devotees and the travellers and the needy, and inquire of them respecting the particulars of this city. Perhaps some one, by the blessing of God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!), and by his aid, may direct us to it, and to the Garden of Irem.

Accordingly, when the morning came, Seyf-el-Mulook rose, and ascended the throne, hugging the tunic; for from this time he neither rose nor sat down, nor would sleep come to him, unless it were with him. So the emeers and wezeers, and the troops, and the lords of the empire, came in to him; but when the court was fully attended, and the assembly was ranged in order, the King Seyf-el-Mulook said to his Wezeer Sá'ed, Go forth to them and say to them, that the King hath experienced an indisposition, and that he passed not last night save in a state of illness. The Wezeer Sá'ed therefore went forth, and acquainted the people with that which the King had said. And when the King 'Ásim heard that, the case of his son was not a light matter to him; wherefore, upon this, he summoned the sages and the astrologers, and went in with them to his son Seyf-el-Mulook; and they looked at him, and prescribed for him a beverage, and he remained in his place during a period of three months. So the King 'Ásim said to the sages who were present, being enraged against them, Wo to you, O dogs! Are ye all unable to cure my son? Now if ye cure him not immediately, I will slay you all! — Their chief replied, O King of the age, we know that this is thy son, and thou knowest that we are not neglectful in the cure of the stranger: how then should we be so with respect to the cure of thy son? But thy son hath a difficult disease: if thou desire to know it, we will mention it to thee, and inform thee of it. The King 'Ásim said, What hath appeared to you in the disease of my son? So the chief sage answered him, O King of the age, verily thy son is now enamoured, and loveth a person with whom there is no way of effecting a union. And upon this, the King 'Ásim was enraged, and said, How learned ye that my son is enamoured, and how came love unto my son? They therefore answered him, Ask his brother and his Wezeer Sá'ed: for he is the person who knoweth his state.

And the King 'Ásim arose, and, having entered a closet alone, summoned Sá'ed, and said to him, Tell me the true nature of the disease of my son. But he replied, I know not its true nature. And the King said to the executioner, Take Sá'ed, bind his eyes, and smite off his head. So Sá'ed feared for himself, and said, O King of the age, give me promise of indemnity. And he replied, Tell me, and thou shalt be safe. Then Sá'ed said to him, Verily thy son is enamoured. — And who, asked the King, is the object of his passion? Sá'ed answered, The daughter of one of the Kings of the Jánn: for he saw her portrait upon a tunic in the wrapper which Suleymán the Prophet of God gave you.

And thereupon the King 'Ásim arose and went in to his son Seyf-el-Mulook, and said to him, O my son, what hath afflicted thee, and what is this portrait of which thou hast become enamoured, and why didst thou not inform me? Seyf-el-Mulook answered, O my father, I was abashed at thee, and I was not able to mention to thee that matter, nor could I acquaint any one with aught of it: but now thou knowest my state; see then how thou wilt act to effect my cure. His father said to him, What expedient shall be employed? Were this of the daughters of mankind, we would contrive an expedient to obtain access to her; but she is of the daughters of the Kings of the Jánn; and who is able to gain possession of her, unless it be Suleymán the son of Dáood? for he is the person who can effect that. But, O my son, arise immediately, and strengthen thyself, and mount, and go to the chase, and to the games in the horse-course; employ thyself also in eating and drinking, and dismiss anxiety and grief from thy heart. I will bring thee a hundred damsels of the daughters of Kings, and thou hast no need of the daughters of the Jánn, over whom we have no power, and who are not of our species.—But he replied, I will not relinquish her, nor will I seek any other than her. So his father said to him, How shall this be done, O my son? And he answered him, Bring to us all the merchants and the travellers and wanderers throughout the countries, that we may inquire of them respecting this. Perhaps God will direct us to the Garden of Irem and to the city of Bâbil.—The King 'Âsim therefore commanded that every merchant in the city should present himself, and every stranger in it, and every sea-captain; and when they came, he asked them respecting the city of Bâbil and its country, and respecting the Garden of Irem. Not one of them, however, knew these places, or gave any information of them.

But on the breaking up of the assembly, one of them said, O King of the age, if thou desire to know that, inquire in the country of China; for it hath a great city, and perhaps some one of that place may direct thee to the object of thy desire. And upon this, Seyf-el-Mulook said, O my father, fit out for me a ship for the voyage to the land of China. His father replied, O my son, sit thou upon the throne of thy kingdom, and rule the people, and I will make the voyage to the land of China, and go myself on this business. But Seyf-el-Mulook said, O my father, this affair concerneth me, and no one can seek to accomplish it like myself; and whatever may happen, if thou give me permission to make the voyage, I will do so, and be absent for a period of time. If I find any tidings of her, my desire is attained; and if I find no tidings of her, by the voyage I shall experience dilatation of my bosom, and enlivenment of my heart; thus my case will become easy; and if I live, I shall return to thee safe.—And the King looked at his son, and saw for himself no resource but doing for him that which would content him. So he gave him permission to make the voyage, and fitted out for him forty ships, and a thousand²⁵ memlooks, besides servants, and gave him wealth and treasures, with every thing that he required of implements of war; and he said to them, Set forth on thy voyage, O my son, in prosperity and health and safety. I commit thee unto Him with whom deposits are not lost.

Then his father and his mother bade him farewell, the ships were laden with water and provisions and arms and soldiers, and they commenced the voyage. They ceased not to pursue their course until they arrived at the capital of China; and when the people of China heard that there had come to them forty ships filled with men and equipages and arms and stores, they made sure that they were enemies who had come to attack them and besiege them; wherefore they closed the gates of the city, and prepared the catapults. So when the King Seyf-el-Mulook heard of this, he sent to them two of his favourite memlooks, and said to them, Go ye to the King of China, and say to him, This is Seyf-el-Mulook, the son of the King 'Âsim: he hath come unto thy city as a guest, to divert himself in thy country for a period of time, and not to fight, nor to contend: so if thou wilt receive him, he will land to visit thee; and if thou wilt not receive him, he will return, and not trouble thee nor the people of thy city.

Accordingly the memlooks, on their arriving at the city, said to its inhabitants, We are envoys of the King Seyf-el-Mulook. They therefore opened to them the gate, and went with them, and presented them before their King. His name was Faghfoor²⁶ Shâh; and there had existed between him and the King 'Âsim, before that period, an acquaintance. So when he heard that the King who had come to him was Seyf-el-Mulook, the son of the King 'Ásim, he bestowed robes of honour upon the envoys, and gave orders to open the gates. He also prepared the gifts of hospitality, and went forth himself, with the favourite officers of his empire, and came to Seyf-el-Mulook; and they embraced each other. He said to him, A friendly and free and an ample welcome to him who hath come unto us! I am thy memlook, and the memlook of thy father; my city is at thy disposal, and every thing that thou demandest shall be brought unto thee.— And he presented to him the gifts of hospitality, and provisions [for him and his people], at their stations. Then the King Seyf-el-Mulook mounted, and Sá'ed his Wezeer, and with them their favourite officers and the rest of the soldiers, and they proceeded along the sea-shore until they entered the city; when the cymbals were beaten, and the drums to announce the happy event; and they remained there for a period of forty days, well entertained.

After this, the King of China said to Seyf-el-Mulook, O son of my brother, how art thou? Hath my country pleased thee? — Seyf-el-Mulook answered him, May God (whose name be exalted!) make it ever to be honoured by thy rule, O King! And the King Faghfoor Sháh said, Nought hath brought thee hither save some affair that hath occurred to thee; and whatever thing thou desirest to obtain from my country, I will accomplish it for thee. So Seyf-el-Mulook replied, O King, verily my case is wonderful; and it is this: I have become enamoured of a portrait of Bedeea-el-Jemál. And upon this the King of China wept in pity and compassion for him, and said to him, And what desirest thou now, O Seyf-el-Mulook? He answered him, I desire of thee that thou bring unto me all the wanderers and travellers, and those who are accustomed to journeys, that I may inquire of them respecting the original of this portrait. Perhaps some one of them may give me information respecting her.— The King Faghfoor Sháh therefore sent the lieutenants and chamberlains and guards, and commanded them to bring all the wanderers and travellers who were in the country. So they brought them; and they were a numerous company; and they assembled before the King Faghfoor Sháh. Then the King Seyf-el-Mulook inquired respecting the city of Bábil and the Garden of Irem: but none of them returned him an answer; wherefore the King Seyf-el-Mulook was perplexed at his case. After that, however, one of the sea-captains said, O King, if thou desire to know this city and that garden, inquire in the islands that appertain to India.

So thereupon, Seyf-el-Mulook commanded that they should bring the ships; and they did so, and stored them with water and provisions and all that they required; after which, Seyf-el-Mulook embarked with Sá'ed his Wezeer, having bidden farewell to the King Faghfoor Sháh, and they continued their course over the sea for a period of four months, with a fair wind, safe and secure. But it happened that there rose against them a wind one day, the billows came upon them from every quarter, the rain descended upon them, and the sea became charged by the violence of the wind. The ships dashed one against another by reason of the force of the wind, and all fell to pieces, as also did the small boats, [except one,] and they were all submerged but Seyf-el-Mulook with a party of his memlooks who remained in a small boat. Then the wind became stilled and calmed by the power of God (whose name be exalted!), and the sun rose, and Seyf-el-Mulook, opening his eyes, saw not any of the ships, nor saw he aught save the sky and the water and himself and those who were with him in the little boat. So he said to the memlooks who were with him, Where are the ship and the small boats, and where is my brother Sá'ed? They answered him, O King of the age, there remain not ships nor boats nor those who were in them; for they are all submerged, and have become food for the fishes.

And thereupon, Seyf-el-Mulook called out, and repeated a sentence the utterer of which is secure from confusion; that is, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Then he began to slap his face, and desired to cast himself into the sea; but the memlooks prevented him, and said to him, O King, what advantage would arise to thee from this? Thou hast done with thyself thus, and hadst thou attended to the words of thy father, nought of this had happened to thee. But all this was written from eternity by the will of the Creator of souls, and the servant must experience the accomplishment of that which God hath decreed to befall him. The astrologers said to thy father, at thy birth, Verily all these difficulties will befall this thy son. And in this case we have no resource but to be patient until God shall dispel from us the affliction in which we are involved. — And Seyf-el-Mulook said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! There is no place of refuge from that which God (whose name be exalted!) decreeth, nor any flight therefrom! — Then he sighed, and recited these verses: —

I am perplexed, by the Compassionate! without doubt, in my case; and trouble hath befallen me from sources unknown to me.

I will be patient, that mankind may know me to have borne with patience that which is more bitter than aloes.²⁷

The taste of bitter aloes is not like my patience; for I have borne with patience what is hotter than live coals.

I have no resource in my present case; but I commit my affairs to the Disposer of events.

He was drowned in the sea of solitudes, and his tears ran down his cheek like a copious rain; and he slept for a period of the day, after which he awoke, and demanded some food. So he ate until he was satisfied, and they removed the provision from before him. The boat proceeded with them, and they knew not whither it was conveying them; and it ceased not to bear them along with the waves and the winds night and day for a long period of time, until their provision was exhausted, and they were confounded, and became in a state of the most violent hunger and thirst and agitation. But, lo, an island appeared to them in the distance, and the winds drove them on until they arrived at it; whereupon they made fast their boat to it, and landed, leaving one in the boat. They went on upon that island, and saw upon it many fruits of all kinds, and ate of them until they were satisfied. And, lo, there was a person sitting among the trees, long-faced, of strange appearance, with white beard and skin; and he called to one of the memlooks by his name, and said to him, Eat not of these fruits, for they are not ripe: but come to me, that I may give thee to eat of these ripe fruits. And the memlook looked at him, and imagined that he was of the number of those who were submerged, and that he had landed upon this island.

So he rejoiced extremely at the sight of him, and walked on until he came near to him; this memlook not knowing what was secretly ordained to befall him, and what was written upon his forehead.²⁸ And when he came near to him, that person leaped upon him; for he was a Márid;²⁹ and mounting upon his shoulders, he wound one of his legs round his neck, and hung the other down his back, and said to him, Walk on: there remaineth for thee no escape from me, and thou hast become my ass. The memlook thereupon called out to his companions, and began to weep, and to say, Alas, my master! Go ye forth and save yourselves from this wood, and flee ye; for one of its inhabitants hath mounted upon my shoulders, and the rest seek you, and desire to mount you like me. — So when they heard these words which the memlook uttered, they all fled, and embarked in the boat; and the inhabitants of the island followed them into the sea, saying to them, Whither go ye? Come and remain with us, that we may ride upon your backs, and we will give you food and drink, and ye shall be our asses. — Therefore on their hearing from them these words, they hastened in their course upon the sea until they were far from them; and they proceeded relying upon God, whose name be exalted!

They ceased not to proceed in this manner for the space of a month, till another island appeared to them; and they landed upon that island, and saw there fruits of various kinds. So they busied themselves with eating the fruits; and, lo, they saw something in the way, appearing in the distance; and when they drew near to it, they looked at it, and saw it to be a creature of hideous appearance, lying down, like a column of silver. And a memlook struck it with his foot; and, behold, it was a person with long eyes and cloven head, and he was hidden beneath one of his ears; for it was his habit, when he slept, to put one of his ears beneath his head, and to cover himself with the other ear.³⁰ He then seized the memlook who struck him, and went with him into the midst of the island; and, lo, it was all occupied by Ghools, who ate the sons of Adam. And thereupon that memlook called out to his companions and said to them, Save yourselves; for this island is the island of the Ghools who eat the sons of Adam, and they desire to cut me up and eat me. So when they heard these words, they turned back in flight, and descended from the shore into the boat, without having collected aught of the fruits.

They proceeded for some days, and it happened that there appeared to them, one day, another island; and when they arrived at it, they found upon it a high mountain, which they ascended, and they found upon the mountain a wood of many trees; and they were hungry; wherefore they busied themselves with eating of the fruits. But they were not aware when there came forth to them, from among the trees, persons of horrible aspect, and tall: the height of each of them was fifty cubits and his dog-teeth protruded from his mouth like the tusks of the elephant. And, lo, they found a person sitting upon a piece of black felt on a rock, and around him were the Ethiopians, a numerous company, standing in attendance upon him. Then these Ethiopians came and took Seyf-el-Mulook and his memlooks, and, having stationed them before their King, said, We found these birds among the trees. And the King was hungry so he took two of the memlooks, and slaughtered them and ate them. Therefore when Seyf-el-Mulook beheld this thing, he feared for himself, and wept; and he recited these two verses: —

Calamities have become familiar with my heart, and I with them, after shunning them; for the generous is habitually familiar.
The anxieties that I suffer are not of one description: I have (praise be to God!) thousands of them.³¹

Then he sighed, and recited also this couplet: —

Fortune hath smitten me so with disasters, that my heart is covered with its arrows;
And now, when other arrows strike me, their points break against the points in my heart.

And when the King heard his weeping and lamentation, he said, Verily these birds have an agreeable voice and modulation, and their voices have pleased me: so put ye each one of them into a cage. Accordingly they put each of them into a cage, and they hung them over the head of the King, that he might hear their voices. Thus Seyf-el-Mulook and his memlooks became imprisoned in the cages, and the Ethiopians gave them food and drink; and at times they wept and at times laughed, and at times they talked and at times were silent; the King of the Ethiopians all the while delighting in their voices; and they ceased not to remain in this state for a length of time.

Now the King had a married daughter in another island; and she heard that her father had birds of agreeable voices; so she sent a party of her people to her father to request of him some of these birds. Her father therefore sent to her Seyf-el-Mulook, and three memlooks, in four cages, with the envoy who came to request them; and when they were brought to her, and she beheld them, they pleased her, and she ordered her attendants to put them up in a place over her head. So Seyf-el-Mulook wondered at the events that had befallen him, and he reflected upon the glorious state in which he had been living, and began to weep for himself, while the three memlooks also wept for themselves; and all the time the King's daughter believed that they were singing. It was the custom of the King's daughter, when any one of the land of Egypt or any other country fell into her possession, and pleased her, to hold him in high estimation; and it happened, by the decree of God (whose name be exalted!) and his predestination, that when she saw Seyf-el-Mulook, his beauty and loveliness pleased her, and his stature, and justness of form. She therefore gave orders to treat him and his companions with honour, and caressed him; but he shewed a dislike to her; and upon this she was incensed against him and his memlooks, and commanded them to serve her, and to convey to her the water and the firewood.

They continued to do thus for four years, and this state wearied Seyf-el-Mulook: so he sent to intercede with the Queen, hoping that she would liberate them, and that they might go their way and be relieved from their present state; but she refused; and Seyf-el-Mulook and the memlooks remained with her upon the island in the same condition. The inhabitants of the island knew that they were the birds of the King's daughter; wherefore none of the people of the city dared to hurt them in any way; and the heart of the King's daughter was at ease respecting them, and she felt certain that there was no escape for them from this island. So they used to absent themselves from her for two days, and three, and to go about the desert to collect firewood from the different tracts of the island and to bring it to the kitchen of the King's daughter; and they continued in this state five years.

After this, it happened that Seyf-el-Mulook sat with his memlooks, one day, upon the shore of the sea, conversing upon the events that had occurred, and Seyf-el-Mulook, looking aside, and seeing himself in this place with his memlooks, thought upon his mother and his father and his brother Sá'ed, and upon the state of glory in which he had lived, and he wept and lamented and wailed exceedingly, as did also the memlooks. Then the memlooks said to him, O King of the age, how long shall we weep? Weeping will not profit. This is an event written upon our foreheads by the pre-determination of God (to whom he ascribed might and glory!), and the pen hath written what He hath appointed, and nought will profit us but patience. Perhaps God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!), who hath afflicted us by this calamity, will dispel it from us. — And Seyf-el-Mulook said to them, O my brothers, how shall we contrive our escape from this accursed woman? I see no way of escape for us unless God deliver us from her by his favour. But it hath occurred to my mind that we may flee and be at ease from this fatigue. — They said to him, O King of the age, whither can we go from this island, which is all occupied by Ghools who eat the sons of Adam? In every place to which we might go they would find us, and they would either eat us or take us prisoners and bring us back to our place, and the King's daughter would be incensed against us. — But Seyf-el-Mulook replied, I will do for you something, and perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) will aid us thereby to effect our deliverance, and we shall escape from this island. So they said to him, How wilt thou act? And he answered, We will cut some of these long pieces of wood, and twist ropes of their bark, and bind one to another, and make them a raft,³² which we will launch into the sea, and lade with these fruits; and we will make for it oars, and embark upon it. Perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) will give us relief by means of it; for He is able to accomplish every thing; and perhaps God will bless us with a fair wind, that will convey us to the land of India, and we shall escape from this accursed woman. — And they replied, This is a good idea. And they rejoiced at it exceedingly.

They began immediately to cut the pieces of wood for making the raft. Then they twisted the ropes to bind the pieces of wood together, and they persevered in this work for the space of a month. Every day, in the evening, they took some firewood, and carried it to the kitchen of the King's daughter, and they devoted the rest of the day to their work in making the raft, until they completed it. So when they had finished making it, they launched it upon the sea, and laded it with fruits gathered from the trees of the island, and prepared themselves at the close of the day, not having acquainted any one with that which they had done. Then they embarked upon the raft, and proceeded over the sea for a period of four months, not knowing whither they were borne. Their provisions were exhausted, and they had become in a state of the most violent hunger and thirst, when, lo, the sea frothed and foamed, and rose in high waves, and there came to them a horrible crocodile, which put forth its fore paw, and seized one of the memlooks, and swallowed him. Therefore when Seyf-el-Mulook saw that crocodile do thus with the memlook, he wept violently. He remained upon the raft with the two other memlooks³³ alone, and they passed on to a distance from the place of the crocodile, in a state of fear. They ceased not to remain in this state until there appeared to them, one day, a great mountain, terrible, lofty, rising high into the air; and they were glad at the sight of it; and after that, there appeared to them an island: so they pursued their course to it with diligence, rejoicing at their arriving there. But while they were in this condition, lo, the sea became agitated, and its waves rose high, and its state became changed. Then again a crocodile raised its head, stretched forth its paw, and took the two remaining memlooks of Seyf-el-Mulook, and swallowed them.

So Seyf-el-Mulook remained alone until he arrived at the island; whereupon he laboured till he had ascended the mountain, and he looked, and saw a wood, which he entered, and he walked among the trees, and began to eat of the fruits; but he saw that more than twenty great apes had ascended some of the trees; each of them larger than a mule. Therefore when Seyf-el-Mulook beheld these apes, violent fear came upon him. Then the apes descended, and surrounded him on every side; and after that, they walked before him, making a sign to him that he should follow them, and went on. So Seyf-el-Mulook walked after them; and they ceased not to proceed, with him following them, until they came to a castle of high structure, with lofty angles. They entered this castle, and Seyf-el-Mulook entered behind them, and he beheld in it, of all kinds of rarities and jewels and minerals, what the tongue cannot describe. He saw also in this castle a young man, upon the sides of whose face hairs had not begun to grow; but he was tall, exceedingly tall; and when Seyf-el-Mulook saw this young man, he was cheered by his company; and there was not in that castle any one of mankind besides this young man. The young man, on seeing Seyf-el-Mulook, was pleased with him extremely; and he said to him, What is thy name, and from what country art thou, and how camest thou hither? Acquaint me with thy story, and conceal not of it aught.

Therefore Seyf-el-Mulook replied, I, by Allah, came not hither by my own choice, nor was this place the object of my desire, nor can I remain in a place ³⁴ until I attain what I seek. — And what is it, said the young man, that thou seekest? Seyf-el-Mulook answered him, I am of the land of Egypt, and my name is Seyf-el-Mulook, and my father is named the King 'Asim the son of Safwán. He then related to him the events that had happened to him from the first of the case to the last; and thereupon that young man arose and betook himself to the service of Seyf-el-Mulook, and said, O King of the age, I was in Egypt, and heard that thou hadst gone to the land of China; and how far is this land from the land of China! Verily this is a wonderful thing, and an extraordinary case! — Seyf-el-Mulook replied, Thy words are true; but after that, I proceeded from the land of China to the land of India, and a wind rose against us, and the sea became agitated, and all the ships that were with me went to pieces. And he told him all that had happened to him, until he said, And I have come unto thee in this place. The young man then said to him, O son of the King, what thou hast experienced in this absence from thy country, and in the difficulties that have attended it, is sufficient for thee, and praise be to God who hath brought thee to this place! Reside then with me, that I may be cheered by thy society until I die, and thou shalt be King over this region; for it compriseth this island, to which no limit is known. Moreover these apes are skilled in arts, and every thing that thou shalt demand thou wilt find here. — But Seyf-el-Mulook replied, O my brother, I cannot remain in any place until my affair be accomplished, though I should go around about the whole world inquiring respecting the object of my desire. Perhaps God will cause me to attain my wish, or my course may lead me to a place wherein my appointed term shall end, and I shall die.

The young man then looked towards an ape, and made a sign to him; whereupon the ape absented himself for a while; after which he came back, accompanied by apes with silken napkins tied to their waists; and they brought forward a table, and put upon it about a hundred dishes of gold and silver, containing all kinds of viands, and the apes stood in the manner of servants before Kings. Next he made a sign to the chamberlains to seat themselves: so they sat; and he whose custom it was to serve stood. Then they ate until they were satisfied, when they removed the table, and brought basins and ewers of gold, and they washed their hands. And after that, they brought wine-vessels, about forty vessels, each containing a particular kind of wine; and they drank, and enjoyed themselves, and were merry, and their time was pleasant; all the apes dancing and playing, while the eaters were occupied in eating. So when Seyf-el-Mulook beheld this, he wondered at them, and forgot the difficulties that had happened to him. And when night came, they lighted the candles, and put them in candlesticks of gold and silver. Then they brought vessels of dried and fresh fruits, and they ate; and when the time for sleep came, they spread for them the beds, and they slept.

And in the morning, the young man arose as he was wont, and he woke Seyf-el-Mulook, and said to him, Put forth thy head from this window, and see what is standing beneath the window. He therefore looked, and he saw apes that filled the wide waste and all the desert tract, and none know the number of those apes but God, whose name be exalted! So Seyf-el-Mulook said, These are numerous apes, that have filled the open country, and wherefore have they assembled at this time? And the young man answered him, This is their custom: all who are in the island have come, and some of them have come from a distance of two days' journey, or three days'; for they come every Saturday³⁵ and stand here until I awake from my sleep and put my head forth from this window; and when they see me, they kiss the ground before me; after which they depart to their occupations. And he put forth his head from the window so that they saw him; and when they beheld him, they kissed the ground before him, and departed.

Seyf-el-Mulook remained with the young man during the space of a whole month; and after that, he bade him farewell, and departed. The young man ordered a party of the apes, about a hundred, to journey with him; and they journeyed in attendance upon Seyf-el-Mulook for a period of seven days, until they had conducted him to the extremity of their country,³⁶ when they bade him farewell, and returned to their places. Seyf-el-Mulook then journeyed alone over the mountains and hills and the deserts and wastes for the space of four months, one day hungry and another day satiated, one day eating of the herbage and another day eating of the fruits of the trees. He began to repent of that which he had done with himself, and of his going forth from that young man, and he desired to retrace his steps to him. But he saw an indistinct black object appearing in the distance; so he said within himself, Is this a black city, or how is the case? But I will not return until I see what this indistinct object is. — And when he came near to it, he saw it to be a palace of lofty structure. He who built it was Yâfith the son of Nooh (on whom be peace!), and it was the palace which God (whose name be exalted!) hath mentioned in his Excellent Book, in his words, And an abandoned well, and a lofty palace.³⁷

Seyf-el-Mulook seated himself at the door of the palace, and said within himself, I wonder what is the state of the interior of this palace, and who of the Kings is within it. Who now will acquaint me with the truth of the case, and are its inhabitants of mankind or of the Jinn? — He sat meditating for some time, and found not any one entering it, nor any coming forth from it. So he arose and walked forward, relying upon God, until he entered the palace; and he counted in his way seven entrance-passages; but saw no one. He beheld, however, on his right hand, three doors, and before him a door over which hung a curtain. He therefore advanced to that door, and lifted the curtain with his hand, and walked on within the door; and, lo, he found a great leewán³⁸ spread with silken carpets, and at the upper end of the leewán was a couch of gold, whereon sat a damsel whose face was like the moon: upon her was the apparel of Kings, and she resembled a bride on the night of her display. And at the feet of the couch were forty tables, upon which were dishes of gold and silver, all of them filled with rich viands. When Seyf-el-Mulook beheld her, he approached her and saluted; and she returned his salutation, and said to him, Art thou of mankind or of the Jinn? He answered, I am of the best of mankind; for I am a King, the son of a King. And she said to him, What dost thou desire? Avail thyself of this food, and after that relate to me thy story from first to last, and tell me how thou camest to this place. — Seyf-el-Mulook therefore seated himself at a table, and removed the cover from it, and, being hungry, he ate of those dishes until he was satiated, and washed his hands; after which he ascended the couch, and seated himself by the damsel, who thereupon said to him, Who art thou, and what is thy name, and whence hast thou come, and who brought thee hither? Seyf-el-Mulook replied, As to me, my story is long. And she said to him, Tell me whence thou art, and what is the cause of thy coming hither, and what is thy desire. But he replied, Inform thou me what is thy state, and what is thy name, and who brought thee hither, and wherefore thou art residing in this place alone. And the damsel said to him, —

My name is Dólet-Khátoon.³⁹ I am daughter of the King of India, and my father dwelleth in the city of Sarandeeb.⁴⁰ He hath a beautiful, large garden: there is not in the land of India and its district any superior to it; and in it is a large tank; and I entered that garden one day with my female slaves, and I and my female slaves approached and descended into the tank, and we proceeded to play and to amuse ourselves. But I was not aware when a thing like a cloud came down upon me, and having snatched me away from among my female slaves, flew with me between heaven and earth, saying, O Dólet-Khátoon, fear not, but be of tranquil heart. Then he flew on with me for a short time; after which he put me down in this palace, and immediately became transformed, and, lo, he was a comely young man, of youthful beauty, and clean in apparel; and he said to me, Dost thou know me? I answered, No, O my master. And he said, I am son of the Blue King, King of the Jánn, and my father dwelleth in the Castle of El-Kulzum,⁴¹ and hath under his authority six hundred thousand of the flying and the diving Jinn.⁴² It happened to me that I was on a journey, going on my way, and I saw thee and became enamoured of thee, and, descending upon thee, seized thee from among the female slaves, and brought thee to this lofty palace, which is my place and my abode. No one ever cometh to it; neither any of the Jinn nor any of mankind; and from India to this place is a journey of a hundred and twenty years: ⁴³ so be sure that thou wilt never see again the country of thy father and thy mother. Reside then with me in this place with tranquil heart and mind, and I will bring before thee whatever thou shalt desire.

And after that, he embraced me and kissed me, and said to me, Reside here, and fear not aught. Then he left me, and was absent from me a while; after which he came bringing these tables and the furniture and carpets. But he cometh to me every Tuesday and remaineth with me three days; and on Friday he remaineth till the middle of the afternoon, when he departeth, and he is absent until the Tuesday: then again he remaineth with me ⁴⁴ in the same manner. When he cometh, he eateth and drinketh with me, and embraceth me and kisseth me; but he hath not induced me to become his wife. My father is named Táj-el-Mulook; and he knoweth no tidings of me, nor hath he discovered any trace of me. — This is my story: now tell me thy story.

Upon this, Seyf-el-Mulook said to her, Verily my story is long, and I fear that, if I tell it thee, the time which it will require will be too long for us, and the 'Efreet will come. But she replied, He did not depart from me more than a little while before thine entrance, and he cometh not save on Tuesday: therefore remain and be at ease, and gladden thy heart, and relate to me what hath happened to thee from first to last. So Seyf-el-Mulook said, I hear and obey. And he commenced his story, and proceeded with it until he had related the whole of it from beginning to end; and when he came to the mention of Bedeea-el-Jemál, her eyes filled with copious tears, and she said, It is not as I imagined of thee, O Bedeea-el-Jemál! Alas, for the conduct of fortune! O Bedeea-el-Jemál, dost thou not remember me, nor say, My sister Dólet-Khátoon, whither hath she gone? — Then she wept exceedingly, and lamented that Bedeea-el-Jemál had not remembered her.⁴⁵ Seyf-el-Mulook therefore said to her, O Dólet-Khátoon, thou art a human being, and she is a Jinneeyeh: how then can this be thy sister? She replied, She is my foster-sister; and the cause was this: my mother went down to divert herself in the garden, and, her time coming, she gave birth to me in the garden: and the mother of Bedeea-el-Jemál was in the garden, she and her 'Óns, and her time came; so she sojourned in a tract of the garden, and she gave birth to Bedeea-el-Jemál. Then she sent one of her female slaves to my mother to demand of her some food and necessary clothing, and my mother sent to her what she demanded, and invited her. She therefore arose, and, taking Bedeea-el-Jemál with her, came to my mother, and my mother suckled Bedeea-el-Jemál; and her mother and she remained with us in the garden for the space of two months, after which she journeyed to her country; and she gave to my mother a thing, saying to her, When thou wantest me, I will come to thee in the midst of the garden. Bedeea-el-Jemál used to come with her mother every year, and they used to remain with us some time, and then to return to their country; and if I were with my mother, O Seyf-el-Mulook, and beheld thee with us in our country, and we were united as usual, I would employ some stratagem against Bedeea-el-Jemál, so as to make thee attain thy desire, but I am in this place, and they know not my case. If they were acquainted with my case, and knew me to be here, they could effect my deliverance from this place; but the affair is God's

Seyf-el-Mulook then said to her, Arise, and come with me: we will flee, and go whither God (whose name be exalted!) pleaseth. But she replied, We cannot do that. By Allah, if we fled to the distance of a year's journey, this accursed wretch would bring us back immediately, and he would destroy us. So Seyf-el-Mulook said, I will hide myself in a place, and when he passeth by me, I will smite him with the sword, and slay him. But she replied, Thou canst not slay him unless thou kill his soul. — And in what place, said he, is his soul? She answered, I asked him respecting it many times; but he would not confess to me its place. It happened, however, that I urged him, one day, and he was enraged against me, and said to me, How often wilt thou ask me respecting my soul? What is the reason of thy question respecting my soul? — So I answered him, O Hátim,⁴⁶ there remaineth to me no one but thee, except God; and I, as long as I live, would not cease to hold thy soul in my embrace; and if I do not take care of thy soul and put it in the midst of my eye, how can I live after thee? If I knew thy soul, I would take care of it as of my right eye. — And thereupon he said to me, When I was born, the astrologers declared that the destruction of my soul would be effected by the hand of one of the sons of the human Kings. I therefore took my soul, and put it into the crop of a sparrow, and I imprisoned the sparrow in a little box, and put this into another small box, and this I put within seven other small boxes, and I put these within seven chests, and the chests I put into a coffer⁴⁷ of marble within the verge of this circumambient ocean; for this part is remote from the countries of mankind, and none of mankind can gain access to it. Now I have told thee; and tell not thou any one of this; for it is a secret between me and thee.

So I said to him, To whom should I relate it? None but thou cometh unto me, that I should tell him. — Then I said to him, By Allah, thou hast put thy soul in a most strongly secured place, to which no being can gain access. How then should any one of mankind gain access to it, unless what is [seemingly] impossible be ordained, and God had predetermined like as the astrologers have said? How can one of mankind gain access to this [place]? — But he replied, Perhaps one of them may have upon his finger the seal-ring of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), and he may come hither, and put his hand with the seal-ring upon the face of the water, and say, By virtue of these names, let the soul of such-a-one come up! Thereupon the coffer will come up, and he will break it, and the chests in like manner, and the small boxes; and the sparrow will come forth from the little box, and he will strangle it, and I shall die.

So thereupon Seyf-el-Mulook said, That King's son is myself, and this is the ring of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!) upon my finger. Arise then and come with us to the shore of this sea, that we may see whether these his words be false or true. — The two, therefore, arose, and walked on until they came to the sea, when Dólet-Khátoon stood upon the sea-shore, and Seyf-el-Mulook entered the water to his waist, and said, By virtue of the names and talismans that are upon this seal-ring, and by the influence of Suleymán (on whom be peace!), let the soul of such-a-one, the son of the Blue King, the Jinnee, come forth! And immediately the sea became agitated, and the coffer came up. So Seyf-el-Mulook took it, and struck it against the rock, and broke it, and he broke the chests and the small boxes, and took forth the sparrow from the little box. They then returned to the palace, and ascended the couch; and, lo, a horrible dust arose, and a huge thing came flying, and saying, Spare me, O son of the King, and slay me not, but make me thy emancipated slave, and I will cause thee to attain thy desire. But Dólet-Khátoon said to him, The Jinnee hath come; therefore kill the sparrow, lest this accursed wretch enter the palace, and take the sparrow from thee, and slay thee, and slay me after thee. So upon this he strangled the sparrow, and it died, and the Jinnee fell upon the ground, a heap of black ashes.

Then Dólet-Khátoon said, We have escaped from the hand of this accursed wretch, and how shall we now act? Seyf-el-Mulook answered, We must seek aid of God (whose name be exalted!), who hath afflicted us; for He will order our affair, and will aid us to effect our deliverance from our present state. And he arose and pulled off, of the doors of the palace, about ten doors. These were of sandal-wood and aloes-wood, and their nails were of gold and silver. And he took some ropes which were there, of common silk and floss-silk, and bound the doors together; after which, he and Dólet-Khátoon helped each other so that they conveyed them to the sea and cast them into it; they having become a raft; ⁴⁸ and they tied it to the shore. They then returned to the palace, and carried off the dishes of gold and silver, and likewise the jewels and jacinths and precious minerals. They transported all that was in the palace of such things as were light to carry and of high price, and put them upon that raft, and they embarked upon it, placing their reliance upon God (whose name be exalted!), who satisfieth, and doth not disappoint, him who relieth upon Him. They also made for themselves two pieces of wood as oars; and they loosed the ropes, and let the raft take its course with them over the sea. They ceased not to proceed in this manner for a period of four months, until their provisions were exhausted, and their affliction became violent, and their spirits were oppressed: so they begged of God to grant them deliverance from the state in which they were. Seyf-el-Mulook, during the course of their voyage, used, when he slept, to put Dólet-Khátoon behind his back; and when he turned over, the sword was between them.⁴⁹

And while they were in this state, one night, it happened that Seyf-el-Mulook was asleep, and Dólet-Khátoon awake, and, lo, the raft inclined to the shore, and came to a harbour in which were ships. So Dólet-Khátoon saw the ships, and she heard a man talking with the sailors, and the man who was talking was the chief captain. Therefore, when she heard the voice of the captain, she knew that this was the harbour of some city, and that they had arrived at the habitations of men; and she rejoiced greatly, and, having roused Seyf-el-Mulook from his sleep, she said to him, Arise, and ask this captain respecting the name of this city, and respecting this harbour. And thereupon Seyf-el-Mulook arose, joyful, and said to him, O my brother, what is the name of this city, and what is this harbour called, and what is the name of its King? But the captain replied, O lying-faced! ⁵⁰ O silly-bearded! if thou know not this harbour nor this city, how camest thou hither? Seyf-el-Mulook said, I am a stranger, and I was in a vessel, one of the merchant-vessels, and it was wrecked, and sank with all that was in it; but I got upon a plank, and have arrived here, and I asked thee a question, which is not disgraceful. So the captain said, This is the city called 'Emáreeyeh, and this harbour is called the harbour Kemeen el-Bahreyn.⁵¹

Now when Dólet-Khátoon heard these words, she rejoiced exceedingly, and said, Praise be to God! So Seyf-el-Mulook said, What is the news? And she answered, O Seyf-el-Mulook, rejoice at the announcement of speedy relief; for the King of this city is my uncle, the brother of my father, and his name is 'Áli-l-Mulook.⁵² Then she said to him, Ask him, and say to him, Is the Sultán of this city, 'Áli-l-Mulook, well? He therefore asked him that question; and the captain, enraged at him, replied, Thou sayest, In my life I never came hither; but am a stranger: — who then acquainted thee with the name of the lord of this city? — And Dólet-Khátoon was glad, and she knew the captain; his name was Mo'een-ed-Deen,⁵³ and he was one of her father's captains: he had come forth to search for her, when she was lost, and found her not, and he ceased not to search about until he came to the city of her uncle. Then she said to Seyf-el-Mulook, Say to him, O captain Mo'een-ed-Deen, come and answer the summons of thy mistress. So he called to him in the words which she had said; and when the captain heard his words, he was violently enraged, and said to him, O dog, who art thou, and how knewest thou me? And he said to some of the sailors, Hand me a staff of shoom,⁵⁴ that I may go to this unlucky fellow and break his head. He then took the staff, and went towards Seyf-el-Mulook; and he saw the raft, and saw upon it an object wonderful and beautiful, whereat his mind was amazed; and looking, and taking a sure view, he beheld Dólet-Khátoon sitting, like a piece of the moon. He therefore said, What is with thee? And Seyf-el-Mulook answered him, With me is a damsel named Dólet-Khátoon. And when the captain heard these words he fell down in a fit, on his hearing her name and knowing that she was his mistress, and the daughter of his King.

Then, as soon as he recovered, he left the raft with what was upon it, and repaired to the city, went up to the palace of the King, and asked permission to go in to him. So the chamberlain went in to the King, and said, The captain Mo'een hath come to thee to give thee good news. Wherefore he gave him permission to enter, and he went in to the King, and kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O King, thou hast to give a present for good news; for the daughter of thy brother, Dólet-Khátoon, hath arrived at the city, in good health and prosperity, and she is upon a raft, accompanied by a young man like the moon in the night of its fulness. And when the King heard the tidings of the daughter of his brother, he rejoiced, and conferred a sumptuous robe of honour upon the captain. He also ordered immediately that they should decorate the city for the safety of the daughter of his brother, and sent to her, and caused her to be brought to him, together with Seyf-el-Mulook, and saluted them, and congratulated them on their safety. He then sent to his brother to inform him that his daughter had been found and that she was with him; and when the messenger came to him, he prepared himself, and the troops assembled, and Táj-el-Mulook, the father of Dólet-Khátoon, set forth, and proceeded until he came to his brother 'Áli-l-Mulook, when he met his daughter, and they rejoiced exceedingly.

Táj-el-Mulook remained with his brother a week; after which he took his daughter, and likewise Seyf-el-Mulook, and they proceeded until they came to Sarandeeb, her father's country, when Dólet-Khátoon met her mother, and they rejoiced at her safety, and celebrated festivities; and it was a great day, the like of which is not seen. As to the King, he treated Seyf-el-Mulook with honour, and said to him, O Seyf-el-Mulook, thou hast done unto me and my daughter all this benefit, and I am not able to requite thee for it, nor can any one requite thee save the Lord of all creatures: but I desire of thee that thou sit upon the throne in my place, and govern in the land of India; for I have given to thee my kingdom and my throne and my treasures and my servants, and all this is a present from me unto thee. So thereupon Seyf-el-Mulook arose, and kissed the ground before the King, and thanked him, and said unto him, O King of the age, I have accepted all that thou hast given to me, and it is returned from me unto thee as a present also; for I, O King of the age, desire not kingdom nor empire, nor desire I aught but that God (whose name be exalted!) may cause me to attain my desire. The King then said to him, These my treasures are at thy disposal, O Seyf-el-Mulook: whatsoever thou desire of them, take it, and consult me not respecting it, and may God recompense thee for me with every thing good! But Seyf-el-Mulook replied, May God strengthen the King! There is no delight for me in sovereignty nor in wealth until I attain my wish; but I desire now to divert myself in this city, and to see its great thoroughfare-streets and its markets.

So Táj-el-Mulook ordered that they should bring him a horse of excellent breed; and accordingly they brought him a horse saddled and bridled, of excellent breed, and he mounted it, and went forth into the market, and rode through the great thoroughfare-streets of the city. And while he was looking to the right and left, he saw a young man, with a tunic, crying it at the price of fifteen pieces of gold; and, looking attentively at him, he found him to resemble his brother Sá'ed; and, in truth, he was Sá'ed himself; but his complexion and condition were changed by protracted estrangement and the difficulties of travel; so he did not know him. He then said to those who were around him, Bring this young man, that I may interrogate him. And they brought him to him, and he said, Take him and convey him to the palace in which I am staying, and let him remain with you until I return from diverting myself. But they imagined that he said to them, Take him and convey him to the prison. And they said, Perhaps this is one of his memlooks, who hath fled from him.

Accordingly they took him and conveyed him to the prison, and shackled him, and left him sitting there. Then Seyf-el-Mulook returned from diverting himself, and went up into the palace; but he forgot his brother Sá'ed, and no one mentioned him to him. So Sá'ed remained in the prison; and when they went forth with the prisoners to employ them in constructions and repairs and similar works, they took Sá'ed with them, and he worked with the prisoners, and dirt increased upon him. He remained in this state for the space of a month, reflecting upon his circumstances, and saying within himself, What is the cause of my imprisonment? And Seyf-el-Mulook was occupied by his joys and other things. But it happened that he was sitting one day, and remembered his brother Sá'ed: so he said to the memlooks who were with him, Where is the memlook who was with you on such a day? They replied, Didst thou not say to us, Convey him to the prison? He said, I did not say to you these words; but I said to you, Convey him to the palace in which I am staying. Then he sent the chamberlains to Sá'ed: so they brought him to him, shackled; and they loosed him from his shackles, and stationed him before Seyf-el-Mulook, who said to him, O young man, from what country art thou? And he answered him, I am from Egypt, and my name is Sá'ed, the son of the Wezeer Fáris.

When Seyf-el-Mulook, therefore, heard his words, he rose from the throne, threw himself upon him, and clung to his neck; and by reason of his joy, he wept violently, and said, O my brother, O Sá'ed, praise be to God that thou art living, and that I have seen thee; for I am thy brother Seyf-el-Mulook, the son of the King 'Ásim. So when Sá'ed heard the words of his brother, and knew him, they embraced each other, and wept together; and the persons who were present wondered at them. Then Seyf-el-Mulook ordered that they should take Sá'ed and conduct him to the bath. Accordingly they conducted him thither; and on his coming forth from the bath, they clad him in sumptuous apparel, and brought him back to the chamber of Seyf-el-Mulook, who seated him with him on the throne. And when Táj-el-Mulook knew of this, he rejoiced greatly at the meeting of Seyf-el-Mulook with his brother Sá'ed; and he came, and the three sat conversing upon the events that had happened to them from first to last.

Then Sá'ed said, O my brother, O Seyf-el-Mulook, when the ship was submerged and the memlooks also were submerged, I and a party of memlooks got upon a plank, and it proceeded with us over the sea for a period of a whole month; after which, the wind cast us, by the decree of God (whose name be exalted!), upon an island. So we landed upon it; and we were hungry; wherefore we went in among the trees and ate of the fruits, and were busied with eating; and we were not aware when there came forth upon us people like 'Efreetes, who sprang upon us, and mounted upon our shoulders, saying to us, Go on with us; for ye have become our asses. I therefore said to him who had mounted me, What art thou, and why hast thou mounted me? And when he heard from me these words, he wound his leg round my neck in such a manner that I nearly died, and he beat me upon my back with his other leg so that I thought he had broken my back. I then fell upon the ground, on my face, and no strength remained in me by reason of my hunger and thirst. So when I fell, he knew that I was hungry, and, taking me by my hand, he brought me to a tree abounding with fruit, and it was a pear-tree; and he said to me, Eat from this tree until thou art satiated. I therefore ate from that tree until I was satiated, and I arose to walk, without desiring to do so; but I had not gone more than a little way before that person turned back and mounted again upon my shoulders. A while I walked, a while I ran, and a while I trotted; and he, riding upon me, laughed, and said, In my life I have never seen an ass like thee.

Now it happened that we gathered some bunches of grapes one day, and put them into a trench, and trod them with our feet, and that trench became a great pool. Then we waited some time, and, coming again to the trench, we found that the sun had heated that juice, and that it had become wine. So after that, we used to drink of it, and intoxicate ourselves, and our faces became red, and we used to sing and dance, by reason of the exhilaration produced by intoxication; whereupon they said, What is it that reddeth your faces, and maketh you dance and sing? We replied, Ask ye not respecting this. And what desire ye by asking respecting it? — They said, Inform us, that we may know the truth of the case. And we replied, [It is] the expressed juice of grapes. And upon this they took us to a valley, of which we knew not the length nor the breadth, and in that valley were grape-vines of which neither the beginning nor the end was known; every one of the bunches that were upon them was as much as twenty pounds in weight, and every one was within easy reach; and they said to us, Gather of these. We therefore gathered of them a great quantity; and I saw there a large trench, larger than a great tank, which we filled with grapes, and we trod them with our feet, and did as we had done the first time: so it became wine, and we said to them, It hath come to perfection. With what then will ye drink? — Whereupon they answered us, There were in our possession some asses like you, and we ate them, and their heads remain: therefore give us to drink in their skulls.

And we gave them to drink, and they became intoxicated; after which they lay down: and they were about two hundred. Upon this we said, one to another, Is it not enough for these to ride us, but will they eat us also? There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! But we will make intoxication to overcome them, and then we will kill them, and be secure from them, and escape from their hands. — Accordingly we roused them, and proceeded to fill for them those skulls, and to give them to drink; but they said, This is bitter. So we said to them, Wherefore do ye say that this is bitter? Every one who saith that, if he drink not of it ten times he will die the same day. — They therefore feared death, and said to us, Give us to drink all the ten times. And when they had drunk what remained of the ten draughts, they were intoxicated, and their intoxication was excessive, and their strength entirely failed: so we dragged them by their hands, and collected a great quantity of the sticks of those vines and put them around them and upon them; after which we set fire to the sticks, and stood at a distance, to see what would become of them. We then approached them, after the fire had become low, and we saw that they were reduced to a heap of ashes.

We therefore praised God (whose name be exalted!) who had saved us from them, and, going forth from the midst of that island, we sought the shore of the sea. Then we parted. But as to me and two of the memlooks, we walked until we came to a great wood, abounding with trees, where we busied ourselves with eating. And, lo, a person of tall stature, with a long beard, with long ears, and with two eyes like two crescents, before whom were many sheep which he was tending, and with him was a party of persons like himself. And when he saw us, he rejoiced at our coming, and was glad; and he welcomed us, saying, A friendly and free welcome! Come to my abode, that I may slaughter for you one of these sheep, and roast it, and feed you. — So we said to him, And where is thy place? And he answered, Near to this mountain: go ye then in this direction until ye see a cave, which enter ye; for in it are many guests like you. Go and sit with them until we prepare for you the entertainment. — And we felt sure that his words were true, and went in that direction, and entered that cave; but we saw the guests that were in it all of them blind; and when we went in to them, one of them said, I am sick: — and another said, I am infirm. So we said to them, What are these words that ye utter? What is the cause of your infirmity and your disease? — And they asked us, saying, Who are ye? We answered them, We are guests. And they said to us, What hath thrown you into the hand of this accursed wretch? There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! This is a Ghool, that eateth the sons of Adam, and he hath blinded us, and desireth to eat us. — We therefore said to them, How hath this Ghool blinded you? They replied, Verily forthwith he will blind you like us. — But how, said we, will he blind us? They answered us, He will bring you cups of milk, and will say to you, Ye are wearied by your journey: therefore take this milk, and drink of it. And when ye drink of it, ye will become like us. —

So I said within myself, There remaineth for us no escape save by stratagem. And I dug a hole in the ground, and sat over it. Then, after a while, the accursed Ghool came in to us, bringing cups of milk, and he handed to me a cup, and handed a cup to each of those who were with me, saying to us, Ye have come from the desert thirsty; therefore take this milk, and drink of it, while I roast for you the meat. Now as to myself, I took the cup, and put it near to my mouth, and emptied it into the hole; after which I cried out, Ah! my sight is gone, and I have become blind! And I held my eyes with my hand, and began to weep and cry out, while he laughed, and said, Fear not. But as to the two who were my companions, they drank the milk, and became blind. And thereupon the accursed arose immediately, and, having closed the entrance of the cave, drew near to me, and felt my ribs, and he found me lean, having no meat upon me; wherefore he felt another, and he saw that he was fat, and rejoiced thereat. He then slaughtered three sheep, and skinned them, and he brought some spits of iron, upon which he put the flesh of the sheep, and he put them over the fire, and roasted the meat; after which he brought it to my two companions, who ate, and he ate with them. He next brought a leathern bottle full of wine, and drank it, and laid himself down upon his face and snored.

So upon this I said within myself, Verily he is immersed in sleep, and how shall I slay him? Then I remembered the spits; and I took two of them, and put them into the fire, and waited until they had become like red-hot coals; whereupon I girded myself, and, having risen upon my feet, took the two iron spits in my hand, and drew near to the accursed, and thrust them into his eyes, pressing upon them with all my strength. So by reason of the sweetness of life he rose erect upon his feet and desired to lay hold upon me, after he had become blind. But I fled from him into the inner part of the cave, while he pursued me; and I said to the blind men who were with him, What is to be done with this accursed? Upon which one of them said, O Sá'ed, arise and ascend to this aperture: thou wilt find in it a polished sword; and do thou take it, and come to me, that I may tell thee what thou shalt do. Accordingly I ascended to the aperture, and took the sword, and came to that man; and he said to me, Take it, and smite him upon his waist, and he will die instantly. I therefore arose and ran after him, and he was tired with running, and he came to the blind men to kill them: so I came to him, and smote him with the sword upon his waist, and he became divided in twain; upon which he cried out to me, saying, O man, since thou desirest my slaughter, smite me a second time. Wherefore I resolved to smite him a second time; but he who directed me to the sword said, Smite him not a second time; for in that case he will not die, but will live, and will destroy us. So I complied with the direction of that man, and smote him not; and the accursed died. The man then said to me, Arise; open the cave, and let us go forth from it. Perhaps God will aid us, and we shall be safe from this place. — But I replied, No harm remaineth for us. We will rather rest, and slaughter some of these sheep, and drink of this wine; for the land is far-extending. — And we remained in this place for a period of two months, eating of these sheep and of the fruits.

After this, it happened that we were sitting upon the shore of the sea, one day, and I saw a large ship appearing upon the sea in the distance: so we made a sign to the persons on board of it, and called out to them. But they feared that Ghool; for they knew that upon this island was a Ghool that ate human beings: wherefore they desired to escape.⁵⁵ We however made signs to them with the ends of our turbans, and drew nearer to them, and proceeded to call out to them; and thereupon one of the passengers, who was sharp-sighted, said, O company of passengers, verily I see these indistinct objects to be human beings like us, and they have not the form of Ghools. Then they came towards us by little and little until they drew near to us; and when they were convinced that we were human beings, they saluted us, and we returned their salutation, and gave them the good news of the slaughter of the accursed Ghool; whereupon they thanked us.

We then provided ourselves from the island with some of the fruits that were upon it, and embarked on board the ship, and it bore us along with a fair wind for the space of three days. But after that, a wind rose against us, and the darkness of the sky became excessive, and not more than one hour had elapsed when the wind bore the ship to a mountain, and it was wrecked, and its planks were rent asunder.⁵⁶ However, God, the Great, decreed that I should lay hold of one of its planks, and I got upon it, and it bore me along for two days. A fair wind had then come, and I, sitting upon the plank, proceeded to row with my feet for some time, until God (whose name be exalted!) caused me to reach the shore in safety, and I landed at this city. But I had become a stranger, alone, solitary, not knowing what to do, and hunger had tormented me, and extreme trouble had befallen me. I therefore came to the market of the city, after I had hidden myself and pulled off this tunic, saying within myself, I will sell it, and sustain myself with its price until God shall accomplish what He will accomplish. Then, O my brother, I took the tunic in my hand, and the people were looking at it, and bidding up for its price, until thou camest and sawest me, and gavest orders to convey me to the palace; whereupon the young men took me and imprisoned me; and after this period thou rememberedst me, and causedst me to be brought to thee. Thus I have acquainted thee with the events that have happened to me; and praise be to God for the meeting!

And when Seyf-el-Mulook, and Táj-el-Mulook the father of Dólet-Khátoon, heard the story of the Wezeer Sá'ed, they wondered at it greatly. Táj-el-Mulook had prepared a pleasant place for Seyf-el-Mulook and his brother Sá'ed; and Dólet-Khátoon used to come to Seyf-el-Mulook, and to thank him, and converse with him respecting his kind conduct. Then the Wezeer Sá'ed said, O Queen, I desire thine aid to accomplish his wish. And she replied, Yes; I will exert myself in his favour so that he shall attain his wish, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! And looking towards Seyf-el-Mulook, she said to him, Be of good heart, and cheerful eye. — Thus was the case of Seyf-el-Mulook and his Wezeer Sá'ed. And now, as to the Queen Bedeea-el-Jemál, information was brought to her of the return of her sister Dólet-Khátoon to her father and her country; and she said, I must visit her and salute her in beautiful trim and ornaments and apparel. So she repaired to her; and when she drew near to her abode, the Queen Dólet-Khátoon met her, and saluted her and embraced her, and kissed her between her eyes; and the Queen Bedeea-el-Jemál congratulated her on her safety. Then they sat conversing, and Bedeea-el-Jemál said to Dólet-Khátoon, What happened to thee during thine absence from thy country? — O my sister, replied Dólet-Khátoon, ask me not respecting the things that befell me. Oh, what difficulties do human creatures endure! — And how so? asked Bedeea-el-Jemál. She answered, O my sister, I was in the Lofty Palace, and in it the son of the Blue King had possession of me.

And she related to her the rest of the story from first to last, and the story of Seyf-el-Mulook, and what happened to him in the palace, and the difficulties and horrors that he had endured until he came to the Lofty Palace: also how he had killed the son of the Blue King, and how he had pulled off the doors, and made them into a raft, and made for it oars; and how he came hither; whereat Bedeea-el-Jemál wondered. Then she said, By Allah, O my sister, verily this was one of the most extraordinary of wonderful cases, and I desire to acquaint thee with the origin of his tale; but bashfulness preventeth my doing so. Bedeea-el-Jemál therefore said to her, What is the cause of thy bashfulness, when thou art my sister and my companion, and we have much between us, and I know that thou desirest not for me aught save what is good? Wherefore then shouldst thou be abashed at me? Acquaint me with that which thou hast to say, and be not abashed at me, nor conceal from me aught of the matter.

So Dólet-Khátoon replied, Verily he saw thy portrait on the tunic which thy father sent to Suleymán the son of Dáood, on both of whom be peace! Suleymán opened it not, nor saw what was on it, but sent it to the King 'Ásim the son of Safwán, the King of Egypt, among other presents and rarities which he sent to him; and the King 'Ásim gave it to his son Seyf-el-Mulook before he opened it. And when Seyf-el-Mulook took it, he opened it, desiring to put it on himself, and he saw on it thy portrait, and became enamoured of it, wherefore he came forth to seek thee, and he endured all these difficulties on thine account. — But Bedeea-el-Jemál said (and her face had become red, and she was abashed at Dólet-Khátoon), Verily this is a thing that can never be; for mankind agree not with the Jánn. So Dólet-Khátoon proceeded to describe to her Seyf-el-Mulook, and the excellence of his form and his conduct and his horsemanship; and she ceased not to praise him and to mention to her his qualites until she said, O my sister, for the sake of God (whose name be exalted!) and for my sake, come and converse with him, though thou speak but a single word. But Bedeea-el-Jemál replied, Verily these words that thou utterest I will not hear, nor will I yield to thy wish expressed in them. And she seemed as though she heard not of them aught, and as though no love for Seyf-el-Mulook and the excellence of his form and his conduct and his horsemanship entered her heart. Then Dólet-Khátoon humbled herself to her, and kissed her feet, and said, O Bedeea-el-Jemál, by the milk that we have sucked, I and thou, and by the characters engraved upon the seal of Suleymán (on whom be peace!), hear these my words; for I pledged myself to him in the Lofty Palace that I would shew him thy face. I conjure thee then by Allah to shew him thy form once, for my sake, and that thou also see him. — And she proceeded to weep to her, and to humble herself to her, and to kiss her hands and her feet, until she consented, and said, For thy sake I will shew him my face once.

Upon this, therefore, the heart of Dólet-Khátoon was comforted. She kissed her hands and her feet, and went forth, and came to the largest palace, which was in the garden; and she ordered the female slaves to spread the furniture in it, to set in it a couch of gold, and to place the wine-vessels in order. She then arose, and went in to Seyf-el-Mulook and Sá'ed his Wezeer, who were sitting in their place, and gave to Seyf-el-Mulook the good news of the attainment of his desire, and the accomplishment of his wish; and she said to him, Repair to the garden, thou and thy brother, and enter the palace, and conceal yourselves from the eyes of the people, so that no one of those who are in the palace may see you, until I and Bedeea-el-Jemál come. So Seyf-el-Mulook and Sá'ed arose, and repaired to the place to which Dólet-Khátoon had directed them; and when they entered it, they saw a couch of gold set, with the cushions upon it, and there were viands and wine. And they sat a while. Then Seyf-el-Mulook thought upon his beloved, and his bosom thereupon became contracted, and love and desire assailed him; he therefore arose and walked on until he went forth from the entrance-passage of the palace. His Brother Sá'ed followed him; but he said to him, O my brother, sit thou in thy place, and follow me not, until I return to thee. So Sá'ed sat, and Seyf-el-Mulook descended, and entered the garden, intoxicated by the wine of desire, perplexed by excess of passion and distraction; love had agitated him, and ecstasy had overcome him, and he recited these verses: —

O Bedeea-el-Jemál, I have none beside thee; have mercy on me then, for I am the captive of thy love:

Thou art the object of my search, and my desire and my joy. My heart hath refused to love any beside thee.

Would I were informed if thou knewest of my weeping all the night long with sleepless eye.

Command sleep to sojourn in my eyelid, and then perhaps I shall behold thee in a dream. Be favourable to one who is distracted by love. Save him from the destructive effects of thy cruelty.

May God increase thy beauty and thy happiness, and may all thine enemies be a ransom for thee.

The lovers shall be ranged, on the day of resurrection, beneath my banner, and all the beauties beneath thine.

Then he wept again, and recited other verses; and thus he continued to do, now weeping, and now reciting, till Sá'ed, thinking him slow to return, went forth from the palace to search for him in the garden, and saw him walking there, perplexed, and reciting verses. Thereupon Seyf-el-Mulook and Sá'ed his brother met, and they proceeded to divert themselves in the garden, and to eat of the fruits.

But as to Dólet-Khátoon, when she and Bedeea-el-Jemál came to the palace, they entered it, after the eunuchs had decorated it with varieties of ornaments, and done in it all that Dólet-Khátoon had ordered them, having prepared for Bedeea-el-Jemál a couch of gold that she might sit upon it. So when Bedeea-el-Jemál saw that couch, she seated herself upon it; and there was by her side a window overlooking the garden. The eunuchs had brought varieties of exquisite viands, and Bedeea-el-Jemál and Dólet-Khátoon ate, the latter putting morsels into the mouth of the former until she was satisfied; when she called for various sweetmeats, and the eunuchs brought them, and the two ladies ate of them as much as sufficed them, and washed their hands. Next, Dólet-Khátoon prepared the wine and the wine-vessels, arranged the ewers and the cups, and proceeded to fill and to hand to Bedeea-el-Jemál; after which she filled the cup and drank. Then Bedeea-el-Jemál looked from the window that was by her side into that garden, and saw its fruit and branches; and happening to turn her eyes in the direction of Seyf-el-Mulook, she beheld him wandering about in the garden, with the Wezeer Sá'ed behind him, and heard Seyf-el-Mulook reciting verses, while he poured forth copious tears; and when she beheld him, the sight occasioned her a thousand sighs.

She therefore looked towards Dólet-Khátoon (and the wine had made sport of her affections), and she said to her, O my sister, who is this young man that I see in the garden, perplexed, distracted, melancholy, sighing? So Dólet-Khátoon said to her, Wilt thou permit his presence with us that we may see him? She answered, if thou canst bring him, do so. And upon this Dólet-Khátoon called him, saying to him, O son of the King, come up to us, and approach us with thy beauty and loveliness. Wherefore Seyf-el-Mulook, knowing the voice of Dólet-Khátoon went up into the palace; and when his eye fell upon Bedeea-el-Jemál, he fell down in a fit: so Dólet-Khátoon sprinkled upon him a little rose-water, and he recovered from his fit. He then arose, and kissed the ground before Bedeea-el-Jemál, who was confounded by his beauty and loveliness; and Dólet-Khátoon said, Know, O Queen, that this is Seyf-el-Mulook, through whose means my deliverance was effected, by the decree of God (whose name be exalted!), and he is the person whom all kinds of difficulties have befallen on thine account; wherefore I desire that thou regard him favourably. Upon this, Bedeea-el-Jemál, after laughing, said, And who filleth vows, that this young man should fulfil them? For mankind are destitute of affection. — So Seyf-el-Mulook replied, O Queen, verily faithlessness will never be in me: and all people are not alike. And he wept before her and recited these verses: —

O Bedeea-el-Jemál, be propitious to one sorrowful, worn and afflicted by an enchanting, cruel eye!^{or}
By the beauteous colours combined in thy cheeks, the white and deep red like that of the anemone, Punish not with abandonment one in constant suffering; for my body is wasting through protracted estrangement!

This is my wish, and the utmost that I hope for; and union is my desire, if this be possible.

Then he wept violently, and recited other verses; and when he had ended them, he wept again violently; whereupon Bedeea-el-Jemál said to him, O son of the King, verily I fear to give myself up to thee entirely, lest I should not experience from thee affection nor love; for often the good qualities of mankind are found to be few, and their perfidy is great. And know that the lord Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!) took Bilkees⁵⁸ lovingly; and when he saw another more beautiful than she, he turned from her to that other person. — But Seyf-el-Mulook replied, O my eye and my soul, God hath not created all mankind alike, and I, if it be the will of God, will fulfil my vow, and will die beneath thy feet. Thou shalt see what I will do agreeably with that which I say, and on God I depend for my doing as I say. — So upon this, Bedeea-el-Jemál said to him, Sit, and be at ease, and swear to me by thy religion, and let us covenant with each other, that neither of us will be treacherous to the other; and may God (whose name be exalted!) execute vengeance on the one who is treacherous to the other! And when Seyf-el-Mulook heard from her these words, he sat; and, with the hand of each in the hand of the other, they swore that neither of them would prefer to the other any person, whether of mankind or of the Jinn. Then they remained a long while embracing one another, and weeping by reason of the violence of their joy. And after Bedeea-el-Jemál and Seyf-el-Mulook had sworn, each to the other, Seyf-el-Mulook arose to walk, and Bedeea-el-Jemál arose also to walk, attended by a slave-girl carrying some food, and carrying likewise a bottle full of wine. And Bedeea-el-Jemál sat, and the slave-girl put before her the food and the wine; but they had not remained more than a short time when Seyf-el-Mulook approached; whereupon she met him with salutation, and they embraced each other.

After this, they sat a while eating and drinking; and Bedeea-el-Jemál said, O son of the King, when thou enterest the Garden of Irem, thou wilt see a large tent pitched, of red satin, and its lining of green silk. Enter the tent, and fortify thy heart. Thou wilt there see an old woman sitting upon a couch of red gold set with large pearls and with jewels; and when thou enterest, salute her with politeness and reverence; and look towards the couch; thou wilt find beneath it a pair of slippers interwoven with gold and adorned with minerals. Take those slippers and kiss them, and put them upon thy head: ⁵⁹ then put them beneath thy right arm-pit, and stand before the old woman, silent, and hanging down thy head. And when she asketh thee and saith to thee, Whence hast thou come, and how arrivedst thou here, and who made known to thee this place, and for what reason tookest thou these slippers? — be thou silent until this my slave-girl entereth and converseth with her, and endeavoureth to render her favourable to thee, and striveth to content her mind by words. Perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) may incline her heart to thee, and she may consent to that which thou desirest. — She then called that slave-girl; and her name was Marjáneh; and she said to her, By the love of me, accomplish this affair this day, and be not slothful in doing it. If thou accomplish it this day, thou shalt be free for the sake of God (whose name be exalted!), and thou shalt receive generous treatment, and there shall not be any dearer in my estimation than thou, nor will I reveal my secret to any but thee.

So she replied, O my mistress, and light of mine eye, tell me what is thine affair, that I may accomplish it for thee on my head and mine eye. And she said to her, It is, that thou carry this human being upon thy shoulders, and convey him to the Garden of Irem, to the presence of my grandmother, the mother of my father; that thou convey him to her tent, and take care of him. And when thou enterest the tent, thou with him, and seest him take the slippers, and pay homage to them, and she saith to him, Whence art thou, and by what way camest thou, and who brought thee to this place, and for what reason tookest thou these slippers, and what is thine affair that I may accomplish it for thee? — thereupon enter thou quickly, and salute her and say to her, O my mistress, I am the person who brought him hither, and he is the son of the King of Egypt, and he is the person who went to the Lofty Palace, and killed the son of the Blue King, and delivered the Queen Dólet-Khátoon, and conveyed her to her father safe; and I have brought him to thee that he may inform thee and give thee the glad tidings of her safety: therefore be gracious unto him. — Then, after that, say to her, By Allah, I conjure thee tell me, is not this young man comely, O my mistress? And she will answer thee, Yes. And thereupon say to her, O my mistress, verily he is perfect in honour and generosity and courage, and he is the lord of Egypt, and its King, and he compriseth all praiseworthy qualities. And when she saith to thee, What is his affair? — reply, My mistress saluteth thee, and asketh thee, how long shall she remain in the house a maiden, unmarried? For the time hath become tedious to her. What then is thy desire in not marrying her, and wherefore dost thou not marry her during thy life and the life of her mother, like other damsels? — And if she say to thee, How shall we act to marry her? If she know any one, or if any one have occurred to her mind, let her inform us respecting him, and we will do for her as she wisheth as far as may be possible: — then do thou reply, O my mistress, thy daughter saith to thee, Ye were desirous of marrying me to Suleymán (on whom be peace!), and ye designed for him my portrait on the tunic. But he had no lot in me; and he sent the tunic to the King of Egypt, who gave it to his son, and he saw my portrait delineated upon it, and became enamoured of me; wherefore he abandoned the kingdom of his father and his mother, turning from the world and what it containeth, and came forth wandering over the earth without regard to any thing, and endured the greatest of troubles and horrors on my account.

The slave-girl then took up Seyf-el-Mulook, and said to him, Close thine eyes. He therefore did so; and she flew up with him to the sky; and after a while, she said to him, O son of the King, open thine eyes. So he opened his eyes, and beheld the garden, the Garden of Irem; and the slave-girl Marjáneh said to him, Enter, O Seyf-el-Mulook, this tent. Upon this, Seyf-el-Mulook uttered the name of God, and entered, and, casting a look in the garden, he saw the old woman sitting upon the couch, with the female slaves in attendance upon her; wherefore he approached her with politeness and reverence, took the slippers and kissed them, and did as Bedeea-el-Jemál had directed him. The old woman then said to him, Who art thou, and whence hast thou come, and from what country art thou, and who brought thee to this place, and for what reason tookest thou these slippers and kissedst them, and when didst thou tell me of a want, and I did not perform it for thee? So upon this the slave-girl Marjáneh entered, and saluted her with politeness and reverence; after which she repeated what Bedeea-el-Jemál had told her. But when the old woman heard these words, she cried out at her, and was incensed against her, and said, How can there be agreement between mankind and the Jinn? Seyf-el-Mulook therefore replied, I will agree with thee, and be thy page, and die loving thee, and keep thy covenant, and see none but thee, and thou shalt see my veracity and my freedom from falsehood, and the excellence of my generosity towards thee, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted!

Then the old woman reflected for some time, with her head hung down; and after that, she raised her head, and said, O comely young man, wilt thou keep the covenant and the compact? He answered her, Yes, by Him who raised the heaven and spread out the earth upon the water, verily I will keep the covenant. And upon this the old woman said, I will accomplish for thee thine affair, if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!); but go now into the garden, and divert thyself in it, and eat of the fruits of which the equals exist not, and of which there are not in the world the like, while I send to my son Shahyál, who will come, and I will talk with him on that affair, and nought but good will happen, if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!); for he will not oppose me, nor disobey my command. I will marry to thee his daughter Bedeea-el-Jemál: so be of good heart; for she shall be thy wife, O Seyf-el-Mulook. — And when Seyf-el-Mulook heard from her these words, he thanked her, and kissed her hands and her feet, and went forth from her into the garden. The old woman then looked towards that slave-girl, and said to her, Go forth and search for my son Shahyál, seek for him in whatsoever quarter and place he is, and bring him unto me. So the slave-girl went and searched for the King Shahyál, and she met with him, and brought him to his mother.

Meanwhile, Seyf-el-Mulook was diverting himself in the garden, when five of the Jánn, who were of the subjects of the Blue King, saw him; and they said, Whence is this man, and who brought him to this place? Perhaps he is the person who killed the son of the Blue King. — Then they said, one to another, We will employ a stratagem against him, and interrogate him, and ask information of him. So they walked on by little and little until they came to Seyf-el-Mulook in a side of the garden, when they seated themselves by him, and said to him, O comely young man, thou failedst not in killing the son of the Blue King, and delivering Dólet-Khátoon from him. He was a perfidious dog, and had circumvented her; and had not God sent thee to her for that purpose, she had never escaped. But how didst thou kill him? — And Seyf-el-Mulook looked at them and answered them, I killed him by means of this seal-ring that is upon my finger. So it was evident to them that he was the person who killed him: therefore two of them seized his hands, and two his feet, and the other held his mouth, lest he should call out, and the people of the King Shahyál should hear him and deliver him from their hands.

Then they took him up and flew away with him, and they ceased not in their flight, until they alighted in the presence of their King, when they stationed him before him, and said, O King of the age, we have brought thee him who killed thy son. — And where is he? said the King. They answered, This is he. And the Blue King said to him, Didst thou kill my son, and the vital spark of my heart, and the light of mine eye, without right, and without any offence that he had committed against thee? Seyf-el-Mulook answered him, Yes, I killed him; but on account of his tyranny and his iniquity; for he took the children of the Kings, and conveyed them to the Abandoned Well and the Lofty Palace, and separated them from their families, and acted impudently towards them. I killed him by means of this ring that is upon my finger, and God hurried his soul to the fire, and miserable is the abode to which he hath gone. — So it was evident to the Blue King that this was the person who killed his son, without doubt; and thereupon he called for his Wezeer, and said to him, This is the person who killed my son, without any uncertainty or doubt. What then dost thou counsel me to do in his case? Shall I slay him in the most abominable manner, or torture him with the most grievous torture, or how shall I act? — The chief Wezeer answered, Cut off one of his limbs. Another said, Inflict upon him every day a severe beating. Another said, Cut him through the middle. Another said, Cut off all his fingers, and burn them with fire. Another said, Crucify him. And every one of them proceeded to speak according to his judgment.

But there was with the Blue King a great Emeer, acquainted with affairs and with the circumstances of the times, and he said to the King, O King of the age, I will say to thee some words, and it is thine to judge whether thou wilt attend to that which I counsel thee to do. He was the counsellor of his kingdom, and the chief officer of his empire, and the King used to attend to his words, and act according to his judgment, and not oppose him in aught. Now he rose upon his feet, kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O King of the age, if I give thee advice in this affair, wilt thou follow it, and wilt thou grant me indemnity? And the King answered him, Shew thine opinion, and thou shalt be safe. Then said he, O King, if thou kill this man, and receive not my advice, nor consider my words, the slaughter of him at this time will not be right; for he is in thy hand and in thine asylum, and he is thy captive, and when thou desirest him thou findest him, and mayest do with him as thou wilt. Be patient then, O King of the age; for this man hath entered the Garden of Irem, and married Bedeea-el-Jemál, the daughter of the King Shahyál, and become one of them, and thy people seized him, and brought him unto thee, and he hath not concealed his case from them nor from thee. So if thou slay him, the King Shahyál will demand of thee his blood-revenge, and will act hostilely to thee, and come to thee with forces on account of his daughter, and thou art not able to prevail against his forces, nor hast thou power to contend with him. — The King therefore attended to this his advice, and gave orders to imprison Seyf-el-Mulook. — Thus did it happen unto him.

Now the lady Bedeea-el-Jemál, having met with her father, Shahyál, sent the slave-girl to search for Seyf-el-Mulook; and she found him not; wherefore she returned to her mistress, and said, I have not found him in the garden. And she sent to the gardeners, and asked them respecting Seyf-el-Mulook; and they answered, We saw him sitting beneath a tree, and lo, five persons, of the people of the Blue King, alighted by him, and conversed with him: then they took him up, and stopped his mouth, and flew with him, and departed. So when the lady Bedeea-el-Jemál heard these words, the affair was not a light matter to her. She was violently enraged, and, rising upon her feet, she said to her father the King Shahyál, How is it that thou art King, and the people of the Blue King come to our garden and take our guest and depart with him in safety while thou art living? In like manner his mother also began to provoke him, and to say, It is not fit that any one should transgress against us while thou art living. But he replied, O my mother, this human being killed the son of the Blue King, a Jinnee; so God cast him into his hand: how then should I go to him and act hostilely towards him on account of the human being?

His mother however said to him, Go to him, and demand of him our guest; and if he be living, and he deliver him to thee, take him, and come back; but if he have slain him, seize the Blue King alive, him and his children and his hareem, and every one who hath his protection among his dependants, and bring them alive unto me, that I may slaughter them with mine own hand, and devastate his dwellings. If thou do not that which I have commanded thee, I will not hold thee lawfully acquitted of the obligation that thou owest me for my milk, and my rearing of thee shall be as though it were to thee unlawful. — So upon this the King Shahyál arose, and commanded his troops to go forth, and repaired unto him, in honour of his mother, and from a regard to the feelings of herself and of those who were beloved of her, and in order to the accomplishment of a thing that had been decreed from eternity.

Shahyál set forth with his troops, and they ceased not to pursue their way until they came to the Blue King, and the two armies met; whereupon the Blue King was defeated with his army, and the victors seized his children, great and small, and the lords of his empire and its great men, and bound them, and brought them before the King Shahyál, who said to the Blue King, O Blue, where is Seyf-el-Mulook, the human being, who was my guest? The Blue King said to him, O Shahyál, thou art a Jinnee and I am a Jinnee, and on account of a human being who hath killed my son dost thou do these deeds? He is the destroyer of my son, the vital spark of my heart and the ease of my soul, and how hast thou done all these deeds, and spilt the blood of so many thousand Jinnees? — But Shahyál replied,⁶⁰ Desist from these words; and if he be living, bring him, and I will liberate thee, and will liberate every one of thy children whom I have seized: but if thou have slain him, I will slaughter thee and thy children. The Blue King said to him, O King, is this more dear unto thee than my son? The King Shahyál answered him, Verily thy son was a tyrant; for he carried off the children of men, and the daughters of Kings, and put them in the Lofty Palace and the Abandoned Well, and acted impudently towards them. And the Blue King said to him, He is with me; but make thou reconciliation between us and him. So he reconciled them, and conferred upon them robes of honour, and he wrote a voucher agreed upon between the Blue King and Seyf-el-Mulook respecting the slaughter of the son of the former; after which, the King Shahyál received Seyf-el-Mulook, and entertained them handsomely; and the Blue King remained with him, he and his army, three days. Then Shahyál took Seyf-el-Mulook, and brought him to his mother, who rejoiced exceedingly at seeing him, and Shahyál wondered at the beauty of Seyf-el-Mulook, and his perfection and loveliness; and Seyf-el-Mulook related to him his story from beginning to end, telling him what had befallen him with Bedeea-el-Jemál.

The King Shahyál then said, O my mother, since thou hast consented to this, I hear and obey all that thou desirest: so take him and go with him to Sarandeeb, and celebrate there a magnificent festivity; for he is a comely young man, and hath endured horrors on her account. Accordingly she proceeded with her female slaves until they arrived at Sarandeeb, and entered the garden belonging to the mother of Dólet-Khátoon. Bedeea-el-Jemál saw Seyf-el-Mulook, after they had gone to the tent and met one another, and the old woman related to them what he had experienced from the Blue King, and how he had been at the point of death in the prison of the Blue King. Then ⁶¹ the King Táj-el-Mulook, the father of Dólet-Khátoon, summoned the great men of his empire, and they performed the ceremony of the contract of the marriage of Bedeea-el-Jemál to Seyf-el-Mulook, and married her to him; and when the ceremony of the contract was performed, the ushers of the court cried out, May it be blessed! He deserveth! — and they scattered the gold and silver upon the head of Seyf-el-Mulook, conferred costly robes of honour, and made banquets. Seyf-el-Mulook then said to Táj-el-Mulook, O King, pardon! I would ask of thee a thing, and I fear that thou mayest refuse it me and disappoint me. But Táj-el-Mulook replied, By Allah, wert thou to demand my soul, I would not withhold it from thee, on account of the kind actions that thou hast done. So Seyf-el-

Mulook said, I desire that thou marry Dólet-Khátoon to my brother Sá'ed, that we may both be thy pages. And Táj-el-Mulook replied, I hear and obey. He forthwith assembled the great men of his empire a second time, and performed the ceremony of the contract of the marriage of his daughter Dólet-Khátoon to Sá'ed; and when they had finished the ceremony of the contract, they scattered the gold and the silver, and the King commanded that they should decorate the city. They then celebrated the festivity, and Seyf-el-Mulook took Bedeea-el-Jemál as his wife, and Sá'ed took Dólet-Khátoon as his wife the same night. Seyf-el-Mulook ceased not to remain in retirement with Bedeea-el-Jemál for forty days; and she said to him one day, O son of the King, doth there remain in thy heart a regret for any thing? Seyf-el-Mulook answered, God forbid! I have accomplished my want, and no regret remaineth in my heart; but I desire to meet my father and mother in the land of Egypt, and to see if they have continued well or not. — So she ordered a party of her servants to convey him and Sá'ed to the land of Egypt; and they conveyed them to their families in Egypt; and Seyf-el-Mulook met his father and his mother, as also did Sá'ed, and they remained with them a week. Then each of them bade farewell to his father and his mother, and they departed to the city of Sarandeeb; and whenever they desired to see their families, they used to go and return. Thus Seyf-el-Mulook lived with Bedeea-el-Jemál a most pleasant and most agreeable life, and in like manner did Sá'ed with Dólet-Khátoon, until they were visited by the terminator of delight and the separator of companions. — Extolled be the perfection of the Living who dieth not, who created the creatures, and sentenced them to death, and who is the First, without beginning, and the Last, without end!

HOW HASAN CAPTURED THE BIRD-MAIDEN AND THE ADVENTURES THAT CAME AFTER ¹

THERE was, in ancient times, a certain merchant residing in El-Basrah, and that merchant had two male children, and great wealth. And it happened, as God, who heareth and knoweth, decreed, that the merchant was admitted to the mercy of God (whose name be exalted!), and left that wealth. So his two sons betook themselves to prepare him for the grave, and to bury him; after which they divided the wealth between them equally, and each of them took his portion, and they opened for themselves two shops. One of them was a dealer in copper-wares, and the other was a goldsmith.

Now while the goldsmith was sitting in his shop, one day, lo, a Persian walked along the market-street among the people until he came to the shop of the young goldsmith, when he looked at his work, and examined it knowingly, and it pleased him. And the name of the young goldsmith was Hasan. Then the Persian shook his head, and said, By Allah, thou art an excellent goldsmith! And he proceeded to look at his work, while he (the young man) was looking at an old book that was in his hand, and the people were occupied with the contemplation of his beauty and loveliness and his stature and justness of form. And when the time of afternoon-prayers arrived, the shop was quitted by the people, and thereupon the Persian accosted Hasan, and said to him, O my son, thou art a comely young man. What is this book? I have not a son, and I know an art than which there is none better that is practised in the world. Numbers of people have asked me to teach it them, and I would not teach it to any one of them; but my soul hath consented that I should teach it to thee, and make thee my son, and put a barrier between thee and poverty; so thou shalt rest from this work of labouring with the hammer and the charcoal and the fire.—Hasan therefore said to him, O my master, and when wilt thou teach me? He replied, To-morrow I will come to thee, and will make for thee, of copper, pure gold in thy presence.

Upon this, Hasan rejoiced, and he bade farewell to the Persian, and went to his mother. He entered and saluted her, and ate with her; but he was stupefied, without memory or intellect. So his mother said to him, What is the matter with thee, O my son? Beware of listening to the words of the people; especially the Persians; and comply not with their counsel in aught; for these people are great deceivers, who know the art of alchemy, and trick people, and take their wealth and devour it by means of false pretences. — But he replied, O my mother, we are poor people,² and we have nothing to be coveted, that any one should trick us. A Persian hath come to me; but he is a virtuous sheykh, bearing marks of virtue, and God hath inclined him towards me. — And thereupon his mother kept silence in her anger; and her son became busied in heart: sleep visited him not that night by reason of the violence of his joy at what the Persian had said to him.

And when the morning came, he rose, took the keys, and opened the shop; and, lo, the Persian approached him. So he rose to him, and desired to kiss his hands; but the Persian refused, and would not consent to his doing that; and said, O Hasan, prepare the crucible, and place the bellows. He therefore did as the Persian ordered him, and lighted the charcoal; after which the Persian said to him, O my son, hast thou by thee any copper? He answered, I have a broken plate. And he ordered him to press upon it with the shears, and to cut it into small pieces; and he did as he told him. He cut it into small pieces, and threw it into the crucible, and blew upon it with the bellows until it became liquid; when the Persian put his hand to his turban, and took forth from it a paper folded up, which he opened, and he sprinkled some of its contents into the crucible, as much as half a drachm. That thing resembled yellow kohl: ³ and he ordered Hasan to blow upon it with the bellows; and he did as he ordered him until the contents of the crucible became a lump of gold. So when Hasan beheld this, he was stupefied, and his mind was confounded by reason of the joy that he experienced. He took the lump and turned it over, and he took the file and filed it, and saw it to be pure gold, of the very best quality. His reason fled, and he was stupefied in consequence of the violence of his joy. Then he bent down over the hand of the Persian to kiss it; and the Persian said to him, Take this lump, and go down with it into the market, and sell it, and take its price quickly, without speaking. Accordingly Hasan went down into the market, and gave the lump to the broker, who took it of him, and rubbed it [on the touchstone], and found it to be pure gold. They opened the bidding for it at the sum of ten thousand pieces of silver, and the merchants increased their offers for it so that he sold it for fifteen thousand pieces of silver.

He received its price, and went home, and related to his mother all that he had done, saying to her, O my mother, I have learnt this art. But she laughed at him, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! And she kept silence in her anger. Then Hasan, in his ignorance, took a brass mortar, and went with it to the Persian, who was sitting in the shop, and put it before him. So he said to him, O my son, what desirest thou to do with this mortar? He answered, We will put it into the fire, and make it into lumps of gold. And the Persian laughed, and said to him, O my son, art thou mad, that thou wouldst go down into the market with two lumps in one day? Knowest thou not that the people would suspect us, and that our lives would be lost? But, O my son, when I have taught thee this art, do not thou practise it in a year more than once; for that will suffice thee from year to year. — And Hasan replied, Thou hast spoken truth, O my master. Then he sat in the shop, and put on the crucible, and threw the charcoal into the fire. The Persian therefore said to him, O my son, what dost thou desire? He answered, Teach me this art, But the Persian laughed, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Thou, O my son, art of little sense. Thou art not suited for this art at all. Doth any one in his life learn this art in the beaten way, or in the markets? For if we occupy ourselves with it in this place, the people will say of us, Verily these are practising alchemy: — and the magistrates will hear of us, and our lives will be lost. If therefore, O my son, thou desirest to learn this art, repair with me to my house.

So Hasan arose, and closed his shop, and went with the Persian. But while he was on the way, he remembered the words of his mother, and revolved in his mind a thousand thoughts; and he stopped, hanging down his head towards the ground for some time; whereupon the Persian looked aside, and, seeing him stopping, laughed, and said to him, Art thou mad? How is it that I purpose in my heart to do thee good, and thou imaginest that I will injure thee? — when the Persian said to him, If thou be afraid to go with me to my house, I will go with thee to thy house, and will teach thee there. So Hasan replied, Be it so, O uncle. And the Persian said to him, Walk before me.

Hasan therefore went on before him to his abode, and the Persian followed him until he arrived there, and Hasan entered his house, and found his mother, and informed her of the Persian's arrival with him, while the Persian stood at the door. So she furnished for them the chamber, and put it in order, and when she had finished her affair, she went away. Then Hasan gave permission to the Persian to enter, and he entered; and Hasan, having taken in his hand a plate, went with it to the market to bring in it something to eat. He went forth, and brought some food, and put it before him, saying to him, Eat, O my master, that the bond of bread and salt may be established between us; and may God (whose name be exalted!) execute vengeance upon him who is unfaithful to the bond of bread and salt! And the Persian said to him, Thou hast spoken truth, O my son. Then he smiled, and said, O my son, who knoweth the due estimation of bread and salt? ⁴ And the Persian advanced, and ate with Hasan until they were satisfied; when he said to him, O my son, O Hasan, bring for us some sweetmeat. Hasan therefore went to the market, and brought ten cups ⁵ of sweetmeat; and he was rejoiced at the words of the Persian. And when he presented to him the sweetmeat, he ate of it, and Hasan ate with him.

The Persian then said to him, May God recompense thee well, O my son! With such a one as thou art should men associate, and him should they acquaint with their secrets, and teach what will profit him. — And he said, O Hasan, bring the apparatus. And Hasan scarcely believed these words, when he went forth like the colts to the spring-pasture, and proceeded until he arrived at the shop, and he took the apparatus and returned, and placed it before him. The Persian thereupon took forth a piece of paper, and said, O Hasan, by the bread and salt, wert thou not dearer than my son, I would not acquaint thee with this art. There remaineth not in my possession aught of this elixir save the contents of this paper. But observe when I compound the simples and put them before thee; and know, O my son, O Hasan, that thou must put, to every ten pounds of copper, half a drachm of this which is in the paper, and the ten pounds will become pure, unalloyed gold. — Then he said to him, O my son, O Hasan, in this paper are three ounces, of Egyptian weight; and after the contents of this paper are exhausted, I will make for thee more. And Hasan took the paper, and saw in it something yellow, finer than the first; and he said, O my master, what is the name of this, and where is it found, and in what is it made? Upon this, the Persian laughed, and longed to get possession of Hasan, and said to him, Respecting what dost thou ask? Do the work and be silent. — And he took forth a cup belonging to the house, cut it up, and threw it into the crucible, and threw upon it a little of what was in the paper, whereupon it became a lump of pure gold. So when Hasan beheld it, he rejoiced exceedingly, and became perplexed in his mind, entirely occupied by meditation upon that lump of gold.

The Persian then hastily took forth a packet from his turban, cut it open, and put it into a piece of the sweetmeat, and said to him, O Hasan, thou hast become my son, and hast become dearer to me than my soul and my wealth, and I have a daughter to whom I will marry thee. Hasan replied, I am thy page, and whatsoever thou dost with me, it will be a deposit with God, whose name be exalted! And the Persian said, O my son, have patience, and restrain thyself, and good fortune will betide thee. Then he handed to him the piece of sweetmeat, and he took it, and kissed his hand, and put it into his mouth, not knowing what was secretly decreed to befall him. He swallowed the piece of sweetmeat, and his head sunk down before his feet, and he became lost to the world; and when the Persian saw that the calamity had come upon him, he rejoiced exceedingly. Rising upon his feet, he said to him, Thou hast fallen into the snare, O young wretch! O dog of the Arabs! For many years have I been searching for thee, until I got thee, O Hasan! — He then girded himself, and tied Hasan's hands behind his back, and bound his feet to his hands; after which he took a chest, emptied it of the things that were in it, put Hasan into it, and locked it upon him. He emptied also another chest, and put into it all the wealth that was in Hasan's abode, with the lump of gold that he had made, and, having locked it, he went forth running to the market, and brought a porter, carried off the two chests, and drew near to a moored vessel. That vessel was fitted out for the Persian, and her master was expecting him: so when her crew saw him, they came to him, and carried the two chests, and put them on board the ship. The Persian then cried out to the master and to all the sailors, saying to them Rise ye! The affair is accomplished, and we have attained our desire. — The master therefore cried out to the sailors, and said to them, Pull up the anchors, and loose the sails! And the ship proceeded with a fair wind. — Such was the case with the Persian and Hasan.

But as to the mother of Hasan, she remained expecting him until night-fall, and heard no sound of him nor any tidings whatever. Then she came to the house, [which she had quitted after the Persian had come,] and saw it open, and beheld not in it any one, nor found the chests nor the wealth. She therefore knew that her son was lost, and that fate had taken effect upon him; and she slapped her face, and rent her garments, cried out and wailed, and began to say, Oh, my son! Oh, the delight of my heart! — And she recited these verses: —

My patience hath failed, and my disquietude is excessive, and excessive is my wailing since your absence, and my disease!

No patience is left to me, by Allah, since you quitted me! How can I bear the loss of the object of my hope?

After the loss of my beloved, how can I delight in sleep? And who is he that can enjoy a life of abasement?

Thou hast gone, and made the house and its family desolate, and my clear draughts thou hast rendered turbid.

Thou wast mine aid in every adversity, and my glory and my honour among mankind, and my reliance.

Cancelled be the day whereon thou wast taken away from my sight, until I see thee return to me!

She continued to weep and wail till the morning, when the neighbors came in to her, and asked her respecting her son, and she informed them of that which had happened to him with the Persian. She felt certain that she should never see him after that, and went about the house weeping; and while she thus went about, lo, she saw two lines written upon the wall: wherefore she brought a Fakeeh, who read them to her: and they were these: —

Leylâ's phantom came by night, when drowsiness had overcome me, towards morning, while my companions were sleeping in the desert:

But when we awoke to behold the nightly phantom, I saw the air vacant, and the place of visitation was distant.^o

So when the mother of Hasan heard these verses, she called out and said, Yes, O my son! Verily the house is desolate, and the place of visitation is distant! — Then the neighbours bade her farewell, after they had prayed for her that she might have patience, and that she might soon experience a reunion, and departed. But the mother of Hasan ceased not to weep during the hours of the night and the periods of the day; and she built in the midst of the house a tomb, on which she inscribed the name of Hasan, with the date of his loss. She quitted not that tomb; and such was her habit incessantly from the time that her son was separated from her.

Now again as to her son Hasan with the Persian. — This Persian was a Magian: he hated the Muslims greatly, and whenever he got power over any of them, he destroyed him. He was a wicked, vile alchemist, such as the poet hath thus described: —

He is a dog, a dog's son, and a dog was his grandsire; and no good is in a dog, the issue of a dog.

The name of that accursed wretch was Bahrám the Magian, and he used every year to take a Muslim and to slaughter him over a hidden treasure.⁷ And when his stratagem was accomplished against Hasan the goldsmith, and he had proceeded with him from the commencement of day until night, the ship moored on the shore till morning; and at sunrise, when the ship continued her course, the Persian ordered his black slaves and his pages to bring to him the chest in which was Hasan. So they brought it to him, and he opened it, and took him forth from it. He then poured some vinegar into his nostrils, and blew a powder into his nose; whereupon he sneezed, and vomited the benj, and, opening his eyes, he looked to the right and left, and found himself in the midst of the sea, the ship in its course, and the Persian sitting by him. He therefore knew that it was a stratagem practised against him, that the accursed Magian had done it, and that he had fallen into the calamity against which his mother had cautioned him. So he pronounced the words of which the utterer is secure from confusion, and which are these: — There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return! O Allah, act graciously with me in thine appointment, and make me to endure with patience thine affliction, O Lord of all creatures! — Then looking towards the Persian, he spoke to him with soft words, and said to him, O my father, what are these deeds, and where is thy respect for the bread and salt and for the oath that thou sworeest to me? But he looked at him, and said to him, O dog, doth such a one as myself know an obligation imposed by bread and salt? I have slain a thousand youths like thee, save one youth, and thou shalt complete the thousand. — And he cried out at him; so he was silent, and he knew that the arrow of fate had pierced him.

The accursed then gave orders to loose his bonds; after which they gave him to drink a little water, while the Magian laughed, and said, By the fire and the light and the shade and the heat, I did not imagine that thou wouldest fall into my net; but the fire strengthened me against thee, and aided me to seize thee, that I might accomplish my affair, and return, and make thee a sacrifice to it, that it might be pleased with me. So Hasan replied, Thou hast been unfaithful to the bond of bread and salt. And upon this the Magian raised his hand and gave him a blow, and he fell, and bit the deck with his teeth, and fainted, his tears running down his cheek. The Magian then ordered that they should light for him a fire; therefore Hasan said to him, What wilt thou do with it? He answered him, This is the fire, that emitteth light and sparks, and it is what I worship; and if thou wilt worship it as I do, I will give thee half my wealth, and marry to thee my daughter. But Hasan cried out at him, and said to him, Wo to thee! Thou art surely an infidel Magian: thou worshippest the fire instead of the Almighty King, the Creator of the night and the day; and this is nought but an evil among religions. — And thereupon the Magian was enraged, and said, Wilt thou not agree with me, O dog of the Arabs, and embrace my religion? But Hasan agreed not with him therein. And the accursed Magian arose, and prostrated himself to the fire, and ordered his young men to throw Hasan down upon his face. So they threw him down upon his face, and the Magian proceeded to beat him with a whip of plaited thongs until he lacerated his sides, while he cried for aid, but was not aided, and implored protection, but none protected him; and he raised his eye to the Avenging King, and endeavoured to propitiate Him by appealing to the Chosen Prophet. He had lost patience, his tears ran down upon his cheeks like rain, and he recited these two verses: —

I will endure with patience, O my Lord, what Thou hast ordered. I will be patient, if so I may obtain thine approval.

They have tyrannized over us, and transgressed, and commanded. Perhaps, in thy beneficence, Thou wilt pardon what is past.

Then the Magian ordered the slaves to make him sit, and to bring him some food and drink. So they brought it; but he would not eat nor drink. The Magian proceeded to torture him night and day during the voyage, while he endured with patience, and humbled himself to God (to whom he ascribed might and glory!); and the heart of the Magian was hardened against him.

They ceased not to pursue their voyage over the sea for a period of three months, during which Hasan continued to suffer torture from the Magian; but when the three months were completed, God (whose name be exalted!) sent against the ship a wind, and the sea became black, and tossed the ship with violence by reason of the greatness of the wind. And thereupon the master and the sailors said, This, by Allah, is all occasioned by the crime committed against this young man, who hath been for three months suffering torment from this Magian, and this is not allowed by God, whose name be exalted! Then they rose against the Magian, and slew his young men and all who were with him. So when the Magian saw that they had slain the young men, he made sure of destruction, and feared for himself; wherefore he loosed Hasan from his bonds, pulled off from him the tattered garments that were upon him, and clad him with others; and he made peace with him, promising that he would teach him the art, and restore him to his country, and said to him, O my son, blame me not for that which I have done unto thee. But Hasan said to him, How can I any longer rely upon thee? He rejoined, O my son, were it not for offence, there were no such thing as pardon; and I did not unto thee these deeds save for the purpose of my seeing thy patience; and thou knowest that the case is wholly in the hand of God. The sailors, therefore, and the master, rejoiced at his release, and Hasan prayed for them, and praised God (whose name be exalted!), and thanked him.

Then the winds became stilled, the darkness was withdrawn, and the wind and the voyage became pleasant. And Hasan said to the Magian, O Persian, whither reparairst thou? He answered, O my son, I am going to the Mountain of the Clouds, on which is the elixir wherewith we practise alchemy. And the Magian swore to him by the fire and the light that he no longer meditated to do to Hasan aught that might frighten him. So the heart of Hasan was comforted; he was rejoiced at the words of the Magian, and proceeded to eat with him, and drink and sleep; and the Magian clad him with his own apparel.

They continued their voyage for three months more; after which, the vessel moored on a long coast, all of it composed of pebbles, white and yellow and blue and black and of every other colour. And when the vessel moored, the Persian arose, and said, O Hasan, arise and land; for we have arrived at the place of our desire and our wish. So Hasan arose and landed with the Persian, and the Magian charged the master to attend to his affairs. Then Hasan walked on with the Magian until they were far from the ship, and had disappeared from before the eyes of the crew; whereupon the Magian seated himself, and took forth from his pocket a drum of copper, and a plectrum^s of silk worked with gold and bearing talismans, and he beat the drum; and when he beat it, there appeared a dust from the further part of the desert. Hasan therefore wondered at his action, and feared him; and he repented of his having landed with him, and his complexion changed. So upon this the Magian looked at him and said to him, What aileth thee, O my son? By the fire and the light, thou hast nothing to fear from me; and were it not that my affair cannot be accomplished save by thy means, I had not brought thee out from the ship. Rejoice at the prospect of every thing good. This dust is the dust occasioned by a thing that we shall mount, and it will aid us to cross this desert, and will render easy unto us the inconvenience thereof.

And but a little while had elapsed when the dust dispersed, and discovered three excellent she-camels. Then the Persian mounted one of them, and Hasan mounted one, and they put their provisions on the third; and they proceeded for seven days, after which they came to an extensive tract; and when they alighted at that tract, they beheld a cupola constructed upon four columns of red gold. They alighted from the she-camels, and, having entered beneath the cupola, ate and drank and rested: and Hasan happened to look aside, and he saw something lofty: so he said to the Magian, What is this, O uncle? The Magian answered, This is a palace. And Hasan said to him, Wilt thou not arise that we may enter it to rest ourselves in it and to divert ourselves with the sight of it? But the Magian upon this went away, saying to him, Mention not to me this palace; for in it is my enemy, and with him there happened to me an event of which this is not the time to inform thee.

Then he beat the drum, and the she-camels approached: so they mounted; and they proceeded for seven days more; and when the eighth day arrived, the Magian said, O Hasan, what is it that thou seest? Hasan answered, I see clouds and mists between the east and the west. And the Magian replied, This is not clouds nor mists; but it is a great, lofty mountain, whereon the clouds divide, and there are not any clouds above it, on account of its excessive height, and vast elevation. This mountain is the object of my desire, and upon it is that which we want. For the sake of this I brought thee with me, and my affair will be accomplished by thy means. — So thereupon Hasan despaired of life. He then said to the Magian, By the object of thy worship, and by what thou believest in thy religion, what is the thing on account of which thou hast brought me? And he answered him, The art of alchemy will not succeed save by means of an herb that groweth in the place where the clouds pass, and on which they are separated; and it is this mountain: the herb is upon it; and when we have obtained the herb, I will shew thee what is this art. And Hasan replied, by reason of his fear, Yes, O my master. He had despaired of life, and he wept on account of his separation from his mother and his family and his home, repenting of his having opposed his mother, and recited these two verses: —

Consider the doings of thy Lord, how happiness cometh unto thee, with speedy relief;
And despair not when thou sufferest affliction; for how many wondrous mercies attend affliction!

They ceased not to proceed until they arrived at that mountain, and stopped beneath it, when Hasan saw upon that mountain a palace: so he said to the Magian, What is this palace? And the Magian answered, This is the abode of the Jánn and the Ghools and the Devils.⁹ Then the Magian alighted from his camel, and ordered Hasan to alight also; and he came to him and kissed his head, and said to him, Blame me not for that which I did to thee. I will preserve thee when thou ascendest to the palace, and it behooveth thee that thou be not dishonest to me in aught of that which thou wilt bring hence: I will share it with thee equally. — And he replied, I hear and obey. The Persian then opened a leathern bag, and took forth from it a mill, and he also took forth from it a quantity of wheat, and ground it with that mill; after which he kneaded the flour, and made of it three round cakes, and lighted a fire, and baked the cakes. He next took forth the copper drum and the figured plectrum, and beat the drum; whereupon the camels came; and he chose one of them, and slaughtered it, and stripped off its skin. Then looking towards Hasan, he said to him, Hear, O my son, O Hasan, what I charge thee to do. He replied, Well. And the Magian said, Enter this skin, and I will sew it up over thee, and will lay thee upon the ground; thereupon the Rukh's¹⁰ will come, and carry thee off, and fly with thee to the summit of the mountain. And take thou this knife with thee, and when the birds have finished their flight, and thou knowest that they have put thee upon the mountain, cut open with it the skin, and go forth; for the birds will fear thee and will fly away from thee; and do thou look down to me from the summit of the mountain, and speak to me, that I may inform thee of that which thou shalt do.

He then prepared for him the three cakes, and a leathern bottle containing water, and put them with him into the skin; after which he sewed it up over him, and went to a distance from him. And the Rukh's came, and carried him off, flew with him to the summit of the mountain, and there put him down. So when Hasan knew that they had put him down upon the mountain, he cut open the skin and came forth from it, and spoke to the Magian, who, on hearing his words, rejoiced, and danced by reason of the violence of his joy; and he said to him, Go in the direction to which thy back is turned, and tell me what thou seest. Hasan therefore went, and he beheld many rotten bones, by which was much wood, and he informed him of all that he saw; upon which the Magian said, This is the object of desire and search. Take then, of the wood, six bundles, and throw them down to me; for this wood is the material with which we shall perform the alchemical process. — So he threw down to him the six bundles; and when the Magian saw that those bundles had come down to him, he said to Hasan, O young wretch, the thing that I desired of thee hath been accomplished; and if thou wilt, remain upon this mountain, or cast thyself down upon the ground that thou mayest perish. Then the Magian departed.¹¹

Upon this, Hasan exclaimed, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! This dog hath circumvented me! — He sat wailing for himself, and recited these verses: —

When God willeth an event to befall a man who is endowed with reason and hearing and sight,
He deafeneth his ears, and blindeth his heart, and draweth his reason from him as a hair, Till having fulfilled his purpose against him, He restoreth him his reason that he may be admonished.

Then say not of an event, How did it happen? — for every thing happeneth by fate and destiny.¹²

He then stood upon his feet, and looked to the right and left, and walked along the summit of the mountain. He made sure of his death, and he proceeded to walk along until he came to the other side of the mountain, when he saw, by the side of the mountain, a blue sea, agitated with waves; and it was foamy, and every wave of it was like a great mountain. Thereupon he sat, and recited an easy portion of the Kur-án, and begged God (whose name be exalted!) to alleviate his trouble, either by death, or by deliverance from these difficulties; after which he recited for himself the funeral-prayer,¹³ and cast himself into the sea. The waves, however, bore him along safely, by the will of God (whose name be exalted!), until he came forth from the sea safe, by the decree of God. So he rejoiced, and praised God (exalted be his name!), and thanked Him.

He then arose and walked along searching for something to eat; and while he was doing thus, lo, he came to the place where he was with Bahrám

the Magian. And he walked on a while, and saw a great palace, rising high into the air. He therefore went to it; and, behold, it was the palace respecting which he asked the Magian, and of which he said to him, In this palace is my enemy. And upon this, Hasan said, By Allah, I must enter this palace. Perhaps I may experience relief in it. — And when he came to it, he saw its door open. So he entered the door-way; and he saw a mastabah in the entrance-passage, and on the mastabah two damsels like two moons, with a chess-table before them, and they were playing; and one of them, raising her head towards him, cried out by reason of her joy, and said, By Allah, this is a human being, and I imagine that he is the person whom Bahrám the Magian brought this year. Therefore when Hasan heard her words, he cast himself down before them, and wept violently, and said, O my mistresses, I am that poor person. And upon this the younger damsel said to her sister the elder, Bear witness against me, O my sister, that this is my brother by a covenant and compact before God, and that I will die for his death and live for his life, and rejoice for his joy and mourn for his mourning.

Then she rose to him, and embraced and kissed him, and, taking him by his hand, led him into the palace, her sister accompanying her; and she pulled off from him the tattered clothing that was upon him, and brought him a suit of royal apparel, with which she clad him. She also prepared for him viands of every kind, and presented them to him, and she and her sister sat and ate with him; and they said to him, Relate to us thine adventure with the wicked dog, the enchanter, from the time of thy falling into his hands to the time of thine escape from him, and we will relate to thee what hath happened to us with him from the first of the case to the last, that thou mayest be on thy guard if thou see him again. And when Hasan heard from them these words, and saw their kind reception of him, his soul was tranquillized, and his reason returned to him, and he proceeded to relate to them what had happened to him with the Magian from first to last; whereupon they said to him, Didst thou ask him respecting this palace? He answered, Yes, I asked him, and he said to me, I like not the mention of it; for this palace belongeth to the Devils and Demons. So the two damsels were violently enraged, and said, Did this infidel call us Devils and Demons? He answered them, Yes. And the younger, the sister of Hasan, said, By Allah, I will surely slay him in the most abominable manner, and I will surely deprive him of the air of the world! — And how, said Hasan, wilt thou get to him and slay him? She answered, He is in a garden called El-Mesheed,¹⁴ and I must without fail slay him soon. And her sister said to her, Hasan hath spoken truth, and all that he hath said of this dog is true: but relate to him our whole story, that it may remain in his memory. So the young damsel said,—

Know, O my brother, that we are of the daughters of the Kings. Our father is one of the Kings of the Jánn, of great dignity, and he hath troops and guards and servants, consisting of Márids; and God (whose name be exalted!) hath blessed him with seven daughters by one wife; but such folly and jealousy and pride as cannot be surpassed affected him, so that he married us not to any one. Then he summoned his wezeers and his companions, and said to them, Do ye know any place for me that no one can invade, neither any of mankind nor any of the Jinn, and that aboundeth with trees and fruits and rivers? So they said to him, What wouldst thou do there, O King of the age? He answered, I desire to place in it my seven daughters. And thereupon they said to him, O King, the Palace of the Mountain of the Clouds, which an 'Efreet of the refractory Jinn who stubbornly disobeyed the vow exacted by Suleymán (on whom be peace!) founded, and which palace, after that 'Efreet perished, none inhabited after him, neither any of the Jinn nor any of mankind, will be suitable for them; for it is separated from the rest of the world. None gaineth access to it; and around it are trees and fruits and rivers, and around it is running water sweeter than honey and colder than snow: no one having the leprosy or elephantiasis or other diseases ever drank of it without being cured immediately. — So when our father heard of this, he sent us to this palace, and sent with us soldiers and troops, and collected for us what we require in it. He used, when he desired to ride, to beat the drum; whereupon all the troops presented themselves to him, and he chose whom of them he would mount, and the rest departed. And when our father desireth that we should visit him, he ordereth the enchanters his dependents to bring us, and they come to us and convey us to his presence, that he may cheer himself by our society, and that we may accomplish our desires by seeing him: then he sendeth us back to our place. We have five sisters, who have gone to hunt in this adjacent desert; for in it are wild beasts that cannot be numbered nor calculated. Each two of us have their turn to remain at home for the purpose of cooking the food, and the turn came to us, me and this my sister; therefore we remained to cook for them the food; and we were begging God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!) that He would bless us with a human being to cheer us by his company. Then praise be to God who hath brought thee unto us! And do thou be of good heart and cheerful eye. No harm shall befall thee.

So Hasan rejoiced, and said, Praise be to God who hath guided us to the way of deliverance, and hath moved hearts with affection and compassion for us! Then his sister arose, and took him by his hand, led him into a private chamber, and brought out from it linen and furniture such as no creature could procure. And after a while, their sisters returned from the chase, and they acquainted them with the case of Hasan; whereupon they rejoiced at his arrival, and, coming in to him in the private chamber, they saluted him, and congratulated him on his safety. He remained with them, passing the most pleasant life, and enjoying the most agreeable happiness; and he used to go forth with them to the chase, and slaughter the game. Thus Hasan became familiar with them, and he ceased not to reside with them in this condition until his body became healthy, and he recovered from the state in which he was; his frame was invigorated, and he became stout and fat, by reason of the generous treatment that he enjoyed, and his residence with them in that place. He amused and diverted himself with them in that decorated palace, and in all the gardens and among the flowers, while they treated him with courtesy, and cheered him with discourse, and his sadness ceased. The damsels became exceedingly joyful and happy in his society, and he rejoiced in their society more than they rejoiced in him. And afterwards, his sister, the young damsel, related to her sisters the story of Bahrám the Magian, telling them that he had called them Devils and Demons and Ghoods; whereupon they swore to her that he should surely be slain.

Then, in the following year, the accursed came, having with him a comely young man, a Muslim, resembling the moon, shackled, and tortured in the most cruel manner; and he alighted with him beneath the palace where Hasan introduced himself to the damsels. Now Hasan was sitting by the river, beneath the trees; and when he beheld the Magian, his heart palpitated, his complexion changed, and he struck his hands together, and said to the damsels, By Allah, O my sisters, aid me to slay this accursed wretch; for here he hath come, and he hath fallen into your hands, and with him is a young Muslim, a captive, of the sons of the great, whom he is torturing with varieties of painful torture. I desire to slay him, that I may heal my soul by taking vengeance upon him, that I may also release this young man from his torture, and gain the recompense thereof [from God], and that the young Muslim may return to his home, and be reunited to his brethren and his family and friends. That action will be as an alms proceeding from you, and ye will acquire the reward thereof from God, whose name be exalted! — And the damsels replied, We hear and obey God and thee, O Hasan. They then threw litháms over their faces, equipped themselves with the implements of war, and slung on the swords; and they brought to Hasan a courser of the best breed, furnished him with complete accoutrements and armed him with beautiful weapons. Having done this, they proceeded all together; and they found that the Magian had slaughtered a camel and skinned it, and was tormenting the young man, and saying to him, Enter this skin.

So Hasan came behind him, while the Magian knew not of his presence, and cried out at him, so that he stupefied and confounded him. Then, advancing to him, he said to him, Withhold thy hand, O accursed! O enemy of God, and enemy of the Muslims! O dog! O perfidious wretch! O worshipper of fire! O pursuer of the way of the wicked, who worshipping the fire and the light, and swearest by the shade and the heat! — The Magian therefore looked aside, and, seeing Hasan, he said to him, O my son, how didst thou escape, and who brought thee down to the ground? Hasan answered him, God delivered me: He who hath caused thy life to be taken by the hands of thine enemies. As thou torturedst me all the way, O infidel! O impious wretch! thou hast fallen into affliction, and turned aside from the way; and neither mother shall profit thee, nor brother nor friend, nor firm covenant; for thou saidst, Whoso shall be unfaithful to the bond of bread and salt, may God execute vengeance upon him! — and thou hast been unfaithful to the bond of bread and salt; wherefore God hath thrown thee into my power, and thy deliverance from me hath become remote.

Upon this, the Magian said to him, By Allah, O my son, thou art dearer in my estimation than my soul and than the light of mine eye! But Hasan advanced to him, and quickly smote him upon his shoulders so that the sword came forth glittering from his vitals, and God hurried his soul to the fire; a miserable abode! Then Hasan took the leathern bag that was with him, and opened it, and having taken forth from it the drum and the plectrum, beat with this the drum; whereupon the camels came to him like lightning; and he loosed the young man from his bonds, mounted him upon a camel, on which he put for him the remaining food and water, and said to him, Repair to the place of thy desire. He therefore departed after God had thus delivered him from his affliction by the hand of Hasan. Then the damsels, when they had seen Hasan smite the neck of the Magian, rejoiced in him greatly; and they came round him, wondering at his courage and his exceeding intrepidity, and thanked him for that which he had done, congratulated him on his safety, and said to him, O Hasan, thou hast done a deed by which thou hast healed the sick, and pleased the Glorious King. And he and the damsels returned to the palace.

He remained with them, eating and drinking, and sporting and laughing. His residence with them was pleasant to him, and he forgot his mother. But while he was with them, passing the most delightful life, there came towards them a great dust from the further part of the desert, whereby the sky was darkened. So the damsels said to him, Arise, O Hasan, and enter thy private chamber, and conceal thyself; or, if thou wilt, enter the garden, and hide thyself among the trees and the grape-vines; and no harm shall befall thee. And he arose and went in and concealed himself in his private chamber, having closed the door upon him, within the palace. And after a while, the dust dispersed, and there appeared beneath it numerous encumbered troops, like the roaring sea, approaching from the King the father of the damsels. When the troops arrived, the damsels lodged them in the best manner, and entertained them during three days; after which the damsels asked them respecting their state and their tidings; and they replied, We have come from the King to summon you. So the damsels said to them, And what doth the King desire of us? One of them answered, One of the Kings celebrateth a marriage-festivity, and he desireth that ye should be present at that festivity, that ye may divert yourselves. — And how long, said the damsels, shall we be absent from our palace? They answered, The time of going and coming, and a residence of two months.

The damsels therefore arose, and, entering the palace, went in to Hasan, and acquainted him with the case, and they said to him, Verily this place is thy place, and our house is thy house; so be of good heart and cheerful eye, and fear not nor grieve; for no one can gain access to us in this place.

Then be of tranquil heart and joyful mind until we come to thee again. These keys of our private chambers we leave with thee; but, O our brother, we beg thee by the bond of brotherhood that thou open not this door, [pointing to one of the doors,] 'for thou hast no need of opening it. — Then they bade him farewell, and departed in company with the troops.

So Hasan remained in the palace alone. His bosom was contracted, and his patience became exhausted, his affliction was excessive, and he was sad, mourning for their separation greatly; the palace, notwithstanding its amplitude, was strait unto him, and when he found himself solitary and sad, he reflected upon the damsels, and recited these verses: —

The whole plain hath become contracted in mine eye, and my heart altogether is troubled by the view of it.

Since the objects of my love departed, my joy hath been disturbed, and the tears have overflowed from mine eyes,

And sleep hath quitted mine eye on account of their separation, and my whole mind hath been perturbed.

Will fortune reunite us, and shall I again enjoy intimacy with them, and nightly conversation?

He used to go alone to hunt in the deserts, and bring back the game and slaughter it, and eat alone. His gloominess and disquietude, on account of his solitariness, became excessive. So he arose and went about through the palace, examined every part of it, and opened the private chambers of the damsels, and he saw in them riches such as would ravish the minds of beholders. But he delighted not in aught thereof, by reason of the absence of the damsels; and a fire burned in his heart on account of the door which his sister had charged him not to open, and respecting which she commanded him that he should not go near to it, nor ever open it. He said within himself, My sister did not charge me not to open this door save because within it is a thing with which she desireth that no one should become acquainted. By Allah, I will arise and open it, and see what is within it, though within may be death.

Accordingly, he took the key, and opened it, and he saw in it no riches; but he saw in it a flight of stairs at the upper end of the place, vaulted with stones of the onyx of El-Yemen; and he ascended those stairs, and went up until he arrived at the roof of the palace, saying within himself, This is what she forbade me to visit.¹⁵ He then went about the top of the palace, and he looked down upon a place beneath it entirely occupied by sown fields, and gardens and trees and flowers, and wild beasts, and birds which were warbling and proclaiming the perfection of God, the One, the Omnipotent. He gazed upon those places of diversion, and saw a roaring sea, agitated with waves; and he ceased not to go round about the palace, on the right and left, until he came to a pavilion upon four columns, in which he saw a mak'ad decorated with all kinds of stones, such as the jacinth and the emerald and the balass-ruby, and various other jewels. It was built with one brick of gold and another brick of silver and another brick of jacinth and another brick of emerald; and in the midst of that pavilion was a pool full of water, over which was a trellis of sandal-wood and aloes-wood, reticulated with bars of red gold and oblong emeralds, and adorned with varieties of jewels and pearls, every bead of which was of the size of a pigeon's egg. Also by the side of the pool was a couch of aloes-wood adorned with large pearls and with jewels, reticulated with red gold, and comprising all kinds of coloured gems and precious minerals, set so as to correspond, one with another. Around it the birds warbled with various tongues, proclaiming the perfection of God (whose name be exalted!) by the sweetness of their notes and the diversity of their tongues; and the like of this palace neither a Kisrâ nor a Cæsar ever possessed. So Hasan was amazed when he beheld it, and he sat in it, looking at what was around it.

And while he sat in it, wondering at the beauty of its construction, and at the lustre of the large pearls and the jacinths that it comprised, and at all the artificial works that it contained, wondering also at those sown fields, and at the birds that proclaimed the perfection of God, the One, the Omnipotent, and contemplating the memorials of him whom God (exalted be his name!) enabled to construct this pavilion (for he was of mighty condition), lo, he beheld ten birds, which approached from the direction of the desert, coming to that pavilion and that pool. Hasan therefore knew that they sought the pool to drink of its water: so he concealed himself from them, fearing that they would see him and fly from him. They then alighted upon a great, beautiful tree, and they went around it: and he saw among them a great and beautiful bird, the handsomest among them; and the rest encompassed it and attended it as servants; whereat Hasan wondered. That bird began to peck the nine others with its bill, and to behave proudly towards them, and they fled from it, while Hasan stood diverting himself with the sight of them from a distance.

Then they seated themselves upon the couch, and each of them rent open its skin with its talons, and came forth from it; and, lo, it was a dress of feathers. There came forth from the dresses ten damsels, virgins, who shamed by their beauty the lustre of the moon; and when they had divested themselves, they all descended into the pool, and washed, and proceeded to play and to jest together; the bird who surpassed the others throwing them down and plunging them, and they fleeing from her, and unable to put forth their hands to her. When Hasan beheld her, he lost his reason, and his mind was captivated, and he knew that the damsels forbade him not to open the door save on this account. He became violently enamoured of her by reason of what he beheld of her beauty and loveliness and her stature and justness of form, while she was sporting and jesting, and they were sprinkling one another with the water. Hasan stood looking at them, sighing that he was not with them; his mind was perplexed by the beauty of the young damsel, his heart was entangled in the snare of her love, and he had fallen into the snare: the eye was looking, and in the heart a fire was burning; for the soul is prone to evil. He wept with desire by reason of her beauty and loveliness, fires were shot into his heart on her account, a flame of which the sparks could not be extinguished increased in him, and a desire of which the signs could not be hidden.¹⁶

Then, after that, the damsels came up from the pool, while Hasan stood looking at them; but they saw him not; and he was wondering at their beauty and loveliness and gracefulness and elegance. And when they came forth from the water, each of them put on her dress and ornaments. The chief damsel put on a green dress, and surpassed in her loveliness the beauties of the world, and the lustre of her face outshone the bright full moon: she surpassed the branches in the beauty of her bending motions, and confounded the minds with apprehension of incurring calumny. The damsels then sat conversing and laughing together, while Hasan still stood looking at them, drowned in the sea of his passion, and bewildered in the valley of his solicitude, and he said within himself, By Allah, my sister said not to me, Open not this door — save on account of these damsels, and in fear of my becoming enamoured of one of them. He continued to gaze at the beauties of the chief damsel, who was the most lovely person that God had created in her time, surpassing in her beauty all human beings.

She had a mouth like the seal of Suleymán,¹⁷ and hair blacker than the night of estrangement is to the afflicted and distracted lover, and a forehead like the new moon of the Festival of Ramadán,¹⁸ and eyes resembling the eyes of the gazelles, and an aquiline nose brightly shining, and cheeks like anemones, and lips like coral, and teeth like pearls strung on necklaces of native gold, and a neck like molten silver, above a figure like a willow-branch. — The damsels ceased not to laugh and sport, while he stood upon his feet looking at them, and forgot food and drink, until the time of afternoon-prayer drew near, when the chief damsel said to her companions, O daughters of Kings, the time hath become late to us, and our country is distant, and we are tired of staying here. Arise, therefore, that we may depart to our place. — Accordingly each of them arose, and put on her dress of feathers; and when they were enveloped in their dresses, they became birds as they were at first, and all flew away together, the chief damsel being in the midst of them.

Hasan therefore despaired of them, and he desired to rise and descend from his place; but he could not rise. His tears ran down upon his cheek, and his desire became violent, and he recited these verses: —

May Allah deny me the accomplishment of my vow, if after your absence I know pleasant sleep,
And may my eyes not be closed after your separation, nor rest delight me after your departure!
It would seem to me as though I saw you in sleep: and would that the visions of sleep might be real!
I love sleep, though without requiring it; for perhaps a sight of you might be granted in a dream.

Then he walked a little, but without being led aright, until he descended to the lower part of the palace; and he ceased not to drag himself along in a sitting posture till he came to the door of the private chamber; whereupon he passed through, and locked it after him; and he lay upon his side, sick, neither eating nor drinking. He was drowned in the sea of his solitudes, and he wept and lamented for himself until the morning, when he recited these verses: —

As birds they flew away in the evening, and cried out. And he who dieth of love is not culpable.¹⁹

I will keep my passion secret while I can; but if violent desire overcome me, it will appear.

The phantom of her whose face is like the morning came at night; and the night of my desire hath no dawn.

I bemoan her, while they sleep who are free from love; and the winds of desire have made sport with me.

I have been liberal of my tears and my wealth and my heart and my reason and my soul; and liberality is gain.

The worst of all kinds of evil and vexation is hostility experienced from beautiful damsels. They say it is forbidden for the beauties to shew favour, and that the shedding of the blood of lovers is lawful,

And that the love-sick can do nought but sacrifice his soul, and liberally forfeit it in love, which is a game.²⁰

I cry out in my longing and ardour for the beloved; and all that the distracted can do is to moan.

And when the sun rose, he opened the door of the private chamber, and ascended to the place in which he was before, and sat before the mak'ad²¹ until the approach of night; but not one of the birds came while he sat expecting them. So he wept violently, till he fainted, and fell prostrate upon the ground; and when he recovered from his fit, he dragged himself along in a sitting posture, and descended to the lower part of the palace. The night had come, and the whole world was strait unto him, and he ceased not to weep and lament for himself all the night until the morning came and the sun rose over the hills and the lowlands. He ate not nor drank nor slept, nor had he any rest: during the day he was perplexed, and during the night sleepless, confounded, intoxicated by his solicitude, expressing the violence of his desire in some verses of a distracted poet.

Now while he was in this violent state of distraction by reason of his passion, lo, a dust rose from the desert; whereupon he arose and ran down and hid himself. He knew that the mistresses of the palace had come, and but a little while had elapsed when the troops alighted, and encompassed the palace. The seven damsels also alighted, and they entered the palace, and took off their arms and all the implements of war that were upon them, except the youngest damsel, his sister, who took not off the implements of war that were upon her, but came to the private chamber of Hasan; and she saw him not. So she searched for him, and found him in one of the closets, infirm and lean; his body had become languid and his bones were wasted, his complexion had become sallow and his eyes were sunk in his face, in consequence of the little food and drink that he had taken, and the abundance of his tears by reason of his attachment to the damsel, and his passion for her. Therefore when his sister the Jinneeyeh saw him in this state, she was confounded, and her reason quitted her, and she asked him respecting his condition, and the state in which he was, and what had befallen him, saying to him, Inform me, O my brother, that I may devise some stratagem for thee to remove thine affliction, and I will be thy ransom. And upon this, he wept violently, and recited thus:—

The lover, when his beloved is separated from him, hath nothing except sorrow and affliction:

Within him is disease, and without is burning: the beginning is remembrance, and the end is solicitude.

So when his sister heard these words, she wondered at his eloquence and his fluency of speech, and at his beauty of expression and his replying to her in verse; and she said to him, O my brother, when didst thou fall into this predicament in which thou art, and when did this happen to thee? For I see thee speak in verses, and shed copious tears. I conjure thee by Allah, O my brother, and by the sacred nature of the love that existeth between us, that thou inform me of thy state, and acquaint me with thy secret, and conceal not from me aught of that which hath befallen thee during our absence; for my bosom hath become contracted, and my life is perturbed on thine account. — And thereupon he sighed, and shed tears like rain, and replied, I fear, O my sister, if I inform thee, that thou wilt not aid me to attain my desire, but wilt leave me to die sorrowing, in my anguish. And she said, No, by Allah, O my brother, I will not abandon thee, though my life should be lost in consequence thereof.

So he told her what had befallen him, and what he beheld when he had opened the door, and informed her that the cause of his affliction and distress was his passion for the damsel whom he had seen, and his affection for her, and that for ten days he had not desired food nor drink. Then he wept violently, and recited these two verses:—

Restore my heart as it was to my breast, and let mine eyes sleep again; then forsake me.

Do you think that the nights have changed the vow of love? May he cease to live who changeth!

And his sister wept at his weeping: she was moved with compassion for his case, and pitied him for his distance from home; and she said to him, O my brother, be of good heart and cheerful eye; for I will expose myself to peril with thee, and give my life to content thee, and contrive for thee a stratagem even if it occasion the loss of my precious things and my soul, that I may accomplish thy desire, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! But I charge thee, O my brother, to conceal the secret from my sisters. Therefore reveal not thy state to any one of them, lest my life and thine be lost; and if they ask thee respecting the opening of the door, answer them, I never opened it; but I was troubled in heart on account of your absence from me, and my sadness for your loss, and my residence in the palace by myself.—And he replied, Yes: this is the right course. He kissed her head, and his heart was comforted, and his bosom became dilated. He had been in fear of his sister on account of his having opened the door; so now his soul was restored to him, after he had thought himself at the point of destruction by reason of the violence of his fear.

He then demanded of his sister something to eat; whereupon she arose and went forth from him; and afterwards she went in to her sisters, mourning and weeping for him. So they asked her respecting her state, and she informed them that her heart was troubled for her brother, and that he was sick, and for ten days no food had entered his stomach. They therefore asked her respecting the cause of his sickness; and she answered them, Its cause was our absence from him, and our leaving him desolate; for these days during which we were absent from him were to him longer than a thousand years, and he is excusable, seeing that he is a stranger and alone, and we left him solitary, without any one to cheer him by society, or any one to comfort his heart. Besides he is, at all events, but a youth, and probably he remembered his family and his mother, who is an old woman, and he imagined that she was weeping for him during the hours of the night and the periods of the day, and that she ceased not to mourn for him; but we used to console him by our society.

And when her sisters heard her words, they wept by reason of the violence of their sorrow for him, and said to her, By Allah, he is excusable. Then they went forth to the troops and dismissed them; after which they went in to Hasan and saluted him; and they saw that his charms had become altered, and his complexion had become sallow, and his body had become lean; wherefore they wept in pity for him, and they sat with him and cheered him and comforted his heart by conversation, relating to him all that they had seen of wonders and strange things, and what happened to the bridegroom with the bride. The damsels remained with him during the period of a whole month, cheering him by their society, and caressing him; but every day he became more ill; and whenever they beheld him in this state, they wept for him violently, the youngest damsel being the one of them who wept the most.

Then, after the month, the damsels were desirous of riding forth to hunt, and they resolved to do so, and asked their younger sister to mount with them; but she said to them, By Allah, O my sisters, I cannot go forth with you while my brother is in this state, until he is restored to health, and the affliction that he suffereth quitteth him. I will rather sit with him to soothe him.—And when they heard her words, they thanked her for her kindness, and said to her, Whatever thou dost with this stranger, thou wilt be recompensed for it. Then they left her with him in the palace, and mounted, taking with them provisions for twenty days. And when they were far from the palace, their sister knew that they had traversed a wide space: so she came to her brother, and said to him, O my brother, arise; shew me this place in which thou sawest the damsels. And he replied, In the name of Allah: ²² on the head: — rejoicing at her words, and feeling sure of the attainment of his desire. He then desired to arise and go with her, and to shew her the place; but he was unable to walk; wherefore she carried him in her bosom, and conveyed him to the [top of the] palace; and when he was upon it, he shewed her the place in which he had seen the damsels, and he shewed her the mak'ad and the pool. And his sister said to him, Describe to me, O my brother, their state and how they came. He therefore described to her what he had observed of them, and especially the damsel of whom he had become enamoured; and when she heard the description of her, she knew her, and her countenance became fallow, and her state became changed. So he said to her, O my sister, thy countenance hath become fallow, and thy state is changed; and she replied, —

O my brother, know that this damsel is the daughter of one of the Kings of the Jánn, of great dignity. Her father hath obtained dominion over men and Jánn, and enchanters and diviners, and tribes and guards, and regions and cities in great numbers, and hath vast riches. Our father is one of his viceroys, and no one is able to prevail against him, on account of the abundance of his troops, and the extent of his dominions, and the greatness of his wealth. He hath assigned to his children, the damsels whom thou sawest, a tract of a whole year's journey in length and breadth, and to that tract is added a great river encompassing it, and no one can gain access to that place, neither any of mankind nor any of the Jánn. He hath an army ²³ of damsels who smite with swords and thrust with spears, five and twenty thousand in number, every one of whom, when she mounteth her courser and equippeth herself with her implements of war, will withstand a thousand brave horsemen; and he hath seven daughters who in bravery and horsemanship equal their sisters, and excel them. He hath set over this tract, of which I have informed thee, his eldest daughter, the chief of her sisters; and she is distinguished by bravery and horsemanship, and guile and artifice and enchantment, by which she can overcome all the people of her dominions. But as to the damsels who were with her, they are the chief ladies of her empire, and her guards, and her favourites among the people of her dominions; and these feathered skins wherewith they fly are the work of the enchanters among the Jánn. Now if thou desire to possess this damsel, and to marry her, sit here and wait for her: for they come on the first day of every month to this place; and when thou seest that they have come, conceal thyself, and beware of appearing; for the lives of all of us would be lost. Know then what I tell thee, and keep it in thy memory. Sit in a place that shall be near unto them, so that thou shalt see them and they shall not see thee; and when they take off their dresses, cast thine eye upon the dress of feathers belonging to the chief damsel, who is the object of thy desire, and take it; but take not aught beside it; for it is the thing that conveyeth her to her country.²⁴ So if thou possess it, thou wilt possess her; and beware of her beguiling thee, and saying, O thou who hast stolen my dress, restore it to me, and here am I with thee and before thee and in thy possession: —for, if thou give it her, she will slay thee, and will demolish the pavilions over us, and slay our father. Know therefore thy case, and how thou shalt act. When her sisters see that her dress hath been stolen, they will fly away, and leave her sitting alone: so thereupon go thou to her, and seize her by her hair and drag her along; and when thou shalt have dragged her to thee, thou wilt have obtained her, and she will be in thy possession. Then, after this, take care of the dress of feathers; for as long as it remaineth with thee, she is in thy power, and in captivity to thee; since she cannot fly away to her country save with it. And when thou hast taken her, carry her and descend with her to thy private chamber, and reveal not to her that thou hast taken the dress.

So when Hasan heard the words of his sister, his heart was tranquillized, and his terror was quieted, and the pain that he suffered ceased. He then rose erect upon his feet, and kissed the head of his sister; after which he descended from the top of the palace, he and his sister, and they slept that night. He studied to restore himself until the morning came; and when the sun rose, he arose and opened the door and ascended to the top. He sat there, and ceased not to sit until nightfall, when his sister came up to him with some food and drink, and changed his clothes, and he slept. She continued to do thus with him every day until the next month commenced. So when he saw the new moon, he watched for them; and while he was doing thus, lo, they approached him, like lightning. On his seeing them, therefore, he concealed himself in a place so that he could see them and they could not see him. The birds alighted, each bird of them seating herself in a place, and they rent open their dresses, and the damsel of whom he was enamoured did the same as the rest. This was done in a place near unto Hasan. She then descended into the pool with her sisters; and thereupon Hasan arose and walked forward a little, still concealing himself; and God veiled him: so he took the dress, and not one of them saw him; for they were playing together. And when they had ended, they came forth, and each of them put on her dress of feathers, except his beloved, who came to put on her dress and found it not. Upon this she cried out, and slapped her face, and tore her clothes. Her sisters therefore came to her, and asked her respecting her state, and she informed them that her dress of feathers had been lost; whereupon they wept and cried out, and slapped their faces. And when the night overtook them, they could not remain with her: so they left her upon the top of the palace alone.

Then, when Hasan saw that they had flown away and were absent from her, he listened to her, and he heard her say, O thou who hast taken my dress, and stripped me, I beg thee to restore it to me, and may God never make thee to taste my grief! And on his hearing these her words, his reason was captivated by his passion for her, his love for her increased, and he could not withhold himself from her. He therefore arose from his place, and ran forward until he rushed upon her and laid hold of her. Then he dragged her to him, and descended with her to the lower part of the palace, and, having taken her into his private chamber, threw over her his 'abááh,²⁵ while she wept, and bit her hands. He locked the door upon her, and went to his sister, and told her that he had got her and obtained possession of her, and had brought her down to his private chamber; and he said to her, She is now sitting weeping, and biting her hands.

His sister therefore, when she heard his words, arose and repaired to the private chamber, and, going in to her, she saw her weeping and mourning. She kissed the ground before her, and then saluted her; and the damsel said to her, O daughter of the King, do people such as ye are do these vile deeds with the daughters of Kings? Thou knowest that my father is a great King, and that all the Kings of the Jánns are terrified at him, and fear his awful power; and that he hath, of enchanter and sages and diviners and devils and Márids, those against whom none can prevail; and that under his authority are people whose number none knoweth but God. How then can it be right for you, O daughters of Kings, to lodge men of human kind with you, and to acquaint them with our circumstances and yours? If ye did not so, how could this man gain access to us? — So the sister of Hasan answered her, O daughter of the King, verily this human being is perfect in kindness of disposition, and his desire is not to do any shameful action: he only loveth thee; and women were not created save for men. Were it not that he loveth thee, he had not fallen sick on thine account, and his soul had not almost departed by reason of his love of thee. — And she related to her all that Hasan had told her, with respect to his passion for her, and how the damsels had acted in their flight and their washing themselves; and told her that none of them all had pleased him except her; for all of them were her slave-girls; and that she was plunging them into the pool, and not one of them could stretch forth her hand to her. — And when she heard her words, she despaired of escape.

Then the sister of Hasan arose and went forth from her, and brought to her a sumptuous dress, with which she clad her. She also brought to her some food and drink, and ate with her, and comforted her heart and appeased her terror. She ceased not to caress her with gentleness and kindness, and said to her, Have compassion upon him who saw thee once and became a victim of thy love. Thus she continued to caress her and gratify her, and to address her with pleasing words and expressions; but she wept until day-break came, when her heart was comforted and she abstained from weeping, knowing that she had fallen into the snare, and that her escape was impossible. So she said to the sister of Hasan, O daughter of the King, thus hath God appointed [and written] upon my forehead, with respect to my estrangement and my disjunction from my country and my family and my sisters; therefore I must endure with becoming patience what my Lord hath decreed.

Then the sister of Hasan appropriated to her alone a private chamber in the palace, than which chamber there was none handsomer there; and she ceased not to sit with her and console her, and to comfort her heart, until she was content, and her bosom became dilated, and she laughed, and her trouble and contraction of the bosom on account of her separation from her family and home, and her separation from her sisters and her parents and her dominions, ceased.

The sister of Hasan then went forth to him, and said to him, Arise, go in to her in her private chamber, and kiss her hands and her feet. He therefore entered, and did so; and he kissed her between her eyes, and said to her, O mistress of beauties, and life of souls, and delight of beholders, be tranquil in heart. I have not taken thee but that I may be thy slave till the day of resurrection, and this my sister will be thy slave-girl. I, O my mistress, desire not aught save to marry thee, agreeably with the ordinance of God and his Apostle, and to journey to my country, and I will reside with thee in the city of Baghdád. I will purchase for thee female slaves, and male slaves; and I have a mother, of the best of women who will be thy servant. There is not a country there better than our country: every thing that is in it is better than what is in any other of all the countries, and its inhabitants and its people are good people, with comely faces.

But while he was addressing her, and cheering her by conversation, and she addressed him not with a single letter, some one knocked at the door of the palace. So Hasan went forth to see who was at the door; and, lo, there were the damsels, who had returned from the chase. He rejoiced at their coming, and met and saluted them; whereupon they offered up prayers in his favour for safety and health, and he prayed for them also. They then alighted from their horses, and entered the palace, and each of them went into her private chamber, where she pulled off the worn clothes that were upon her, and put on comely apparel, after which they came forth, and demanded the game; and they brought ²⁶ an abundance of gazelles and wild oxen, and hares and lions and hyenas, and other beasts, some of which they brought forward for slaughter, and they left the rest with them in the palace. Hasan stood among them with girded waist, slaughtering for them, while they sported and amused themselves, rejoicing exceedingly at his doing thus. And when they had finished the slaughter, they sat preparing something whereof to make their dinner.

Then Hasan advanced to the eldest damsel, and kissed her head; and he proceeded to kiss all their heads, one after another. So they said to him, Thou hast greatly humbled thyself to us, O our brother, and we wonder at the excess of thine affection for us, thou being a man of the sons of Adam, and we being of the Jinn. And thereupon his eyes shed tears, and he wept violently; wherefore they said, What is the news, and what causeth thee to weep? Thou hast troubled our life by thy weeping this day. It seemeth that thou hast conceived a longing to see thy mother and thy country; and if the case be so, we will equip thee, and will journey with thee to thy home and thy friends. — He replied, By Allah, my desire is not to be separated from you. They therefore said to him, Then who of us hath disturbed thee, that thou art thus troubled? And he was-ashamed to say, Nought hath disturbed me but love of the damsel — fearing that they would deny him their approval: wherefore he was silent, and did not acquaint them with aught of his case. So his sister arose and said to them, He hath caught a bird from the air, and he desireth of you that ye aid him to make her his wife. And they all looked at him, and said to him, We are all before thee, and whatsoever thou demandest, we will do it. But tell us thy tale, and conceal not from us aught of thy state. — He therefore said to his sister, Tell thou my tale to them; for I am abashed at them, and I cannot face them with these words.

Accordingly, his sister said to them, O my sisters, when we departed on our journey and left this poor young man alone, the palace become strait unto him, and he feared that some one might come in to him; and ye know that the intellects of the sons of Adam are weak. So he opened the door that leadeth to the roof of the palace, when his bosom was contracted and he had become solitary and lone, and he ascended upon it, and sat there, looking down upon the valley, and looking down also towards the door, fearing lest some one should come to the palace. And while he was sitting one day, lo, ten birds approached him, coming to the palace; and they ceased not to pursue their course until they seated themselves upon the margin of the pool that is above the mandharah; whereupon he looked at the bird that was the most beautiful of them, and she was pecking the others, among which there was not one that could stretch forth her claw to her. Then they put their talons to their necks, rent open their dresses of feathers, and came forth from them, and each of them became a damsel like the moon in the night of its fulness. After that, they disrobed themselves, while Hasan stood looking at them, and they descended into the water, and proceeded to sport; the chief damsel plunging the others, among whom there was not one who could put forth her hand to her; and she was the most beautiful of them in face, and the most just of them in stature, and the most clean of them in apparel. They ceased not to do thus until the time of afternoon-prayers drew near, when they came forth from the pool, put on their garments, and entered the apparel of feathers, in which they wrapped themselves, and they flew away.

Thereupon his mind was troubled, and his heart was inflamed with fire, on account of the chief bird, and he repented that he had not stolen her apparel of feathers. He became sick, and remained upon the palace expecting her return, and he abstained from food and drink and sleep. He continued in that state until the new moon appeared; and while he was sitting, lo, they approached according to their custom, and pulled off their garments, and descended into the pool. So he stole the dress of the chief damsel, and, knowing that she could not fly save with it, he took it and hid it, fearing that they would discover it and slay him. Then he waited until the others had flown away; when he arose and seized her, and brought her down from the top of the palace. — Upon this, her sisters said to her, And where is she? She answered them, She is in his possession, in such a closet. And they said, Describe her to us, O our sister. She therefore said, She is more beautiful than the moon in the night of its fulness, and her face is more splendid than the sun, and the moisture of her mouth is sweeter than wine, and her figure is more elegant than the slender branch. She hath black eyes, and brilliant face, and bright forehead, and a bosom like pearl, in which are seen the forms of two pomegranates; and she hath cheeks like two apples. She captivateth the hearts by her eyes bordered with kohl, and by the slenderness of her delicate waist, and by her heavy hips, and speech that cureth the sick. She is comely in shape, beautiful in her smile, like the full moon.

And when the damsels heard these descriptions, they looked towards Hasan and said to him, Shew her to us. So he arose with them, distracted with love, and proceeded until he had conducted them to the closet in which was the King's daughter; whereupon he opened it and entered, and they entered behind him; and when they saw her, and beheld her loveliness, they kissed the ground before her, wondering at the beauty of her form, and at her elegance. They then saluted her, and said to her, By Allah, O daughter of the supreme King, this is an egregious thing; but hadst thou heard the description of this human being among the women, thou wouldst have wondered at him all thy life. He is enamoured of thee to the utmost degree; yet, O daughter of the King, he desireth not aught that is dishonest. He desireth thee not save as his lawful wife; and if we knew that damsels were content without husbands, we would have prevented him from attaining the object of his desire, though he sent not to thee a messenger, but came to thee himself; and he hath informed us that he hath burnt the dress of feathers: otherwise we would have taken it from him. — Then one of the damsels agreed with her and became her deputy for the performance of the ceremony of the marriage-contract. She performed the ceremony of the contract of her marriage to Hasan, who took her hand,²⁷ putting his hand in hers, and she married her to him with her permission; after which they celebrated her marriage-festivity in the manner befitting the daughters of Kings, and introduced him to her; and he congratulated himself thereupon, and recited these verses: —

Thy shape is enticing, and thine eye like the gazelle's, and thy face drippeth with the water of beauty.

Thou appearest in mine eye most gloriously pictured, half of thee of ruby, and a third of pearl,

And a fifth of musk, and a sixth of ambergris: thou resembllest fine pearl: nay, thou art more splendid.

Eve hath not borne like thee any one, nor in the Gardens of Eternity is another like thee. Then if thou wish my torment, it will proceed from love's laws; and if thou wilt pardon, thou hast the choice to do so.

O ornament of the world, and utmost object of desire, who can keep from enjoying the beauty of thy face?

The damsels were standing at the door, and when they heard the verses, they said to her, O daughter of the King, hast thou heard the words of this human being? How canst thou blame us, when he hath recited these verses on the subject of his love for thee? — And on her hearing that, she was happy and cheerful and glad. Then Hasan remained with her for a period of forty days, in pleasure and happiness and delight and joy, the damsels renewing for him, every day, festivity and beneficence and presents and rarities, and he passing his time among them in happiness and cheerfulness; and the residence of the King's daughter among them became pleasant to her, so that she forgot her family.

But after the forty days, Hasan was sleeping, and he saw his mother mourning for him: her bones had wasted, and her body had become emaciated, and her complexion had become sallow, and her state was altered, while he was in good condition. And when she beheld him in this state, [as he thought,] she said to him, O my son, O Hasan, how is it that thou livest in the world, blest with a pleasant life, and forgettest me? Look at the state in which I have been since thy departure. I will not forget thee, nor will my tongue cease to mention thee until I die; and I have made for thee a tomb in my house, that I may never forget thee. Shall I live, O my son, and see thee with me, and shall we again be united as we were? — So Hasan awoke from his sleep weeping and lamenting; his tears ran down upon his cheeks like rain, and he became sorrowful and afflicted; his tears ceased not, nor did sleep visit him, nor had he any rest, nor did any patience remain to him. And when he arose, the damsels came in to him, and wished him good morning, and were cheerful with him as they were wont: but he looked not towards them. They therefore asked his wife respecting his state; and she answered him, I know not. So they said to her, Ask thou him respecting his state. Accordingly she advanced to him, and said to him, What is the matter, O my master? And thereupon he sighed and was oppressed, and acquainted her with that which he had seen in his sleep. Then he recited these two verses: —

We have become distracted in mind, perplexed, seeking to draw near, without means of doing it.

The calamities of love increase upon us, and the endurance of love is burdensome to us.

His wife therefore acquainted them with that which he had said to her; and when the damsels heard the verses, they were moved with pity for his state, and said to him, Favour us [by doing as thou desirest]: in the name of Allah. We cannot prevent thee from visiting her: we will rather aid thee to do so by every means in our power. But it behooveth thee to visit us, and not sever thyself from us, though in every year thou come but once. — And he replied, I hear and obey.

Then the damsels arose immediately, prepared for him the provisions, and equipped for him the bride with ornaments and apparel and every thing costly, such as language would fail to describe; and they also prepared for him rarities which pens cannot enumerate. After that, they beat the drum, and thereupon the she-camels came to them from every quarter, and they chose of them such as should carry all that they had prepared. They mounted the damsel and Hasan, and put upon the camels, and brought to them, five and twenty chests full of gold, and fifty of silver. Then they proceeded with them for three days, during which they traversed a space of three months' journey; and having done so, they bade him farewell, and desired to return from them. Upon this, Hasan's sister, the youngest damsel, embraced him, and wept until she fainted; and when she recovered, she recited these two verses: —

Would that the day of separation had ne'er been! No sleep remaineth in mine eyes.
The union of us and thee is broken, and our strength and our body are enfeebled.

Then, having finished her verses, she bade him farewell, and strictly charged him that, when he had arrived at his city and met his mother, and his heart was tranquillized, he should not fail to visit her once in every six months, and she said to him, When an affair rendereth thee anxious, or thou fearest any thing disagreeable, beat the drum of the Magian: thereupon the she-camels will come to thee, and do thou mount, and return to us, and remain not away from us. And he swore to her that he would do so; after which he conjured them to return. So they returned, after they had bidden him farewell, and mourned for his separation; and she who mourned most was his sister, the youngest damsel; for she found no rest, nor did patience obey her: she wept night and day.

Hasan proceeded all the night and day, traversing with his wife the deserts and wastes and the valleys and rugged tracts, during the midday-heat and the early dawn, and God decreed them safety. So they were safe, and arrived at the city of El-Basrah; and they ceased not to pursue their way until they made their camels kneel down at the door of his house. He then dismissed the camels, and advanced to the door to open it; and he heard his mother weeping with a soft voice, that proceeded from a bosom which had experienced the torture of fire, while she recited these verses: —

How can she taste sleep who hath lost somnolency, and is wakeful at night while others repose?

She possessed riches and family and glory; but hath become a stranger and solitary.

Fire and groaning are in her bosom, and violent longing that cannot be exceeded.

Passion hath gained dominion over her. She moaneth for her sufferings; but is firm.

Her state under the influence of love telleth that she is mourning and afflicted, and her tears are witnesses.

And Hasan wept when he heard his mother weeping and lamenting; and he knocked at the door with alarming violence. So his mother said, Who is at the door? And he replied, Open: — wherefore she opened the door, and looked at him; and when she knew him, she fell down in a fit; and he ceased not to caress her until she recovered, when he embraced her, and she embraced him and kissed him. He then conveyed his goods and property into the house, while the damsel looked at him and at his mother; and the mother of Hasan when her heart was tranquillized, and God had reunited her to her son, recited these verses: —

Fortune hath compassionated my case, and felt pity for the length of my torment,
And granted me what I desire, and removed that which I dreaded.
I will therefore forgive its offences committed in former times;
Even the injustice it hath shewn in the turning of my hair gray.

Hasan and his mother then sat conversing together, and she said to him, How was thy state, O my son, with the Persian? He answered her, O my mother, he was not [only] a Persian, but he was a Magian, who worshipped fire instead of the Almighty King. And he informed her of what he had done with him; that he had travelled with him, and put him into the skin of the camel and sewed it up over him, and that the birds had carried him off, and put him down upon the top of the mountain. He told her too what he had seen upon the mountain, namely the dead men, whom the Magian had deluded and left upon the mountain after they had accomplished his affair; and how he cast himself into the sea from the top of the mountain, and God, (whose name be exalted!) preserved him, and conducted him to the palace of the damsels; and of the sisterly love of the youngest damsel for him, and his residence with the damsels; and how God had conducted the Magian to the place in which he was residing. He also told her of his passion for the damsel whom he had married, and how he caught her, and her whole story, [and the subsequent events] until God reunited them. And when his mother heard his story, she wondered, and praised God (whose name be exalted!) for his health and safety.

She then arose and went to those packages, and looked at them, and asked him respecting them; and he acquainted her with their contents; whereat she rejoiced exceedingly. And after that, she advanced to the damsel, to converse with her and to cheer her by her company; and when her eye fell upon her, her mind was stupefied by her comeliness, and she rejoiced and wondered at her beauty and loveliness and her stature and justness of form. Then she said to Hasan, O my son, praise be to God for thy safety, and for thy safe return! And she sat by the side of the damsel, cheering her by her company, and comforting her heart; after which, early the next day, she went down into the market, and bought ten suits, the most sumptuous garments that were in the city. She also brought for her magnificent furniture, and clad the damsel, and adorned her with every thing beautiful. Then she accosted her son, and said, O my son, with this wealth we cannot live in this city; for thou knowest that we were poor, and the people will accuse us of practising alchemy. Therefore arise with us, and let us go to the city of Baghdád, the Abode of Peace, that we may reside in the sacred asylum of the Khaleefeh, and thou shalt sit in a shop and sell and buy, and fear God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!): then will

God open to thee the doors of prosperity by means of this wealth. — And when Hasan heard her words, he approved them.

He arose immediately, and went forth from her, sold the house, and summoned the she-camels; and he put upon them all his riches and goods, together with his mother and his wife. He set forth, and ceased not to pursue his journey until he arrived at the Tigris; when he hired a vessel to convey them to Baghdád, embarked in it all his wealth and effects, and his mother and his wife, and every thing that was with him, and went on board the vessel, which conveyed them with a fair wind for a period of ten days, until they came in sight of Baghdád; and when they came in sight of it, they rejoiced. The vessel brought them into the city, and Hasan landed there forthwith, and hired a magazine in one of the Kháns. He then removed his goods from the vessel to the magazine, and went up, and remained one night in the Khán; and when he arose in the morning, he changed his clothes; and the broker seeing him, asked him respecting his affair, and what he desired: so he said to him, I desire a house, handsome and ample. And the broker shewed him the houses that he had to let, and a house that had belonged to one of the wezeers pleased him; wherefore he bought it of him for a hundred thousand pieces of gold, and gave him the price. Then he returned to the Khán in which he had taken lodging, and removed thence all his wealth and his goods to the house; after which he went forth into the market, and bought what was requisite for the house, of utensils and furniture and other things. He purchased also eunuchs, and among them was a young black slave, for the house. And he resided in ease with his wife, enjoying the most delightful life and happiness, for the space of three years, during which he was blessed by her with two boys, one of whom he named Násir, and the other Mansoor.

Then, after this period, he remembered his sisters, the damsels before mentioned, and he remembered their kindness to him, and how they had aided him to attain his desire. So he longed to see them; and, having gone forth to the markets of the city, he bought there some ornaments, and costly stuffs, and dried fruits, the like of which they had never seen nor known. His mother therefore asked him the reason of his buying those rarities, and he answered her, I have determined to repair to my sisters, who treated me with all kindness, and from whose goodness and beneficence to me my present good fortune proceeded; for I desire to go to them and to see them, and I will return soon, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! So she replied, O my son, be not long absent from me. And he said to her, Know, O my mother, how thou shalt manage with my wife. Here is her dress of feathers, in a chest buried in the earth: then be careful of it, lest she light upon it and take it, and fly away with her children, and depart, and I shall not find any tidings of her; so I shall die in sorrow on account of them. Know also, O my mother, that I caution thee not to mention this to her. And know that she is the daughter of the King of the Jánn, and there is not among the Kings of the Jánn any greater than her father, nor any that hath more numerous troops, or more wealth than he. Know likewise that she is the mistress of her people, and the dearest of the things that her father hath. Moreover, she is excessively high-minded: therefore do thou thyself serve her; and allow her not to go forth from the door, nor to look from the window, or from over a wall; for I fear on her account the wind when it bloweth; ²⁸ and if any event of the events of the world befall her, I shall slay myself on her account.

And his mother replied, Allah preserve me from disobeying thee, O my son! Am I mad, that when thou givest me this charge I should disobey thee with respect to it? Set forth, O my son, and be of good heart, and thou shalt come back happily, and see her, if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), and she shall acquaint thee with my conduct to her. But, O my son, remain not away more than the time required for going and returning. — And his wife, as was decreed, heard his words to his mother; and they knew it not.

Hasan then arose and went forth from the city, and beat the drum; so thereupon the she-camels came to him, and he laded twenty with the rarities of El-'Erák; after which he bade farewell to his mother and his wife and his children. The age of one of his two children was a year, and the age of the other was two years. Then he returned to his mother, and charged her a second time; and having done this, he mounted and journeyed to his sisters. He ceased not to pursue his journey night and day, traversing the valleys and the mountains, and the plains and the rugged tracts, for the space of ten days; and on the eleventh day he arrived at the palace and went in to his sisters, having with him the things that he had brought for them. And when they saw him, they rejoiced at his arrival, and congratulated him on his safety; and as to his sister, the youngest damsel, she decorated the palace without and within. They took the present, and lodged Hasan in a private chamber as before, and asked him respecting his mother and his wife. So he informed them that his wife had borne him two sons. Then his sister, the youngest damsel, when she saw him in health and prosperity, rejoiced exceedingly, and recited this verse: —

I ask the wind respecting you whenever it bloweth, and none but you ever occurreth to my mind.

He remained with them, entertained and treated with honour, for a period of three months, and he passed his time in joy and happiness and comfort and cheerfulness, and in hunting.

But as to his mother and his wife, when Hasan had set forth on his journey, his wife remained a day and a second day with his mother, and she said to her on the third day, Extolled be the perfection of God! Do I reside with him three years and not enter the bath? — And she wept. So his mother compassionated her state, and said to her, O my daughter, we are here strangers, and thy husband is not in the city. If he were present, he would take upon himself to serve thee; but as for me, I know not any one.

However, O my daughter, I will heat for thee the water, and will wash thy head in the bath that is in the house. — To this the damsel replied, O my mistress, hadst thou said these words to one of the female slaves, she would have demanded to be sold in the market, and would not have remained with you. But, O my mistress, men are excusable; for they are jealous, and their minds say to them, that the woman, if she go forth from her house, will perhaps commit a dishonest action; and women, O my mistress, are not all alike. Thou knowest too that a woman, if she have a desire for a thing, no one can overcome her, nor can any one set a guard over her or preserve her, or debar her from the bath or any thing else, or from doing all that she desireth. — Then she wept, and cursed herself, and began to bewail for herself, and for her absence from her native country. So the mother of her husband pitied her state, and knew that all which she said must be done. Wherefore she arose, and prepared the things that they required for the bath, and took her and went to the bath. And when they entered it, they pulled off their clothes, and all the women began to look at her and to extol the perfection of God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!), contemplating the beautiful form that He had created. Every woman who passed by the bath entered and diverted herself by viewing her.

The fame of her spread through the city, and the women crowded upon her, and the bath could not be passed through by reason of the number of women who were in it. Now it happened in consequence of this wonderful event, that there came to the bath that day one of the slave-girls of the Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, called Tohfeh²⁹ the lute-player; and seeing the women crowding together, and the bath not to be passed through by reason of the number of the women and girls, she asked what was the matter, and they informed her of the damsel. So she came in to her and looked at her and viewed her attentively, and her mind was confounded by her beauty and loveliness. She extolled the perfection of God (greatly be He glorified!) for the beautiful forms that He had created, and she entered not [the inner apartment] nor washed; but sat confounded at the sight of the damsel until the damsel had made an end of washing, and came forth and put on her clothes, when she appeared still more beautiful. And when she came forth from the harárah,³⁰ she sat upon the carpet and the cushions, the women gazing at her; and she looked at them and went forth.

Tohfeh the lute-player, the slave-girl of the Khaleefeh, arose and went forth with her, and proceeded with her until she knew her house, when she bade her farewell, and she returned to the palace of the Khaleefeh. She ceased not to pass on until she came before the lady Zubeydeh, and kissed the ground before her; whereupon the lady Zubeydeh said, O Tohfeh, what is the reason of thy loitering in the bath? So she answered, O my mistress, I saw a wonder, the like of which I have not seen among men nor among women, and that was the thing which diverted my attention and amazed my mind and confounded me so that I did not wash my head. And the lady Zubeydeh said, And what was it, O Tohfeh? She answered, O my mistress, I saw a damsel in the bath, having with her two young children, like two moons, and none hath beheld the like of her, neither before her nor after her, nor doth there exist the like of her form in the whole world. By thy beneficence, O my mistress, if thou acquaintedst the Prince of the Faithful with her, he would slay her husband, and take her from him; for there existeth not one like her among women. I inquired respecting her husband, and they said that her husband is a merchant, whose name is Hasan of El-Basrah. And I followed her when she went forth from the bath until she entered her house, whereupon I saw it to be the house of the Wezeer, that hath two entrances, an entrance on the side of the river, and an entrance on the side of the land. I fear, O my mistress, that the Prince of the Faithful may hear of her, and that he will disobey the law, and slay her husband, and marry her.

Upon this, the lady Zubeydeh said, Wo to thee, O Tohfeh! Is this damsel endowed with such beauty and loveliness that the Prince of the Faithful would sell his religion for his worldly enjoyments, and disobey the law on her account? By Allah, I must have a sight of this damsel; and if she be not as thou hast described, I will give orders to strike off thy head, O wicked woman! In the palace of the Prince of the Faithful are three hundred and sixty slave-girls, according to the number of the days of the year, among whom there is not one such as thou hast described. — And she replied, O my mistress, no, by Allah; nor is there in all Baghdád the like of her; nay, neither among the foreigners nor among the Arabs, nor hath God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!) created the like of her.

So upon this the lady Zubeydeh summoned Mesroor, who came and kissed the ground before her; and she said to him, O Mesroor, go to the house of the Wezeer, that hath two entrances, an entrance towards the river, and an entrance towards the land, and bring to me the damsel who is there, together with her children, and the old woman who is with her, quickly, and loiter not. And Mesroor replied, I hear and obey. He went forth from before her, and proceeded until he arrived at the door of the house, whereupon he knocked at the door, and the old woman, the mother of Hasan, came forth to him, saying, Who is at the door? He answered her, Mesroor, the eunuch of the Prince of the Faithful. So she opened the door, and he entered, and saluted her, and she saluted him, and asked him respecting his business. He therefore said to her, The lady Zubeydeh the daughter of El-Kásim, the wife of the Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, the fifth³¹ of the sons of El-'Abbás the uncle of the Prophet (whom may God bless and save!), summoneth thee to her, thee and the wife of thy son, and her children; for the women have informed her respecting her and respecting her beauty. Upon this, the mother of Hasan said, O Mesroor, we are strangers, and the damsel's husband, my son, is not in the city, and he did not order me to go forth, neither me nor her, to any one of the creatures of God (whose name be exalted!); and I fear, if any thing happen and my son come, he will slay himself. I beg then, of thy kindness, O Mesroor, that thou impose not upon us a command which we are unable to perform. — But Mesroor replied, O my mistress, if I knew that in this were aught to be feared on your account, I would not require you to go. The desire of the lady Zubeydeh is only to see her, and she shall return: therefore disobey not; for thou wouldst repent; and like as I take you I will bring you back hither safe, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! — So the mother of Hasan could not disobey him; wherefore she entered, and made ready the damsel, and took her forth, together with her children.

They followed Mesroor, who preceded them to the palace of the Khaleefeh, and led them up and stationed them before the lady Zubeydeh, whereupon they kissed the ground before her, and prayed for her. The damsel had her face covered: so the lady Zubeydeh said to her, Wilt thou not uncover thy face, that I may see it? The damsel therefore kissed the ground before her, and displayed a face that put to shame the full moon in the horizon of the sky; and when the lady Zubeydeh beheld her, she fixed her eyes in astonishment upon her, and let them wander over her, and the palace was illumined by her splendour and by the light of her countenance. Zubeydeh was amazed at her beauty, and so also was every one in the palace, and every one who beheld her became insane, unable to speak to another. The lady Zubeydeh then arose, and made the damsel stand, and she pressed her to her bosom, seated her with herself upon the couch, and commanded that they should decorate the palace; after which she gave orders to bring for her a suit of the most magnificent apparel, and a necklace of the most precious jewels, and decked the damsel with them, and said to her, O mistress of beauties, verily thou hast pleased me, and filled my eye with delight. What hast thou among thy treasures? — So the damsel answered, O my mistress, I have a dress of feathers: if I were to put it on before thee, thou wouldst see a thing of the most beautiful make, that thou wouldst wonder at, and every one who would see it would talk of its beauty, generation after generation. — And where, said Zubeydeh, is this thy dress? She answered, It is in the possession of the mother of my husband; so demand it for me of her.

The lady Zubeydeh therefore said, O my mother, by my life I conjure thee that thou go down and bring to her her dress of feathers, that she may amuse us with the sight of that which she will do, and take thou it again. The old woman replied, O my mistress, this damsel is a liar. Have we seen any woman possessing a dress of feathers? This is a thing that pertaineth not to any but birds. — The damsel however said to the lady Zubeydeh, By thy life, O my mistress, I have in her possession a dress of feathers, and it is in a chest buried in the closet that is in the house. So the lady Zubeydeh pulled off from her neck a necklace of jewels worth the treasures of a KISRÀ and a CÆSAR, and said to her, O my mother, receive this necklace. And she handed it to her, saying to her, By my life I conjure thee that thou go down and bring that dress, that we may divert ourselves with the sight of it, and take thou it again after that. But she swore to her that she had not seen this dress, and that she knew not where to find it. And upon this, the lady Zubeydeh cried out at the old woman, and, having taken from her the key, called Mesroor, who came, and she said to him, Take this key, and go to the house, and open it, and enter the closet of which the door is of such and such a description: in the midst of it is a chest, which take thou up, and break it, and bring the dress of feathers that is in it before me. So he replied, I hear and obey.

He took the key from the hand of the lady Zubeydeh, and went; and the old woman, the mother of Hasan, arose, with weeping eye, repenting of her compliance with the desire of the damsel, and of having gone to the bath with her; for the damsel had not desired to go to the bath save for the purpose of practising a stratagem. Then the old woman entered the house with Mesroor, and she opened the door of the closet: so he entered, and raised forth the chest, took from it the dress of feathers, and, having wrapped it in a napkin that he had with him, brought it to the lady Zubeydeh, who took it and turned it over, wondering at the beauty of its make. She then handed it to the damsel, saying to her, Is this thy dress of feathers? She answered, Yes, O my mistress. And she stretched forth her hand to it and took it from her, full of joy.

The damsel examined it, and saw that it was perfect as it was when upon her, not a single feather of it being lost. She was therefore delighted with it, and rose from the side of the lady Zubeydeh, took the dress and opened it, and took her children in her bosom; after which she wrapped herself in it, and became a bird, by the power of God, to whom be ascribed might and glory! So the lady Zubeydeh wondered at that, as also did every one who was present; all of them wondering at that which she did. The damsel leant from side to side, and walked about, and danced and played; and the persons present had fixed their eyes in astonishment upon her, wondering at her actions. She then said to them, with an eloquent tongue, O my mistress, is this beautiful? The persons present answered her, Yes, O mistress of beauties: all that thou hast done is beautiful. And she said to them, And this that I am about to do will be more beautiful, O my mistresses. And she expanded her wings, and flew up with her children above the cupola, and stood upon the roof of the saloon. So they looked 'at her and said to her, By Allah, this is an extraordinary and a beautiful art, that we have never before beheld! Then the damsel, when she desired to fly away to her country, remembered Hasan, and said, Hear, O my mistresses! And she recited these verses:—

O thou who hast quitted these mansions and departed to the objects of thy love with rapid flight!

Dost thou think that I continue in comfort among you, and that your life hath not become a life of troubles?

When I was taken captive in the snare of love, he made love my prison, and went far away.

When my dress was hidden, he felt sure that I should not implore the One, the Omnipotent, to restore it.

He charged his mother to keep it carefully in a closet, and transgressed against me, and oppressed:

But I heard their words and kept them in my memory, and conceived hopes of abundant good fortune.

My going to the bath was the means of making the minds of people to be confounded at the sight of me;

And the spouse of Er-Rasheed wondered at my beauty, when she beheld me on the right and left.

Then I said, O wife of the Khaleefeh, I possess a dress of feathers of great magnificence. If it were upon me, thou wouldst see wonders that would efface sorrow and disperse troubles.

So the spouse of the Khaleefeh asked, Where is it? And I answered, In the house of him who hath hidden it.

And Mesroor pounced down and brought it to her; and, lo, it was here, beaming with light.

Thereupon I took it from his hand and opened it, and I saw its bosom and its buttons. Then I entered it, having my children with me, and expanded my wings, and flew away. O mother of my husband, tell him when he cometh, if he wish to meet me, he must leave his home.

And when she had ended her verses, the lady Zubeydeh said to her, Wilt thou not descend to us, that we may continue to enjoy thy beauty, O mistress of the comely? Extolled be the perfection of Him who hath endowed thee with eloquence and beauty! — But she replied, Far from returning be that which hath passed! She then said to the mother of Hasan, the mourning, the wretched, By Allah, O my mistress, O mother of Hasan, thou wilt render me desolate by thine absence; but when thy son hath come, and the days of separation have become tedious to him, and he desireth approach and meeting, and the winds of love and longing desire agitate him, let him come to me in the Islands of Wák-Wák.³² — And she flew away with her children, and sought her country.

When the mother of Hasan beheld this, she wept, and slapped her face, and wailed until she fainted; and when she recovered, the lady Zubeydeh said to her, O my mistress the pilgrim,³³ I did not know that this would happen; and if thou hadst acquainted me with it, I would not have opposed thee. I knew not that she was of the Flying Jinn before the present time; and had I known that she was of this nature, I would not have allowed her to put on the dress, nor would I have suffered her to take her children. But, O my mistress, absolve me. — And the old woman replied, having no way of avoiding it, Thou art absolved. She then went forth from the palace of the Khaleefeh, and ceased not to pursue her way until she entered her house, when she proceeded to slap her face until she fainted again; and when she recovered from her fit, she sorrowfully longed for the damsel and for her children, and for the sight of her son, and recited these verses: —

On the day of separation, your removal made me weep, lamenting on account of your absence from home.

I cried out, from the pain of parting, in anguish, and tears had made my eyelids sore,

This is separation! Shall we enjoy your return? For your departure hath deprived me of the power of concealment.

Would they had returned, and observed good faith! If they do so, perhaps my former times may return.

Then she arose, and dug in the house three graves; ³⁴ and she betook herself to them, weeping night and day. And when the absence of her son became tedious to her, and her disquietude and longing and mourning became excessive, she recited these verses: —

Thine image is within mine eyelids, and I think of thee when my heart is throbbing and when it is quiet,

And love of thee hath circulated in my bones, as circulates the juice in the fruits upon the branches:

And when I see thee not, my bosom is contracted, and the censurers excuse me for my sorrows.

O thou whose love hath got possession of me, and for whom my distraction exceedeth my affection, Fear the Compassionate, with respect to me, and be merciful! Love of thee hath made me to taste of death.

But as to her son Hasan, when he came to the damsels, they conjured him to stay with them for three months. And after that period, they prepared for him the wealth, and made ready for him ten loads, five of gold and five of silver, and also of provisions one load; after which they bade him commence his journey, and went forth with him; but he conjured them to return. So they advanced to embrace him, for the purpose of bidding him farewell. The youngest damsel first advanced to him, and she embraced him, and wept until she fainted. Then she recited these two verses: —

When shall the fire now kindled by separation be quenched by your approach, and my desire be accomplished by your presence, and when shall we be as formerly?

The day of parting hath filled me with terror, and hath afflicted me; and the act of bidding thee farewell, O my master, hath increased my infirmity.

The second damsel next approached, and embraced him, and recited this couplet: —

Bidding thee farewell is like bidding life farewell; and the loss of thee is like the loss of the zephyr.³⁵

Thine absence is like a fire that burneth my heart, and in thy presence I enjoy the Gardens of Delight.

In like manner also did the other damsels; each embracing him and reciting a couplet. Then Hasan bade them farewell. He wept until he fainted, on account of his separation from them, and recited these verses: —

My tears flowed, on the day of separation, like pearls, and I made of them, as it were, a necklace.

The camel-driver urged on the beasts with singing, and I found not strength nor patience, nor was my heart with me.

I bade them farewell: then retired in grief, and quitted the society of the places I had frequented.

I returned—evil was the way!—and my soul was not comforted save by hoping to come again and see thee.

O my friend, listen to the words of love! God forbid that I should speak and thy heart should not remember!

O my soul, when thou partest with them, also part with the delight of life, and wish not to survive!

He then pursued his journey with assiduity, night and day, until he arrived at Baghdád, the Abode of Peace, and the sacred asylum of the 'Abbásee Khaleefehs; and he knew not what had happened after his departure.

He entered the house, and went in to his mother to salute her; but he saw that her body was emaciated, and her bones were wasted, by reason of exceeding lamentation and sleeplessness, and weeping and groaning, so that she had become like a toothpick; and she was unable to reply. He dismissed the she-camels, and advanced to her; and when he beheld her in this state, he went about the house searching for his wife and children; and found not any trace of them. Then he looked into the closet, and he found it open, and the chest also open, and he found not in it the dress. So upon this he knew that she had got possession of the dress of feathers, and taken it, and flown away, taking her children with her. He therefore returned to his mother, and, seeing that she had recovered from her fit, he asked her respecting his wife and his children; and she wept, and said, O my son, may God compensate thee greatly for the loss of them! These are their three tombs.—And when he heard the words of his mother, he uttered a great cry, and fell down in a fit, and thus he remained from the commencement of the day until noon. The grief of his mother therefore increased, and she despaired of his life. And when he recovered, he wept and slapped his face, and rent his clothes, and went about the house confounded. Then he recited these two verses:—

Persons before me have bemoaned the pain of absence, and living and dead have been terrified by estrangement;

But an instance of feelings like those in my bosom I have never heard of nor beheld.

And after he had concluded his verses, he took his sword and drew it, and coming to his mother, he said to her, If thou acquaint me not with the truth of the case, I will strike off thy head, and slay myself. So she said to him, O my son, do not that, and I will inform thee. Then she said to him, Sheathe thy sword, and sit, that I may tell thee what happened. And when he had sheathed his sword and seated himself by her side, she repeated to him the story from beginning to end, and said to him, O my son, if I had not seen her weep to go to the bath, and feared thee, that thou wouldst come and that she would complain to thee, and thou wouldst be incensed against me, I had not gone with her thither. And if the lady Zubeydeh had not been incensed against me, and taken from me the key by force, I had not taken forth the dress, though I should have died; and, O my son, thou knowest that no one can contend for superiority in power with the Khaleefeh. Then, when they brought the dress to her, she took it and turned it over, imagining that some part of it might be lost; but she found that no injury had happened to it. She therefore rejoiced, and, having taken her children, she bound them to her waist, and put on the dress of feathers, after the lady Zubeydeh had pulled off and given to her all that was upon her, in honour of her, and for her loveliness. And when she had put on the dress of feathers, she shook, and became a bird; and she walked about the palace, while they looked at her and wondered at her beauty and loveliness. She then flew up, and perched upon the palace; and after that, she looked at me and said to me, When thy son hath come, and the nights of separation have become tedious to him, and he desireth to approach and meet me, and the winds of love and longing desire agitate him, he must leave his home, and repair to the Islands of Wák-Wák. Thus did she during thine absence.

Now when Hasan heard the words of his mother, he uttered a great cry, and fell down in a fit. He ceased not to lie in this state until the close of the day; and when he recovered, he slapped his face, and rolled about on the floor like a serpent. His mother sat weeping at his head until midnight; and after he had recovered from his fit, he wept vehemently, and recited these verses: —

Pause, and see the condition of him whom you abandon: perhaps you will pity him after your cruelty;

For if you see him, you will doubt of him, by reason of his sickness, as though, by Allah, you knew him not.

He is dying in consequence of his passion for you, and would be numbered among the dead, but for his groaning.

Do not imagine your separation to be light: it is grievous to the lover, and death would be easier.

And when he had ended his verses, he arose, and continued going about the house, moaning and weeping and wailing, for a period of five days, during which he tasted not food nor drink. So his mother went to him and conjured him with oaths to abstain from weeping; but he yielded not to her words, and ceased not to weep and wail. His mother still attempted to console him, but he would not attend to aught that she said. He continued in this state, weeping until the next morning. Then his eyes slumbered, and he saw his wife mourning and weeping: whereupon he arose from his sleep, crying out, and recited these two verses: —

Thine image is with me, and never quitteth me. I have given it the most honourable place in my heart.

But for the hope of reunion, I could not live a moment; and but for the phantom of thy form, I would not sleep.

And in the morning his wailing and weeping increased. He remained with weeping eye and mourning heart, sleepless during the night, and eating little; and he continued in this state for the space of a whole month.

But when that month had passed, it occurred to his mind that he should journey to his sisters, in order that they might assist him to attain his desire of regaining his wife. So he summoned the excellent she-camels, loaded fifty with rarities of El-'Erák, and mounted one of them. He then charged his mother with the care of the house, and committed all his goods [to the custody of persons of his acquaintance], except a few things that he left in the house; after which he set forth on his journey to his sisters, hoping that he might obtain their aid to effect his reunion with his wife. He ceased not to pursue his way until he arrived at the palace of the damsels by the Mountain of Clouds; and when he went in to them, he presented to them the gifts, with which they were delighted; and they congratulated him on his safety, and said to him, O our brother, what is the reason of thy coming so quickly, when thou hast not been absent from us more than two months? And upon this he wept, and recited these verses: —

I find my soul solicitous on account of the loss of its beloved, enjoying not life nor its delights.

My disease is one of which the cure is unknown. And can any one cure diseases but their physician?

O thou who hast debarred me from the delight of sleep! thou hast left me to inquire for thee of the wind when it bloweth,

If it be near to the place of the beloved, who compriseth those charms that excite mine eye to weep.

O thou who alightest in her country! perhaps thy breath may revive my heart by its fragrance.

And when he had ended his verses, he uttered a great cry, and fell down in a fit; and the damsels seated themselves around him, weeping for him until he recovered from his fit; whereupon he recited this couplet: —

Probably fortune will turn its rein, and bring my beloved; for time is changeable;³⁸
And my fortune may prosper me, and my wants be performed, and happy events may follow adverse.

He continued for some time weeping and fainting, and reciting verses; and the damsels had retired; but when his sister heard his words, she came forth to him, and saw him lying in a fit; upon which she cried out, and slapped her face; and her sisters, hearing her, came forth to her, and beheld Hasan lying in a fit. They surrounded him, and wept for him; and when they saw him in this state, the ecstasy and distraction of love, and longing desire, that affected him no longer remained concealed from them.

They then asked him respecting his condition, and he wept, and acquainted them with that which had befallen him during his absence from home, telling them that his wife had flown away, and taken her children with her. So they mourned for him, and asked him what she said when she departed; and he answered, O my sisters, she said to my mother, Tell thy son, when he hath come, and the nights of separation have become tedious to him, and he desireth to approach and meet me, and the winds of love and longing desire agitate him, he must come to me in the Islands of Wák-Wák. — And when they heard his words, they winked to each other, and reflected; and each of them looked at her sister, while Hasan looked at them. Then they hung down their heads towards the ground a while; and after that, they raised their heads, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! And they said to him, Stretch forth thy hand to heaven, and if thou canst reach to heaven, thou mayest reach to thy wife and thy children. And thereupon his tears ran down upon his cheeks like rain, so that they wetted his clothes; and he recited these verses: —

The red cheeks and the pupils of the eyes have disturbed me, and patience abandoned me when sleeplessness approached.

Fair, sleek damsels have by cruelty emaciated my body: to men's eyes it seemeth not to retain the last breath.

With black eyes, and proud gait, like the gazelles of the sandhill, they shewed beauty of which the saints, if they saw it, would be enamoured.

They walk like the zephyr of the gardens towards daybreak.³⁷ Through love of them, anxiety and disquietude have come upon me.

I have attached my hopes to a lovely damsel among them. My heart burneth with flaming fire on her account.

Gazelle-like, sleek-limbed, walking with proud gait; her face is like the morning; but her hair is dark as night.

She hath disturbed me. But how many heroes have the eyelids and the eyes of the fair ones disturbed with love!

And when he had concluded his verses, he wept, and the damsels wept at his weeping; compassion and zeal for him affecting them.

They betook themselves to soothing him, and exhorting him to have patience, and praying for his reunion to his wife; and his sister accosted him and said to him, O my brother, be of good heart and cheerful eye, and be patient: then wilt thou attain thy desire; for he who is patient, and waiteth, obtaineth what he wisheth; and patience is the key of relief. The poet hath said, —

Let destiny run with slackened reins, and pass not the night but with careless mind;
For between the closing of an eye and its opening, God effecteth a change in the state of affairs.

She then said to him, Strengthen thy heart, and confirm thy resolution; for he whose life is to be ten years will not die when he is but nine; and weeping and grief and mourning occasion disease and sickness. Remain with us until thou shalt have taken rest, and I will contrive means of thy gaining access to thy wife and thy children, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! — But he wept violently, and recited this couplet: —

If I be cured of a disease in my body, I am not cured of a disease in my heart.
There is no other cure for the diseases of love than union of the beloved with the lover.

Then he sat by the side of his sister, who proceeded to converse with him and to console him, and asked him what was the cause of his wife's departure. So he informed her of the cause of that event; and she said to him, By Allah, O my brother, I desired to say to thee, Burn the dress of feathers: — but the Devil made me forget that. And she continued to converse with him and to soothe him. But when the case became tedious to him, and his disquietude increased, he recited these verses: —

A beloved, with whom I was familiar, hath got possession of my heart: and God's decree cannot be prevented.

She hath all the united beauty of the Arabs. She is a gazelle; but freely pastureth on my heart.

Though my patience and contrivance in my love of her are little, I weep, notwithstanding weeping availeth not.

She is lovely, and hath twice seven years, as though she were a moon of five nights and five and four.³⁸

So when his sister saw how he suffered from ecstasy and distraction of love, and the afflictions of passion and desire, she went to her sisters, with weeping eye and mourning heart, and she wept before them, threw herself upon them, kissed their feet, and begged them to aid her brother in the accomplishment of his affair, and in effecting his meeting with his children and his wife. She conjured them to contrive means of procuring him access to the Islands of Wák-Wák, and ceased not to weep before her sisters until she made them also weep, and they said to her, Comfort thy heart; for we will strive to accomplish his meeting with his family, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! He then remained with them a whole year; but his eye abstained not from shedding tears.

Now the sisters of the youngest damsel had a paternal uncle, the brother of their father by the same father and mother, and his name was 'Abd-El-Kuddoos.³⁹ He loved the eldest damsel with a great affection, and every year he used to visit her once, and perform her affairs. The damsels also had related to him the story of Hasan, and the events that befell him with the Magian, and how he was enabled to slay him; whereat their uncle rejoiced; and he gave to the eldest damsel a purse containing some incense, and said to her, O daughter of my brother, if any thing render thee anxious, and any thing disagreeable happen to thee, or any want occur to thee, throw this incense into the fire, and mention me; and I will come to thee quickly, and will perform thy want. This he said on the first day of the year.

And that damsel said to one of her sisters, Verily the year hath entirely passed, and my uncle hath not come. Arise, strike the steel upon the flint, and bring me the box of incense. — So the damsel arose joyful, and brought the box of incense; and she opened it, and, having taken from it a small quantity, handed it to her sister, who took it and threw it into the fire, mentioning her uncle; and the fumes of the incense had not ceased before a dust appeared advancing from the further extremity of the valley. Then, after a while, the dust dispersed, and there appeared beneath it a sheykh riding upon an elephant, which was crying out beneath him. And when the damsels beheld him, he began to make signs to them with his hands and his feet. Soon after, he came to them, and alighted from the elephant, and came in to them; whereupon they embraced him, and kissed his hands, and saluted him. He then sat, and the damsels proceeded to converse with him, and to ask him the cause of his absence. And he said, I was just now sitting with the wife of your uncle, and I smelt the incense; so I came to you upon this elephant. What then dost thou desire, O daughter of my brother? — She answered, O my uncle, we were longing to see thee, the year having passed, and it is not thy custom to remain absent from us more than a year. And he replied, I was occupied, and I had determined to come to you to-morrow. They therefore thanked him and prayed for him.

After that, they sat conversing with him, and the eldest damsel said to him, O my uncle, we related to thee the story of Hasan of El-Basrah, whom Bahrá'm the Magian brought, and how he slew him, and we informed thee of the damsel, the daughter of the supreme King, whom he took, and of the difficulties and horrors he endured, and how he caught the King's daughter and married her, and how he journeyed with her to his country. He replied, Yes. And what, he asked, happened to him after this? — She answered him, She acted perfidiously to him, after he had been blest with two sons by her; she took them and departed with them to her country, while he was absent; and she said to his mother, When thy son hath come, and the nights of separation have become tedious to him, and he desireth to approach and meet me, and the winds of love and longing desire agitate him, he must come to me in the Islands of Wák-Wák. — And upon this he shook his head, and bit his finger. Then he hung down his head towards the ground, and began to make marks upon the ground with the end of his finger; ⁴⁰ after which he looked to the right and left, and shook his head again, while Hasan looked at him, but was concealed from him. So the damsels said to their uncle, Reply to us; for our livers are broken in pieces. And he shook his head at them and said to them, O my daughters, this man hath wearied himself, and cast himself into a most terrible predicament and great peril; for he cannot gain access to the Islands of Wák-Wák.

Upon this the damsels called Hasan, and he came forth to them, and, advancing to the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, he kissed his hand and saluted him; and the sheykh was pleased with him, and seated him by his side. The damsels then said to their uncle, O uncle, shew our brother the truth of that which thou hast said. He therefore said to him, O my son, relinquish this most vexatious affair; for thou couldst not gain access to the Islands of Wák-Wák even if the Flying Jinn and the wandering stars assisted thee, since between thee and those Islands are seven valleys and seven seas and seven mountains of vast magnitude. How then canst thou gain access to this place, and who will convey thee to it? By Allah I conjure thee that thou return soon, and weary not thy heart. — And when Hasan heard the words of the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, he wept until he fainted, and the damsels sat around him weeping for his weeping. But as to the youngest damsel, she rent her clothes and slapped her face until she also fainted.

So when the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos saw them in this state of anxiety and ecstasy of grief, and mourning, he pitied them, and was affected with commiseration for them, and he said, Be ye silent. Then he said to Hasan, Comfort thy heart, and rejoice at the prospect of the accomplishment of thine affair if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! And after that, he said to him, O my son, arise, and brace up thy nerves, and follow me. So Hasan stood up, after he had bidden the damsels farewell; and he followed him, rejoicing in expectation of the accomplishment of his affair. The sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos then called the elephant, and he came, and he mounted him, putting Hasan behind him, and proceeded with him for the space of three days with their nights, like the blinding lightning, until he came to a vast, blue mountain, all the stones of which were blue; and in that mountain was a cavern, which had a door of iron of China.

Upon this the sheykh took the hand of Hasan, and put him down; after which the sheykh himself alighted, and dismissed the elephant. He then advanced to the door of the cavern, and knocked it; whereupon the door opened, and there came forth to him a black slave, beardless, resembling an 'Efreet, and having in his right hand a sword, and in the other a shield of steel. But when he saw the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, he threw down the sword and shield from his hands, and advanced to the sheykh, and kissed his hand. Then the sheykh took the hand of Hasan, and entered with him, and the slave shut the door behind them. Hasan saw that the cavern was very large and wide, and that it had a passage vaulted over; and they ceased not to go on for the space of a mile, after which their course brought them at last to a vast desert. They repaired to an angle in which were two great doors, of cast brass, and the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos opened one of them, and entered, and closed it, having said to Hasan, Sit at this door, and beware of opening it and entering until I shall have entered and returned to thee quickly. And when the sheykh had entered he remained absent for the space of an astronomical hour.

He then came forth, having with him a horse saddled and bridled, which, when he went along, flew; and when he flew, the dust overtook him not. The sheykh led him forward to Hasan, and said, Mount. And the sheykh opened the other door; whereupon there appeared within it an extensive desert. So Hasan mounted the horse, and the two passed through the door, and were in that desert. And the sheykh said to Hasan, O my son, take this letter, and proceed upon this horse to the place to which he will convey thee; and when thou seest him stop at the door of a cavern like this, descend from his back, and put his rein upon the pommel, and dismiss him, and he will enter the cavern; but enter not thou with him. Stay at the door of the cavern for the space of five days, and be not weary; for on the sixth day there will come forth to thee a black sheykh, clad in black apparel, and with a beard white and long, descending to his waist; and when thou seest him, kiss his hands, and lay hold of his skirt, and put it on thy head, and weep before him, that he may have pity on thee. He will thereupon ask thee respecting thine affair; and when he saith to thee, What is thine affair? — give him this letter, and he will take it of thee and will not speak to thee, but will enter and leave thee. Stay in thy place five days more, and be not weary, and on the sixth day expect him; [for perhaps] he will come forth to thee; and if he himself come forth to thee, know that thine affair will be accomplished; but if one of his young men come forth to thee, know that he who hath come forth to thee desireth to slay thee. And peace be on thee! But know, O my son, that every one who exposeth himself to peril destroyeth himself: therefore if thou fear for thy soul, cast it not into destruction: if however thou fear not, do as thou desirest. I have shewn thee the circumstances of the case; and if thou desire to return to thy companions, this elephant is ready, and he will convey thee to the daughters of my brother, who will send thee to thy country and restore thee to thy home, and God will bless thee with one better than this damsel to whom thou art attached.

But Hasan said to the sheykh, How can life be pleasant to me, without my attaining my desire? By Allah, I will never return until I find my beloved, or my death overtake me! — Then he wept, and recited some verses, commencing thus: —

For the loss of my beloved, and the excess of my passion, I stood and cried out in my despondency and abjection;
And I kissed the dust of the house, in my longing for her; but it only served to augment my sorrow.

And when the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos heard his recitation and his words, he knew that he would not relinquish the object of his desire, and that words would make no impression upon him, and he was convinced that he must expose himself to peril, though his life should be sacrificed. But he said, Know, O my son, that the Islands of Wák-Wák are seven islands, in which is a great army, entirely composed of damsels, virgins; and the inhabitants of the Interior Islands are Devils and Márids and enchanter and various tribes. Whosoever entereth their country returneth not, and no one ever went to them and returned. I conjure thee therefore by Allah that thou return to thy family soon. Know moreover that the damsel whom thou seekest is the daughter of the King of all these islands; and how canst thou gain access to her? Hear then my words, O my son; and perhaps God will give thee in her stead one better than she. — But Hasan replied, By Allah, O my master, were I cut piecemeal for my love of her, I should only increase in fondness and desire. I must see my wife and my children, and enter the Islands of Wák-Wák; and if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), I will not return save with her and with my children. — So the sheykh 'Abd-

El-Kuddoos said to him, Then thou must perform the journey. He replied, Yes; and I only desire of thee thy prayers for help and aid. Perhaps God will reunite me to my wife and my children soon. — Then he wept by reason of the greatness of his desire, and recited these verses: —

You are my desire, and the best of creatures. I hold you to be as dear as my hearing and my sight.
You have possessed my heart, and it hath become your abode, and since you left me, O my mistress, I have been in trouble.
Then think not that I have relinquished the love of you; for it hath put the wretched being in fear.
You have gone, and my happiness went when you departed, and what was bright became to me obscure in the extreme.
You have left me to contemplate the stars in my anguish, weeping with tears like a pouring rain.
O night, thou art tedious to him who is disquieted, in the violence of his passion gazing at the moon!
O wind, if thou pass by the tribe that she sojourneth with, give my salutation to her; for my life is short;
And describe to her somewhat of the anguish I experience; for the beloved is not acquainted with my state!

And when he had ended his verses, he wept so violently that he fainted; and on her recovery the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos said to him, O my son, thou hast a mother: then make her not to taste the pain of thy loss. But Hasan replied, By Allah, O my master, I will not return, save with my wife, or my death shall overtake me. Then he wept and moaned, and again recited some verses; and when he had ended them, the sheykh knew that he would not draw back from his present purpose though his life should be sacrificed; wherefore he handed to him the letter, prayed for him, and directed him how he should act, and said to him, I have given a strict charge for thee, in the letter, to Abu-r-Ruweysh the son of Balkees the daughter of the accursed Iblees; ⁴¹ for he is my sheykh and my preceptor, and all mankind and the Jinn humble themselves to him, and fear him. He then said to him, Go, in reliance upon the blessing of God.

He therefore departed, giving the rein to the horse, which fled with him more rapidly than lightning. Hasan ceased not to speed along on the horse for a period of ten days, until he beheld before him a huge indistinct object, blacker than night, obstructing the space between the east and the west; and when he drew near to it, the horse neighed beneath him; whereupon there came together horses numerous as the drops of rain, the number of which could not be calculated, nor was any help for them known; and they began to rub against Hasan's horse. So Hasan feared them and was terrified; and he ceased not to proceed, with the horses around him, until he arrived at the cavern which the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had described to him, when the horse stopped at its entrance, and Hasan alighted from him, and put his rein upon his saddle. The horse then entered the cavern, and Hasan stopped at the entrance, as the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had ordered him. He meditated upon the result of his case how it would be, perplexed, distracted, not knowing what would happen to him. He continued at the entrance of the cavern five days with their nights, sleepless, mournful, perplexed, meditating upon his having parted from his family and home and companions and friends, with weeping eye and mourning heart.

Then he remembered his mother, and thought upon what might happen to him, and upon the separation of his wife and his children, and the troubles he had suffered, and recited some verses, which he had not ended when the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh came forth to him. He was black, and clad in black apparel; and when Hasan beheld him, he knew him by the descriptions which the shykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had given of him. So he threw himself upon him, and rubbed his cheeks upon his feet, and, taking his foot, he put it upon his head, and wept before him. The sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh therefore said to him, What is thine affair, O my son? And Hasan stretched forth his hand with the letter, and handed it to the sheykh, who received it from him, and entered the cavern, without returning him a reply; and Hasan remained in his place at the entrance, as the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had desired him, weeping. He ceased not to stay in his place for the space of five days more. His disquietude was excessive, and his fear was violent, and his sleeplessness was constant. He wept and was oppressed in mind by the pain of estrangement and excessive wakefulness, and recited some plaintive verses.

He ceased not to weep until the dawn appeared, when, lo, the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh came forth to him, clad in white apparel, and made a sign to him with his hand, that he should enter. So Hasan entered, and the sheykh, taking him by the hand, led him into the cavern; and he rejoiced, and felt sure that his affair would be accomplished. The sheykh continued to proceed, and Hasan with him, for the space of half a day; after which they arrived at an arched doorway with a door of steel, which the sheykh opened, and he and Hasan entered a passage vaulted over with variegated stones decorated with gold. They ceased not to go on till they came to a great saloon constructed with marble, and spacious, in the midst of which was a garden containing all kinds of trees and flowers and fruits, and birds upon the trees warbling, and proclaiming the perfection of God, the Omnipotent King. In the saloon were four leewáns, facing one another, each leewán having a sitting-place with a fountain, and at each of the corners of each fountain was a figure of a lion of gold. — In each sitting-place also was a chair, upon which was sitting a person with a great number of books before him, and before them were perfuming-vessels of gold, containing fire and incense. Every one of these sheykhs likewise had before him students, reading to him the books. And when the two went in to them, they rose to them and treated them with honour; and the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh accosted them and made a sign to those four sheykhs that they should dismiss the other persons who were present.

So they dismissed them, and the four sheykhs arose and seated themselves before the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh, and asked him respecting the case of Hasan; whereupon the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh made a sign to Hasan, and said to him, Tell the company thy story and all that hath happened to thee from the first of the case to the last. And Hasan wept violently, and related to them his story; and when he had finished it all the sheykhs cried out and said, Is this he whom the Magian caused to ascend to the top of the Mountain of the Clouds by means of the birds,⁴² he being in the skin of the camel? So Hasan answered them, Yes. And they accosted the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh and said to him, O our sheykh, Bahrám practiced a stratagem to effect his ascent to the top of the mountain, and how did he descend, and what wonders did he see upon the mountain? The sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh therefore said, O Hasan, tell them how thou descendedst, and acquaint them with the wonders that thou sawest. Accordingly he repeated to them the account of the events that had happened to him from beginning to end, and told them how he got the Magian into his power and slew him, and how his wife had acted perfidiously to him and taken his children and flown away, and of all the horrors and difficulties that he had suffered. And the persons present wondered at the things that had happened to him.

They then accosted the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh and said to him, O sheykh of the sheykhs, by Allah, this young man is a pitiable person; and perhaps thou wilt assist him to deliver his wife and his children. The sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh replied, O my brothers, verily this is a great and perilous affair, and I have not seen any one hate life except this young man. Ye know that the Islands of Wák-Wák are difficult of access: no one ever arrived at them without exposing himself to peril; and ye know the strength of their inhabitants, and their guards. I have sworn that I will not tread their country, nor oppose myself to them in aught; and how can this person gain access to the daughter of the supreme King, and who can convey him to her, or assist him to attain this object? — Upon this they said, O sheykh of the sheykhs, verily desire hath almost consumed this man, and he hath exposed himself to peril, and brought to thee the letter of thy brother, the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos: therefore it is incumbent on thee to assist him. Then Hasan arose and kissed the foot of Abu-r-Ruweysh, and, lifting up his skirt, put it on his head, and wept, and said to him, I conjure thee by Allah that thou unite me with my children and my wife though the doing so occasion the loss of my life and soul! And the persons present wept at his weeping, and said to the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh, Acquire the recompense that will be granted for this poor man, and act kindly with him for the sake of thy brother the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos. So he replied, Verily this young man is a pitiable person, and he knoweth not what he is undertaking; but we will assist him as far as possible.

Hasan therefore rejoiced when he heard his words, and kissed his hands. He kissed also the hands of the other persons who were present, one after another, and begged their aid. And thereupon Abu-r-Ruweysh took a paper and an inkhorn, and wrote a letter, and sealed it, and gave it to Hasan. He likewise gave him a small bag of leather, containing incense and instruments for striking fire, consisting of a steel and other things; and said to him, Take care of this bag; and when thou fallest into a difficulty, burn a little of the incense that it containeth, and mention me; and I will be present with thee, and deliver thee from the difficulty. Then he ordered one of those who were present to summon to him an 'Efreet of the Flying Jinn immediately; and he came; and the sheykh said to him, What is thy name? He answered, Thy slave is Dahnash the son of Faktash. And Abu-r-Ruweysh said to him, Draw near to me. So he drew near to him; and the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh put his mouth to the ear of the 'Efreet, and said to him some words; whereat the 'Efreet shook his head. The sheykh then said to Hasan, O my son, arise, mount upon the shoulders of this 'Efreet, Dahnash the Flyer; but when he hath taken thee up to heaven, and thou hearest the praises of the Angels in the sky, utter not thou any words of praise; for if thou do, thou wilt perish, and so will he. And Hasan replied, I will never speak. Then the sheykh said to him, O Hasan, when he hath gone with thee, he will put thee down on the next day, a little before daybreak, upon a white, clean land, like camphor; and when he hath put thee there, walk on ten days by thyself, until thou arrivest at the gate of the city. On thine arrival at it, enter, and ask for its King; and when thou hast an interview with him, salute him, and kiss his hand, and give him this letter; and whatsoever he directeth thee to do, understand it. — So Hasan replied, I hear and obey. He arose with the 'Efreet, and the sheykhs arose and prayed for him, and gave the 'Efreet a charge respecting him.

Now when the 'Efreet had taken him upon his shoulders, he rose with him to the clouds of heaven, and proceeded with him a day and a night, until he heard the praises of the Angels in heaven; and when the dawn came, he put him down upon a land white like camphor, and left him and departed. So when Hasan saw that he was upon the earth, and that no one was with him, he went on night and day for the space of ten days, until he arrived at the gate of the city: whereupon he entered it, and inquired for the King. They therefore guided him to him, and said that his name was the King Hasoon, King of the Land of Camphor, and that he had, of soldiers and troops, what would fill the earth in its length and breadth. He asked permission to go in to him, and permission was given him; and when he went in to him, he found him to be a magnificent King; and he kissed the ground before him. So the King said to him, What is thine affair? And Hasan kissed the letter, and handed it to him; and he took it and read it. Then he shook his head a while; after which he said to one of the chief officers, Take this young man, and lodge him in the mansion of entertainment.

Accordingly he took him and proceeded with him, until he had lodged him there, and he remained in it for a period of three days, eating and drinking, having no one with him but the eunuch who attended him; and that eunuch conversed with him and cheered him, and asked him respecting his story, and how he had come to this country; wherefore he acquainted him with all that had happened to him, and all his state. After that, on the fourth day, the young man took him and brought him before the King; and he said to him, O Hasan, thou hast come unto me, desiring to enter the Islands of Wák-Wák, as the sheykh of the sheykhs hath mentioned to us. O my son, I will send thee during these days; but in thy way are many dangerous places, and thirsty deserts abounding with fearful spots. Be patient, however, and nought but good will happen. I must employ a stratagem, and cause thee to attain thy wish, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! Know, O my son, that here are soldiers of Ed-Deylem⁴³ desiring to enter the Islands of Wák-Wák, fitted out with arms and horses and accoutrements, and they have not been able to enter. But, O my son, for the sake of the sheykh of the sheykhs, Abu-r-Ruweysh the son of the daughter of the accursed Iblees, I cannot send thee back to him without thy having accomplished thine affair. Soon there will come to us ships from the Islands of Wák-Wák: there remaineth not before their arrival more than a short time; and when one of them hath come, I will embark thee in it, and will charge the sailors respecting thee, that they may take care of thee and convey thee to the Islands of Wák-Wák. Whosoever asketh thee respecting thy condition and thy story, answer him, I am a relation of the King Hasoon, lord of the Land of Camphor. And when the vessel mooreth at the Islands of Wák-Wák, and the master saith to thee, Land — do thou land. Thou wilt see many settees in all the quarters of the shore; and do thou choose for thyself one of them, and sit beneath it, and move not. And when the night becometh dark, and thou seest that the army of women hath surrounded the merchandise, stretch forth thy hand and lay hold upon the owner of this settee beneath which thou hast placed thyself, and beg her protection; and know, O my son, that if she protect thee, thou wilt accomplish thine affair, and wilt gain access to thy wife and thy children. But if she protect thee not, mourn for thyself, and despair of life, and be sure of thy destruction. Know, O my son, that thou art exposing thyself to peril; and I cannot do for thee aught but this. And peace be on thee! Know also, that if aid had not been granted thee by the Lord of Heaven, thou hadst not gained access hither.

When Hasan heard these words of the King Hasoon, he wept until he fainted; and on his recovering, he recited these two verses: —

A decreed term is my certain lot; and when its days have ended, I die.
If the lions contended with me in their forests, I should vanquish them if aught of my term remained.

And after he had ended his verses, he kissed the ground before the King, and said to him, O great King, how many days remain to the time when the ships will come? He answered, The period of a month; and they will remain here for the sale of their cargoes a period of two months: then they will return to their country: so hope not to make thy voyage in the ship save after three whole months. The King then commanded Hasan to return to the mansion of entertainment, and gave orders to carry to him all that he required, of food and drink and apparel, such as was fit for Kings. He remained in the mansion of entertainment a month; and after the month, the ships came. The King and the merchants therefore went forth, and he took Hasan with him to the ships. And he saw a ship in which were many people, like the pebbles: none knew their number but He who created them. That ship was in the midst of the sea, and had small boats transporting the goods that it contained to the shore. Hasan stayed with them until the crew had removed the goods from it to the shore, and sold and bought, and there remained not to the time of departure more than three days; whereupon the King summoned Hasan before him, prepared for him what he required, and conferred upon him great favours.

Then, after that, he called for the master of that ship, and said to him, Take this young man with thee in the ship, and acquaint no one with him; convey him to the Islands of Wák-Wák, and leave him there, and bring him not back. And the master replied, I hear and obey. The King then charged Hasan, and said to him, Acquaint not any one of the persons with thee in the ship with aught of thy case, nor let any one know thy story; for if thou do, thou wilt perish. And he replied, I hear and obey. And he bade him farewell, after he had offered up prayers in his favour for length of life, and victory over all the enviers and enemies; and the King thanked him for that, and prayed for his safety and for the accomplishment of his affair. He then committed him to the master, who took him and put him into a chest, and embarked him in a boat; and he took him not forth in the ship but when the people were occupied in removing the goods.

After that, the ships departed, and they ceased not to pursue their course for the space of ten days; and on the eleventh day, they reached the shore. The master thereupon landed him from the ship; and when he went up on the shore, he saw there settees, the number of which none knew but God. So he walked on until he came to a settee of which there was not the like, and he hid himself beneath it. And when the night approached, there came a numerous crowd of women, like scattered locusts, advancing on foot, with their swords drawn in their hands; but they were enveloped in coats of mail; and on their seeing the goods, they busied themselves with them. Then, after that, they sat to take rest, and one of them seated herself upon the settee beneath which was Hasan. He therefore laid hold of the edge of her skirt, put it upon his head, and, throwing himself upon her, began to kiss her hands and her feet, weeping. So she said to him, O thou, arise and stand up before any one see thee and slay thee. And thereupon he came forth from beneath the settee [where he had hidden himself again], and rose upon his feet, kissed her hands, and said to her, O my mistress, I throw myself upon thy protection! Then he wept again, and said to her, Have mercy upon him who is parted from his family and his wife and his children, and hath hastened to effect his reunion with them, and exposed his life and soul to peril! Have mercy upon me, and be sure that thou wilt be recompensed for that with Paradise. Or, if thou wilt not receive me, I conjure thee by Allah, the Great, the Excellent Protector, that thou conceal my case!

And the merchants fixed their eyes upon him, while he spoke to her; and when she heard his words, and saw his humiliation, she had compassion upon him, her heart was moved with pity for him, and she knew that he had not exposed himself to peril and come to this place save for a great affair. So thereupon she said to Hasan, O my son, be of good heart and cheerful eye, comfort thy heart and thy soul, and return to thy place, and hide thyself beneath the settee as thou wast at first until the next night, and God will do what He desireth. Then she bade him farewell, and Hasan entered beneath the settee as before. The army passed the night, having lighted candles composed with an admixture of aloes-wood and crude ambergris, until the morning. And when daylight came, the ships returned to the shore, and the merchants occupied themselves with conveying the goods and effects till night approached, while Hasan remained hidden beneath the settee, with weeping eye and mourning heart, not knowing what was secretly decreed to happen unto him.

Now while he was in this state, lo, the female merchant whose protection he had begged approached him, and handed to him a coat of mail and a sword and a gilt girdle and a lance; after which she departed from him, fearing the troops. So when he saw that, he knew that the female merchant had not brought him these accoutrements save in order that he should put them on; wherefore he arose and put on the coat of mail, put the girdle round his waist, hung on the sword beneath his arm-pit, took the lance in his hand, and seated himself upon that settee. His tongue neglected not to repeat the praises of God (whose name be exalted!), and he begged his protection; and while he sat, lo, the cressets and the lanterns and the candles approached, and the army of women. Hasan therefore arose and mixed among the troops, having become like one of them; and at the approach of daybreak, the troops proceeded, and Hasan with them, until they came to their tents, when each of them entered her tent. Hasan also entered the tent of one of them, and, lo, it was the tent of his companion, whose protection he had begged.

And when she entered her tent, she threw down her arms, and pulled off the coat of mail and the veil; and Hasan, having thrown down his arms, looked at his companion, and found her to be blue-eyed with a large nose; she was a calamity among calamities, of the most hideous form, with a face marked with smallpox, and hairless eyebrows, and broken teeth, and puffed cheeks, and gray hair, and a mouth running with saliva: her hair was falling off, and she was like the speckled, black and white, serpent. Now when she looked at Hasan, she wondered, and said How could this person gain access to this country and in which of the ships came he and how did he arrive safely? And she proceeded to ask him respecting his case, and wondered at his arrival; and upon this, Hasan fell upon her feet, rubbing his face upon them, and wept until he fainted: and when he recovered, he recited these verses: —

When will time grant us our meeting, and when shall we be reunited after our separation,
And when shall I enjoy the object of my choice, and see reproach ended, and love remain?

If the Nile were to flow as copiously as my tears, it would leave in the world no land unwatered:

It would overflow the Hejáz and Egypt, and Syria likewise with El-'Erák.

This is caused by thine estrangement, O my beloved! Be kind to me, and promise a meeting.

And after he had ended his verses, he took the skirt of the old woman, and put it upon his head, and proceeded to weep and to beg her protection. So when the old woman saw his ardour and affliction and pain and distress, her heart was moved with sympathy for him, and she granted him protection and said to him, Fear not at all. Then she asked him respecting his case, and he related to her all that had happened to him from beginning to end; and the old woman wondered at his tale, and said to him, Comfort thy heart and comfort thy soul. There remaineth nothing for thee to fear. Thou hast attained thy desire and the accomplishment of thine affair, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! —Therefore Hasan rejoiced at that exceedingly.

The old woman then sent to the leaders of the army, commanding them to come before her. This was on the last day of the month. And when they presented themselves before her, she said to them, Go forth, and proclaim among all the troops that they shall go forth to-morrow, in the morning, and that none of them shall remain behind; and if any one remain behind, that person's life shall be taken. And they replied, We hear and obey. They went forth, and proclaimed among all the troops that they should march on the morrow, in the morning; after which they returned, and acquainted her therewith. So Hasan knew that she was the chief of the troops, and the person of authority among them, and their leader. Then Hasan took not off the arms from his body that day. The name of that old woman with whom he had placed himself was Shawáhee, and she was surnamed Umm-ed-Dawáhee.⁴⁴ And the old woman had not made an end of her commanding and forbidding until the daybreak came, when all troops went forth from their places; but the old woman went not forth with them.

And when the army had gone, and the places were devoid of their presence, Shawáhee said to Hasan, Draw near to me, O my son. So he drew near to her, and stood before her; and she accosted him and said to him, What is the cause of thine exposure of thyself to peril, and thine entering this country, and how was it that thy soul consented to its own destruction?

Acquaint me with the truth of thy whole affair, and conceal not from me aught of it, nor fear thou; for thou hast become one to whom I have plighted my faith, and I have granted thee protection, and had compassion upon thee, and pitied thy state. If thou inform me truly, I will aid thee to accomplish thine affair, even if the consequence be the loss of lives, and the destruction of the sheykhs. Now that thou hast come unto me, no harm shall befall thee, nor will I suffer any one, of all who are in the Islands of Wák-Wák, to do thee any injury. — He therefore repeated to her his story from first to last, telling her of the affair of his wife, and the birds, and how he caught her from among the ten, and how he married her, and then resided with her until he was blest with two sons by her, and how she took her children and flew away when she knew the means of obtaining the dress of feathers; and he concealed not aught of his story, from the commencement to that day.

So when the old woman heard his words, she shook her head, and said to him, Extolled be the perfection of God who preserved thee and brought thee hither and caused thee to light on me! Hadst thou lighted on any except me, thy life had been lost, and thine affair had not been accomplished. But the honesty of thine intention, and thy love and the excess of thy desire for thy wife and thy children, were the means of enabling thee to attain the object of thy search. Were it not that thou lovest her, and art distracted by thy passion for her, thou hadst not thus exposed thyself to peril; and praise be to God for thy safety! It is therefore incumbent on us to accomplish for thee thine affair, and to aid thee to attain the object of thy desire, that thou mayest obtain what thou seekest soon, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! But know, O my son, that thy wife is in the seventh island of the Islands of Wák-Wák, and the distance between us and it is seven months' journey, night and day. For we proceed hence until we arrive at a land called the Land of the Birds; and by reason of the vehemence of the cries of the birds, and the flapping of their wings, one of them heareth not what another uttereth. Then we proceed over that land for a period of eleven days, night and day; after which we pass forth from it to a land called the Land of the Wild Beasts; and by reason of the vehemence of the cries of the beasts of prey and the hyenas and other wild beasts, and the howling of the wolves and the roaring of the lions, we shall hear nothing else. We journey over that land for the space of twenty days, and then pass forth from it to a land called the Land of the Jinn, where, by reason of the vehemence of the cries of the Jánn, and the rising of the flames and the flying about of the sparks and the smoke from their mouths, and the harsh sounds from their throats, and their insolence, they will obstruct the way before us, and our ears will be deafened, and our eyes will be covered with darkness, so that we shall neither hear nor see, nor will any of us be able to look behind him; for by doing so he would perish. In that place, the horseman will put his head upon the pommel of his saddle, and not raise it for a period of three days. After that, there will be before us a vast mountain and a running river, which extend to the Islands of Wák-Wák. Know also, O my son, that all this army consisteth of damsels, virgins; and the sovereign who ruleth over us is a woman of the Seven Islands of Wák-Wák. The extent of these seven islands is a whole year's journey to the rider who travellet with diligence.⁴⁵ On the bank of this river [that I have mentioned] is another mountain, called the Mountain of Wák-Wák; and this name is the proper appellation of a tree whose branches resemble the heads of the sons of Adam; and when the sun riseth upon it, those heads all cry out, saying in their cry, Wák! Wák! Extolled be the perfection of the King, the Excellent Creator! — So when we hear their cry, we know that the sun hath risen. In like manner also when the sun setteth, those heads cry out and say in their cry the same words, and we know thereupon that the sun hath set. No man can reside with us, nor gain access to us, nor tread our land; and between us and the residence of the Queen who ruleth over this land is a journey of a month, from this shore. Also, all the subjects upon that shore are under the authority of that Queen; and under her authority likewise are the tribes of the Jánn, Márids and Devils, and under her authority are enchanters, the number of whom none knoweth but He who created them. Now if thou fear, I will send with thee one who will convey thee to the coast, and I will bring one who will transport thee with him in a vessel and convey thee to thy country. But if it be agreeable to thy heart to remain with us, I will not prevent thee: thou shalt be with me as though thou wert in mine eye, until thou shalt accomplish thine affair, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted!

Upon this he said to her, O my mistress, I will not quit thee until I meet with my wife, or my life shall be lost. And she replied, This will be an easy affair: so comfort thy heart, and thou shalt attain thy desire if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! I must acquaint the Queen with thee, that she may aid thee to attain thy wish. — Hasan therefore prayed for her, and kissed her hands and her head, and thanked her for that which she had done, and for her exceeding kindness. He proceeded with her, meditating upon what might be the result of his case, and upon the horrors of his estrangement; and he began to weep and wail, and recited these verses: —

From the place of the beloved a zephyr hath blown, and thou seest me, from the excess of my ecstasy, distracted.

The night of union is like a brilliant morning, and the day of separation like a black night.
Taking leave of the beloved is severely distressing, and the separation of the companion is a heavy calamity.

I will not complain of her cruelty save to her. I have not among mankind a friendly relation.

My becoming indifferent to you is impossible; for the despised censurer doth not make my heart indifferent.

O unparalleled in loveliness! my love is unparalleled. O thou whose equal existeth not!
my heart existeth not.

Whosoever pretended that he loveth you, and dreadeth reprehension, he is reprehensible.

The old woman then gave orders to beat the drum for their departure, and the army proceeded, Hasan proceeding also, in company with the old woman. Being drowned in the sea of solitudes, he was oppressed in mind, and recited verses, while the old woman exhorted him to be patient, and consoled him; but he recovered not, nor attended to that which she proposed.

to him. They ceased not to journey on until they arrived at the first of the seven islands, which was the Island of the Birds; and when they entered it, Hasan imagined that the world was overturned, in consequence of the vehemence of the cries. His head ached and his mind was bewildered, his eyes were blinded and his ears were stopped, and he feared violently and made sure of death, saying within himself, If this is the Land of the Birds, how will be the Land of the Wild Beasts? So when the old woman named Shawáhee saw him in this state, she laughed at him, and said to him, O my son, if this is thy state in the first island, how will it be with thee when thou comest to the remaining islands? He therefore supplicated God, and humbled himself to Him, and begged of Him that He would aid him to bear up against the affliction with which He had visited him, and that He would cause him to attain his desires.

They continued their journey until they had traversed the Land of the Birds, and passed forth from it, and entered the Land of the Jánn; and when Hasan beheld it, he feared, and repented of his having entered it with them. Then he begged aid of God (whose name be exalted!), and proceeded with them. And they escaped from the Land of the Jánn, and arrived at the river, and, alighting beneath a vast, lofty mountain, they pitched their tents upon the bank of the river. The old woman placed for Hasan a couch of alabaster, set with fine pearls, and jewels, and bars of red gold, by the side of the river. So he seated himself upon it; and the troops advanced, and she displayed them to him. After that they pitched their tents around him, and rested a while. Then they ate and drank and slept in security; for they had arrived at their country.

Now Hasan had put over his face a lithám, so that nought of him appeared save his eyes. And, lo, a company of the damsels walked near to the tent of Hasan, and, having pulled off their outer garments, descended into the river. So Hasan kept looking at them while they washed, and they proceeded to play and divert themselves, not knowing that he was looking at them; for they imagined that he was of the daughters of the Kings.⁴⁶ Thus the whole army assembled before Hasan; for the old woman gave orders to proclaim among all the troops that they should assemble before his tent, and display themselves, and descend into the river, thinking that perhaps his wife might be among them, and he would know her. She proceeded to ask him respecting them, company after company; and he replied, She is not among these, O my mistress. So the old woman said, Describe her to me, and acquaint me with all her characteristics, that she may be in my mind; for I know every damsel in the Islands of Wák-Wák, as I am the leader of the army of damsels, and their commander; and if thou describe her to me, I shall know her, and will contrive means for thy taking her. Accordingly, he described her to her.

And thereupon the old woman hung down her head towards the ground for some time; after which she raised her head towards Hasan, and said, Extolled be the perfection of God, the Great in dignity! Verily I am afflicted in thee, O Hasan; and I would that I had not known thee! — For the woman whom thou hast described to me, she is thy wife indeed: I have known her by her characteristics, and she is the daughter of the supreme King, his eldest ⁴⁷ daughter, who ruleth over all the Islands of Wák-Wák. Therefore open thine eyes, and consider thine affair; and if thou be asleep, awake; for it is impossible for thee ever to gain access to her; and if thou gainedst access to her, thou couldst not get possession of her; since between thee and her is like as is between heaven and earth. Return therefore, O my son, soon, and cast not thyself into destruction, and me with thee; for I imagine that thou hast no lot in her. Return to the place whence thou hast come, lest our lives be lost. — And she feared for herself and for him.

When Hasan, therefore, heard the words of the old woman, he wept violently, so that he fainted; and the old woman ceased not to sprinkle water upon his face until he recovered from his fit. He continued to weep so that he wetted his clothes with his tears, by reason of the excessive anxiety and grief that had come upon him in consequence of the words of the old woman, and he despaired of life. Then he said to the old woman, O my mistress, and how can I return after I have got hither? I did not imagine in my mind that thou wast unable to accomplish my desire, especially because thou art the leader of the army of damsels, and their commander. — To this she replied, I conjure thee, by Allah, O my son, that thou choose for thyself a damsel from among these damsels, and I will give her to thee instead of thy wife, lest thou fall into the hand of the Kings, and I shall have no means of releasing thee. By Allah, I conjure thee that thou hear my words, and choose for thyself one of these damsels, instead of that damsel, and return to thy country soon in safety, and make me not to drink thine anguish [by witnessing thy death]. By Allah, thou hast cast thyself into a severe calamity and great peril, from which no one can deliver thee. — So thereupon Hasan hung down his head and wept violently, and he recited some verses, commencing thus: —

I said to my censurers, Do not censure me: for nought but tears were mine eyelids created.
The tears of mine eye have overflowed and inundated my cheek, and my beloved hath treated me with cruelty.

And when he had ended his verses, he wept again until he fainted, and the old woman ceased not to sprinkle water upon his face till he recovered from his fit; when she addressed him and said, O my master, return to thy country: for if I go with thee to the city, thy life and mine will be lost; as the Queen, when she knoweth thereof, will blame me for coming with thee into her country and her islands, to which no one of the sons of Adam cometh, and she will slay me because of my having brought thee with me and given thee a sight of these virgins whom thou hast seen in the river, although no male hath touched them, nor a husband approached them. So Hasan swore that he had never looked at them with an evil glance. But she rejoined, O my son, return to thy country, and I will give thee wealth and treasures and rarities on account of which thou shalt become indifferent to all women. Hear then my words, and return soon, and expose not thyself to peril; for I have given thee good advice. — When Hasan, however, heard her words, he wept, and rubbed his cheeks upon her feet, and said, O my mistress and my lady, and delight of mine eye, how can I return after I have come to this place without seeing her whom I desire, and have approached the abode of the beloved, and hoped to meet her soon, and when perhaps I may have the good fortune to be reunited with her? Then he recited some verses; and when he had ended them, the old woman pitied him and had compassion on him, and, addressing him kindly, she comforted his heart, and said to him, Let thy soul be happy and thine eye be cheerful, and let thy mind be free from anxiety. By Allah, I will expose my soul to peril with thee until thou shalt attain thy desire or my death shall overtake me!

So the heart of Hasan was comforted, his bosom became dilated, and he sat conversing with the old woman until the close of the day; and when the night approached, all the damsels became dispersed; some of them entered their palaces in the city, and some passed the nights in the tents. The old woman then took Hasan with her, and conducted him into the city, and she appropriated to him a place for himself alone, lest any one should become acquainted with him and inform the Queen of him, and she should slay him and the bringer of him. She served him herself, and inspired him with fear of the authority of the supreme King, the father of his wife; and he wept before her, and said, O my mistress, I choose death for myself, and hate the world, if I be not reunited with my wife and my children: so I will expose my life to peril, and either I shall attain my desire, or else I shall die. And the old woman proceeded to meditate upon the mode of effecting his union and interview with his wife, and what stratagem should be employed in the case of this poor man, who had cast his soul into destruction, and would not be restrained from pursuing the object of his desire by fear nor by any thing else. He had become indifferent to himself; and the author of the proverb saith, The enamoured heareth not the words of one who is free from love. The damsel above mentioned was Queen of the island in which they then were, and her name was Noor-el-Hudà.⁴⁸ This Queen had six⁴⁹ sisters, virgins, residing with their father, the supreme King, who was ruler of the seven islands and the districts of Wák-Wák; and the seat of government of that King was in the greatest of the cities of that country. His eldest daughter, Noor-el-Hudà, was ruler over that city in which Hasan was, and over all its districts.

Now the old woman, when she saw Hasan burning with desire to meet with his wife and his children, arose and repaired to the palace of the Queen Noor-el-Hudà, and went in to her, and kissed the ground before her. The old woman had a claim upon her for favour, because she had reared all the daughters of the King, and she had authority over them all, and was held in honour by them, and was dear unto the King. So when she went in to the Queen Noor-el-Hudà, the Queen rose to her and embraced her, seated her by her side, and asked her respecting her journey. She therefore answered her, By Allah, O my mistress, it was a blessed journey, and I have brought for thee with me a present which I will place before thee. Then she said to her, O my daughter, O Queen of the age and time, I have brought with me a wonderful thing, and I desire to shew it to thee, in order that thou mayest aid me to accomplish what it requireth. — And what is it? said the Queen. So she acquainted her with the story of Hasan from its beginning to its end. She trembled like the reed in the day of the stormy wind, until she fell down before the daughter of the King, and said to her, O my mistress, a person implored my protection upon the coast, and he was hidden beneath the settee, and I granted him protection, and brought him with me among the army of damsels, he being armed that no one might know him, and I conducted him into the city. Then she said to her, And I inspired him with fear of thy authority, and acquainted him with thy valour and thy power; but as often as I threatened him, he wept, and recited verses, and he said to me, I must regain my wife and my children, or I will die, and I will not return to my country without them. He hath exposed himself to peril, and come to the Islands of Wák-Wák; and I have not seen in my life a human being more strong of heart than he, nor any of greater valour; but love hath gained the utmost ascendancy over him.

When the Queen, however, heard her words, and understood the case of Hasan, she was violently enraged, and hung down her head for a while towards the ground. Then she raised her head, and, looking at the old woman, said to her, O ill-omened old woman, hath thy wickedness occasioned thee to convey males, and conduct them to the Islands of Wák-Wák, and bring them in unto me, without fearing my authority? By the head of the King, were it not for the claim thou hast upon me on account of thy having reared me, I would slay thee and him this instant in the most abominable manner, that the travellers might be admonished by thine example, O accursed woman, lest any one else should do the like of this egregious deed which thou hast done, and which none was able to do before! But go forth and bring him this instant, that I may see him.

The old woman therefore went forth from before her, confounded, not knowing whither to go, and saying, All this calamity hath God sent upon me from this Queen by means of Hasan! She proceeded until she went in to Hasan, when she said to him, Arise: answer the summons of the Queen, O thou whose last day hath drawn near! So he arose with her, his tongue ceasing not to utter the name of God (extolled be it!), saying, O Allah, act graciously with me in thine appointment, and deliver me from the calamity which Thou hast sent upon me! — She went on with him until she stationed him before the Queen Noor-el-Hudà, and the old woman directed him on the way as to what he should say with her. And when he presented himself before Noor-el-Hudà, he saw her with a lithám over her face; and he kissed the ground before her, saluted her, and recited these two verses: —

 And may our Lord increase thy glory and grandeur, and the Mighty aid thee against thine enemies!

Then, when he had ended his verses, the Queen commanded the old woman to talk with him before her, that she might hear his answers. The old woman therefore said, The Queen returneth thy salutation, and saith to thee, What is thy name, and from what country art thou, and what are the names of thy wife and thy children on account of whom thou hast come, and what is the name of thy country? So he answered her (and he had fortified his heart, and destiny aided him), O Queen of the age and period, and peerless one of the time, as to me, my name is Hasan, the very mournful, and my city is El-Basrah; but as to my wife, I know not her name: as to my children, however, one is named Násir, and the other is named Mansoor. And when the Queen heard his words, she said, And whence took she her children? He answered her, O Queen, from the city of Baghdád, from the palace of the Khaleefeh. She then said to him, And did she say to you aught at the time of her flying away? He answered, She said to my mother, When thy son cometh, and the days of separation have become tedious to him, and he desireth nearness and meeting, and the winds of longing desire agitate him, let him come to me in the Islands of Wák-Wák. — And thereupon the Queen Noor-el-Hudà shook her head. Then she said to him, If she desired thee not, she had not said to thy mother these words; and if she did not desire thee and long for thine approach, she had not acquainted thee with the place of her abode, nor summoned thee to her country. And Hasan said, O mistress of Kings, and ruler over every King and pauper, I have acquainted thee with what hath happened, and I have not concealed of it aught. I implore protection of God and of thee, begging thee not to oppress me. Have compassion upon me, and gain the recompense and reward that will be given for me, and aid me to accomplish my reunion with my wife and my children; dispel my sorrow and cheer mine eye by the restoration of my children, and help me with a sight of them. — Then he wept and yearned and lamented, and recited some verses.

Upon this, the Queen Noor-el-Hudà hung down her head towards the ground and shook it for a long time; after which, she raised it and said to him, I have compassionated thee and pitied thee, and I have determined that I will display to thee every damsel in the city and in the districts of my island; and if thou know thy wife, I will deliver her to thee; but if thou know her not, I will slay thee, and crucify thee upon the door of the house of the old woman. And Hasan replied, I accept this proposal from thee, O Queen of the age. He then recited these verses: —

You have roused my desire, and remained at ease: and made my wounded eyelid to be wakeful, and slept:

And you made a vow to me that you would not be backward; but when you had en-chained me, you acted perfidiously.

I loved you when a child, not knowing what was love. Then slay me not; for I complain of oppression.

Fear you not God, in slaying a lover who watcheth the stars while others are asleep? By Allah, O my people, if I die, write ye on my tombstone, This was a slave of love. Perhaps a man like me, whom love hath afflicted, when he seeth my grave, may give me his salutation.

And when he had ended his verses, he said, I consent to the condition which thou hast imposed, and there is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! — The Queen Noor-el-Hudà then gave orders that no damsel in the city should remain without coming up to the palace and passing before him, and she ordered the old woman Shawáhee herself to go down into the city and to bring every damsel therein to the Queen in her palace. The Queen proceeded to introduce the damsels to Hasan, a hundred after a hundred, until there remained not in the city a damsel whom she did not display to him. But he saw not his wife among them. The Queen asked him and said to him, Hast thou seen her among these? And he answered her, By thy life, O Queen, she is not among them. And thereupon the rage of the Queen became violent against him, and she said to the old woman, Enter, and bring out every one who is in the palace and display them to him. But when she displayed to him every one in the palace, he saw not his wife among them; and he said to the Queen, By thy head, O Queen, she is not among them. So she was enraged, and she cried out to those who were around her, saying, Take him and drag him upon his face on the ground, and smite off his head, lest any one after him expose himself to peril and become acquainted with our condition, and come unto us in our country, and tread our land and our islands.

Accordingly they dragged him along upon his face, threw his skirt over him, bound his eyes, and stood with the swords over his head, waiting for permission. And upon this, Shawáhee advanced to the Queen, kissed the ground before her, and, taking hold of her skirt, raised it over her head, and said to her, O Queen, by the claim that I have upon thee for rearing thee, hasten not to punish him, especially since thou knowest that this poor man is a stranger, who hath exposed himself to peril, and endureth events that none hath endured before him, and God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!) hath saved him from death on account of the predestined length of his life. He had heard of thy justice, and entered thy country and thine asylum; therefore, if thou slay him, the news will be spread abroad by the travellers, respecting thee, that thou hatest the strangers, and slayest them. He is at all events in thy power, and the victim of thy sword if his wife appear not in thy country; and at whatever time thou shalt desire his presence, I shall be able to bring him back unto thee. Moreover, I granted him not protection save with the desire of thy generosity, on account of the claim that I have upon thee for having reared thee: so I pledged myself to him that thou wouldst enable him to attain the object of his search, because I knew thy justice and thy clemency. Had I not known this of thee, I had not brought him into thy country, and said within myself, The Queen will divert herself by seeing him, and by hearing the verses and the charming and eloquent words which he will utter, and which will be like strung pearls. This man hath entered our country and eaten our food: so it is expedient that we give him his due, especially since I promised him an interview with thee; and thou knowest that separation is hard to endure, and knowest that separation is slaughter, especially separation from one's children. Now there remaineth not any one of the women for us to display except thee: therefore shew him thy face.

At this the Queen smiled, and she said, How can he be my husband, and have had children by me, that I should show him my face? Then she gave orders to bring him; wherefore they brought him in to her, and stationed him before her, and she uncovered her face; and when Hasan beheld it, he uttered a great cry, and fell down in a fit. So the old woman ceased not to soothe him until he recovered; and when he recovered from his fit, he recited these verses: —

O zephyr that hast blown from the land of El-'Erāk upon the tracts of the country of Wāk-Wāk!

Convey to the beloved the information, for me, that I die of the bitter taste of love. O object of my love, be kind and propitious! My heart is dissolved by the afflictions of separation.

And when he had ended his verses, he arose and looked at the Queen, and again uttered a great cry, whereat the palace almost fell upon those who were in it. Then a second time he fell down in a fit, and the old woman, as before, ceased not to soothe him until he recovered, when she asked him respecting his state, and he replied, Verily this Queen is either my wife, or she is the most like, of all persons, to my wife. So the Queen said to the old woman, Wo to thee, O nurse! Verily this stranger is mad, or disordered in mind; for he looketh in my face and stareth. — The old woman replied, O Queen, this man is excusable; therefore blame him not, since it is said in the proverb, For the sick of love there is no remedy, and he and the mad are alike. — Then Hasan wept violently, and recited these two verses: —

I behold their footsteps, and melt with desire, pouring forth my tears in the places of their abode,

And begging of Him who hath afflicted me by their separation that He will graciously vouchsafe me their return.

— after which he said to the Queen, By Allah, thou art not my wife; but, of all persons, thou art the most like to her. And the Queen Noor-el-Hudā laughed until she fell backwards and turned upon her side. She then said, O my friend, act leisurely, and observe me distinctly, and answer me respecting that of which I shall ask thee, and dismiss from thy mind insanity and perplexity and confusion; for relief hath approached thee. So Hasan replied, O mistress of Kings, and refuge of every rich person and pauper, when I beheld thee, I became mad, seeing thee to be either my wife, or, of all persons, the most like to my wife; and now ask me concerning what thou wilt. And she said, What is there in thy wife that resembleth me? He answered, O my mistress, all that thou hast, of beauty and loveliness, and elegance and amorous manner (as the justness of thy shape, and the sweetness of thy speech, and the redness of thy cheeks, and other things), resembleth her. Then the Queen looked towards Shawáhee Umm-ed-Dawáhee, and said to her, O my mother, take him back to his place where he was with thee, and do thou thyself serve him until I investigate his case; and if this man be a person of generosity, so that he retain the feelings of companionship and friendship and affection, it will be incumbent on us to aid him in the accomplishment of his affair, especially since he hath sojourned in our country and eaten our food, and endured the difficulties of travel, and undergone horrors and perils. But when thou hast conveyed him to thy house, give a charge respecting him to thy servants, and return to me speedily; and if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), nought but good shall happen.

So thereupon the old woman went forth, and took Hasan, and, having gone with him to her house, she ordered her female slaves and her servants and other dependants to serve him, commanding them to bring to him all that he required, and not to fail in doing what was proper for him. She then returned to the Queen with speed, and the Queen ordered her to arm herself, and to take with her a thousand brave horsemen. And the old woman Shawáhee obeyed her command. She put on her coats of mail, and summoned the thousand horsemen; and when she stood before the Queen, and informed her that the thousand horsemen were ready, the Queen commanded her to go to the city of the supreme King, her father, and to alight at the abode of his daughter, Menár-es-Senà,⁵⁰ her sister, and to say to her, Clothe thy two sons with the two coats of mail which I have made for them, and send them to their aunt; for she is desirous of seeing them. And she said to her also, I charge thee, O my mother, to conceal the affair of Hasan; and when thou hast received the two children from her, say to her, Thy sister inviteth thee to visit her. Then, when she hath given thee her two children, and come forth with them to visit me, bring thou the two children speedily, and let her come at her leisure. Come thou by a way different from that by which she shall come, and let thy journey be continued night and day, and beware that no one become acquainted with this affair. Then I will swear by all oaths, and if my sister prove to be his wife, and it appear that her children are his children, I will not prevent his taking her, nor her journeying with him and with her children to his country.

And the old woman confided in her words, not knowing what she purposed in her mind; for the wicked woman had purposed in her mind, that if she were not his wife, and if her children did not resemble him, she would slay him. The Queen then said to the old woman, O my mother, if my imagination tell truth, my sister Menár-es-Senà is his wife (But God is all-knowing); for these characteristics are hers, and all the qualities that he hath mentioned, her surpassing loveliness and exceeding beauty, are not found in any one except my sisters; and especially are they found in the youngest. — Then the old woman kissed her hand, and returned to Hasan, and acquainted him with that which the Queen had said; on his hearing which, his reason fled in consequence of his joy, and he arose and advanced to the old woman and kissed her head. But she said to him, O my son, kiss not my head: kiss me on my mouth, and let this kiss be a gratuity for thy safety. Be of good heart and cheerful eye, and let not thy bosom be otherwise than dilated; and dislike not kissing me on my mouth, for I have been the cause of thine interview with her. Comfort thy heart and thy mind, and be not otherwise than with dilated bosom, cheerful eye, and tranquil soul. — She then bade him farewell, and departed.

The old woman equipped herself with her arms, and, taking with her a thousand armed horsemen, repaired to that island in which was the sister of the Queen; and she proceeded until she came to the Queen's sister. Between the city of Noor-el-Hudà and that of her sister was a space of three days' journey. And when Shawáhee arrived at the city, and went up to the Queen's sister, Menár-es-Senà, she saluted her, and gave her the salutation of her sister Noor-el-Hudà, acquainted her with her sister's desire to see her and her children, and informed her that the Queen Noor-el-Hudà reproved her for not visiting her. So the Queen Menár-es-Senà replied, Verily I am indebted to my sister, and I have been deficient in the duty I owe her, in my not visiting her; but I will visit her now. She then gave orders to take forth her tents to the outside of the city, and took with her for her sister a present and rarities suitable to her. And her father the King, looking from the windows of the palace, saw the tents pitched. He therefore asked respecting them; and they answered him, The Queen Menár-es-Senà hath pitched her tents in that route; for she desireth to visit her sister Noor-el-Hudà. And when the King heard thereof, he prepared for her some troops to conduct her to her sister, and took forth from his treasures, of riches, and of food and drink, and of rarities and jewels, what words would fail to describe.

The seven daughters of the King were of one father and one mother, except the youngest: the eldest was named Noor-el-Hudà; the second, Nejm-es-Sabáh; the third, Shems-ed-Dohà; the fourth, Shejeret-ed-Durr; the fifth, Koot-el-Kuloob; the sixth, Sharaf-el-Benát; and the seventh, Menár-es-Senà;⁵¹ and she was the youngest of them, and was the wife of Hasan, and she was their sister by the father's side only. Then the old woman came and kissed the ground before Menár-es-Senà. So Menár-es-Senà said to her, Hast thou any want, O my mother? And she answered her, The Queen Noor-el-Hudà, thy sister, desireth thee to change the apparel of thy two sons, and to clothe them with the two coats of mail which she hath made for them, and to send them with me unto her, and I will take them and go on before with them, and will be the announcer of the glad tidings of thy coming to her. But when Menár-es-Senà heard the words of the old woman, she hung down her head towards the ground, and her complexion had changed; and she ceased not to hang down her head for a long time. Then she shook her head, and raising it towards the old woman, said to her, O my mother, my mind was violently agitated, and my heart throbbled, when thou mentionedst my children; for from the time of their birth none of the Jinn nor any of mankind hath seen their faces, neither female nor male, and I am jealous, for them, of the zephyr when it bloweth in the night.

So the old woman said to her, What are these words, O my mistress? Dost thou fear, on their account, thy sister? Allah preserve thy reason! If thou wouldst disobey the Queen in this thing, thou couldst not disobey; for she would reprove thee. However, O my mistress, thy children are young, and thou art excusable in fearing for them, and the loving is addicted to evil imagination. But, O my daughter, thou knowest my kindness and my love for thee and for thy children, and I reared you before them. I will receive them and take them, and spread for them my cheek as a carpet, and open my heart and put them within it, and I require no charge respecting them in such a case as this. Therefore be of good heart and cheerful eye, and send them to her, and at most I shall be before thee one day or two.—She ceased not to urge her until her temper was softened, and she feared the anger of her sister, and knew not what was concealed from her in the secret purpose of God. So she consented to send them with the old woman, and, having called for them, she bathed them and made them ready, changed their apparel, clad them with the two coats of mail, and delivered them to the old woman.

She therefore took them and proceeded with them like a bird, by a different way from that by which their mother was going, as the Queen Noor-el-Hudà had charged her. She ceased not to prosecute her journey with diligence, fearing for them, until she arrived with them at the city of the Queen Noor-el-Hudà. She crossed the river with them, entered the city, and went with them to the Queen their aunt; and when the Queen saw them, she rejoiced at their arrival, embraced them, and pressed them to her bosom, and seated one upon her right thigh, and the other upon her left thigh. Then she looked towards the old woman, and said to her, Bring now Hasan; for I have given him my protection, and granted him deliverance from my sword, and he hath sought defence in my mansion, and alighted in my abode, after having endured horrors and difficulties, and escaped the causes of death that were attended by increasing anxiety yet to the present time hath not become secure from drinking the cup of death, and from the stopping of his breath. The old woman therefore said to her, If I bring him before thee, wilt thou reunite him and them; and if it appear not that they are his children, wilt thou pardon him, and send him back to his country.

But when the Queen heard her words, she was violently enraged, and said, Wo to thee, O ill-omened old woman! How long shall continue this guile in the affair of this stranger, who hath emboldened himself against us, and removed our veil, and become acquainted with our circumstances? Doth he imagine that he can come to our country, and see our faces, and soil our reputations, and return to his country in safety, and disgrace us in his country and among his people, and that our story shall reach all the Kings in the regions of the earth, and the merchants travel about relating our story in every quarter, and saying, A human being hath entered the Islands of Wák-Wák, and crossed the countries of the enchanters and sorcerers, and trod the Land of the Jánn and the Lands of the Wild Beasts and the Birds, and returned in safety? This shall never be. I swear by the Creator of Heaven, and its Architect, and the Expander of the Earth, and its Spreader, and the Creator of the Creatures, and their Numberer, if they be not his children, I will surely slay him, and I will be the smiter off of his head with mine own hand! — She then cried out at the old woman, who thereupon fell down through fear; and she set upon her the chamberlain and twenty memlooks, and said to them, Go with this old woman, and bring me the young man who is in her house, with speed.

So the old woman went forth, dragged along, with the chamberlain and the memlooks; and her complexion had turned sallow, and the muscles of her side quivered. She proceeded to her abode, and went in to Hasan; and when she went in to him, he rose to her and kissed her hands and saluted her. She, however, saluted not him; but said to him, Arise, and answer the summons of thy Queen. Did I not say to thee, Return to thy country — and did I not forbid thy doing all this? But thou heardest not my words. And did I not say to thee, I will give thee what none is able to procure, and return thou to thy country soon? But thou obeyedst me not, nor heardest my words, but actedst contrary to my advice, and chocest destruction for me and for thyself. Take then what thou hast chosen; for death is near. Arise: answer the summons of this wicked, sinful, oppressive, tyrannical woman. — So Hasan arose, broken-spirited, with mourning heart, fearing, and saying, O God of peace, preserve me! O Allah, act graciously with me in the trial which Thou hast decreed to fall upon me, and protect me, O most merciful of those who shew mercy! And he had despaired of life. He repaired with the twenty memlooks and the chamberlain and the old woman, and they went in to the Queen with Hasan, who found his two sons Násir and Mansoor sitting in her lap, and she was playing with them, and cheering them by conversation. When his eye fell upon them, he knew them, and, uttering a great cry, fell upon the floor in a fit by reason of the violence of his joy at seeing his two children; and when he recovered, he knew his children, and they knew him, and natural affection moved them so that they extricated themselves from the lap of the Queen, and stood by Hasan; and God (to whom he ascribed might and glory!) caused them to utter the exclamation, O our father! Upon this, the old woman and the rest who were present wept in compassion and pity for them, and said, Praise be to God, who hath reunited you to your father! And when Hasan recovered from his fit, he embraced his children. Then he wept until he fainted again; and having recovered from his fit, he recited these verses: —

By your existence, my heart would be unable to endure separation even if union were perdition!

Your phantom saith to me, We shall meet to-morrow. Shall I live, in spite of the enemies, till the morrow?

By your existence, O my mistress, since the day of your separation, the sweets of life have never delighted me!

If God decree my death on account of my love of you, I will die loving you among the greatest of martyrs.²²

Oft doth a gazelle make my heart her pasturage; but her person, like sleep, hath fled from mine eye.

If she deny, in the battle-field of law, the fact of her shedding my blood, on her cheeks it beareth witness.

But when the Queen had certified herself that the little-ones were the children of Hasan, and that her sister, the lady Menár-es-Senà, was his wife, in search of whom he had come, she was enraged against her with a violent rage, not to be exceeded; and she cried out in the face of Hasan, who fainted thereupon; and when he recovered from his fit, he recited these verses: —

You are distant; but to my mind you are the nearest of people: and you are absent; but in my heart you are still present.

By Allah, I have not turned from you to another; but I bear with patience the tyranny of fortune.

Nights pass and end while I still love you, and in my heart is a flame, and a raging fire. I was one who consented not to an hour's estrangement. How then must be my case when months have passed over me?

I am jealous when a zephyr bloweth upon you. Verily I am jealous for the beautiful, soft damsel.

Then, having ended his verses, he fell down again in a fit; and when he recovered, he saw that they had taken him forth, dragged along upon his face. So he rose and walked, stumbling upon his skirts, and not believing in his escape from that which he had suffered from her; and this was grievous to the old woman Shawáhee; but she could not address the Queen on the subject of his case by reason of the violence of her anger. Now when Hasan went forth from the palace, he became perplexed, not knowing whither to go, nor to what place to come, nor whither to repair. The world, with its amplitude, became strait unto him, and he found not any one to converse with him and cheer him by his company, nor any one to comfort him, nor any one of whom to ask advice, nor any one to whom to resort and to whom to apply for refuge. He therefore made sure of destruction; for he was unable to travel, and knew not any one with whom to travel, nor knew he the way, nor was he able to traverse the Valley of the Jánn, and the Land of the Wild Beasts, and the Islands of the Birds; therefore he despaired of life. Then he wept for himself until he fainted; and when he recovered, he thought upon his children and his wife, and her coming to her sister, and thought upon what might happen to her with the Queen, her sister. He repented of his having come to this country, and of his not having attended to the words of any one; and he recited some mournful verses; after which he ceased not to walk on until he went forth to the outside of the city, when he found the river, and he proceeded along its bank, not knowing whither to repair.

But as to his wife, Menár-es-Senà, she desired to set forth on her journey on the second day after that on which the old woman set forth. While, however, she was meditating to depart, lo, the chamberlain of the King her father came in to her, and kissed the ground before her, and said to her, O Queen, thy father the supreme King saluteth thee and calleth thee to him. So she arose and repaired with the chamberlain to her father to see what he wanted. And when her father saw her, he seated her by his side upon the couch, and said to her, O my daughter, know that I have seen this last night a vision, and I fear for thee in consequence thereof, and fear that there will occur to thee, from this thy journey, long-continued anxiety. She therefore said to him, Wherefore, O my father; and what didst thou see in thy sleep? And he answered, I beheld as though I entered a repository of treasure, and saw in it great riches, and jewels and jacinths in abundance, and as though there pleased me not in all that treasure, nor among all those jewels, aught save seven beads, which were the most beautiful of the things there. And I chose, of the seven jewels, one, which was the smallest of them, and the most beautiful of them, and the most excellent of them in brilliancy; and it seemed as though I took it in my hand, when its beauty pleased me, and went forth with it from the repository of treasure. But when I went forth from its door, I opened my hand, being joyful, and turned over the jewel; and, lo, a strange bird had approached from a distant country — it was not of the birds of our country — and it pounced down upon me from the sky, seized the jewel from my hand, and returned with it to the place whence it had come.⁵³ So anxiety and sorrow and vexation came upon me, and I was affected with exceeding terror, which roused me from my sleep, and I awoke mournful, lamenting the loss of that jewel. Therefore when I awoke, I summoned the interpreters and expounders, and related to them my dream; and they said to me, Thou hast seven daughters, the youngest of whom thou wilt lose, and she will be taken from thee forcibly, without thy consent. Now thou, O my daughter, art the youngest of my daughters, and the dearest of them in my estimation, and the most generous of them to me; and now thou art about to journey to thy sister, and I know not what will befall thee from her: therefore go not; but return to thy palace.

And when Menár-es-Senà heard the words of her father, her heart throbbed, and she feared for her children, and hung down her head for a while towards the ground. Then she raised her head towards her father, and said to him, O King, verily the Queen Noor-el-Hudà hath prepared for me an entertainment, and she is expecting my coming to her hour after hour. For four years she hath not seen me, and if I delay visiting her, she will be incensed against me; and the utmost period of my stay with her will be a month, after which I shall be with thee again. Besides, who is this person who can invade our country and gain access to the Islands of Wák-Wák?

And who can gain access to the White Land, and the Black Mountain, and come to the Island of Camphor, and the Castle of Crystal; ⁵⁴ and how can he traverse the Valley of the Birds; then the Valley of the Wild Beasts; then the Valley of the Jánn; and then enter our Islands? If any stranger came in to them, he would be drowned in the seas of destructions. Therefore let thy soul be happy and thine eye be cheerful with regard to my journey; for no one hath power to tread our land. — And she ceased not to persuade him until he granted her permission to go. He then ordered a thousand horsemen to journey with her, to conduct her to the river, and there to remain until she should arrive at the city of her sister and enter her sister's palace. He also ordered them to remain with her till they should take her and bring her back to her father; and her father charged her that she should remain with her sister two days only, and then return speedily. So she said, I hear and obey.

She then arose and went forth, and her father went forth with her, and bade her farewell. The words of her father had made an impression upon her heart, and she feared for her children; but fortifying oneself by caution against the assault of destiny is of no avail. She prosecuted her journey with diligence for three days with their nights, until she arrived at the river, and pitched her tents on its bank. Then she crossed the river, having with her some of her pages and other followers, and her wezeers; and when she arrived at the city of the Queen Noor-el-Hudà, she ascended to the palace, and went in to her; and she saw her children weeping by her and crying out, O our father! So the tears flowed from her eyes, and she wept, and pressing her children to her bosom, she said to them, Have ye seen your father? Would that the hour had never been when I parted from him! And if I knew that he were in the abode of the world, I would convey you to him. — She then lamented for herself and for her husband and for the weeping of her children, and recited these verses: —

My beloved, notwithstanding distance and cruelty, I desire you and incline to you, wherever you are,
 And mine eye looketh towards your home, and my heart lamenteth that the days when you were with me are past.
 How many nights have we passed without suspicion, loving one another, fidelity and kindness rejoicing us!

But when her sister saw that she pressed her children to her bosom, and said, I have occasioned this to befall myself and my children, and have made my house desolate — she saluted her not: on the contrary, she said to her, O wicked woman, how hadst thou these children? Hast thou married without the knowledge of thy father, or hast thou formed an unlawful connection? If thou have done this, thou must be severely punished; and if thou have married without our knowledge, wherefore didst thou quit thy husband and take thy children, separating them from their father, and come to our country? Moreover thou hast concealed thy children from us. Dost thou imagine that we knew not that? By Allah (whose name be exalted!), who knoweth all secrets, thy case hath been made manifest to us, and thy state hath been revealed, and thy shameful secrets have been exposed. — Then, after that, she ordered her guards to lay hold upon her. So they seized her, and she bound her hands behind her, shackled her with shackles of iron, and inflicted upon her a painful beating, so that she lacerated her skin; and she suspended her by her hair, put her into a prison, and wrote a letter to the supreme King, her father, informing him of her story, and saying to him, —

There hath appeared in our country a man of the human race, and my sister, Menár-es-Senà, asserteth that she hath married him lawfully and had by him two sons, whom she hath concealed from us and from thee; but she revealed not aught respecting herself until that man, who is of the human race, came to us. His name is Hasan, and he hath informed us that he married her, and that she resided with him a long time; after which she took her children and departed without his knowledge, having told his mother, at her departure, and said to her, Say to thy son, when he hath a longing to see me, that he must come to the Islands of Wák-Wák. So we seized the man in our abode, and I sent to her the old woman Shawáhee to bring her to me, together with her children; wherefore she fitted herself out and came. And I had ordered the old woman to bring to me her children first, and to come on in advance to me with them, before the arrival of their mother. Accordingly the old woman came with the children before her arrival. Then I sent to the man who asserted her to be his wife; and when he came in to me, and saw the children, he knew them. So I was certified that they were his children and that she was his wife, and I knew that the saying of the man was true, that there was no disgracefulness in him, and I saw that the turpitude and disgracefulness were in my sister. I therefore feared that we should be dishonoured in the opinion of the people of our islands; and when this wicked, deceitful woman came in to me, I was incensed against her, and inflicted upon her a painful beating, and suspended her by her hair. Now I have acquainted thee with her story; and it is thine to command: whatever thou shalt order us to do, we will do it. Thou knowest that this thing is attended with dishonour to us, and with disgrace to us and to thee; for probably the people of the islands will hear thereof, and we shall become among them an example; wherefore it is expedient that thou return us a reply speedily.

She gave the letter to the messenger, who went with it to the King; and when the supreme King read it, he was violently enraged against his daughter Menár-es-Senà, and wrote to his daughter Noor-el-Hudà a letter, in which he said to her, I have committed her case unto thee, and given thee power over her life; and if the thing be as thou hast said, slay her, and consult me not respecting her case. So when the letter of her father came to her, and she read it, she sent to Menár-es-Senà, and caused her to be brought before her. She was drowned in her blood, having her hands bound behind her with her hair, shackled with heavy shackles of iron, and upon her was apparel of haircloth. They stationed her before the Queen, and she stood abject and abased; and when she beheld herself in this state of great abasement, and excessive contempt, she reflected upon her former glory, and wept violently, and recited these two verses: —

O my Lord, the enemies are attempting to destroy me, and imagine that I cannot escape from them.

I have recourse to Thee to annul what they have done! O my Lord, Thou art the refuge of the fearful, the suppliant!

And again she wept violently, until she fell down in a fit; and when she recovered, she recited some other verses.

Her sister then caused a ladder of wood to be brought to her, and extended her upon it, and ordered the servants to bind her upon her back on the ladder, stretched forth her arms and tied them with cords, uncovered her head, and wound her hair upon the ladder; and pity for her had been eradicated from her heart. So when Menâr-es-Senâ beheld herself in this state of abasement and contempt, she cried out and wept: but no one aided her. She said to the Queen, O my sister, how is it that thy heart is hardened against me, and thou hast no mercy on me, nor hast mercy on these little infants? But when she heard these words, her hardness of heart increased, and she reviled her, and said to her, O wanton! O wicked woman! may God shew no mercy to the person who sheweth mercy to thee! How can I have pity on thee, O deceitful woman? — So Menâr-es-Senâ, lying stretched (as above described), said to her, I appeal against thee to the Lord of Heaven with regard to that wherewith thou reproachest me, and I am innocent of it. By Allah, I have not formed an unlawful connection; but I married him legally; and my Lord knoweth whether my words be true or not. My heart is incensed against thee on account of the excessive hardness of thy heart towards me. How is it that thou accusest me of dishonesty without knowledge thereof? But my Lord will deliver me from thee; and if the accusation of dishonesty that thou hast brought against me be true, God will punish me for it. — And her sister meditated in her mind when she heard her words, and said to her, How is it that thou addressest me with these words? Then she arose and advanced to her, and beat her until she fainted; and they sprinkled water upon her face till she recovered. Her charms had become changed by reason of the violence of the beating, and the tightness of the bonds, and the excessive insult that she had experienced; and she recited these two verses: —

If I have committed a crime, and done an iniquitous deed,
I repent of what hath passed, and have come to you begging pardon.

But when Noor-el-Hudâ heard her verses, she was violently incensed, and said to her, Dost thou speak, O wicked woman, before me in verse, and seek to excuse thyself for the heinous sins that thou hast committed? It was my desire that thou shouldst return to thy husband, in order that I might witness thy wickedness and thy turpitude; for thou gloriest in the wickedness and shameful conduct and heinous sins that have proceeded from thee. — She then ordered the pages to bring her the palm-stick: so they brought it; and she arose and tucked up the sleeves from her arms, and fell to beating her from her head to her feet; after which she called for a plaited whip, such that if an elephant were beaten with it he would trot with speed; and she fell to beating her with that whip upon her back and her stomach and all her limbs until she fainted. — Now when the old woman Shawáhee saw this that the Queen did, she went forth fleeing from before her, and weeping and cursing her. But the Queen cried out to the servants, and said to them, Bring her to me. So they ran together after her, and laid hold upon her, and brought her before the Queen, who gave orders to throw her upon the ground, and said to the female slaves, Drag her along on her face, and turn her out. Accordingly they dragged her and turned her out from before the Queen.

As to Hasan, however, he arose with firmness, and walked along the bank of the river, and turned his face towards the desert. He was perplexed, anxious, despairing of life, and he had become confounded, not knowing night from day, by reason of the violence of the afflictions that had befallen him. He ceased not to walk on until he came to a tree, and he found upon it a paper suspended. So he took it with his hand, and looked at it; and, lo, on it were written these verses: —

I disposed thine affair at the time when thou wast in thy mother's womb,
And inclined her heart to thee so that she fostered thee in her bosom.
We will suffice thee in matters that occasion thee anxiety and sorrow.
So submit to us, and arise. We will aid thee in thine enterprise.

And when he had finished reading the paper, he felt sure of escape from trouble, and of effecting his reunion. Then he went on two steps, and found himself alone in a desert and perilous place, without any one by whose society to cheer himself; wherefore his reason fled in consequence of his solitude and fear, the muscles of his side quivered on account of this fearful place, and he recited some verses.

After that, he proceeded along the bank of the river two steps further, and he found two young boys, of the sons of the enchanters and sorcerers. Before them was a rod of brass, engraved with talismans, and by the side of the rod was a cap⁵⁵ of leather, the crown of which was composed of three triangular pieces, whereon were worked, in steel, names, and characters of seals. The rod and the cap were thrown upon the ground, and the two boys were disputing and beating each other on account of them, so that blood flowed from them, while this said, None shall take the rod but I — and the other said, None shall take the rod but I. So Hasan interposed between them, and disengaged them, each from the other, and said to them, What is the cause of this contention? And they answered him, O uncle, judge between us; for God (whose name be exalted!) hath sent thee to us in order that thou shouldst decide between us justly. He therefore said, Relate to me your story, and I will judge between you. And one of them said to him, We are two brothers by the same father and mother, and our father was one of the great enchanters. He resided in a cavern in this mountain, and he died, leaving to us this cap and this rod; and my brother saith, None shall take the rod but I — and I say, None shall take it but I. So judge between us, and deliver us, each from the other. — Therefore when Hasan heard their words, he said to them, What is the difference between the rod and the cap, and what is their value? For the rod, in appearance, is worth six jedeeds,⁵⁶ and the cap is worth three jedeeds. — They replied, Thou knowest not their virtues. And he said to them, What are their virtues? They answered him, In each of them is a wonderful secret property; for the rod is worth the revenue of the Islands of Wák-Wák with their districts, and the cap in like manner.

So Hasan said to one of them, O my son, By Allah, discover to me their secret properties. And he replied, O uncle, verily their secret properties are extraordinary; for our father lived a hundred and thirty-five years applying himself to the contrivance of them until he finished them in the most perfect manner, ingrafted in them the secret virtues, made use of them for extraordinary services, designed upon them the similitude of the revolving firmament, and dissolved, by their means, all talismanic charms; and when he had finished the contrivance of them, death, which every one must experience, overtook him. Now as to the cap, its secret property is this: that whosoever putteth it on his head, he is concealed from the eyes of all people, and no one seeth him as long as it remaineth on his head. And as to the rod, this is its secret property that whosoever possesseth it, he hath authority over seven tribes of the Jinn, and all of them will serve that rod: all of them will be under his command and authority; and every one who possesseth it, and in whose hand it is, when he smiteth with it the ground, its Kings will humble themselves to him, and all the Jinn will be at his service.

When Hasan heard these words, he hung down his head for a while towards the ground. Then he said within himself, By Allah, I shall surely be rendered triumphant by means of this rod and this cap, if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), and I am more worthy of them than they. So I will immediately employ a stratagem to take them from them, that I may have recourse to their aid for my deliverance and the deliverance of my wife and my children from this tyrannical Queen, and we will journey from this dismal place, from which there is [otherwise] no deliverance nor flight for any one of mankind. Probably God sent me not to these two youths save for the purpose of my getting from them the rod and the cap. — He then raised his head towards the two youths, and said to them, If ye desire the decision of the case, I will make trial of you, and he who overcometh his companion shall take the rod, and he who faileth shall take the cap; for if I make trial of you and discern between you, I shall know what each of you deserveth. And they replied, O uncle, we depute thee to make trial of us, and to judge between us as thou choosest. Hasan said to them, Will ye attend to my words, and have regard to what I shall say? They answered him, Yes. And Hasan said to them, I will take a stone and throw it, and the one of you who getteth first to it, and taketh it before his companion, shall take the rod; and he who is last, and reacheth it not, shall take the cap. And they replied, We accept from thee this proposal, and we are content with it. Then Hasan took a stone and threw it with all his force and it went out of sight.

The two youths therefore hastened together after it; and when they were at a distance, Hasan took the cap and put it on, and he took the rod in his hand, and removed from his place to see the truth of that which they had said with respect to the secret of their father. And the younger boy got first to the stone and took it, and he returned with it to the place in which was Hasan, and saw no trace of him. So he called out to his brother, and said to him, Where is the man who judgeth between us? And he answered, I see him not, nor know I whether he hath ascended to the highest heaven, or descended to the lowest earth. They searched for him, and saw him not; and Hasan was standing in his place. Therefore they reviled one another, and said, The rod and the cap are gone: they are neither mine nor thine; and our father said to us these very words; but we forgot what he told us.

Then they retraced their steps, and Hasan entered the city, wearing the cap, and having in his hand the rod, and none of the people saw him. He entered the palace, ascended to the place in which was Shawáhee Zát-ed-Dawáhee,⁵⁷ and went in to her, still wearing the cap, and she saw him not. Then he walked on until he drew near to a shelf which was over her head, and on which were vessels of glass and China-ware; and he shook it with his hand so that the things that were upon it fell on the floor. So Shawáhee Zát-ed-Dawáhee cried out, and slapped her face; and she rose and restored what had fallen to their places,⁵⁸ saying within herself, By Allah, I imagine not aught but that the Queen Noor-el-Hudà hath sent to me a devil, and that he hath done to me this deed. I therefore beg God (whose name be exalted!) to deliver me from her, and to preserve me from her anger. O my Lord, if this is her abominable conduct to her sister, beating and suspending her, when she is dear in the estimation of her father, how will she act with the stranger like myself, when she is incensed against her? — Then she said, I conjure thee, O devil, by the Most Compassionate, the Beneficent, the Great in dignity, the Mighty in dominion, the Creator of mankind and the Jánn and by the characters upon the seal of Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), that thou speak to me and reply to me! So Hasan replied to her and said to her, I am not a devil: I am Hasan the distracted, the confounded, the perplexed.

He then pulled off the cap from his head; whereupon he appeared to the old woman, and she knew him, and, having taken him into a private place, she said to him, What hath happened to thy reason, that thou hast come hither? Go; hide thyself; for this iniquitous woman hath inflicted tortures upon thy wife, though she is her sister: how then will she act if she light upon thee? — And she related to him all that had befallen his wife, describing to him her present state of distress and punishment and torture; and in like manner she described to him the torture that had befallen herself; after which she said to him, Verily the Queen repented of her having liberated thee, and hath sent to thee one to bring thee to her, promising that she will give him a hundredweight of gold, and place him in my post in her service. She hath also sworn that if they bring thee back, she will slay thee, and slay thy wife and thy children. — Then the old woman wept, and discovered to Hasan what the Queen had done to her; whereupon Hasan also wept, and he said, O my mistress, how is it possible to escape from this country and from this tyrannical Queen; and what is the stratagem that will enable me to deliver my wife and my children, and to return with them to my country? The old woman replied, Wo to thee! Save thyself! — But he said, I must deliver her, and deliver my children from the Queen by force. — How, said the old woman, wilt thou deliver them from her by force? Go and hide thyself, O my son, until God (whose name be exalted!) shall permit.

Hasan therefore shewed her the rod of brass and the cap; and when the old woman saw them, she rejoiced in them exceedingly, and said to him, Extolled be the perfection of Him who reanimateth the bones when they are rotten! By Allah, O my son, thou and thy wife were nought but of the number of the perishing, and now, O my son, thou and thy wife and thy children are saved; for I know the rod, and know who was its owner; he having been my sheykh, who taught me enchantment. He was an egregious enchanter: he persevered a hundred and thirty-five years until he skilfully made this rod and this cap; and when the making of them in this manner was finished, death, which is inevitable, overtook him. And I heard him say to his two sons, O my two sons, these two things are not of your lot; for a person, a stranger to the country, will come and take them from you by force, and ye will not know how he will take them. So they said, O our father, inform us how he will be able to take them. But he replied, I know not that. How then wast thou able, O my son, to take them? — He therefore told her how he took them from the two boys; and when he told her, she rejoiced thereat, and said to him, O my son, as thou hast enabled thyself to gain possession of thy wife and thy children, hear what I will say to thee. I can no longer reside in the abode of this wicked woman, since she hath assaulted me and tormented me. I am about to depart from her to the cavern of the enchanters, to reside with them and to live with them until I die. Now do thou, O my son, put on the cap, and take the rod in thy hand; then go in to thy wife and thy children, in the place in which they are, and strike the ground with the rod, and say, O servants of these names! Thereupon their servants will come up to thee; and if one of the chiefs of the tribes come up to thee, command him to do as thou shalt desire and choose.

He then bade her farewell, and departed, and having put on the cap, and taken the rod with him, he entered the place in which was his wife. He saw her in a state approaching to annihilation, extended upon the ladder, with her hair bound to it, and with weeping eye and mourning heart, in the most evil condition, not knowing any way to effect her deliverance. Her children were beneath the ladder playing, and she was looking at them, and weeping for them and for herself, on account of the things that had happened to her and befallen her, and the torment and painful beating and most violent punishment that she suffered; and when he saw her thus in the most evil of conditions, he heard her recite these verses: —

There remaineth not aught save a flitting breath, and an eye whose pupil is confounded,⁶⁵
And a desirous lover whose bowels are burned with fire, notwithstanding which she is silent.

The exulting foe pitieth her at the sight of her. Alas for her whom the exulting foe pitieth!

When Hasan saw the torment and abasement and contempt that she was suffering, he wept until he fainted; and on his recovering, and seeing his children playing, and their mother in a fit of insensibility, by reason of the excess of her pain, he removed the cap from his head; whereupon they cried out, O our father! Then he covered his head again, and their mother recovered from her fit on hearing their cry, and saw not her husband, but only saw her children weeping, and crying out, O our father! So she wept when she heard them mention their father and weep: her heart broke, and her bowels were cut in pieces, and she called out, with a liver that was burst, and a painful heart, Where are ye, and where is your father? Then she reflected upon the times of her union with him, and reflected upon the events that had befallen her since his separation, and wept violently, so that her tears ulcerated her cheeks, and wetted the ground. Her cheeks became drowned in her tears, by the excess of her weeping! and she had not a hand at liberty that she might wipe away her tears with it from her cheeks. The flies were satiated with feeding upon her skin, and she found for herself no aider save weeping, and consoling herself by reciting verses. And when Hasan heard her verses, he wept until he fainted, his tears ran down upon his cheeks like rain, and, drawing near to the children, he removed the cap; and when they saw him, they knew him, and cried out saying, O our father! So their mother wept again on hearing them mention their father, and said, There is no means of avoiding what God hath decreed. And she said within herself, O wonderful! What is the cause of their mention of their father at this time, and their calling to him? — Then she wept, and recited these verses: —

The country is destitute of the rising moon! O mine eye, pour forth overflowing tears! They have gone, and how can I be patient after their departure? I swear that I have neither heart nor patience.

O ye who have departed, but whose abode is in my heart, will you, after this, O my master, return?

What harm if they return and I enjoy their society, and they feel pity for the overflowing of my tears, and my anguish?

They made mine eyes misty on the day of departure through astonishment, and the fire of my bosom is not extinguished.

I desire their remaining; but fortune opposed me with respect to them, and disappointed my desire by separation.

By Allah, O object of our love, return to us; for my tears have flowed sufficiently for your absence!

So Hasan could no longer abstain from removing the cap from his head, and his wife saw him; and when she knew him, she uttered a cry that alarmed all who were in the palace. She then said to him, How camest thou hither? Hast thou descended from the sky, or risen from the earth? — And her eyes filled with tears: therefore Hasan also wept; and she said to him, O man, this is not a time for weeping, nor is it a time for reproach. Fate hath had its course, and the sight was blinded, and the pen hath written what God decreed from eternity. I conjure thee by Allah to tell me whence thou hast come. Go and hide thyself, lest any one see thee and inform my sister thereof and she slaughter me and slaughter thee also. — Hasan replied, O my mistress, and mistress of every Queen, I have exposed my life to peril and come hither, and either I will die, or I will deliver thee from the predicament in which thou art, and I and thou and my children will journey to my country, in spite of this wicked woman, thy sister. But when she heard his words she smiled and laughed, and shook her head for a long time, and said to him, Far, O my soul, far is it from me that any one should deliver me from the predicament in which I am, except God, whose name be exalted! So save thyself, and depart, and cast not thyself into destruction; for she hath numerous and heavily-equipped troops whom no one can confront. And suppose thou tookest me and wentest forth; how canst thou make thy way to thy country, and how can we escape from these islands, and the difficulties of these places? Thou hast seen, in thy way, wonders and strange things, and horrors and troubles, such as scarcely can one of the refractory Jinn escape. Go therefore soon, and increase not my anxiety nor my sorrow; and pretend not that thou wilt deliver me from this state; for who will convey me to thy country across these valleys and thirsty lands and fatal places?

Hasan thereupon said to her, By thy life, O light of mine eye, I will not go forth hence, nor will I journey forth, save with thee. She rejoined, O man, how canst thou do this thing? What is thy nature? For thou knowest not what thou sayest. If thou hadst dominion over Jānn and 'Efreet, and enchanters and tribes and 'Ōns, thou couldst not; for no one is able to escape from these places. Therefore save thyself, and leave me. Perhaps God will bring to pass other events after these."— So Hasan said to her, O mistress of beauties, I came not save to deliver thee by means of this rod and by means of this cap. And he related to her what had happened to him with the two boys.

But while he was speaking, lo, the Queen came in to them, and heard their conversation. So when he saw the Queen, he put on the cap; and she said to her sister, O wicked woman, who is he with whom thou wast conversing? She replied, And who is with me to speak to except these infants? And the Queen took the whip, and proceeded to beat her with it, while Hasan stood looking on. She ceased not to beat her until she fainted, when she gave orders to remove her from that place to another; wherefore they loosed her and went forth with her to another place, and Hasan went forth with them to the place to which they conveyed her. Then they threw her down senseless, and stood looking at her; and when she recovered from her fit, she recited these verses: —

I have sorrowed on account of our disunion with a sorrow that made the tears to overflow from my eyelids;

And I vowed that if fortune should reunite us, I would never again mention our separation;

And I would say to the enviers, Die ye with regret; by Allah, I have now attained my desire!

Joy hath overwhelmed me to such a degree that by its excess it hath made me weep.

O eye, how hath weeping become thy habit? Thou weepest in joy as well as in sorrows.

And when she had ended her verses, the female slaves went forth from her.

So thereupon Hasan pulled off the cap; and his wife said to him, See O man: all this hath not befallen me save on account of my having disobeyed thee, and acted in opposition to thy command, and gone forth without thy permission. But I conjure thee by Allah, O man, blame me not for my misconduct. Know that a woman is not sensible of the value of a man until she is separated from him. I have done wrong and sinned; but I beg God, the Great, to pardon the actions committed by me; and if God reunite us, I will never disobey thy command after that. — Hasan replied (and his heart pained him for her), Thou sinnedst not, and none sinned but I; for I went away on a journey and left thee with one who knoweth not thy dignity nor knoweth thy value nor thy rank. And know thou, O beloved of my heart, and delight of my soul, and light of mine eye, that God (whose perfection be extolled!) hath empowered me to deliver thee. Desirest thou, then, that I convey thee to the abode of thy father, and that thou shouldst experience, with him, the accomplishment of all that God hath appointed for thee, or wilt thou journey to our country soon, seeing that relief hath come to thee? — But she said to him, And who is able to deliver me, except the Lord of Heaven? Go thou therefore to thy country, and dismiss from thy mind desire; for thou knowest not the dangers of this country; and if thou comply not with my advice, thou wilt see. — Then she recited some verses, and wept with her children, and the female slaves heard their weeping; so they came in to them, and found the Queen Menár-es-Senà and her children weeping; but they saw not Hasan with them; and the female slaves wept in compassion for them, and cursed the Queen Noor-el-Hudà.

Then Hasan waited until night approached and the guards who were deputed to watch her went to their sleeping-places; after which he arose and girded his waist, and, coming to his wife, loosed her, and kissed her head, pressed her to his bosom, kissed her between her eyes, and said to her, How great is our desire for our country and for our reunion there! Is this our meeting in sleep or in a time when we are awake? — He then took up his elder child, and she took upon the younger child, and they went forth from the palace. God had let down the veil of his protection over them, and they proceeded; and on their arrival at the outside of the palace, they stopped at the door that was locked to close the entrance to the palace of the Queen; but when they were there, they saw it locked. So Hasan said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return! — Upon this they despaired of escape, and Hasan said, O Dispeller of griefs! — and struck hand upon hand, and said, I had calculated upon every thing, and considered its result, except this; and now, when the day cometh upon us, they will take us; and how shall we contrive in this case? And he recited these two verses: —

Thou thoughtest well of the days when they went well with thee, and fearedst not the evil that destiny was bringing.

Thy nights were peaceful, and thou wast deceived by them: in the midst of their brightness, there cometh gloom.

Then he wept, and his wife wept at his weeping, and on account of the contempt and misfortunes that she suffered; and Hasan, looking towards her, recited this couplet: —

My fortune opposeth me as though I were its enemy, and every day meeteth me with calamity.

When I seek prosperity, it bringeth the reverse of it; and if one day it is bright to me, the next day it is turbid.

And his wife said to him, By Allah, there is no relief for us, unless we kill ourselves, and so be at rest from this excessive trouble. Otherwise, in the morning we shall suffer painful torture.

Now while they were talking, a speaker said, outside the door, By Allah, I will not open to thee, O my mistress Menár-es-Senà, and to thy husband Hasan, unless ye will obey me in that which I shall say to you. And when they heard these words from that person, they were silent, and desired to return to the place in which they had been. But a speaker said, Wherefore have ye kept silence, and not returned me a reply? And thereupon they knew the person who spoke, who was the old woman Shawáhee Zât-ed-Dawáhee. So they said to her, Whatsoever thou shalt command us to do, we will do it. But open to us the door first; for this time is not a time for talk. — She however replied, By Allah I will not open to you until ye swear to me that ye will take me with you, and not leave me with this profligate woman; and whatsoever shall befall you shall befall me: if ye be preserved, I shall be preserved; and if ye perish, I shall perish; for this wicked, vicious woman despiseth me, and constantly tortureth me on your account; and thou, O my daughter, knowest my worth. Therefore when they knew her, they confided in her, and swore to her by oaths that she trusted in; after which she opened to them the door, and they went forth; and they found her riding upon a red earthen jar of Greek manufacture, upon the neck of which was a rope of the fibres of the palm-tree, and it was turning about beneath her, and moving with a speed greater than that of the Nejde⁶⁰ colt.

She then came before them and said to them, Follow me, and be not terrified at aught; for I know forty modes of enchantment, by the least of which I could make this city a roaring sea agitated with waves, and enchant every damsel in it so that she would become a fish. All that could I do before the morning; but I was unable to do aught of that mischief by reason of my fear of the King, the father of Noor-el-Hudà, and from regard to her sisters; for they derive might from the great number of their guards and tribes and servants. However, I will shew you the wonders of my enchantment. Then proceed with us, relying upon the blessing of God (whose name be exalted!) and his aid. — So thereupon Hasan and his wife rejoiced, and felt sure of escape.

They went forth to the exterior of the city, and Hasan, taking the rod in his hand, struck with it the ground, and fortified his heart, and said, O servants of these names, present yourselves to me, and acquaint me with your brethren! And, lo, the earth clove asunder, and there came forth from it seven ⁶¹ 'Efreetes, each of them having his feet in the lowest limits of the earth, and his head in the clouds. They kissed the ground before Hasan three times, and all of them said, with one voice, At thy service, O our master, and ruler over us! What dost thou command us to do? For we will hear and obey thy command. If thou desire, we will dry up for thee the seas, and remove for thee the mountains from their places. — So Hasan was rejoiced at their words, and at the quickness of their reply; and he encouraged his heart, and fortified his mind and resolution, and said to them, Who are ye, and what are ye called, and from what tribes are ye derived, and of what race are ye, and of what tribe, and of what company? Upon this, they kissed the ground a second time, and answered with one voice, We are seven Kings: each King of us ruleth over seven tribes of the Jinn and the Devils and the Márids: so we seven Kings rule over nine and forty tribes of all the races of the Jinn and the Devils and the Márids and the companies and the 'Óns, the Flyers and the Divers, and the dwellers in the mountains and the deserts and the wastes, and the inhabitants of the seas. Order us to do what thou wilt; for we are thy servants and slaves; and whoever possesseth this rod, he hath authority over the necks of us all, and we become obedient unto him.

When Hasan, therefore, heard their words, he rejoiced greatly, as did also his wife and the old woman; and thereupon Hasan said to the Jinn, I desire of you that ye shew me your company and your troops and your guards. But they replied, O our master, if we shewed thee our company, we should fear for thee and for those who are with thee; for it consists of numerous troops, of various forms and make and kinds and faces and bodies. Among us are heads without bodies, and among us are bodies without heads, and among us are some like the wild beasts, and among us are some like animals of prey. However, if thou desire that, we must exhibit to thee first those who are like the wild beasts. But, O our master, what dost thou desire of us at this present time? — So Hasan said to them, I desire of you that ye carry me and my wife and this virtuous woman immediately to the city of Baghdád. But when they heard his words, they hung down their heads. Therefore Hasan said to them, Why do ye not reply? And they said with one voice, O master and ruler over us, we have existed from the time of the lord Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), and he made us swear that we would not carry any one of the sons of Adam upon our backs: so from that time we have not carried any one of the sons of Adam upon our shoulders nor upon our backs; but we will immediately saddle for thee, of the horses of the Jinn, such as will convey thee to thy country, thee and those that are with thee.

Upon this, Hasan said to them, And what distance is between us and Baghdád? They answered him, A distance of seven years' journey to the horseman who travelleth with diligence. And Hasan wondered thereat, and said to them, How came I hither in less than a year? They answered him, God moved the hearts of his virtuous servants with compassion for thee; and had it not been for that, thou hadst not gained access to this country and region, nor ever beheld it with thine eye. For the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, who mounted thee on the elephant, mounted thee also on the fortunate courser, which traversed with thee, in ten ⁶² days, a space of three years' journey to the horseman who proceedeth with diligence; and as to the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh, he committed thee to Dahnash, and that 'Efreet traversed with thee, during the day and the night, a space of three years' journey. This was effected through the blessing of God, the Great; for the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh is of the posterity of Ásaf the son of Barkhiyá,⁶³ and he knoweth the Most Great Name of God. And from Baghdád to the palace of the damsels is a year's journey. So these make up the seven years. — And when Hasan heard their words, he wondered greatly, and said, Extolled be the perfection of God, who maketh easy what is difficult, and repaireth the broken heart, and bringeth near what is distant, and abaseth every obstinate tyrant, who hath rendered every thing easy to us, and conveyed me to this country, and made subservient to me these people, and reunited me to my wife and my children! I know not whether I be sleeping or awake, or whether I be in my senses or intoxicated.

He then looked towards them and said to them, When ye have mounted me upon your horses, in how many days will they arrive with us at Baghdád? They answered, They will arrive with thee in less than a year, after thou shalt have endured difficulties and troubles and horrors, and traversed thirsty valleys and dismal wastes, and deserts and dangerous places great in number; and we shall not be sure of thy safety, O my master, from the people of these islands, nor from the malice of the supreme King, nor from these enchanters and sorcerers. Perhaps they will overcome us, and take you from us, and we shall be afflicted by them; and every one whom the news reacheth after that will say to us, Ye are the unjust. How did ye go against the supreme King, and convey the human being from his country, and convey also his daughter with you? Wert thou alone with us, the affair were easy to us; but He who caused thee to gain access to these islands is able to cause thee to arrive at thy country, and to reunite thee to thy mother soon, at no distant period. Therefore be resolute, and depend upon God, and fear not; for we are at thy service until we cause thee to reach thy country. — So Hasan thanked them for that, and said to them, May God recompense you well! Then he said to them, Hasten with the horses. And they replied, We hear and obey.

They then struck the ground with their feet; whereupon it clove asunder, and they were absent within it a while; after which they presented themselves, and, lo, they had come up bringing with them three horses, saddled and bridled, and on the fore part of each saddle was a pair of saddle-bags, in one side of which was a leathern bottle full of water, and the other side was full of food. They brought forward the horses, and Hasan mounted a courser, taking a child before him; and his wife mounted the second courser, and took a child before her. Then the old woman alighted from the jar, and mounted the third courser. And they departed, and ceased not to proceed all the night, until the morning came, when they turned aside from the way, and went towards the mountain; their tongues ceasing not from the mention of God. They proceeded all the day beneath the mountain; and while they were journeying on, Hasan beheld a phantom-like form, resembling a pillar, and it was lofty, like smoke ascending to the sky. So he recited somewhat of the Kur-án, and begged for refuge with God from Satan the accursed.

Then that black object appeared more plainly the nearer they approached to it; and when they came near to it, they found it to be an 'Efreet, whose head was like a huge dome, and his dog-teeth were like hooks, and his nostrils like ewers, and his ears like shields, and his mouth was like a cavern, and his teeth were like pillars of stone, and his hands like winnowing-forks,⁶⁴ and his legs like masts: his head was amid the clouds, and his feet were in the lowest limits of the earth, beneath the dust. And when Hasan looked at the 'Efreet, the 'Efreet bowed himself and kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O Hasan, fear me not. I am chief of the inhabitants of this land, and this is the first island of the Islands of Wák-Wák. I am a Muslim, a professor of the unity of God; and I heard of you, and knew of your coming; and when I became acquainted with your state, I desired to journey from the country of the enchanters to another land, devoid of inhabitants, remote from human beings and the Jánn, that I might live therein solitary, by myself, and worship God until my appointed term overtake me. I therefore desired to accompany you, and to be your guide, until ye go forth from these islands, and I will not appear save by night. So comfort your hearts with regard to me; for I am a Muslim, like as ye are Muslims.

And when Hasan heard the words of the 'Efreet, he rejoiced exceedingly, and felt sure of escape. Then looking towards him, he said to him, May God recompense thee well! Proceed with us, relying upon the blessing of God! — Accordingly the 'Efreet went before them, and they betook themselves to conversing and sporting. Their hearts became happy, and their bosoms were dilated; and Hasan proceeded to relate to his wife all that had happened to him, and what he had endured. They ceased not to prosecute their journey all the next night, until the morning, the horses bearing them along like the blinding lightning; and when daylight rose, they put their hands to their several saddle-bags, and each took forth something thence, and ate it; and took forth water, and drank it. Then they pursued their way with diligence, and continued to proceed, with the 'Efreet before them; but he had turned aside with them from the way to another way, which was not a beaten route, along the shore of the sea.

They ceased not to traverse the valleys and the wastes for the space of a whole month; and on the thirty-first day there arose against them a dust that obstructed the view of the surrounding tracts, and the day was darkened by it. So when Hasan beheld it, paleness came upon him; and they heard alarming noises, and the old woman looking towards Hasan, said to him, O my son, these are the troops of the Islands of Wák-Wák: they have overtaken us, and immediately will they take us in their grasp. Hasan therefore said to her, What shall I do, O my mother? And she answered him, Strike the earth with the rod. Wherefore he did so; and the seven Kings came up to him and saluted him, and, having kissed the ground before him, said to him, Fear not nor grieve. So Hasan rejoiced at their words, and said, Ye have done well, O lords of the Jinn and 'Efreet. This is your time. — And they said to him, Ascend, with thy wife and thy children, and her who is with thee, upon the mountain, and leave us with them; for we know that ye are in the right, and they are in the wrong, and God will defend us against them. Therefore Hasan and his wife and children and the old woman alighted from the backs of the horses, and, having dismissed the horses, ascended upon the side of the mountain.

Then the Queen Noor-el-Hudà approached, with troops disposed on the right and left, and the chiefs went around them, and ranged them company by company. The two armies met, and the two hosts dashed against each other, and the fires raged, and the heroes advanced boldly, and the cowards flew, and the Jinn cast forth from their mouths burning sparks, until the thickly-dark night approached. Thereupon the two hosts separated, and the two parties retired from each other; and when they alighted from their horses and rested upon the ground, they lighted the fires, and the seven Kings went up to Hasan, and kissed the ground before him. So he advanced to them and thanked them, and prayed for them that they might be rendered victorious; and he asked them respecting their state with regard to the army of the Queen Noor-el-Hudà; upon which they said to him, They will not withstand us more than three days; for we were to-day about to overcome them. We have seized of them as many as two thousand, and slain of them a great multitude, the number of which cannot be calculated. Therefore let thy soul be happy and thy bosom be dilated. — They then bade him farewell, and descended to their army, to guard it. They ceased not to light the fires until the morning rose, and diffused its light, and shone, when the horsemen mounted the five-year-old horses, and smote one another with the thin-edged swords, and thrust one another with the brown spears, and they passed the night upon the backs of the horses, dashing together like seas, and the fire of war raged among them. They ceased not to fight and contend until the troops of Wák-Wák were defeated, and their power was broken, and their resolution fell, and their feet slipped; and whithersoever they fled, defeat was before them. They turned their backs, and placed their reliance upon flight. The greater number of them were slain, and the Queen Noor-el-Hudà was taken captive, together with the grandees of her kingdom, and her chief officers.

And when the morning came, the seven Kings presented themselves before Hasan, and set for him a couch of alabaster ornamented with fine pearls and with jewels; and he seated himself upon it. They also set, by it, another couch, for the lady Menár-es-Senà, his wife, and that couch was of ivory overlaid with brilliant gold. And by the side of it they set another couch, for the old woman Shawáhee Zát-ed-Dawáhee. Then they brought forward the prisoners before Hasan, and among them the Queen Noor-el-Hudà, who had her hands bound behind her, and her feet shackled. And when the old woman saw her, she said to her, Thy recompense, O wicked, O tyrannical woman, shall be none other than this: that one shall make two bitches hungry, and tie them with thee to the tails of horses, and drive them to the sea, that thy skin may be lacerated; and after that, some of thy flesh shall be cut off and given thee to eat. How didst thou do to thy sister these deeds, O wicked woman, seeing that she married lawfully, according to the ordinance of God and his Apostle? For there is no monkery in El-Islám, and marriage is one of the ordinances of the Apostles (on whom be peace!); and women were not created save for men. — And thereupon Hasan gave orders to slay all the captives; and the old woman cried out and said, Slay ye them, and let not one of them remain! But when the Queen Menár-es-Senà saw her sister in this state, shackled, and in captivity, she wept for her, and said to her, O my sister, and who is this who hath made us captives in our country, and overcome us? She answered her, This is a momentous case. Verily this man whose name is Hasan hath gained possession of us, and God hath given him power over us and over all our kingdom, and he hath subjugated us and the Kings of the Jinn. — And her sister replied, God aided him not against you, nor did he subdue you, nor did he make you prisoners, save by means of this cap and this rod.

So her sister was convinced of that, and knew that he had delivered her by these means; and she humbled herself to her sister until her heart was affected with sympathy for her, and she said to her husband Hasan, What dost thou desire to do with my sister? For here she is before thee, and she hath not committed an abominable deed that thou shouldst punish her for it. — He replied, Her torture of thee was sufficiently abominable. But she said to him, For every abominable deed that she did to me she was excusable. And as to thee, thou hast tortured my father's heart by reason of the loss of me, and how will be his state after the death of my sister? — So Hasan said to her, It is thine to determine. Whatever thou desirest, do it. — And thereupon the Queen Menár-es-Senà gave orders to loose all the prisoners; and they loosed them for the sake of her sister, and loosed her sister also; after which, Menár-es-Senà advanced to her sister and embraced her. She began to weep with her, and they ceased not to do so for some time. Then the Queen Noor-el-Hudà said to her sister, O my sister, blame me not for that which I have done to thee. And the lady Menár-es-Senà replied, O my sister, this was decreed to befall me.

She and her sister sat upon the couch, conversing together; and afterwards, Menár-es-Senà made a reconciliation between the old woman and her sister in the most perfect manner, and their hearts became comforted. Hasan then dismissed the troops who were in the service of the rod, and thanked them for that which they had done in aiding him against his enemies; after which, the lady Menár-es-Senà related to her sister all that had happened to her with her husband Hasan, and all that had happened to him, and what he had endured for her sake. And she said to her, O my sister, it is incumbent upon one not to neglect what is due to a person who hath done these deeds, and who hath this power, and whom God (whose name be exalted!) hath aided by such exceeding fortitude that he hath entered our country, and taken thee and made thee a prisoner, and defeated thine army, and subdued thy father the supreme King, who ruleth over the Kings of the Jinn. Her sister replied, By Allah, O my sister, thou hast spoken truth in that which thou hast told me, respecting the wonderful events that this man hath endured. And was all this for thy sake, O my sister? — She answered, Yes. Then they passed the night conversing together till the morning; and when the sun rose, they desired to depart. So they bade one another farewell, and Menár-es-Senà bade farewell to the old woman, having made a reconciliation between her and her sister Noor-el-Hudà.

Thereupon Hasan struck the earth with the rod, and its servants came up to him, and saluted him, and said to him, Praise be to God for the quiet of thy soul! Command us to do what thou desirest, that we may do it for thee in less time than the twinkling of an eye. — He therefore thanked them for their words, and said to them, May God recompense you well! He then said to them, Saddle for us two coursers, of the best of horses. And they did as he commanded them immediately, and brought forward to him two saddled coursers. So Hasan mounted one of them, taking his elder son before him; and his wife mounted the other, taking her younger son before her. The Queen Noor-el-Hudà also mounted with the old woman; and all went to their countries. Hasan with his wife journeyed to the right, and the Queen Noor-el-Hudà with the old woman journeyed to the left; and Hasan ceased not to proceed with his wife and his children for the space of a whole month; after which they came in sight of a city, around which they found fruits and rivers; and when they arrived at the trees, they alighted from the backs of the horses, desiring to rest. Then they sat conversing together; and, lo, many horsemen advanced to them. So when Hasan saw them, he rose upon his feet, and met them; and, behold, they were the King Hasoon, the lord of the Land of Camphor and the Castle of Crystal,⁶⁵ with his attendants. Thereupon Hasan advanced to the King, and kissed his hands and saluted him; and when the King saw him, he alighted from the back of his courser, and seated himself with Hasan upon furniture spread beneath the trees, after he had saluted him and congratulated him on his safety; and he was rejoiced exceedingly at his return, and said to him, O Hasan, acquaint me with the events that have happened to thee from beginning to the end.

So Hasan acquainted him with all those events; and the King Hasoon wondered at them, and said to him, O my son, no one ever obtained access to the Islands of Wák-Wák and returned from them except thee, and thy case is wonderful. But praise be to God for thy safety! — Then, after that, the King arose and mounted, ordering Hasan to mount and accompany him; wherefore he did so, and they ceased not to proceed until they came to the city, and they entered the King's palace. The King Hasoon alighted, and Hasan and his wife and his children alighted at the mansion of entertainment; and when they had alighted, they remained with the King three days, eating and drinking, and enjoying sport and mirth.

Hasan then begged permission of the King Hasoon that he might journey to his country, and he gave him permission. So he mounted with his wife and his children, and the King mounted with them, and they proceeded ten days; and when the King desired to return, he bade Hasan farewell, and Hasan continued his journey with his wife and his children. They ceased not to journey on for the space of another whole month, after which they came in sight of a great cavern, the ground of which was of brass; whereupon Hasan said to his wife, See this cavern. Dost thou know it? — She answered, Yes. And he said, In it is a sheykh named Abu-r-Ruweysh, to whom I am greatly indebted; for he was the cause of the acquaintance between me and the King Hasoon. And he proceeded to relate to his wife the story of Abu-r-Ruweysh; and, lo, the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh came forth from the entrance of the cavern. So when Hasan saw him, he alighted from his courser and kissed his hands, and the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh saluted him, and congratulated him on his safety. He rejoiced at his arrival, and took him and conducted him into the cavern, and sat with him; and Hasan proceeded to tell the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh what had happened to him in the Islands of Wák-Wák; whereat the sheykh wondered extremely; and he said, O Hasan, how didst thou deliver thy wife and thy children? Hasan therefore related to him the story of the rod and the cap; and when the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh heard that story he wondered, and said, O Hasan, O my son, had it not been for this rod and this cap, thou couldst not have delivered thy wife and thy children. And Hasan replied, Even so, O my master.

Now while they were speaking, a person knocked at the door of the cavern: so the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh went forth and opened the door, and he found that the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had come, riding upon the elephant. The sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh thereupon advanced and saluted and embraced him, rejoicing greatly at his arrival, and congratulated him on his safety; after which, the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh said to Hasan, Relate to the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos all that hath happened to thee, O Hasan. So Hasan proceeded to relate to the sheykh all that had happened to him from first to last, until he came to the story of the rod and the cap; whereupon the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos said to him, O my son, as to thee, thou hast delivered thy wife and thy children, and thou hast no longer any need of the rod and the cap; but as to us, we were the cause of thy gaining access to the Islands of Wák-Wák, and I have acted kindly to thee for the sake of the daughters of my brother, and I beg thee, of thy bounty and beneficence, to give me the rod, and to give the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh the cap.

And when Hasan heard the words of the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, he hung down his head towards the ground, and was ashamed to say, I will not give them to you. Then he said within himself, Verily these two sheykhs have done a great kindness to me, and they were the cause of my gaining access to the Islands of Wák-Wák, and but for them I had not arrived at these places, nor had I delivered my wife and my children, nor had I got this rod and this cap. And he raised his head, and said, Yes: I will give them to you. But, O my masters, verily I fear the supreme King, the father of my wife, lest he come to me with troops into our country and they fight against me, and I shall not be able to repel them save by means of the rod and the cap. — The sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, however, replied, O my son, fear not; for we will be to thee a spy and a helper in this place, and whosoever shall come to thee from the father of thy wife, we will repel him from thee. Fear not any thing whatever; but be of good heart and cheerful eye and dilated bosom. No harm shall befall thee. — So when Hasan heard the words of the sheykh, bashfulness affected him, and he gave the cap to the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh, and said to the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, Accompany me to my country, and I will give thee the rod. And the two sheykhs rejoiced thereat exceedingly, and prepared for Hasan riches and treasures that cannot be described.

He remained with them three days; and after that, he desired to continue his journey; wherefore the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos prepared himself to journey with him. And when Hasan had mounted a beast, and mounted his wife upon another, the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos whistled, and, lo, a huge elephant advanced trotting from the further part of the desert, and the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos took him and mounted upon him, and proceeded with Hasan and his wife and his children. But as to the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh, he entered the cavern. Hasan and his wife and his children, and the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos, ceased not to pursue their journey, traversing the land in its length and breadth, the sheykh guiding them by an easy way and near roads, until they drew near to the country that they sought; and Hasan rejoiced at his approach towards the country of his mother, and at the return of his wife and his children to him. On his arrival at the country [of his sisters], after these arduous, horrible events, he praised God (whose name be exalted!) for this, and thanked Him for his grace and bounty, and recited these verses: ⁶⁶—

Perhaps, in a short time, God will unite us, and we shall be encircled in each other's arms,

And I shall tell you the most wonderful of the events that have befallen me, and what I have suffered from the pain of separation,

And I shall cure mine eye by looking at you; for my heart is in a state of longing desire. I have hidden a story for you in my mind, that I may relate it to you when we meet. I will reproach you for the actions that have proceeded from you, with a reproach that shall end; but affection will remain.

And when he had ended his verses, he looked, and, lo, the green cupola appeared to them, and the pool, and the green palace, and the Mountain of the Clouds appeared to them in the distance. So the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos said, O Hasan, rejoice at the prospect of good fortune; for thou wilt this night be a guest with the daughters of my brother. Therefore Hasan rejoiced thereat exceedingly, and so did his wife. Then they alighted at the cupola, and rested and ate and drank; after which they mounted again, and proceeded until they drew near to the palace.

Upon this, the daughters of the brother of the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos came forth to them and met them, and saluted them and their uncle, and their uncle saluted them, and said to them, O daughters of my brother, see, I have accomplished the affair of your brother Hasan, and aided him to deliver his wife and his children. So the damsels advanced to him and embraced him, rejoicing at his return, and congratulated him on his safety and health, and his reunion to his wife and his children; and it was to them a festival-day. Then the sister of Hasan, the youngest damsel, advanced and embraced him, and wept violently. Hasan also wept with her, on account of the length of his desolate state; and she complained to him of the pain of separation that she had experienced, and the trouble of her heart, and what she had endured in consequence of his absence, and recited these two verses: —

Mine eye hath not looked, since thy separation, at any one but thy form appeared before it:

Nor hath it closed without my seeing thee in slumber, as though thou wast dwelling between the eyelid and the eye.

And when she had finished her verses, she rejoiced exceedingly; and Hasan said to her, O my sister, I thank none for this affair but thee, above the rest of my sisters; and may God (whose name be exalted!) be thine aider and assister! He then related to her all that had befallen him in his travel from first to last, and what he had endured, and what had happened to him with the sister of his wife, and how he had delivered his wife and his children. He told her also of the wonders, and the arduous and horrible events, that he had witnessed, that the sister of his wife had desired to slaughter him, and to slaughter her and her children, and that none had preserved them from her save God, whose name be exalted! After that, he related to her the story of the rod and the cap, telling her that the sheykh Abu-r-Ruweysh and the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos had demanded those two things of him, and that he had not given them to them but for her sake. She therefore thanked him for that, and prayed for long life for him; and he said, By Allah, I shall not forget all the good offices that thou hast done me from the beginning of the affair to its end!

Then his sister looked towards his wife Menár-es-Senà, and embraced her, and pressed her children to her bosom; after which she said to her, O daughter of the supreme King, was there no mercy in thy heart, that thou separatedst him and his children, and torturedst his heart for them. Didst thou desire by doing thus that he should die? — And she laughed, and replied, Thus ordained God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!); and he who deceiveth men, him doth God deceive. Then they brought some food and drink, and they all ate and drank and were happy. Hasan remained with them ten days, eating and drinking, and in joy and happiness; and after ten days, he prepared himself for his journey. His sister thereupon arose, and prepared for him wealth and rarities that cannot be described, and after that, she pressed him to her bosom, to bid him farewell, and embraced him; and Hasan, alluding to her, recited these verses: —

The relinquishment of lovers is nought but remote, and quitting one's beloved is nought but afflicting,

And cruelty and absence are nought but trouble, and the victim of love is nought but a martyr.

How tedious is the night to the enamoured, who is parted from his true love, and hath become solitary!

His tears run down upon his cheek, and he saith, Are there yet any more tears to flow?

Then Hasan gave the sheykh 'Abd-El-Kuddoos the rod, and he rejoiced in it exceedingly, and thanked Hasan for it; and after he had received it from him, he mounted, and returned to his abode.

Hasan then mounted, with his wife and his children, and departed from the palace of the damsels; and they went forth with him, and bade him farewell, after which they returned. Hasan repaired to his country, proceeding over the desert tract for the space of two months and ten days, until he arrived at the city of Baghdád, the Abode of Peace; and he came to his house by the way of the private door which opened towards the plain and the desert, and knocked at the door. His mother, on account of the length of his absence, had relinquished sleep, and given herself continually to mourning and weeping and wailing, until she fell sick, and ate not food, nor delighted in sleep, but wept night and day, and ceased not to mention her son. She had despaired of his return to her; and when he stood at the door, he heard her weeping, and reciting these verses: —

By Allah, O my master, cure her whom you have made sick; for her body is emaciated and her heart is broken!

If you grant her a meeting, in your generosity, the enamoured will be overwhelmed with the favours of the beloved.

I despair not of your approach; for God can effect it; and in the midst of difficulty, prosperity surroundeth one.

And when she had ended her verses, she heard her son Hasan calling out at the door, O my mother, verily fortune hath granted reunion! And on her hearing his words, she knew him. She came to the door in a state between that of believing and that of disbelieving; and when she opened the door, she saw her son standing there with his wife and his children, and she cried out by reason of the violence of her joy, and fell upon the ground in a fit. Hasan therefore ceased not to soothe her until she recovered, when she embraced him, and then she wept; after which she called his pages and slaves, and ordered them to bring all that was with him into the house. Accordingly they brought the loads into the house. Then his wife and his children entered, and his mother went to her and embraced her, and kissed her head and kissed her feet, and said to her, O daughter of the supreme King, if I have erred in not doing what was due to thee, lo, I beg forgiveness of God, the Great. And looking towards her son, she said to him, O my son, what was the cause of this long absence? So when she asked him respecting that, he acquainted her with all that had happened to him from beginning to end; and on hearing his words, she uttered a great cry, and again fell upon the ground in a fit, on account of the mention of the events that had happened to her son. He ceased not to soothe her until she recovered, and thereupon she said to him, O my son, by Allah, thou hast acted negligently with respect to the rod and the cap; for if thou hadst taken care of them and preserved them, thou hadst possessed the earth in its length and breadth;

but praise be to God, O my son, for thy safety, and for that of thy wife and thy children!

They passed a most agreeable and most pleasant night; and when the morning came, Hasan changed his clothes, and put on a suit of the most beautiful material. He then went forth to the market, and bought male black slaves and female slaves, and stuffs and precious things, consisting of ornaments and apparel, and furniture and costly vessels, of which the like existed not in the possession of the Kings. He bought also houses and gardens, immovable estates, and other things; and he resided with his children and his wife and his mother, eating and drinking and delighting. They ceased not to pass the most comfortable life, and the most agreeable, until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions. — Extolled be the perfection of Him who possesseth the dominion that is apparent and the dominion that is hidden, and who is the Living, the Everlasting, who dieth not!

THE FISHERMAN AND THE RIVER APES AND WHAT FOLLOWED WITH THE SULTÁN AND HIS FAVORITE SLAVE GIRL

THERE was, in ancient times, in the city of Baghdád, a fisherman named Khaleefeh, who was a man in needy circumstances, a pauper; and he had never in his life married. And it happened one day that he took his net, and went with it to the river, as it was his custom to do, that he might catch some fish before the other fishermen. When he arrived at the river, he girded himself, and tucked up his sleeves: then advancing to the river, he spread his net, and cast it the first time and the second time; but there came not up in it aught. He ceased not to cast it until he had done so ten times; but nothing whatever came up in it. So his bosom was contracted, and his mind was perplexed respecting his case, and he said, I beg forgiveness of God, the Great, beside whom there is no deity, the Living, the Everlasting; and I turn unto Him repentant! There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! What God willeth cometh to pass, and what He willeth not cometh not to pass! Subsistence is to be bestowed by God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!); and when God bestoweth upon a servant, no one preventeth him; and when He preventeth a servant, no one bestoweth upon him. — Then, by reason of the abundant grief that affected him, he recited this couplet: —

When fortune afflicteth thee with a calamity, prepare patience to endure it, and expand thy bosom;
For the Lord of all creatures, in his beneficence and bounty, will cause easy circumstances to follow difficult.

He then sat a while, meditating upon his case, and hanging down his head towards the ground; after which he recited some other verses, and said within himself, I will cast the net this time also, and rely upon God: perhaps He will not disappoint my hope.

Accordingly he advanced, and cast the net as far as he could into the river, and he folded its cord, and waited over it a while. Then, after that, he drew it, and found it heavy: therefore when he knew that it was heavy, he managed it gently, and drew it until it came up on the bank; and, lo, in it was a one-eyed, lame ape. So Khaleefeh, on beholding him, said, There is no strength nor power but in God! Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return! What is this deficient fortune, and evil luck! What hath happened to me on this blessed day! But all this is by the prede-termination of God, whose name he exalted! — He then took the ape, bound him with a rope, and, advancing to a tree growing upon the bank of the river, he tied him to it. And he had with him a whip, and he took it in his hand, and raised it in the air, desiring to beat with it the ape. But God caused this ape to speak with an eloquent tongue, and he said to him, O Khaleefeh, restrain thy hand, and beat me not, but leave me tied to this tree, and go to the river, and cast thy net, relying upon God; for He will give thee thy means of subsistence. So when Khaleefeh heard the words of the ape, he took the net, and advanced to the river, and cast it, and slackened its cord.

Then he drew it, and found it heavier than it was the first time; and he ceased not to labour at it until it came up to the bank, when, lo, there was in it another ape, whose front teeth were far apart, his eyes adorned with kohl, and his hands stained with hennà; and he was laughing, and had around his waist a piece of ragged stuff. Upon this, Khaleefeh said, Praise be to God who hath substituted, for the fish of the river, apes! He then came to the ape that was tied to the tree, and said to him, See, O unlucky, how abominable was that which thou advisedst me to do! For none caused me to fall in with the second ape but thou; because, when thou presentedst thyself to me in the morning, lame and one-eyed, I became embarrassed, weary, not possessing a piece of silver nor a piece of gold.¹ — And he took in his hand a stick for driving cattle, and whirled it round in the air three times, and was about to strike with it the ape, when he prayed for aid against him, and said to him, I conjure thee by Allah to pardon me for the sake of this my companion, and seek thou of him what thou wantest; for he will guide thee to that which thou desirest. Khaleefeh therefore threw down the stick and pardoned him.

He then came to the second ape, and stood by him; and the ape said to him, O Khaleefeh, these words will not profit thee at all, unless thou hear what I shall say to thee; but if thou hear my words and comply with my advice, and oppose me not, I shall be the means of thy becoming rich. So Khaleefeh said to him, What wilt thou say to me, that I may obey thee respecting it? And he answered him, Leave me tied here in my place, and go to the river and cast thy net, and I will tell thee what thou shalt do after this. Khaleefeh accordingly took the net and went to the river, and cast it and waited over it a while. Then he drew it, and found it heavy; and he ceased not to labour at it until he brought it up to the bank; and, lo, in it was another ape: but this ape was red; around his waist were blue garments, and his hands and feet were stained with hennà, and his eyes adorned with kohl.

On seeing him, Khaleefeh said, Extolled be the perfection of God, the Great! Extolled be the perfection of the Possessor of dominion! Verily this day is blessed from its beginning to its end; for its luck hath been shewn to be fortunate by the countenance of the first ape, and the page is shewn by its superscription! This day is a day of apes; there remaineth not in the river a single fish, and we came not forth to-day save to catch apes! Praise be to God who hath substituted, for the fish, apes! — He then looked towards the third ape, and said to him, What art thou also, O unlucky? The ape said to him, Dost thou not know me, O Khaleefeh? Khaleefeh answered, No. And he replied, I am the ape of Abu-s-Sa'ádát, the Jew, the money-changer. — And what dost thou for him? said Khaleefeh. He answered him, I present myself to him in the morning, at the beginning of the day, and he gaineth five pieces of gold; and I present myself to him in the evening, at the close of the day, and he gaineth five pieces of gold again. And Khaleefeh thereupon looked towards the first ape, and said to him, See, O unlucky, how excellent are the apes of other people: but as to thee, thou presentest thyself to me in the morning lame and one-eyed, and with thine unlucky countenance, and I become a pauper, a bankrupt, hungry. He then took the stick, and whirled it round in the air three times, and was about to strike him with it. But the ape of Abu-s-Sa'ádát said to him, Leave him, O Khaleefeh, and withdraw thy hand, and come to me, that I may tell thee what thou shalt do. So Khaleefeh threw down the stick from his hand, and, advancing to him, said to him, Of what wilt thou tell me, O master of all apes? And he answered him, Take the net, and cast it in the river, and leave me and these apes remaining by thee; and whatever cometh up to thee in the net, bring it to me, and I will acquaint thee with that which will rejoice thee. Khaleefeh replied, I hear and obey. And he took the net and folded it upon his shoulder, and recited these verses: —

When my bosom is contracted, I will beg aid of my Creator, who is able to make easy every thing that is difficult;

For before the eye can close, by the grace of our Lord the captive is liberated and the broken heart made whole.

Commit then to God all thine affairs; for every discerning person knoweth his beneficence.

Then he recited also these two verses: —

Thou art the cause of men's falling into trouble, and Thou removest anxieties and the means of misfortunes.

Cause me not to covet what I cannot attain. How many who have coveted have failed to gain their wishes!

And when he had ended his verses, he advanced to the river, and cast in it the net, and waited over it a while; after which he drew it, and, lo, in it was a large fish, with a great head, and its tail was like a ladle, and its eyes were like two pieces of gold. So when Khaleefeh saw it, he was rejoiced at it; for he had not caught the like of it before in his life. He took it, wondering at it, and brought it to the ape of Abu-s-Sa'ádát the Jew; and he was as though he had gained possession of the whole world. And the ape said to him, What dost thou desire to do with this, O Khaleefeh, and what wilt thou do to thine ape? Khaleefeh answered him, I will inform thee, O master of all apes, what I will do. Know that I will, before every thing else, contrive means of destroying this accursed one, my ape, and I will take thee in his stead, and feed thee every day with what thou shalt desire. — And the ape said to him, Since thou hast informed me, I will tell thee how thou shalt do; and by thy so doing, thy state shall be amended, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! Understand then what I say to thee; and it is this: that thou prepare for me also a rope, and tie me with it to a tree: then thou shalt leave me, and go to the middle of the quay, and cast thy net into the river Tigris; and when thou hast cast it, wait over it a little, and draw it, and thou wilt find in it a fish than which thou hast not seen any more beautiful in thy whole life. Bring it to me, and I will tell thee how thou shalt do after that. — So thereupon Khaleefeh arose immediately, and cast the net in the river Tigris, and drew it, and he saw in it a fish of the kind called bayád,² of the size of a lamb. He had not seen the like of it in his whole life; and it was larger than the first fish.

He took it and went with it to the ape; and the ape said to him, Bring for thyself some green grass and put half of it into a basket, and put the fish upon it, and cover it with the other half, and leave us tied. Then carry the basket upon thy shoulder, and go with it into the city of Baghdád; and whoever speaketh to thee, or asketh thee a question, return him not a reply, until thou enterest the market of the money-changers. Thou wilt find, at the upper end of the market, the shop of the Mo'allim³ Abu-s-Sa'ádát the Jew, the Sheykh of the money-changers, and thou wilt see him sitting upon a mattress, with a pillar behind him, and before him two chests, one for the gold and the other for the silver, and with him memlooks, and black slaves, and pages. Advance to him, and put the basket before him, and say to him, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, I have gone forth to-day to fish, and cast the net in thy name, and God (whose name be exalted!) sent this fish. Thereupon he will say, Hast thou shewn it to any one beside me?⁴ And do thou answer him, No, by Allah. And he will take it from thee, and give thee a piece of gold. But do thou return it to him. And he will give thee two pieces of gold. But return them to him. And whenever he giveth thee aught, return it to him; if he give thee its weight in gold, receive not from him aught. So he will say to thee, Tell me what thou desirest. And say thou to him, By Allah, I will not sell it save for two sayings. And when he saith to thee, And what are those two sayings? — answer him, Rise upon thy feet, and say, Bear witness, O ye who are present in the market, that I have exchanged, for the ape of Khaleefeh the fisherman, my ape; and I have exchanged, for his lot, my lot; and for his good fortune, my good fortune. This is the price of the fish, and I have no need of the gold. — And when he hath done with thee thus, I will every day present myself to thee in the morning and the evening, and henceforth thou wilt gain every day ten pieces of gold; while this his one-eyed, lame ape will present himself in the morning to Abu-s-Sa'ádát the Jew, and God will afflict him every day with an exaction which he will be obliged to pay, and he will not cease to be thus afflicted until he becometh reduced to poverty, and is possessed of nothing whatever. Hear then what I say to thee: so wilt thou become prosperous and be directed aright. — And when Khaleefeh the fisherman heard the words of the ape, he replied, I accept the advice which thou hast given me, O King of all the apes! But as to this unlucky one, may God not bless him! I know not what to do with him. — The third ape, however, said to him, Let him go into the water, and let me go also. And Khaleefeh replied, I hear and obey: — and he advanced to the apes and loosed them and left them; whereupon they descended into the river.

He then approached the fish, and took it and washed it, and he put beneath it some green grass in the basket, covered it also with grass, and, carrying it upon his shoulder, proceeded, singing this mowwál: ⁵—

Commit thine affairs to the Lord of Heaven, and thou wilt be safe;
And act kindly throughout thy life, and thou wilt not repent;
And associate not with the suspected, for thou wouldst be suspected;
And keep thy tongue from reviling, for thou wouldst be reviled.

He ceased not to walk on until he entered the city of Baghdád; and when he entered it, the people, knowing him, wished him good morning, and said, What has thou with thee, O Khaleefeh? But he paid no regard to any one among them until he came to the market of the money-changers, and passed the shops, as the ape directed him. Then he looked at that Jew, and saw him sitting in the shop, with the pages in attendance upon him, and he was like one of the Kings of Khurásán. When Khaleefeh saw him, he knew him, and walked on until he stood before him; whereupon the Jew raised his head towards him, and knew him, and said to him, Welcome to thee, O Khaleefeh! What is thine affair, and what is it that thou desirest? For if any one have spoken to thee or contended with thee, tell me, that I may go with thee to the Wálee, and he will exact for thee thy due from him. — So he replied, No, by thy head, O chief of the Jews! No one hath spoken to me. But I went forth to-day from my house for thy luck, and repaired to the river, and cast my net in the Tigris, and there came up this fish. — He then opened the basket, and threw down the fish before the Jew; and when the Jew saw it, he admired it, and said, By the Pentateuch and the Ten Commandments,⁶ I was sleeping yesterday, and I saw in my sleep as though I were before a person⁷ who said to me, Know, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, that I have sent to thee a beautiful present. So probably the present is this fish: without doubt it is. — Then he looked towards Khaleefeh and said to him, By thy religion, hath any one seen it beside me? Khaleefeh answered him, No, by Allah! By Aboo-Bekr the Very Veracious,⁸ O chief of the Jews, no one beside myself hath seen it!

And upon this the Jew looked towards one of his pages, and said to him, Come hither: take this fish, and go with it to the house, and let Sa'ádeh⁹ prepare it, and fry and broil against the time when I shall accomplish my business and come. Khaleefeh also said to him, Go, O page: let the wife of the Mo'allim fry some of it and broil some of it. And the page replied, I hear and obey, O my master. And he took the fish and went with it to the house. But as to the Jew, he stretched forth his hand with a piece of gold, and offered it to Khaleefeh the fisherman, saying to him, Take this for thyself, O Khaleefeh, and expend it upon thy family.

When Khaleefeh saw it in his hand, he said, Extolled be the perfection of the Possessor of dominion! — and seemed as though he had not seen anything of gold in his life. He took the piece of gold, and walked away a little. Then he remembered the charge of the ape: so he returned, and threw back the piece of gold to the Jew, saying to him, Take thy gold, and give me people's fish. Are people to thee objects of ridicule? — And when the Jew heard his words, he imagined that he was jesting with him; wherefore he handed to him two pieces of gold, in addition to the first piece. But Khaleefeh said to him, Give me the fish without jesting. Dost thou know that I will sell the fish for this price? — And the Jew put forth his hand to two other pieces, and said to him, Take these five pieces of gold as the value of the fish, and relinquish covetousness. And Khaleefeh took them in his hand, and went away with them, joyful. He proceeded to look at the gold, and to wonder at it, and say, Extolled be the perfection of God! There is not in the possession of the Khaleefeh of Baghdád the like of what is in my possession this day! — And he ceased not to walk on until he came to the end of the market.

Then he remembered the words of the ape, and the charge that he had given him. So he returned to the Jew, and threw back to him the gold. The Jew therefore said to him, What aileth thee, O Khaleefeh? What dost thou desire? Wilt thou take pieces of silver in change of thy gold? — And he answered him, I desire not pieces of silver nor pieces of gold. I only desire that thou give me people's fish. — And upon this the Jew was enraged, and cried out at him, and said to him, O fisherman, dost thou come to me with a fish that is not worth a piece of gold, and do I give thee for it five pieces of gold, and dost thou not consent? Art thou mad? Tell me for how much thou wilt sell it. — Khaleefeh answered him, I will not sell it for silver nor for gold, and I will not sell it save for two sayings that thou shalt utter to me. And when the Jew heard his mention of two sayings,¹⁰ his eyes became fixed in his head, and his breathing became difficult, and he locked his teeth together, and said to him, O recrement of the Muslims, dost thou desire that I should abandon my religion for the sake of thy fish, and wouldst thou alienate from me my faith and my belief which I found my fathers to have held before me? And he cried out to his pages, who came before him, and he said to them, Wo to you! Take this unlucky fellow; mangle with blows the back of his neck, and torture him with abundant beating. — They therefore fell to beating him, and ceased not to do so until he fell down beneath the shop, when the Jew said to them, Leave him, that he may rise. And Khaleefeh rose up as though nought ailed him.¹¹

The Jew then said to him, Tell me what thou desirest as the price of this fish, and I will give it thee; for thou hast not obtained good from us on this occasion. But Khaleefeh replied, Fear not for me, O Mo'allim, on account of the beating; for I can bear as much beating as ten asses. And the Jew laughed at his words, and said to him, By Allah, I conjure thee, tell me what thou desirest, and I, by my religion, will give thee it. So he replied, Nought from thee will content me as the price of this fish save two sayings. The Jew therefore said to him, I imagine thou desirest of me that I should become a Muslim. Khaleefeh replied, By Allah, O Jew, if thou become a Muslim, thy becoming so will not profit the Muslims nor will it injure the Jews; and if thou remain in thine infidelity, thine infidelity will not injure the Muslims nor will it profit the Jews.¹² But what I desire of thee is this: that thou rise upon thy feet, and say, Bear witness against me, O people of the market, that I have given in exchange my ape for the ape of Khaleefeh the fisherman, and my good luck in the world for his good luck, and my good fortune for his good fortune. — And the Jew said, If this thing be thy desire, it is to me easy. Then the Jew rose immediately, and stood upon his feet, and said as Khaleefeh the fisherman had told him; after which he looked towards him, and said to him, Hast thou aught more to demand of me? The fisherman answered, No. And the Jew said to him, Go in peace.

So Khaleefeh arose immediately, and, having taken his basket and his net, went to the river Tigris, and cast the net. Then he drew it, and found it heavy, and he pulled it not forth save after laborious exertion; and when he pulled it forth, he saw it full of fish of all kinds. And there came to him a woman, having with her a plate, and she gave him a piece of gold, for which he gave her fish; and there came to him a eunuch also, who bought of him for a piece of gold. Thus it happened until he had sold fish for ten pieces of gold; and he ceased not to sell every day for the pieces of gold till the end of ten days, so that he amassed a hundred pieces of gold.

Now this fisherman had a chamber within a place through which the merchants passed.¹³ And while he was sleeping in his chamber one night, he said to himself, O Khaleefeh, verily all the people know that thou art a poor man, a fisherman, and there have come into thy possession a hundred pieces of gold: so, inevitably, the Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, will hear of thy story from some one of the people; and probably he will be in need of wealth, and will send to thee, and say to thee, I am in want of a certain number of pieces of gold, and it hath been told me that thou hast a hundred pieces of gold; therefore lend them to me. Then I will say, O Prince of the Faithful, I am a poor man, and he who informed thee that I had a hundred pieces of gold lied against me: they are not in my possession, nor have I aught thereof. And he will deliver me to the Wálee, and will say to him, Strip him of his clothing, and torture him with beating, that he may confess, and may bring the hundred pieces of gold that are in his possession. Therefore the right opinion, that will be the means of saving me from this embarrassing predicament, is this: that I arise immediately, and torture myself with the whip, that I may be accustomed to beating. — And his hasheesh¹⁴ said to him, Arise; strip thyself of thy clothes.

So he arose forthwith, and stripped himself of his clothes, and took in his hand a whip that he had by him. — He had also a pillow of leather; and he proceeded to strike one blow upon that pillow, and one blow upon his skin, saying, Ah! Ah! By Allah, this is a false assertion, O my lord, and they utter a lie against me: I am a poor man, a fisherman, and have not in my possession aught of worldly goods. — And the people heard Khaleefeh the fisherman torturing himself, and beating upon the pillow with the whip, the falling of the blows upon his body and upon the pillow making a noise in the night; and among those who heard him were the merchants. They therefore said, What can be the matter with the poor man, that he crieth, and that we hear the falling of the blows upon him? It seemeth that the robbers have come down upon him, and they are the persons who are torturing him. — So thereupon they all arose, on hearing the sounds of the beating and crying, and came forth from their lodgings to the chamber of Khaleefeh, and, seeing its door locked, they said, one to another, Probably the robbers have descended upon him from behind the saloon: ¹⁵ therefore it is expedient that we ascend by way of the roofs. Accordingly they ascended to the roofs, and descended through the memrak; ¹⁶ and they saw him with bare back, and torturing himself. They therefore said to him, What aileth thee, O Khaleefeh? What is thy story? — And he answered, Know, O people, that I have acquired some pieces of gold, and I fear that my case will be reported to the Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, and he will summon me before him, and demand of me those pieces of gold. Then I will deny; and when I deny, I fear that he will torture me; wherefore I am torturing myself, and making the torture habitual to me, to prepare for what may come. — And the merchants laughed at him, and said to him, Leave off these actions. May God not bless thee, nor the pieces of gold that have come to thee! For thou hast disquieted us this night, and alarmed our hearts.

So Khaleefeh discontinued the beating of himself, and slept until the morning; and when he arose from sleep, and desired to depart to his occupation, he reflected upon the matter of the hundred pieces of gold that had come into his possession, and said within himself, If I leave them in the chamber, the robbers will steal them; and if I put them into a kamar ¹⁷ around my waist, probably some one will see them, and lay wait for me until I am alone, in a place devoid of other persons, and he will slay me, and take them from me. But I will practise a stratagem, one that will be good, and very advantageous. — He then arose immediately, and sewed for himself a pocket within the upper border of his vest, and, having tied up the hundred pieces of gold in a purse, put them into that pocket which he had made; after which he arose and took his net and his basket and his staff, and proceeded until he came to the river Tigris, and cast his net in it. Then he drew it; but there came not up for him anything. He therefore removed from that place to another place, and there he cast his net; but nothing came up for him. And he ceased not to remove from place to place until he was as far from the city as the space of half a day's journey, casting the net on the way; but still there came not up for him aught. And he said within himself, By Allah, I will not cast my net again into the water save this time, whatever be the result!

So he cast the net with all his force, by reason of the violence of his rage, and the purse in which were the hundred pieces of gold flew from his bosom, fell into the midst of the river, and was carried away with the force of the current. Upon this he threw down the net from his hand, and stripped himself of his clothes, and leaving them upon the bank, descended into the river, and dived after the purse. He ceased not to dive and come up about a hundred times, until his strength became impaired; but he found not that purse; and when he despaired of it, he came up on the bank, and found not aught save the staff and the net and the basket. He sought his clothes; but discovered no trace of them. So he unfolded the net, and wrapped himself in it, and, taking the staff in his hand, and the basket upon his shoulder, he went trotting along like the stray camel, running to the right and left, and backwards and forwards, with dishevelled hair, and dust-coloured, like the refractory 'Efreet when let loose from Suleymán's prison.¹⁸—Such was the case of Khaleefeh the fisherman.

Now the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed had a companion, a jeweller, named Ibn-El-Kirnás; and all the people and the merchants and the brokers and the bargain-makers knew that Ibn-El-Kirnás was the merchant of the Khaleefeh. Nought that was sold in the city of Baghdád, of rarities and other costly things, was sold until it was shewn to him, and among these things were the memlooks and the female slaves. And while that merchant, Ibn-El-Kirnás, was sitting in his shop one day, lo, the sheykh of the brokers came to him, having with him a female slave, the like of whom eyes had not beheld. She was endowed with the utmost beauty and loveliness, and fine stature, and justness of form; and among the number of her excellences were these: that she knew all sciences and arts, and composed verses, and played upon all kinds of musical instruments. So Ibn-El-Kirnás the jeweller purchased her for five thousand pieces of gold, and he clad her at the cost of one thousand pieces of gold, and brought her to the Prince of the Faithful, who tried her in every science and in every art, and found her to be acquainted with all sciences and arts.

She was unequalled in her age; and her name was Koot-el-Kuloob. And on the following morning, the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed sent to Ibn-El-Kirnás the jeweller; and when he came, he gave orders to pay him ten thousand pieces of gold as the price of that slave-girl. Then the heart of the Khaleefeh became engrossed by that slave-girl named Koot-el-Kuloob, and he abandoned the lady Zubeydeh the daughter of El-Kásim, though she was the daughter of his paternal uncle. He abandoned also all the concubines, and remained a whole month without going forth from that slave-girl, save to the Friday-prayers, after which he returned to her in haste. So this conduct was grievous to the lords of the empire; wherefore they complained thereof to the Wezeer Jaafar El-Barmekkee; and the Wezeer waited for the Prince of the Faithful until the next Friday, when he entered the mosque, and met the Prince of the Faithful, and related to him all that he had heard of stories concerning extraordinary love, in order that he might draw forth the statement of his feelings. And upon this the Khaleefeh said to him, O Jaafar, by Allah, that thing was not of my choice; but my heart is entangled in the snare of love, and I know not what is to be done. The Wezeer Jaafar therefore replied, Know, O Prince of the Faithful, that this concubine Koot-el-Kuloob hath become under thine authority, and of the number of thy servants; and what the hand possesseth the soul doth not covet. I will also acquaint thee with another thing, which is this: that the best of what the Kings and the sons of the Kings glory in are hunting, and enjoying sport and conveniences; and if thou do thus, probably thou wilt thereby be diverted from her, and probably thou wilt forget her. — And the Khaleefeh said to him, Excellent is that which thou hast said, O Jaafar. Repair then with us hastily, immediately, to hunt.

Accordingly, when the Friday-prayers were ended, they both went forth from the mosque, and mounted immediately, and went to hunt. They proceeded until they came to the desert, and the Prince of the Faithful and the Wezeer Jaafar were riding upon two mules; and as they occupied each other by conversation, the troops outwent them. The heat had become oppressive to them: so Er-Rasheed said, O Jaafar, violent thirst hath affected me. Then Er-Rasheed cast his eyes, and saw a distant object faintly appearing upon a high mound; and he said to the Wezeer, Dost thou see what I see? The Wezeer answered him, Yes, O Prince of the Faithful: I see a distant object faintly appearing upon a high mound, and it is either the keeper of a garden or the keeper of a ground for melons and cucumbers; and in either case, his tract is not without water. The Wezeer then said, I will go to him, and bring thee some water from him. But Er-Rasheed replied, My mule is more swift than thine; therefore stay thou here, on account of the troops, and I will myself go and get drink from the station of this person, and return. And he urged his mule, which thereupon went forth like the wind in its pace, or as water poureth into a pool, and ceased not to bear him away until he arrived at that faint object in the twinkling of an eye, when he found not that object to be any one but Khaleefeh the fisherman. Er-Rasheed saw him with his naked body wrapped in the net, and his eyes, by reason of their excessive redness, were like burning cressets. His form was horrible, and his figure bending, and, with dishevelled hair, and dust-coloured, he resembled an 'Efreet, or a lion.

Er-Rasheed saluted him, and he returned his salutation in a state of rage, and his breath would have kindled fires; and Er-Rasheed said to him, O man, hast thou by thee any water? Khaleefeh replied, O thou, art thou blind or mad? Go to the river Tigris; for it is behind this mound.¹⁹ So Er-Rasheed went round behind the mound, and descended to the river Tigris, and drank, and watered his mule. Then he went up immediately, and, returning to Khaleefeh the fisherman, said to him, Wherefore, O man, art thou standing here, and what is thine occupation? Khaleefeh replied, Verily this question is more wonderful and more extraordinary than thy question respecting the water. Dost thou not see the apparatus of my occupation upon my shoulder? — Er Rasheed therefore said to him, It seemeth that thou art a fisherman. He replied, Yes. — Where then, said Er-Rasheed, is thy jubbeh, and where is thy shemleh,²⁰ and where is thy herám,²¹ and where are thy clothes? — Now the things that had gone from Khaleefeh were like those which he mentioned to him, article agreeing with article: so when Khaleefeh heard those words of the Khaleefeh, he imagined in his mind that he was the person who had taken his clothes from the bank of the river. He therefore descended immediately from the top of the mound, more swiftly than the blinding lightning, and, seizing the bridle of the mule of the Khaleefeh, said to him, O man, give me my things, and desist from sport and jesting. So the Khaleefeh replied, I, by Allah, have not seen thy clothes, nor do I know them. And Er-Rasheed had large cheeks, and a small mouth: wherefore Khaleefeh said to him, Probably thine occupation is that of a singer, or a piper? But give me my clothes, by the means that are best, or else I will beat thee with this staff so that thou shalt find thyself in an evil plight.

And when the Khaleefeh saw the staff in Khaleefeh's hand, he said within himself, By Allah, I cannot endure from this pauper half a blow with this staff. And there was upon Er-Rasheed a long vest of satin: so he pulled it off, and said to Khaleefeh, O man, take this vest instead of thy clothes. Khaleefeh therefore took it, and turned it over, and said, Verily my clothes are worth ten such things as this variegated cloak. Er-Rasheed however replied, Wear it till I bring thee thine own clothes. And Khaleefeh took it and put it on; but he saw it to be too long for him; and, having with him a knife tied to the handle of the basket, he took it and cut off with it from the lower part of the vest as much as one third of it, so that it reached but just below his knees.

He then looked towards Er-Rasheed, and said to him, By Allah I conjure thee, O piper, that thou inform me what is the amount of thy wages that thou receivest every month from thy master, for the art of piping. The Khaleefeh replied, My wages every month are ten pieces of gold. And upon this, Khaleefeh said to him, By Allah, O poor man, thou hast made me to partake of thine anxiety! By Allah, the sum of ten pieces of gold I gain every day! Dost thou desire, then, to be with me as my servant? If so, I will teach thee the art of fishing, and be partner with thee in the gain. Thus thou wilt work every day at the rate of five pieces of gold, and be my young man, and I will protect thee from thy master with this staff. — And Er-Rasheed answered him, I will consent to that. So Khaleefeh said to him, Alight now from the back of the ass, and tie it, that it may be of use to us hereafter in carrying the fish; and come, that I may teach thee the art of fishing immediately. And thereupon Er-Rasheed alighted from the back of his mule, and tied it, and tucked up his skirts within the circle of his girdle. Kahleefeh then said to him, O piper, hold this net so, and put it upon thine arm so, and cast it into the river Tigris so. And Er-Rasheed fortified his heart, and did as Khaleefeh shewed him. He cast the net in the river, and pulled it; but could not draw it up. Khaleefeh therefore came to him, and pulled it with him; but they could not draw it up together. So Khaleefeh said to him, O ill-omened piper, if I took thy cloak instead of my clothes the first time, this time I will take thine ass for my net, if I see it mangled, and I will beat thee until thou shalt be in an abominable condition. Er-Rasheed replied, Let me and thee pull together.

And the two together pulled the net, and they could not draw up that net save with difficulty; and when they had drawn it up, they looked at it, and, lo, it was full of all kinds of fish. Upon this, Khaleefeh said to Er-Rasheed, By Allah, O piper, verily thou art an ugly fellow; but when thou shalt have laboured at fishing, thou wilt be an excellent fisherman. And now, the right opinion is this: that thou mount thine ass, and go to the market, and bring two great baskets, and I will take care of these fish until thou come again, when I and thou will put them upon the back of thine ass; and I have the pair of scales and the pound-weights and every thing that we require. We will take all with us, and thou wilt have nothing to do but to hold the pair of scales and to receive the prices; for we have with us fish worth twenty pieces of gold. Hasten then to bring the two great baskets, and delay not. — And the Khaleefeh replied, I hear and obey.

He left him, and left the fish, and urged on his mule, being in a state of the utmost joy. He ceased not to laugh at what had happened to him with the fisherman until he came to Jaafar; and when Jaafar saw him, he said to him, O Prince of the Faithful, probably when thou wentest to drink, thou foundest a pleasant garden, and enteredst it and divertedst thyself in it alone. And Er-Rasheed, on his hearing the words of Jaafar, laughed. Then all the Barmekees kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O Prince of the Faithful, may God perpetuate thy joys, and dispel from thee troubles! What was the cause of thy delay when thou wentest to drink, and what happened to thee? — And the Khaleefeh answered them, An extraordinary event, and a mirth-exciting, wonderful thing hath happened to me. Then he repeated to them the story of Khaleefeh the fisherman, and what had happened to him with him; his saying, Thou hast stolen my clothes, — and his having given him his vest, and the fisherman's having cut off a part of the vest on his seeing it to be too long for him. And Jafaar said, By Allah, O Prince of the Faithful, it was my wish to have requested of thee the vest; but I will go immediately to the fisherman and purchase it of him. So the Khaleefeh said to him, By Allah, he hath cut off a third of it, from its lower part, and hath entirely spoiled it; but, O Jaafar, I am fatigued by my fishing in the river; for I have caught a great quantity of fish, and they are upon the bank of the river, with my teacher Khaleefeh. He is standing there waiting for me to return to him, and to take to him two great baskets. Then I and he are to go to the market, and we are to sell the fish, and divide their price. — Jaafar replied, O Prince of the Faithful, I will bring to you one who will purchase of you. And the Khaleefeh said to him, O Jaafar, by my pure forefathers, to every one who bringeth me a fish from among those which are before Khaleefeh, who taught me the art of fishing, I will give for it a piece of gold! The crier therefore proclaimed among the troops, Go ye forth and purchase fish for the Prince of the Faithful!

Accordingly the memlooks went forth, repairing to the bank of the river; and while Khaleefeh was waiting for the Prince of the Faithful to bring to him two great baskets, lo, the memlooks pounced upon him like eagles, and took the fish, and put them in gold-embroidered handkerchiefs, and proceeded to beat each other to get at him. So Khaleefeh said, No doubt these fish are the fish of Paradise! Then, taking two fish in his right hand, and two in his left hand, he descended into the water to his throat, and began to say, O Allah, by these fish, let thy servant the piper, my partner, come immediately! ²² And, lo, a black slave advanced to him, and that slave was the chief over all the black slaves that were in the palace of the Khaleefeh. The cause of his having come later than the memlooks was an impediment that occurred to him on the way. So when he came to Khaleefeh, he found that there remained not of the fish little nor much; but looking to the right and left, he saw Khaleefeh the fisherman standing in the water with the fish in his hands; and thereupon he said to him, O fisherman, come hither! The fisherman replied, Go, without impertinence. The eunuch however advanced to him, and said to him, Give me these fish, and I will give thee the price. Khaleefeh the fisherman rejoined, Art thou of little sense? I will not sell them.

But the eunuch drew forth against him the mace: so thereupon Khaleefeh said to him, Strike not, O wretch: for the conferring of a favour is better than the mace! Then he threw to him the fish, and the eunuch took them, and placed them in his handkerchief, and put his hand into his pocket; but found not a single piece of silver. He therefore said, O fisherman, verily thy fortune is unlucky! I, by Allah, have not with me any money. But to-morrow come thou to the palace of the Khaleefeh, and say, Direct me to the eunuch Sandal. Thereupon the eunuchs will direct thee to me; and when thou hast come to me there, thou wilt obtain what is decreed for thee, and thou shalt receive it and go thy way.

So upon this, Khaleefeh said, Verily this day is blessed, and its blessing was apparent from its commencement! ²³ Then he took his net upon his shoulder, and walked on until he entered Baghdád, and he walked along the streets. The people therefore saw the garment of the Khaleefeh upon him, and they continued looking at him until he entered the quarter [where he lived]. And the shop of the tailor of the Prince of the Faithful was by the gate of the quarter: so the tailor saw Khaleefeh the fisherman having upon him a garment worth a thousand pieces of gold, of the apparel of the Khaleefeh; and he said, O Khaleefeh, whence obtainedst thou this farajeeh? Khaleefeh replied, And what reason hast thou to be impertinent? I received it from him whom I have taught the art of fishing, and who hath become my young man, and I have remitted to him the amputation of his hand; ²⁴ for he stole my clothes, and gave me this cloak instead of them. — The tailor therefore knew that the Khaleefeh had passed by him, while he was fishing, and had jested with him, and given him the farajeeyeh. Then the fisherman went to his abode.

Now the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed had not gone forth to the chase save in order that he might be diverted from thinking of the slave-girl Koot-el-Kuloob. And when Zubeydeh heard of the slave-girl, and of the Khaleefeh's devotion to her, that jealousy which seizes women so seized her that she abstained from food and drink, and relinquished the delight of sleep; and she waited for the absence of the Khaleefeh, and his going forth on a journey, that she might set, for Koot-el-Kuloob, the snare of stratagems. Therefore when she knew that the Khaleefeh had gone forth to hunt, she ordered the female slaves to spread the furniture in the palace, and she made a profuse display of decoration and magnificence, caused the viands and the sweetmeats to be placed, and prepared, among these, a China dish containing sweetmeat of the most dainty kind, in which she put some benj, infusing it therewith. She then ordered one of the eunuchs to go to the slave-girl Koot-el-Kuloob, to invite her to partake of the food of the lady Zubeydeh the daughter of El-Kásim, the wife of the Prince of the Faithful, and to say to her, The wife of the Prince of the Faithful hath drunk to-day some medicine, and she hath heard of the sweetness of thy melody, wherefore she desireth to divert herself by hearing somewhat of thy performance. — And she replied, I hear and obey God and the lady Zubeydeh. She arose immediately, not knowing what was secretly decreed to befall her, and, taking with her what instruments she required, she accompanied the eunuch, and ceased not to proceed until she went in to the lady Zubeydeh, when she kissed the ground before her many times; after which she rose upon her feet and said, Peace be on the lady of the highly-honoured curtain and the unapproachable majesty, the descendant of El-'Abbás and the member of the family of the Prophet! May God cause thee to obtain prosperity and peace during the course of days and years!

Then she stood among the female slaves and the eunuchs; and thereupon the lady Zubeydeh raised her head towards her, and contemplated her beauty and loveliness; and she saw a damsel with smooth cheeks, with a bosom presenting the similitude of two pomegranates, and a brilliant countenance and shining forehead and large black eyes. Her eyelids were languishing, and her face was beauteously bright. The splendour of her countenance was like that of the rising sun; and the hair over her forehead like the darkness of night; and her odour, like the fragrance diffused by musk; and her beauty, like charming flowers; and her forehead, like the moon; and her figure, like the waving branch. She was like the full moon shining in the dark night, and her eyes were amorous, and her eyebrows were arched, and her lips were as though they were formed of coral. She amazed by her beauty every one who beheld her, and enchanted with her eye every one who saw her. Glory be to Him who created her and perfected her and completed her! She was like her of whom the poet hath said,—

When she is incensed, thou seest men slain; and when she is pleased, their souls return. She hath eyes the glances of which are enchanting: with them she killeth and reanimateth whom she will.

She captivateth all creatures with her eyes; and it seemeth as though they were her slaves.

The lady Zubeydeh said to her, A friendly and free and an ample welcome to thee, O Koot-el-Kuloob! Sit, that thou mayest amuse us with thy performances and the excellence of thine art. — So she replied, I hear and obey. And she sat, and, putting forth her hand, she took the tambourine; and after that, the shebbábéh; ²⁵ and next, the lute; and she played fourteen tunes, and sang to it an entire piece in such a manner that she amazed the beholders, and moved with delight the hearers. And after that, she exhibited her skill in juggling and sleights, and every pleasing art, so that the lady Zubeydeh almost became enamoured of her, and said within herself, The son of my uncle, Er-Rasheed, is not to be blamed for his passion for her. Then the damsel kissed the ground before Zubeydeh, and sat down; and they presented to her the viands; and afterwards, the sweetmeat; and they presented the dish in which was the benj. So she ate of it; and the sweetmeat had not settled in her stomach before her head turned over and she fell down on the floor asleep; whereupon the lady Zubeydeh said to the female slaves. Take her up to one of the private chambers, and there leave her until I require her to be brought. And they replied, We hear and obey. She then said to one of the eunuchs, Make for us a chest, and bring it to me. And she gave orders to make the semblance of a tomb, and to spread a report that the damsel had been choked and had died. She also warned her chief attendants, that whoever should say that she was living, that person's head should be struck off. — And, lo, the Khaleefeh then came back from the chase, and his first inquiry was respecting the damsel. So one of his eunuchs advanced to him; and the lady Zubeydeh had charged him that, if the Khaleefeh should ask him respecting her, he should say she had died: wherefore he kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O my lord, may thy head long survive! Know for certain that Koot-el-Kuloob hath been choked with food, and hath died.

Upon this, the Khaleefeh said, May God not rejoice thee with good tidings, O wicked slave! He then arose and entered the palace, and heard of her death from every one in it; and he said, Where is her tomb? They therefore conducted him thither, and shewed him the tomb that had been made for deception, saying to him, This is her tomb. And when he saw it, he cried out, and embraced the tomb, and wept, and recited some verses. He wept for her violently, and remained there some time; after which he arose and quitted the tomb, in a state of the utmost grief. So the lady Zubeydeh knew that her stratagem had been accomplished, and she said to the eunuch, Bring the chest. He therefore brought it before her; and she caused the damsel to be brought, and put her in it, and said to the eunuch, Endeavour to sell the chest, make it a condition with the purchaser that he shall purchase it locked: then give its price in alms. And the eunuch took it and went forth from her, and complied with her command.

But as to Khaleefeh the fisherman, when the morning came and diffused its light and shone, he said, I have no occupation to follow this day better than my going to the eunuch who bought of me the fish; for he made an appointment with me that I should go to him in the palace of the Khaleefeh. He then went forth from his abode to repair to the palace of the Khaleefeh; and when he arrived at it, he found the memlooks and the black slaves and the eunuchs sitting and standing. So he looked attentively at them, and, lo, the eunuch who took from him the fish was sitting there, with the memlooks in attendance upon him. And one of the memlooks called out to him; whereupon the eunuch looked towards him, to see who he was; and, behold, he saw the fisherman. Therefore when the fisherman knew that he saw him, and recognized his person with certainty, he said to him, Thou hast not failed in thy duty, O Shukeyr! ²⁶ Thus are persons of fidelity! — And the eunuch, on hearing his words, laughed at him, and replied, By Allah, thou hast spoken truth, O fisherman! Then the eunuch Sandal desired to give him something, and put his hand to his pocket.

But just then a great clamour arose: so the eunuch raised his head, to see what had happened; and, lo, the Wezeer Jaafar El-Barmekkee was coming forth from the Khaleefeh. Therefore when the eunuch saw him, he rose to him, and walked before him, and they both proceeded to converse together as they walked until the time became tedious. Khaleefeh the fisherman waited a considerable while, during which the eunuch looked not towards him; and when his standing was tedious to him, the fisherman placed himself opposite to him, but at a distance from him, and, making a sign to him with his hand, said, O my master Shukeyr, let me go! And the eunuch heard him, but was ashamed to return him a reply, on account of the presence of the Wezeer Jaafar. He continued to converse with the Wezeer, and so to divert himself from attending to the fisherman. So Khaleefeh said, O delayer of the payment of thy debt, may God disgrace every sulky person, and every one who taketh the goods of others and acteth sulkily to them! I place myself under thy protection, O my master Kerish-en-Nukhál, ²⁷ begging thee to give me what is my due, that I may go!

The eunuch heard him; but he was abashed at Jaafar; and Jaafar also saw him as he made signs with his hands and talked to the eunuch, though he knew not what he said to him; and he said to the eunuch, disapproving of his conduct, O eunuch, what doth this poor beggar demand of thee? Sandal the eunuch therefore said to him, Dost thou not know this man, O our lord the Wezeer? The Wezeer Jaafar answered, By Allah, I do not know him! And how (he added) should I know this man when I have not seen him before the present time? — So the eunuch replied, O our lord, this is the fisherman whose fish we seized from the bank of the Tigris. I got not any, and was ashamed to return to the Prince of the Faithful without aught, all the memlooks having taken. But when I came to him, I found him standing in the midst of the river, supplicating God, and having with him four fish. I therefore said to him, Give me what thou hast with thee, and receive their price. And when he gave me the fish, I put my hand into my pocket, desiring to give him something; but found not in it aught: wherefore I said to him, Come to me in the palace, and I will give thee something by means of which thou mayest seek aid against thy poverty. Accordingly he came to me this day, and I put forth my hand with the desire of giving him something, and thou camest: so I arose to wait upon thee, and was diverted by thee from attending to him, and the case became tedious to him. This is his story, and this is the reason of his standing here.

And when the Wezeer heard the words of the eunuch, he smiled at them, and said, O eunuch, how is it that this fisherman hath come in the time of his need, and thou hast not accomplished his affair? Dost thou not know him, O chief of the eunuchs? — He answered, No. And Jaafar said, This is the teacher of the Prince of the Faithful, and his partner; and our lord the Khaleefeh hath risen this day with contracted bosom, mourning heart, and troubled mind, and there is nothing that will dilate his bosom except this fisherman. So let him not go until I consult the Khaleefeh respecting him, and bring him before him. Perhaps God will dispel his grief, and console him for the loss of Koot-el-Kuloob, by means of his presence, and he will give him something wherewith to seek for himself aid; and thou wilt be the cause of that. — The eunuch therefore replied, O my lord, do what thou desirest; and may God (whose name be exalted!) preserve thee as a pillar of the dynasty of the Prince of the Faithful! May God perpetuate its shadow, and keep its branch and its root!

The Wezeer Jaafar then went to the Khaleefeh, and the eunuch commanded the memlooks that they should not quit the fisherman. So thereupon Khaleefeh the fisherman said, How excellent is thy beneficence, O Shukeyr! The demander hath become demanded; for I came to demand my money, and they have imprisoned me for the arrears! ²⁸ — And when Jaafar went in to the Khaleefeh, he saw him sitting, hanging down his head towards the ground, with contracted bosom, full of solicitude, singing some plaintive verses; and Jaafar, standing before him, said, Peace be on thee, O Prince of the Faithful, and defender of the dignity of the religion, and descendant of the uncle of the Chief of Apostles — may God bless and save him and all his family! — The Khaleefeh therefore raised his head, and replied, And on thee be peace, and the mercy of God, and his blessings! And Jaafar said, With the permission of the Prince of the Faithful, may his servant speak, and not be restrained? The Khaleefeh replied, And when was restraint as to speech put upon thee? Thou, being the chief of the Wezeers, shalt speak what thou wilt. — So the Wezeer Jaafar said to him, I went forth, O our lord, from before thee, desiring to repair to my house, and I saw thy master and thy teacher and thy partner, Khaleefeh the fisherman, standing at the gate, and he was displeased with thee, and was complaining of thee, and saying, Extolled be the perfection of-God! I have taught him the art of fishing, and he went to bring me two great baskets, and returned not to me; and this is not consistent with the condition of partnership nor the condition of teachers. — Therefore if thou desire to be a partner, no harm: but if not, inform him, that he may take some other than thyself as partner.

And when the Khaleefeh heard his words, he smiled, and the contraction of the bosom that he suffered ceased; and he said to Jaafar, By my life I conjure thee to tell me, is it true that thou sayest, that the fisherman is standing at the gate? Jaafar answered, By thy life, O Prince of the Faithful, he is standing at the gate. And thereupon the Khaleefeh said, O Jaafar, by Allah, I will assuredly endeavour to accomplish that which is his due; and if God send him, by my means, misery, he obtaineth it; and if He send him, by my means, prosperity, he obtaineth it. Then the Khaleefeh took a piece of paper, and cut it in pieces, and said, O Jaafar, write with thine own hand twenty sums of money, from a piece of gold to a thousand pieces of gold; and the posts of Wálee and Emeers, from the least office to that of Wezeer;²⁹ and twenty kinds of punishment, from the slightest chastisement to slaughter. And Jaafar replied, I hear and obey, O Prince of the Faithful. He wrote the papers with his own hand, as the Khaleefeh commanded him; and after that, the Khaleefeh said, O Jaafar, I swear by my pure forefathers, and my connection by lineage with Hamzeh and 'Akeel,³⁰ that I desire to cause Khaleefeh the fisherman to be brought, and I will order him to take one of these papers, the inscription of which none shall know except me and thee; and whatever is written upon it, I will give him possession thereof: even if upon it be written the office of Wezeer, I will make him possessor of it; and if upon it be written hanging, or amputation, or slaughter, I will do unto him accordingly. So go, and bring him unto me.

When Jaafar, therefore, heard these words, he said within himself, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Perhaps there will prove to be the lot of this poor man something that will occasion his destruction, and I shall be the cause. But the Khaleefeh hath sworn: so it only remaineth for him to enter; and nought will happen but what God desireth. — He then went to Khaleefeh the fisherman, and laid hold of his hand, desiring to enter with him; and upon this, the reason of Khaleefeh fled from his head, and he said within himself, How have I trifled, that I have come to this ill-omened slave Shukeyr, and he hath brought me into the company of Kerish-en-Nukhál! Jaafar ceased not to proceed with him, the memlooks being behind him and before him, and Khaleefeh saying, Is not imprisonment enough, that these are behind me and before me, preventing my fleeing? — Jaafar still went on with him until he had passed through seven antechambers, when he said to Khaleefeh, Wo to thee, O fisherman! Thou wilt stand before the Prince of the Faithful, and the defender of the dignity of the religion. — Then he raised the grand curtain, and the eye of Khaleefeh the fisherman fell upon the Khaleefeh, who was sitting upon his couch, with the lords of the empire standing in attendance upon him; and when he knew him, he advanced to him and said, A friendly and free welcome to thee, O piper! It is not right in thee to become a fisherman, and leave me sitting to keep watch over the fish, and go, and not return, so that I was not aware when the memlooks advanced, upon beasts of various colours, and snatched the fish from me, while I stood alone. All this was occasioned by thee; for if thou hadst come with the great baskets, quickly, we should have sold of them for a hundred pieces of gold. But I came to demand my due, and they imprisoned me. And who imprisoned thee also in this place? — And the Khaleefeh smiled, and, lifting up the edge of the curtain, put forth his head from beneath it, and said to him, Advance, and take for thee one of these papers.

So Khaleefeh the fisherman said to the Prince of the Faithful, Thou wast a fisherman, and I see thee to-day to have become an astrologer. But when a man's trades become many, his poverty becometh great. — Upon this, Jaafar said, Take the paper speedily, without talking, and do as the Prince of the Faithful hath commanded thee. Accordingly Khaleefeh the fisherman advanced, and put forth his hand, and said, Far be it from me that this piper should be again my young man, and fish with me! He then took the paper, and handed it to the Khaleefeh, and said, O piper, what hath proved to be written upon it as my lot? Conceal not of it aught. — The Khaleefeh therefore took it and handed it to the Wezeer Jaafar, saying to him, Read what is upon it. And Jaafar looked at it, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! So the Khaleefeh said, Good news,³¹ O Jaafar! What hast thou seen upon it? — He answered, O Prince of the Faithful, there hath proved to be written upon the paper, The fisherman shall receive a hundred blows with a staff. And thereupon the Khaleefeh commanded that he should have a hundred blows with a staff inflicted upon him; and they complied with his command; and when they had done so, Khaleefeh arose, saying, Accursed be this game, O Kerish-en-Nukhál! Are imprisonment and beating among the conditions of the game?

Upon this, Jaafar said, O Prince of the Faithful, this poor man hath come to the great river,³² and how shall he return thirsty? We hope that by the beneficence of the Prince of the Faithful he may be allowed to take for himself another paper, and perhaps there may prove to be written upon it as his lot something good, so that he may return with it, to have recourse to it for aid against his poverty. — The Khaleefeh replied, By Allah, O Jaafar, if he take a paper, and slaughter prove to be the lot written for him upon it, I will assuredly slay him, and thou wilt be the cause. Jaafar rejoined, If he die, he will be at rest. And upon this, Khaleefeh the fisherman said to him, May God not rejoice thee with good tidings! Have I made Baghdád strait unto you, that ye seek my slaughter? — But Jaafar replied, Take for thyself a paper, and beg success of God, whose name be exalted! And he put forth his hand, and took a paper, and gave it to Jaafar, who took it from him, and read it, and was silent. The Khaleefeh therefore said to him, Why art thou silent, O son of Yahyà? He answered, O Prince of the Faithful, there hath proven to be written upon the paper, The fisherman shall not be given any thing. And the Khaleefeh said, There is no good fortune for him to obtain from us. Tell him to depart from before my face. — But Jaafar said, By thy pure forefathers, let him take the third! Perhaps good fortune may betide him by it. — And the Khaleefeh replied, Let him take for himself one paper more, and nought beside it. So he stretched forth his hand, and took the third paper; and, lo, on it was written, The fisherman shall be given a piece of gold. Jaafar therefore said to Khaleefeh, I sought for thee prosperity; but God would not that aught should fall to thy lot save this piece of gold. Khaleefeh replied, Every hundred blows with a staff for a piece of gold are abundant good fortune. May God not make thy body to be healthy! — And the Khaleefeh laughed at him.

Jaafar then took the hand of Khaleefeh, and went forth with him; and when he came to the gate, Sandal the eunuch saw him, and said to him, Come hither, O fisherman! Bestow upon us a present from that which the Prince of the Faithful hath given thee while jesting with thee — And Khaleefeh replied, By Allah, thou hast spoken truth, O Shukeyr! And dost thou desire to share with me, O black-skinned, when I have had a hundred blows with a staff and received one piece of gold? Thou art absolved of responsibility with respect to it. — Then he threw the piece of gold to the eunuch, and went forth, his tears running down upon the surface of his cheek. So when the eunuch saw him in this state, he knew that he had spoken truth: he therefore went towards him, and called out to the pages, Bring him back! Accordingly they brought him back; and the eunuch put his hand to his pocket, and took forth from it a red purse, which he opened and shook, and, lo, in it were a hundred pieces of gold; and he said, O fisherman, take this gold as the price of thy fish, and go thy way. So thereupon, Khaleefeh the fisherman rejoiced.

He took the hundred pieces of gold, and the Khaleefeh's piece of gold, and went forth; he had forgotten the beating. And as God (whose name be exalted!) desired the accomplishment of an event that He had decreed, Khaleefeh the fisherman passed through the market for female slaves; and he saw a large ring of persons, comprising many people; upon which he said within himself, What are these people? Then he advanced and made his way among the people, who consisted of merchants and others; and the merchants said, Make room for the nákhoodah Zuleyt! ³³ So they made room for him; and Khaleefeh looked, and lo, there was a sheykh upon his feet; and before him was a chest, upon which was sitting a eunuch; and the sheykh was crying and saying, O merchants, O possessors of riches, who will hazard and hasten to give his money for this chest of which the contents are unknown, from the palace of the lady Zubeydeh the daughter of El-Kásim, the wife of the Prince of the Faithful, Er-Rasheed? At what sum shall it be announced for you? May God bless you! — Upon this, one of the merchants said, By Allah, this is a hazarding; but I will say something for which I shall not be blamable. Be it mine for twenty pieces of gold. — Another said, For fifty pieces of gold. And the merchants increased their biddings for it until the sum offered amounted to a hundred pieces of gold; when the crier said, Have ye any addition to make, O merchants? And Khaleefeh the fisherman said, Be it mine for a hundred pieces of gold and one. So when the merchants heard the words of Khaleefeh, they imagined that he was jesting; and they laughed at him, and said, O eunuch, sell it to Khaleefeh for the hundred pieces of gold and one. And the eunuch replied, By Allah, I will not sell it save to him! Take it, O fisherman. May God bless thee in it! And give me the gold.

Khaleefeh therefore took forth the gold, and delivered it to the eunuch, and the contract was concluded. The eunuch then gave away the gold in alms in the place where he stood, and returned to the palace, and acquainted the lady Zubeydeh with that which he had done; whereat she rejoiced. Khaleefeh the fisherman took the chest upon his shoulder; but he could not carry it so, on account of the greatness of its weight; wherefore he carried it upon his head, and came with it to the quarter in which he dwelt, and put it down from his head. He had become fatigued; and he sat meditating upon the events that had happened to him, and began to say within himself, Would that I knew what is in this chest! Then he opened the door of his abode, and laboured to remove the chest until he had brought it into his abode; after which he laboured to open it; but was not able. So he said within himself, What hath happened to my reason, that I have bought this chest? I must break it, and see what is in it. — And he applied himself to open the lock; but could not; and he said within himself, I will leave it till the morrow.

He then desired to sleep; but found not a place in which to sleep, for the chest was just of the size of the chamber in length and breadth. He therefore got upon it, and slept on it; and after he had remained a while, something moved; whereupon Khaleefeh was frightened, and sleep fled from him, and his reason also took flight. He arose and said, It seemeth that there are Jinn in it. Praise be to God who caused me not to open it! For if I had opened it, they would have come upon me in the dark and destroyed me, and no good would have betided me from them. — Then he returned and lay down again; and lo, the chest moved a second time, more than the first time. Khaleefeh therefore arose and stood up, and said, This is another time; but it is alarming! And he hastened to get a lamp; but found it not, and he had not aught wherewith to buy a lamp. So he went forth from the house, and called out, O people of the quarter! And most of the people of the quarter were sleeping; and they awoke at his cry, and said, What aileth thee, O Khaleefeh? He answered, Come to me with a lamp; for the Jinn have come forth upon me! They therefore laughed at him, and gave him a lamp, and he took it and went with it into his abode. He then beat the lock of the chest with a stone, and broke it, and opened the chest; and, lo, he beheld a damsel like a hooreeyeh, lying in the chest.

She had been stupefied with benj, and having then vomited the benj, and recovered her senses, she opened her eyes, and became sensible of her confinement, and moved. So when Khaleefeh saw her, he rose to her, and said, By Allah, O my mistress, whence art thou? And she opened her eyes, and said, Bring me Yásemeen and Narjis.³⁴ Khaleefeh replied, There is nothing here but temer-hennà.³⁵ And upon this she recovered her consciousness, and, seeing Khaleefeh, she said to him, What art thou? Then she said, And where am I? He answered her, Thou art in my house. She said, Am I not in the palace of the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed? He replied, What is Er-Rasheed, O mad woman? Thou art nought but my slave-girl, and this day I bought thee for a hundred pieces of gold and one, and brought thee to my house, and thou wast in this chest, asleep. — And when the damsel heard his words, she said to him, What is thy name? He answered, My name is Khaleefeh. And how is it (he added) that my star hath become fortunate, when I know that my star was not so? — And she laughed and said, Cease to trouble me with these words. Hast thou any thing to be eaten? — He answered, By Allah, I have not even any thing to be drunk; and I, by Allah, have passed two days without eating aught, and I am now in want of a morsel. So she said to him, Hast thou not any money? He replied, Allah preserve this chest which hath reduced me to poverty! For I have given what I had for it, and become a bankrupt. — And the damsel laughed at him, and said, Arise, seek of thy neighbours something that I may eat; for I am hungry.

Khaleefeh therefore arose and went forth from the chamber, and cried out, O people of the quarter! And they were sleeping: so they awoke and said, What aileth thee, O Khaleefeh? He answered, O my neighbours, I am hungry, and I have not any thing for me to eat. And upon this, one came down to him with a cake of bread, and another with a fragment of bread, and another with a bit of cheese, and another with a cucumber. Thus his lap was filled, and he entered the chamber, and put the whole before her, saying to her, Eat. But she laughed at him, and said to him, How shall I eat of this, when I have not a mug of water whereof to drink, so that I fear I may be choked with a morsel, and die? Khaleefeh therefore said, I will fill for thee this jar. And he took the jar, and went forth into the midst of the quarter, and called out, O people of the quarter! So they said to him, What is thy misfortune this night, O Khaleefeh? And he answered them, Ye gave me, and I have eaten; but I am thirsty: therefore give me to drink.

And this one came down to him with a mug, and this with a ewer, and this with a water-bottle; and he filled the jar, went with it into the chamber, and said to the damsel, O my mistress, there remaineth to thee no want. She replied, True: there remaineth to me no want at present. He then said to her, Speak to me, and tell me thy story. And she replied, Wo to thee! If thou know me not, I will acquaint thee with myself. I am Koot-el-Kuloob, the slave-girl of the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed. The lady Zubeydeh hath become jealous of me, and stupefied me with benj, and put me into this chest. — Then she said, Praise be to God that this easy event happened, and that another event happened not! But this happened not to me save for the sake of thy good fortune; for thou wilt undoubtedly receive from the Khaleefeh Er-Rasheed a large sum of money, that will be the cause of thy becoming rich. — Upon this, Khaleefeh said to her, Is not he Er-Rasheed in whose palace I was imprisoned? She answered, Yes. And he said, By Allah, I have not beheld any one more avaricious than he, that piper of little goodness and intellect! For he caused me to receive, yesterday, a hundred blows with a staff, and gave me one piece of gold, although I had taught him the art of fishing, and made him my partner; and he acted perfidiously to me. — So she said to him, Abstain from this foul language, and open thine eyes, and behave respectfully when thou seest him after this; for if so, thou wilt attain thy desire. And when he heard her words, he was as though he had been sleeping, and awoke; and God removed the veil from the judgment, for the sake of his good fortune; wherefore he replied, On the head and the eye. Then he said to her, In the name of Allah, sleep.

According she arose, and laid herself down and slept, and he slept at a distance from her until the morning; and when she arose in the morning, she demanded of him an inkhorn and a piece of paper. So he brought them to her; and she wrote to the merchant who was the companion of the Khaleefeh, acquainting him with her case, and the events that had happened to her; that she was in the abode of Khaleefeh the fisherman, and that he had purchased her. Then she gave to him the paper, and said to him, Take this paper, and go with it to the jewel-market, and inquire for the shop of Ibn-El-Kirnás the jeweller, and give him this paper without speaking. Khaleefeh therefore replied, I hear and obey. He took the paper from her hand, and went with it to the jewel-market, and inquired for the shop of Ibn-El-Kirnás. So they directed him to it, and he came to him and saluted him, and he returned his salutation, but despised him, and said to him, What dost thou want? And he handed to him the paper, which he took; but he read it not, imagining that he was a pauper, who desired of him an alms; wherefore he said to one of his pages, Give him half a piece of silver. So Khaleefeh said to him, I have no need of alms; but read thou the paper.

He therefore took the paper and read it, and he understood its contents; and when he knew what it contained, he kissed it, and put it on his head, and, rising, he said to Khaleefeh, O my brother, where is thy house? Khaleefeh said to him, And what desirest thou with regard to my house? Is it thy desire to go to it to steal my slave-girl? — He answered him, No: but I will buy for thee something that thou shalt eat with her. So thereupon Khaleefeh replied, My abode is in such a quarter. And the jeweller said to him, Thou hast done well. May God not give thee health, O unfortunate! ³⁶ — Then he cried out to two of his black slaves, and said to them, Go with this man to the shop of Mohsin the money-changer, and say to him, O Mohsin, give this person a thousand pieces of gold, — and return ye with him to me speedily. — Accordingly the two slaves went with Khaleefeh to the shop of the money-changer, and said to him, O Mohsin, give this man a thousand pieces of gold. He therefore gave him them, and Khaleefeh took them, and returned with the two slaves to the shop of their master; whom they found riding upon a light-paced mule worth a thousand pieces of gold, with the memlooks and pages around him, and by the side of his mule was a mule like it, saddled and bridled. The jeweller then said to Khaleefeh, In the name of Allah, mount this mule. But Khaleefeh replied, I will not mount. By Allah, I fear that she would throw me. — The merchant Ibn-El-Kirnás, however, said to him, By Allah, thou must mount. So Khaleefeh advanced to mount her, and he mounted her back-foremost, and laid hold of her tail, and cried out; whereupon she threw him on the ground, and the people laughed at him; and he rose and said, Did I not say to thee, I will not mount this great ass?

Then Ibn-El-Kirnás left Khaleefeh in the market, and went to the Prince of the Faithful, and gave him information of the damsel; after which he returned, and removed her to his own house. And Khaleefeh went to his house to see the damsel, and beheld the people of the quarter assembled, and saying, Verily Khaleefeh is to-day altogether terrified! ³⁷ Whence can this damsel have come into his possession? — And one of them said, This man is a mad rascal. Probably he found her in the way, intoxicated, and carried her and brought her to his house, and hath not absented himself save because he knew his crime. — And while they were talking, lo, Khaleefeh approached them; and they said to him, How is thy condition, O poor man? Dost thou not know what hath happened to thee? — He answered, No, by Allah. And they said, Just now some memlooks came and took thy slave-girl, and they sought thee, but found thee not. So Khaleefeh said, How did they take my slave-girl? And one said, Had he fallen in their way, they had slain him. And Khaleefeh paid no regard to them; but returned running to the shop of Ibn-El-Kirnás; and he saw him riding, and said to him, By Allah, it is not right in thee; for thou divertedst my attention, and sentest thy memlooks, and they have taken my slave-girl. And he replied, O madman, come hither, and be thou silent!

Then he took him and conducted him to a house of handsome construction, which he entered with him, and he saw the damsel sitting in it upon a couch of gold, surrounded by ten slave-girls resembling moons. And when Ibn-El-Kirnás saw her, he kissed the ground before her; and she said to him, What hast thou done with my new master, who purchased me with all that he possessed? He answered her, O my mistress, I have given him a thousand pieces of gold. And he related to her the story of Khaleefeh from its beginning to its end; whereupon she laughed, and said, Blame him not; for he is a man of the vulgar class. Then she said, And these thousand pieces of gold besides are a present from me to him; and if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), he shall receive from the Khaleefeh what will enrich him.

Now while they were talking, lo, a eunuch from the palace of the Khaleefeh advanced, demanding Koot-el-Kuloob; for the Khaleefeh knew that she was in the house of Ibn-El-Kirnás, and when he knew that, he could not endure her absence, wherefore he gave orders to bring her. And when she went to him, she took Khaleefeh with her. She went on until she approached the Khaleefeh; and on her coming to him, she kissed the ground before him; and he rose to her and saluted her and welcomed her, and asked her how had been her state with him who had purchased her. So she answered him, He is a man named Khaleefeh the fisherman, and here he is, standing at the gate; and he hath mentioned to me that he hath a reckoning to make with our lord the Prince of the Faithful, on account of the partnership that was between him and the Prince of the Faithful in the trade of fishing. Upon this the Khaleefeh said, Is he standing there? She answered, Yes. And he gave orders to bring him. Therefore he came; and he kissed the ground before the Khaleefeh, and prayed for the continuance of his glory and blessings; and the Khaleefeh wondered at him, and laughed at him, and asked him how he had conducted himself to Koot-el-Kuloob. So he told him that he had treated her respectfully, and he repeated to him the account of all that had happened to him from first to last, while the Khaleefeh laughed at him. He told him the story of the eunuch, and what happened to him with him, and how he gave him the hundred pieces of gold, in addition to the piece of gold that he had received from the Khaleefeh. He told him also of his entering the market, and his buying the chest for the hundred pieces of gold and one, not knowing what was in it; and he related to him the whole story, from the beginning to the end.

And the Khaleefeh laughed at him; his bosom became dilated, and he said to him, We will do as thou desirest, O thou who hast conveyed to the owner his rightful property! Then he was silent. And after that, the Khaleefeh gave orders to present him with fifty thousand pieces of gold, and a sumptuous robe of honour, of the apparel of the great Khaleefehs, and a mule; and he gave to him black slaves to serve him. Thus he became as though he were one of the Kings of that age. And the Khaleefeh was rejoiced at the return of his slave-girl, and knew that all this was of the doings of the lady Zubeydeh, the daughter of his uncle; wherefore his rage against her was excessive, and he forsook her for a length of time, and visited her not, nor inclined to her.

So when she was certified thereof, she was affected with great anxiety on account of his wrath. Her complexion became sallow after redness; and when endurance wearied her, she sent a letter to the son of her uncle, the Prince of the Faithful, apologizing to him, and confessing her crime; and she recited these verses: —

I long to experience your former approbation, that I may quench the fire of my grief and sorrow.

O my lord, have pity for the excess of my passion; for this that I have suffered from you is sufficient!

My patience hath failed since your estrangement, O my beloved, and what was bright in my life you have rendered turbid.

I shall live if you fulfil the vows that you made me; and if you grant me not fulfilment, I shall die.

Suppose I have committed a crime: forgive it. For, by Allah, how sweet is the beloved when he pardoneth!

Therefore when the letter of the lady Zubeydeh came to the Prince of the Faithful, and he read it, he knew that she had acknowledged her crime, and sent to apologize to him for that which she had done. So he said within himself, Verily God forgiveth all sins; for He is the Very Forgiving, the Merciful.³⁸ And he sent to her a reply to her letter, containing the expression of his satisfaction and forgiveness, and pardon of what was past; whereupon she experienced great joy.

The Khaleefeh then assigned Khaleefeh a monthly allowance of fifty pieces of gold, and he acquired, in the estimation of the Khaleefeh, great dignity and high rank, and honour and respect. Khaleefeh kissed the ground before the Prince of the Faithful on his going forth, and went forth walking with stately gait; and when he came to the entrance, the eunuch who had given him the hundred pieces of gold saw him and knew him, and said to him, O fisherman, whence came to thee all this? So he told him what had happened to him from first to last. And the eunuch rejoiced at that, seeing that he had been the cause of his becoming rich; and he said to him, Wilt thou not give me a present from this wealth that hath become thine? And Khaleefeh put his hand to his pocket, and took forth from it a purse containing a thousand pieces of gold, which he handed to the eunuch; but the eunuch said to him, Take thy wealth. May God bless thee in it! — And he wondered at his generosity, and the liberality of his mind, considering his late poverty. Khaleefeh then went forth from the eunuch, riding upon the mule, and attended by the servants with their hands upon her haunches. Thus he proceeded until he came to the Khán, the people diverting themselves with gazing at him, and wondering at the glory that had betided him; and they advanced to him after he had alighted from the mule, and asked him respecting the cause of that good fortune. He therefore acquainted them with the events that had happened to him from first to last. Then he purchased a house of handsome structure, and expended upon it a large sum of money, so that it became perfect in beauty.

He took up his abode in that house; and when he had settled himself in it, he demanded for himself in marriage one of the daughters of the chief men of the city, of the beautiful damsels, and took her as his wife; and he experienced the utmost delight, and exceeding pleasure, and happiness. He became in a state of abundant affluence and complete prosperity; and when he beheld himself in that state of enjoyment, he thanked God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!) for the abundant affluence and successive favours that He had bestowed upon him, praising his Lord with the praise of the grateful. He used frequently to visit the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed, being well received by him, and Er-Rasheed used to cover him with his benefits and munificence. So Khaleefeh ceased not to live in a state of the most perfect affluence and happiness and glory and hilarity, enjoying abundant wealth and rising elevation, and a pleasant, agreeable life, and pure, grateful delight, until he was visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions. — Extolled be the perfection of Him to whom belong glory and permanence, and who is living, everlasting, who will never die! ³⁹

ABOO-SEER THE FAITHFUL FRIEND AND ABOO-KEER THE DECEIVER

THERE were, in the city of Alexandria, two men, one of whom was a dyer, and his name was Aboo-Keer; and the other was a barber, and his name was Aboo-Seer; ¹ and they were neighbours, each to the other, in the market; the shop of the barber being by the side of the shop of the dyer. The dyer was a swindler, a liar, a person of exceeding wickedness: he was as though the temple of his head were cut out of rock, or made from the threshold of the synagogue of the Jews: he was not ashamed of any disgraceful action that he committed among the people. It was his custom, when any one gave him a piece of stuff to dye, to demand of him the pay first, and to make him believe that he would buy with it materials wherewith to dye. So the man would give him the pay in advance; and when he had received it of him, he would expend it for food and drink. Then he would sell the stuff that he had received, after its owner had gone, and expend its price for food and drink and other things. He ate nothing but what was good, of the most excellent of food; nor did he drink save of the best of the drinks that dispelled the reason.

And when the owner of the stuff came to him, he would say to him, To-morrow come to me before sunrise, and thou wilt find thy stuff dyed. Therefore the owner would go, and say within himself, One day soon followeth another. Then he would come to him the next day, at the time appointed; and the dyer would say to him, Come to-morrow; for yesterday I was not at leisure, having with me guests; so I was occupied in doing what was expedient for them until they went. To-morrow, before sunrise, come and receive thy stuff dyed. — And he would go, and come to him again on the third day; when the dyer would say to him, Verily I was yesterday excusable; for my wife gave birth to a child in the night, and all the day I was engaged in transacting affairs; but, to-morrow, without fail, come and receive thy stuff dyed. The man would therefore come to him again at the time appointed, and the dyer would practise with him some other stratagem, of any kind, and swear to him. And he would not cease to promise him and to swear when he came to him, until the customer would become impatient, and say to him, How often wilt thou say to me, To-morrow? Give me my stuff; for I do not desire it to be dyed. — And thereupon the dyer would say, By Allah, O my brother, I am abashed at thee; but I will tell thee the truth; and may God harm every one who harmeth men with respect to their goods!

So the man would say to him, Tell me what hath happened. And he would reply, As to thy stuff, I dyed it in a manner unequalled, and spread it upon the rope, and it was stolen, and I know not who stole it. Therefore if the owner of the stuff were of the people of kindness, he would say to him, God will compensate me. And if he were of the people of malevolence, he would persevere in disgracing and insulting him; but nothing would he get from him, even if he complained of him to the magistrate.

He ceased not to do these deeds until he became notorious among the people, and they used to caution one another against him, and to make him a subject of proverbs. They all abstained from employing him; and none used to fall into his snare save he who was ignorant of his conduct; but notwithstanding this, he was sure to experience, every day, insult and disgrace from the creatures of God. So his trade became dull in consequence thereof, and he used to come to the shop of his neighbour the barber, Aboo-Seer, and to sit in it, facing the dyeing-shop, and looking at its door; and if he saw any one ignorant of his conduct standing at the door of the dyeing-shop, and having with him something which he desired to be dyed, he would rise from the shop of the barber, and say, What dost thou want, O man? He would answer him, Take and dye for me this thing. And he would say, What colour dost thou desire? For, with all these bad qualities, he was able to dye all colours; but he never acted honestly with any one, and poverty overcame him. Then he would take the thing of the man, and say to him, Give me the pay in advance, and to-morrow come and take the thing. And the man would give him the pay, and depart; and after the owner of the thing had gone his way, he would take that thing, and repair to the market, and sell it, and buy, with its price, meat and vegetables and tobacco² and fruit, and what else he required.

And when he saw standing at the shop any one of those who had given him things to dye, he would not appear to him, nor shew himself to him. Thus he continued to do for years; but it happened to him, one day, that he received a thing of a violent man, and sold it, and expended its price; and its owner came to him every day; but saw him not in the shop; for whenever the dyer saw any one who had aught to demand of him, he used to flee from him into the shop of the barber Aboo-Seer. And when that violent man had not found him in his shop, and this conduct of his wearied him, he repaired to the Kádee, and, having brought one of his sergeants to his shop, nailed up its door in the presence of a company of the Muslims, and sealed it; for he saw not in it aught except some earthen basins broken in pieces, and found not in it any thing to compensate him for his stuff. Then the sergeant took the key, and said to the neighbours, Tell him to bring the property of this man, and come to receive the key of his shop. And the man and the sergeant went their ways.

Aboo-Seer, upon this, said to Aboo-Keer, What is thy misfortune? For every one who bringeth to thee a thing thou makest to lose it. Whither is gone the property of this violent man? — O my neighbour, he answered, verily it was stolen from me. — Wonderful! replied Abboo-Seer. Whenever any one giveth thee a thing, doth a thief steal it from thee? Art thou at enmity with all the thieves? But I imagine that thou liest. Acquaint me then with thy case. — And he said, O my neighbour, no one has stolen from me aught. — Then what dost thou, asked Abboo-Seer, with the men's goods? He answered him, Whenever any one giveth me aught, I sell it, and expend its price. Abboo-Seer said to him, Is this allowed thee by God? Abboo-Keer replied, I do this only in consequence of poverty; for my trade is unprofitable, and I am a poor man, having nothing in my possession. And he proceeded to talk to him of the unprofitableness of his trade, and the littleness of his business; and Abboo-Seer spoke to him of the unprofitableness of his trade also, and said, I am a craftsman; I have no equal in this city; but no one is shaved at my shop because I am a poor man, and I have conceived a hatred for this art, O my brother. So Abboo-Keer the dyer said to him, And I also have conceived a hatred for my art on account of its unprofitableness. But, O my brother, what is the inducement for our residing in this town? Let me and thee journey from it, and divert ourselves in other countries, and our arts, which we shall carry with us, will be in demand in all countries; and when we travel, we shall enjoy the fresh air, and be relieved from this excessive anxiety. — And Abboo-Keer ceased not to commend travel to Abboo-Seer until the latter became desirous of emigration. So they both agreed to travel, and Abboo-Keer rejoiced that Abboo-Seer was desirous of doing so; and he recited these verses: —

Transport thyself from home in search of eminence, and travel; for in travels are five advantages:

The dispelling of anxiety, and the gaining of subsistence, and knowledge, and good manners, and the society of the noble.

If it be said that in travels are grief and affliction, and the disunion of friends, and the incurring of difficulties,

The death of a man is better than his living in the abode of contempt between the slanderer and the envier.

And when they determined to travel, Abboo-Keer said to Abboo-Seer, O my neighbour, we have become brothers, and there is no difference between us: so it is requisite that we recite the Fátéhah³ in confirmation of our agreement that he of us who is occupied shall make gain and feed him of us who is unoccupied, and whatever remaineth we will put into a chest; and when we return to Alexandria, we will divide it between us truly and equally. Abboo-Seer replied, And it shall be so. And they recited the Fátéhah in confirmation of their agreement that the occupied should make gain and feed the unoccupied.

Abboo-Seer locked his shop, and gave the keys to its owner; and Abboo-Keer left the key of his shop with the sergeant of the Kádee, and left the shop closed and sealed. Then they took their things, and in the morning they set forth, embarking in a galleon upon the sea. They departed that day, and aid attended them; and by the complete good fortune of the barber, it happened that among all who were in the galleon there was not a single barber; and there were in it a hundred and twenty men, beside the captain and the sailors. And when they loosed the sails of the galleon, the barber arose and said to the dyer, O my brother, this is a sea: we stand in need here of food and drink, and we have not with us more than a little stock of provisions; but probably some one will say to me, Come hither, O barber: shave me: — and I will shave him for a cake of bread, or for a nuf faddah,⁴ or for a drink of water: so I shall profit thereby; I and thou. And the dyer replied, No harm. Then he laid down his head, and slept, while the barber arose and took his apparatus, together with the cup,⁵ and, having put upon his shoulder a piece of rag to serve instead of the towel (for he was a poor man), passed amid the passengers; and one said to him, Come hither, O craftsman: shave me. So he shaved him; and when he had shaved that man, he gave him a nuf faddah; whereupon the barber said to him, O my brother, I have no need of this nuf faddah; and hadst thou given me a cake of bread, it had been a more blessed gift to me on this sea; for I have a companion, and our provisions are but little. And he gave him a cake of bread and a piece of cheese, and filled for him the cup with fresh water. He therefore took those things, and came to Aboo-Keer, and said to him, Take this cake of bread, and eat it with the cheese, and drink what is in the cup. And he took them of him, and ate and drank.

Then Aboo-Seer the barber, after that, took his apparatus, with the rag upon his shoulder and the cup in his hand, and went about the galleon, among the passengers; and he shaved one man for two cakes of bread, and another for a piece of cheese. Demands were made for his services; and whenever any one said to him, Shave me, O craftsman, — he bargained with him for two cakes of bread and a nuf faddah; and there being in the galleon no barber beside him, sunset came not before he had collected thirty cakes of bread and fifteen⁶ nuf faddahs; beside which he got cheese and olives and batárikh.⁷ Whenever he demanded any thing, they gave it him, so that he became in possession of an abundance of things. He also shaved the captain, and complained to him of the smallness of his stock of provisions for the voyage; and the captain said to him, Welcome to thee! Bring thy companion every night, and sup ye with me, and suffer not anxiety as long as ye voyage with us.

He then returned to the dyer, and saw that he had not ceased to sleep: so he woke him; and when Aboo-Keer awoke, he saw at his head an abundance of bread and cheese and olives and batárikh; and he said to Aboo-Seer, Whence gottest thou this? Aboo-Seer answered, From the bounty of God, whose name be exalted! And Aboo-Keer desired to eat; but Aboo-Seer said to him, Eat not, O my brother, of this. Leave it to be of use to us at another time. For know that I have shaved the captain, and I complained to him of the littleness of our stock of provisions; whereupon he said to me, Welcome to thee! Bring thy companion every night, and sup ye with me. And the first time of our supping with the captain is to be this night. — Abboo-Keer however replied, I am sea-sick, and cannot rise from my place: therefore let me make my supper of these things, and go thou alone to the captain. So Abboo-Seer said to him, There will be no harm in that. And he sat diverting himself with looking at him while he ate, and saw him cut off the mouthful as the quarryman cutteth stone from the mountain, and swallow it as the elephant that for days hath not eaten, bolting one mouthful before he had quite swallowed the preceding one, and staring at what was before him with the stare of the ghool, and blowing as bloweth the hungry bull over the straw and the beans.

And, lo, a sailor came and said, O craftsman, the captain saith to thee, Bring thy companion, and come to supper. So Abboo-Seer said to Abboo-Keer, wilt thou arise and go with us? But he answered him, I am not able to walk. The barber therefore went alone, and he saw the captain sitting with a table before him comprising twenty different kinds of food, or more; and he and his party were waiting for the barber and his companion: so when the captain saw him, he said to him, Where is thy companion? He answered him, O my master, he is sea-sick. And the captain replied, No harm will befall him. His sickness will leave him. Come thou; sup with us; for I was waiting for thee. — Then the captain set apart a dish of kebáb, and put into it some of every kind of food, and it became enough for ten; and after the barber had supped, the captain said to him, Take this dish with thee to thy companion. Accordingly Abboo-Seer took it, and went with it to Abboo-Keer, whom he saw grinding his food with his dog-teeth like the camel, and adding mouthful to mouthful in haste. So Abboo-Seer said to him, Did I not say to thee, Eat not; for the captain hath abundance of good things? See then what he hath sent thee when I informed him that thou wast sick. — Abboo-Keer replied, Give it me.

And Abboo-Seer handed to him the dish; and he took it from him, greedy for it and for other food, like the grinning dog, or the bone-breaking lion, or the rukh' when it pounceth upon the pigeon, or like him who hath almost died of hunger; and Abboo-Keer, seeing some viands, proceeded to eat. Abboo-Seer then left him, and went back to the captain, and drank coffee⁸ with him; after which he returned to Abboo-Keer, and he saw that he had eaten all that was in the dish, and thrown it aside empty. So he took it and conveyed it to one of the servants of the captain, and went back to Abboo-Keer, and slept until the morning. And on the following day, Abboo-Seer proceeded again to shave; and whenever any thing came to him, he gave it to Abboo-Keer, who ate and drank sitting still, not rising save when he was obliged to do so; and every night, Abboo-Seer brought him a full dish from the captain.

They continued in this state twenty days, until the galleon moored in the harbour of a city; whereupon they both landed from the galleon, and entered the city, and took for them a chamber in a Khán. Abboo-Seer furnished it,⁹ and bought all that they required, and brought some meat and cooked it, while Abboo-Keer slept from the time that he entered the chamber.

He awoke not until Aboo-Seer roused him, and put the table before him; and when he awoke, he ate; and after that, he said to Aboo-Seer, Blame me not; for I am giddy. Then he slept again. And they remained in this state forty days. Every day the barber took his apparatus, and went about the city, practised his art for such remuneration as destiny allotted him, and, returning, found Aboo-Keer sleeping. So he would wake him; and when he awoke, he would betake himself to eating with voracity, eating as he who is not satiated nor contented; after which he would sleep again. He ceased not to do thus for forty days more; and every time that Aboo-Seer said to him, Sit and rest thyself, and go forth and take an airing in the city, for it is a diverting and gay place, and there is no equal to it among the cities,—Aboo-Keer the dyer would reply, Blame me not; for I am giddy. And Aboo-Seer the barber did not like to trouble his heart, nor to make him hear a word that would vex him. But on the forty-first day, the barber fell sick, and was unable to go abroad; and he engaged the door-keeper of the Khán to serve him gratuitously. He performed for them their affairs, bringing them their food and drink; and all the while Aboo-Keer ate and slept. The barber ceased not to employ the door-keeper of the Khán to perform gratuitously his affairs for the space of four days; and after that, the disease of Aboo-Seer became so violent that he was unconscious by reason of its severity.

But as to Aboo-Keer, hunger tortured him. So he arose and searched the clothes of Aboo-Seer, and saw in his possession a sum of money; and he took it, and closed the door of the chamber upon Aboo-Seer, and departed, without informing any one; and the doorkeeper was in the market; wherefore he saw him not when he went forth. Aboo-Keer then betook himself to the market, and clad himself in costly clothes, and proceeded to go about the city, and to divert himself. He saw it to be a city of which he had not found the like among cities; but all the apparel of its inhabitants was white and blue, without any other colour. And he came to a dyer, and saw all that was in his shop to be blue; and, producing to him a handkerchief, he said to him, O master, take this handkerchief, and dye it, and receive thy pay. The dyer replied, The pay for dyeing this will be twenty pieces of silver. So Aboo-Keer said to him, We should dye this in our country for two pieces of silver. The man rejoined, Go, dye it in your country; but as to me, I will not dye it save for twenty pieces of silver: the pay will not fall short of this sum in the least. Upon this, Aboo-Keer said to him, What colour dost thou desire to dye it? The dyer answered him, I will dye it blue. Aboo-Keer said to him, I desire that thou shouldst dye it for me red. The man however replied, I know not how to dye red. Aboo-Keer said, Green. The dyer replied, I know not how to dye green. Aboo-Keer said, Yellow. The dyer replied, I know not how to dye yellow. And Aboo-Keer proceeded to enumerate to him the colours, one after another; but the dyer replied, We, in our country, are forty masters, not one more nor one less; and when one of us dieth, we teach his son; and if he leave not a son, we are deficient by one. When one leaveth two sons, we teach one of them; and if he die, we teach his brother. Thus our trade is strictly regulated; and we know not how to dye any colour except blue alone.

So Aboo-Keer the dyer said to him, Know that I am a dyer, and I know how to dye all colours. I desire that thou wouldst take me into thy service for pay, and I will teach thee the art of dyeing all colours, that thou mayest glory therein over all the company of dyers. — But he replied, We allow not a stranger to enter our trade ever. Aboo-Keer said to him, And if I open for myself alone a dyeing-shop? The man answered, Thou canst not do that ever. And thereupon Aboo-Keer left him, and went to the second, and he said to him as the first had said; and he ceased not to go from dyer to dyer until he had gone round to the forty masters; but they would not admit him either as a hired servant or as a master. He went also to the Sheykh of the dyers, and informed him; but he replied, We do not allow a stranger to enter our trade.

So upon this, exceeding rage affected Aboo-Keer, and he went up to complain to the King of that city, and said to him, O King of the age, I am a stranger, and my trade is that of dyeing, and there have happened to me, with the dyers, such and such events. I dye red of various hues, as rose-colour and jujube-colour; and green of various hues, as plant-green, and pistachio-green, and oil-green, and parrot's-wing; and black of various hues, as coal-black and kohl-black; and yellow of various hues, as orange-colour and lemon-colour; — and he proceeded to mention to him all the colours. Then he said, O King of the age, all the dyers who are in thy city are unable to dye any of these colours, and they know not how to dye any colour but blue; yet they will not admit me among them as a master nor as a hired workman. And the King replied, Thou hast spoken truth as to that matter; but I will open for thee a dyeing-shop, and give thee a capital, and care not thou for them; for whosoever opposeth thee, I will hang him over the door of his shop.

He then commanded the builders, and said to them, Repair ye with this master; go about the city with him, and whatsoever place pleaseth him, turn out its owner, whether it be occupied by a shop or a Khán or other building, and build for him a dyeing-shop agreeable with his desire. Whatever he commandeth to do, do it and oppose him not with respect to that which he shall say. — Then the King clad him in a handsome suit of apparel, gave him a thousand pieces of gold, and said to him, Expend them upon thyself until the building shall be completed. He also gave him two memlooks to serve him, and a horse with embroidered saddle and trappings; and Aboo-Keer put on the dress, and mounted the horse, and became as though he were an Emeer. The King, moreover, appropriated to him exclusively a house, and gave orders to furnish it: so they furnished it for him, and he took up his abode in it.

Then, on the following day, he mounted, and went about through the city, with the architects before him, and he ceased not to survey until a place pleased him; whereupon he said, This place is good. They therefore ejected its owner from it, and brought him to the King, who gave him, as the price of his place, more than would have contented him, and the building proceeded there, Aboo-Keer saying to the builders, Build thus and thus, and do thus and thus, — until they had built for him a dyeing-shop of which the equal existed not. He then presented himself to the King, and informed him that the building of the dyeing-shop was completed, and that only the price of the materials for dyeing was requisite in order to commence work; upon which the King said to him, Take these four thousand pieces of gold, and make them thy capital, and shew me the products of thy dyeing-shop. So he took them, and repaired to the market, and he saw the indigo to be abundant, and [compäparatively] of no price. He bought all the materials for dyeing that he required; after which, the King sent to him five hundred pieces of stuff, and he proceeded to dye them, and, having dyed them of all colours, spread them [on ropes] before the door of the dyeing-shop.

Therefore, when the people passed by the shop, they saw a wonderful sight, the like of which they had not seen in their lives; and crowds collected at the door of the dyeing-shop, diverting themselves, and asking him and saying to him, O master, what are the names of these colours? So he answered them, This is red, and this is yellow, and this is green, — mentioning to them the names of all the colours; and they proceeded to bring to him pieces of stuff, and to say to him, Dye for us like this and this, and receive what thou shalt demand. And when he had finished the dyeing of the stuffs of the King, he took them and went up with them to the court; and on the King's seeing those dyed stuffs, he was delighted with them, and conferred upon him exceeding favours. All the troops also brought to him stuffs, saying to him, Dye for us thus. And he dyed for them according to their desires, and they threw to him gold and silver. Then his fame spread abroad, and his dyeing-shop was named the dyeing-shop of the Sultän. Prosperity came in upon him by every way; and of all the dyers, not one could speak to him, save only that they used to come to him and kiss his hands, and apologize to him for their past injurious conduct to him, offering themselves to him, and saying to him, Make us servants to thee. But he would not accept one of them. He had male black slaves, and female slaves, and he collected abundant wealth.

Now as to Aboo-Seer, when Aboo-Keer had closed the door of the chamber upon him, after he had taken his money, and gone, and left him sick, in a state of unconsciousness, he lay in that chamber, with the door closed upon him, and remained so three days. The door-keeper of the Khän then observed the door of the chamber, and saw it closed, and he saw not either of these two persons until sunset, nor knew he any tidings of them. So he said within himself, Perhaps they have travelled away without paying the rent of the chamber, or died; or what can be their case? And he came to the door of the chamber, and saw it closed, and he heard the groaning of the barber within it, and saw the key in the wooden lock. He therefore opened the door and entered, and saw the barber groaning: so he said to him, No harm shall befall thee. Where is thy companion? — And the barber replied, By Allah, I have not yet recovered from the stupefying effects of my disease save on this day; and I called out; but no one returned me a reply. I conjure thee by Allah, O my brother, that thou look for the purse beneath my head, and take from it five nusfs, and buy for me with them something wherewith I may sustain myself; for I am in a state of extreme hunger. — Accordingly, the doorkeeper stretched forth his hand, and took the purse, and he saw it empty; wherefore he said to the barber, Verily the purse is empty: there is not in it aught.

So Aboo-Seer the barber knew that Aboo-Keer had taken what was in it, and fled; and he said to the door-keeper, Hast thou not seen my companion? He answered him, For the space of three days I have not seen him, and I imagined not any thing but that thou hadst travelled away with him. And the barber replied, We travelled not; but he coveted my money, and he took it and fled, when he saw me sick. Then he wept and wailed. But the door-keeper of the Khán said to him, No harm shall befall thee; and he will receive the recompense of his conduct from God. The door-keeper then went and cooked for him some broth, and, having ladled out for him a dishful, gave it to him; and he ceased not to attend to him for the space of two months, maintaining him from his own purse, until he perspired profusely, and God cured him of the disease that he had been suffering. After this, he rose upon his feet, and said to the door-keeper of the Khán, If God (whose name be exalted!) enable me, I will recompense thee for thy good actions to me; but none, save God in his bounty, will recompense. The door-keeper however replied, Praise be to God for thy health! I did not unto thee that service save from a desire of seeing the face of God, the Bountiful.

The barber then went forth from the Khán, and passed through the markets, and destiny brought him to the market in which was the dyeing-shop of Aboo-Keer. There he saw the stuffs dyed of various colours, spread [upon ropes] at the entrance of the dyeing-shop, and the people crowding together, diverting themselves with the sight of them. So he asked a man of the inhabitants of the city, and said to him, What is this place, and wherefore do I see the people crowding together? And the person whom he asked answered him, This is the Sultán's dyeing-shop, which he founded for a stranger named Aboo-Keer; and whenever he hath dyed a piece of stuff, we assemble around it, and divert ourselves with the sight of his dyeing; for there are not in our country dyers who know how to dye these colours; and such and such events happened to him with the dyers who are in the city. He told him what had occurred between Aboo-Keer and the dyers, and that he had complained of them to the Sultán, who thereupon had aided him, and built for him this dyeing-shop, and given him such and such things: and he acquainted him with all that had happened.

Upon this, Aboo-Seer rejoiced, and said to himself, Praise be to God who hath aided him so that he hath become a master-tradesman! And the man is excusable. Probably he hath been diverted from thinking of thee by his work, and forgotten thee; but thou actedst kindly to him, and treatedst him with generosity, when he was unoccupied; and when he seeth thee, he will rejoice in thee, and treat thee with generosity, like as thou treatedst him. — He then advanced towards the door of the dyeing-shop, and saw Aboo-Keer sitting upon a high mattress upon a mastabah at the door of the dyeing-shop, with a suit of the apparel of Kings upon him, and before him four black slaves and four white memlooks wearing the most sumptuous apparel. He also saw the workmen, ten black slaves, standing at work; for when Aboo-Keer bought them, he taught them the art of dyeing; and he was sitting between the cushions, as though he were a grand Wezeer, or a most magnificent King, not doing aught with his own hand, but only saying to them, Do so and so. Aboo-Seer stood before him, imagining that, when he should see him, he would rejoice in him, and salute him, and treat him with generosity, and behave courteously to him. But when eye met eye, Aboo-Keer said to him, O scoundrel, how many times have I said to thee, stand not at the door of this workshop? Dost thou desire to disgrace me with the people, O thief? — And he said, Seize ye him.

So the slaves ran after him, and seized him, and Aboo-Keer, rising with energy, took a staff, and said, Throw him down! Accordingly they threw him down; and he gave him a hundred blows on his back; after which they turned him round, and he gave him a hundred blows on his stomach, and said to him, O villain! O deceiver! if I see thee after this day standing at the door of this dyeing-shop, I will send thee to the King immediately, and he will deliver thee to the Wálee, that he may strike off thy head! Walk away! May God not bless thee! — So he departed from him with broken heart by reason of the beating and the contemptuous treatment that had befallen him; and the persons present said to Aboo-Keer the dyer, What hath this man done? Whereupon he answered them, He is a thief, who stealeth the stuffs of the people; for he hath often stolen stuffs from me, and I said within myself, May God pardon him! for he is a poor man. — And I would not trouble him; but would give the people the prices of their stuffs, and forbid him gently; yet he would not abstain. So if he return again after this time, I will send him to the King, and he will slay him, and relieve the people from his mischief. — The people therefore reviled him after his departure.

Aboo-Seer returned to the Khán, and sat reflecting upon that which Aboo-Keer had done to him; and he ceased not to sit until the pain of the beating became alleviated, when he went forth and passed through the markets of the city, and it occurred to his mind that he should enter the bath. So he asked a man of the inhabitants of the city, and said to him, O my brother, which is the way to the bath? But the man said to him, And what is the bath? He replied, A place in which people wash themselves, to remove the impurities that are upon them, and it is of the best of the good things of the world. Upon this the man said to him, Betake thyself to the sea. He replied, I desire the bath. But the man said to him, We know not what kind of thing the bath is: we all of us go to the sea: even the King, when he desireth to wash himself, goeth to the sea.

So when Aboo-Seer knew that there was not a bath in the city, and that its inhabitants knew not the bath, nor what kind of thing it was, he repaired to the council of the King, and went in to him, and, having kissed the ground before him, and prayed for him, said to him, I am a man of a strange country, and my trade is that of a bath-keeper, and I entered thy city, and desired to repair to the bath, but saw not in it even one bath; and how is it that the city which is of this beautiful description is without a bath, which is one of the best of the delights of the world? So the King said to him, What is the bath? He proceeded, therefore, to describe it to him, and said to him, Thy city will not be a perfect city unless there be in it a bath. And upon this the King said to him, Welcome to thee! And he clad him in a suit of apparel of which the like existed not, gave him a horse and two black slaves, and bestowed upon him four female slaves, and two memlooks. He also prepared for him a furnished house, and treated him with more honour than the dyer; and he sent with him the builders, saying to them, In the place that shall please him, build ye for him a bath.

So he took them and went with them through the midst of the city, until a place pleased him, when he pointed it out to them, and they commenced the building there. He proceeded to direct them as to the manner of its construction until they had built for him a bath of which there existed not the like; whereupon he ordered them to paint it; and they painted it in an admirable manner, so that it became a delight to the beholders. He then went up to the King, and acquainted him with the completion of the building of the bath, and its painting, and said to him, There is nothing wanting but the furniture. The King therefore gave him ten thousand pieces of gold; and he took them, and furnished the bath, and arranged in it the napkins upon the ropes; and every one who passed by the door of the bath gazed at it in astonishment, and his mind was confounded at the sight of its painting.

The people crowded about that thing of which they had not seen the like in their lives, and they proceeded to divert themselves with the sight of it, saying, What is this? And Aboo-Seer answered them, This is a bath. And they wondered at it. Then he heated the water, and set the bath in action.¹⁰ He made also a fountain in the basin, such as captivated the reason of every one of the inhabitants of the city who beheld it. And he demanded of the King ten memlooks under the age of manhood; whereupon the King gave him ten memlooks like moons; and Aboo-Seer betook himself to rubbing them with the bag, and said to them, Do with the bathers thus. He then gave vent to the fumes of the incense, and sent a crier to cry in the city, and to say, O creatures of God, repair to the bath, which is named the bath of the Sultán! So the people came thither, and he ordered the memlooks to wash the bathers. The people descended into the tank, and came up; and after they had come up, they sat upon the leewán, while the memlooks rubbed them as Aboo-Seer had taught them; and the people continued to enter the bath, and to gratify their desire thereby, and go forth, without paying, for the space of three days.

After that, on the fourth day, Aboo-Seer invited the King to the bath. So he mounted with the great men of his empire, and they went thither. He pulled off his clothes, and entered [the inner apartment], and Aboo-Seer entered, and rubbed the King with the bag, removing from his person the impure particles like twists of thread, and shewing them to him; whereat the King rejoiced. The putting his hand upon his body made a sound, by reason of its smoothness and cleanness. And after Aboo-Seer had washed his skin, he mixed for him some rose-water with the water of the tank, and the King descended into the tank and came forth, and his skin was softened, and he experienced a liveliness which in his life he had never known before. Then, after that, Aboo-Seer seated him upon the leewán, and the memlooks proceeded to perform upon him the operation of gently rubbing and pressing him, while the perfuming vessels diffused the odour of aloes-wood. And the King said, O master, is this the bath? Aboo-Seer answered, Yes. And the King said to him, By my head, my city hath not become a city save by this bath. He then said to him, What wilt thou take as pay for each person? Aboo-Seer answered, What thou shalt command me I will take. And he ordered him to take a thousand pieces of gold, saying to him, From every one who washeth in thy bath take a thousand pieces of gold. But Aboo-Seer replied, Pardon, O King of the age! Verily all men are not alike; for among them is the rich, and among them is the poor; and if I took from every one a thousand pieces of gold, the bath would become void, since the poor man cannot pay the thousand pieces of gold. — So the King said, And how then wilt thou act with respect to the pay? Aboo-Seer answered, I will regulate the pay generously; and every one who can afford a thing, his soul consenting to it, shall give that thing. Thus we shall take from every man according to his condition; for if the case be so, the people will come to us; and he who is rich will give according to his rank, while he who is poor will give that to which his soul consenteth. If the case be thus, the bath will be in action, and it will be in excellent condition; but as to the thousand pieces of gold, it is the gift of the King, and every one cannot afford it.

And the great men of the empire pronounced his words to be true, and said, This will be the right course, O King of the age. Dost thou imagine that the people are all like thee, O glorious King? — The King replied, Verily your saying is true; but this is a stranger, a poor man, and to treat him with generosity is incumbent on us; for he hath made in our city this bath, the like of which we have never in our lives seen, and our city had not been adorned, and acquired importance, without it: so if we shew him generosity by giving him excessive pay, it will not be much. But they said, If thou treat him with generosity, do so by bestowing upon him of thine own wealth, and let the King's generosity be shewn to the poor by the smallness of the pay for bathing, in order that thy subjects may pray for thee; but as to the thousand pieces of gold, we are the great men of thine empire, and yet our souls consent not to give it: how then can the souls of the poor consent thereto? The King therefore said, O great men of my empire, every one of you shall give him this time a hundred pieces of gold, and a memlook, and a female slave, and a male black slave. And they replied, Yes; we will give him those things; but after this day, every one who entereth shall only give him what his soul shall consent to. And he said, There will be no harm in that.

Accordingly each of the great men gave him a hundred pieces of gold, and a female slave, and a memlook, and a male black slave; and the number of the great men who bathed with the King on this day was four hundred souls. So the number of the pieces of gold that they gave him was forty thousand; and of the memlooks, four hundred; and of the male black slaves, four hundred; and of the female slaves, four hundred: and enough was this gift! The King also gave him ten thousand pieces of gold, and ten memlooks and ten female slaves, and ten male black slaves. Abboo-Seer therefore advanced and kissed the ground before the King, and said to him, O fortunate King, endowed with right judgment, what place will contain me with these memlooks, and female slaves, and male black slaves? The King replied, I ordered not my grantees to do this save in order that we might collect for thee a great quantity of wealth; for perhaps thou hast reflected upon thy country and thy household, and longed to see them, and desired to voyage to thy home, and thou wilt have taken from our country a large quantity of wealth to which thou mayest have recourse for thy subsistence as long as thou shalt live in thy country. But Abboo-Seer rejoined, O King of the age (may God strengthen thee!), verily these numerous memlooks, and female slaves, and male black slaves, are proper only for Kings; and hadst thou given orders to present me with ready money, it had been better for me than this army; for they will eat, and drink, and dress, and whatever wealth I acquire, it will not suffice them to expend for their support. And upon this the King laughed, and said, By Allah, thou hast spoken truth; for they have become a heavy army, and thou hast not ability to expend what will be sufficient upon them. But wilt thou sell them to me, each one for a hundred pieces of gold? — He answered, I sell them to thee for this price.

So the King sent to the treasurer, desiring him to bring him the money; and he brought it, and the King gave Abboo-Seer the price of the whole, complete and entire; after which he bestowed them upon their former owners, saying, Every one who knoweth his male black slave, or his female slave, or his memlook, let him take such slave; for they are a gift from me unto you. And they complied with the command of the King, each of them taking what appertained to him. Abboo-Seer then said to the King, May God relieve thee, O King of the age, as thou hast relieved me from these ghools, whom none but God can satiate! And the King laughed at his words, and said that he had spoken truth, and he took the great men of his empire, and returned from the bath to his palace.

Abboo-Seer passed the ensuing night counting the gold and putting it into the bags and sealing them. And he had with him twenty male black slaves, and twenty memlooks, and four female slaves to serve him. And when the morning came, he opened the bath, and sent a crier to cry and say, Whosoever entereth the bath and washeth, he shall give that to which his soul shall consent, and what his generosity shall require him to give. He seated himself by the chest,¹¹ and those who desired to bathe rushed upon him, every one who entered putting down what was easy to him to give; and evening came not before the chest was filled with the good gifts of God, whose name be exalted! Then the Queen desired to enter the bath: so when this was made known to Aboo-Seer, he divided the day on her account into two portions, making from daybreak to noon the portion of the men, and from noon to sunset the portion of the women. And when the Queen came, he stationed a female slave behind the chest. He had taught four female slaves the art of washing women and plaiting their hair, so that they became skilful performers of these arts; and the Queen, on her entering, was pleased by what she saw, her bosom became dilated, and she put down a thousand pieces of gold. His fame spread throughout the city, and every one who entered treated him with honour, whether he were rich or poor, and good fortune came in to him by every way. He became acquainted with the King's guards, and gained companions and friends, and the King used to come to him one day in the week, when he gave him a thousand pieces of gold; the other days of the week being for the great men and the poor; and he used to behave kindly to the people, and to treat them with the utmost courtesy.

It happened also that the King's sea-captain came in to him in the bath one day, whereupon Aboo-Seer pulled off his clothes, and entered [the inner apartment] with him, and proceeded to rub and press him, treating him with exceeding courtesy. And when he came forth from the bath, he made for him sherbet and coffee; and on the captain's desiring to give him something, he swore that he would not receive from him aught. So the captain was grateful for his kindness, on account of the exceeding courtesy that he had experienced from him, and his beneficence to him, and he became perplexed respecting what he should give to that bath-keeper in return for his generous conduct to him.

Meanwhile, Aboo-Keer heard all the people eagerly talking of the bath, every one of them saying, Verily this bath is the delight of the world, without doubt! If it be the will of God, O such-a-one, thou shalt go with us tomorrow into this delectable bath. — So Aboo-Keer said within himself, I must go like others, and see this bath that hath captivated the minds of men. Then he put on the most sumptuous of the apparel that he had, mounted a mule, took with him four black slaves and four memlooks, who walked behind him and before him, and repaired to the bath. He alighted at the door of the bath; and when he was at the door, he smelt the odour of aloes-wood, and saw men entering and men coming forth, and he saw the mastabahs fully occupied by great and small. He then entered the vestibule, and saw Aboo-Seer, who rose to him, and rejoiced at seeing him; and Aboo-Keer said to him, Is this fulfilling the covenant of the sons of the ingenuous? I have opened for myself a dyeing-shop, and become the master-dyer of the city, and acquainted with the King, and have become in a state of prosperity and authority, yet thou comest not to me, nor inquirest respecting me, nor sayest, Where is my companion? I have been unable to find thee while searching for thee, and sending my black slaves and my memlooks to search for thee in the Kháns and in all other places; for they knew not how to find thee, nor did any one give them tidings of thee.

So Aboo-Seer replied, Did I not come to thee, and didst thou not call me a thief, and beat me, and disgrace me among the people? And thereupon Aboo-Keer was grieved, and said, What are these words? Art thou the person whom I beat? — Aboo-Seer answered him, Yes; that person was myself. And Aboo-Keer swore to him a thousand oaths that he knew him not, and said, One resembling thee used to come every day and steal people's stuffs, and I imagined that thou wast that person. And he proceeded to feign repentance, and to strike hand upon hand, and say, There is no strength nor power but in God, the Great! We have acted injuriously to thee; but would that thou hadst acquainted me with thyself, and said, I am such-a-one. The fault therefore is thine, because thou didst not acquaint me with thyself; especially as I was confounded by the multiplicity of my occupations. — And upon this, Aboo-Seer said to him, May God pardon thee, O my companion! This event was secretly predestined, and reparation is God's affair. Enter; pull off thy clothes, and bathe and enjoy thyself. — Aboo-Seer rejoined, By Allah I conjure thee that thou pardon me, O my brother! And Aboo-Seer said to him, May God acquit thee of responsibility, and pardon thee! For it was an event predestined from eternity to befall me.

Aboo-Keer then said to him, And whence obtainedst thou this authority? He answered him, He who aided thee aided me; for I went up to the King, and described to him the bath, and he ordered me to build one. So Aboo-Keer replied, As thou art an acquaintance of the King, I also am his acquaintance; and if it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), I will cause him to love thee and to treat thee with generosity exceeding this generosity, for my sake; for he knew not that thou wast my companion; but I will inform him that thou art my companion, and I will give him a charge respecting thee. Aboo-Seer, however, said to him, I require not any charge to be given him; for He who moveth hearts with affection existeth; and the King hath conceived a love for me, he and all his court, and given me such and such things. He told him the story, and then said to him, Pull off thy clothes behind the chest, and enter the bath, and I will enter with thee, that I may rub thee with the bag. So he pulled off the clothes that were upon him, and entered the bath, and Aboo-Seer entered with him, and rubbed him with the bag, washed him with soap, dressed him, and occupied himself with serving him until he came forth [from the inner apartment]; and when he came forth, he brought him dinner and sherbet; and all the people wondered at the great honour that he shewed him.

After that, Aboo-Keer was about to give him something; but he swore that he would not receive from him aught, and said to him, Be ashamed of this thing, seeing that thou art my companion, and there is no difference between us. Then Aboo-Keer said to Aboo-Seer, O my companion, by Allah, this bath is excellent; but thine art in it is deficient. So Aboo-Seer said to him, And what is its deficiency? Aboo-Keer answered him, The remedy that is a composition of arsenic and lime, which removeth the hair with facility.¹² Therefore make this remedy; and when the King cometh, present it to him, and teach him how the hair falleth off by its means; for thereupon he will love thee exceedingly, and will treat thee with honour. — And Aboo-Seer replied, Thou hast spoken truth. If it be the will of God, I will make that.

Then Aboo-Keer went forth, and mounted his mule, repaired to the King, and went in to him, and said to him, I give thee a precaution, O King of the age. So the King said, And what is thy precaution? And he answered him, Information hath been given me that thou hast built a bath. The King said, Yes: a stranger hath come to me, and I have founded the bath for him, like as I have founded for thee this dyeing-shop; and it is an excellent bath; my city hath become adorned by it. And he proceeded to mention to him the excellencies of the bath. Aboo-Keer then said to him, And hast thou entered it? He answered, Yes. And Aboo-Keer said, Praise be to God who hath saved thee from the wickedness of this villain, the enemy of the religion; and he is the bath-keeper. The King therefore said to him, And what is his desire? And Aboo-Keer answered, Know, O King of the age, that if thou enter the bath after this day, thou wilt perish.

Wherefore? said the King. He answered him, Verily the bath-keeper is thine enemy, and the enemy of the religion; for he induced thee not to found this bath save because he desireth to poison thee in it. He hath made for thee a thing; and when thou enterest the bath, he will bring it to thee, and will say to thee, This is a remedy: whosoever applieth it to himself, it will cause the hair to fall off from the part with ease. And it is not a remedy: on the contrary, it is a cause of terrible disease, and a deadly poison. The Sultán of the Christians hath promised this villain that, if he slay thee, he will liberate his wife and his children from captivity; for his wife and children are in captivity in the land of the Sultán of the Christians. I also was in captivity with him in their country; but I opened a dyeing-shop, and dyed for them stuffs of various colours, in consequence of which they inclined the heart of the King to favour me, and the King said to me, What dost thou desire? So I desired of him emancipation, and he emancipated me; and, having come to this city, I saw the man in the bath. I therefore asked him and said to him, How was effected thine escape, and the escape of thy wife and thy children? And he answered, I and my wife and my children ceased not to remain in captivity until the King of the Christians held a court, and I was present at it among the rest, standing among the people, and I heard them enter upon the mention of the Kings, and proceed until they mentioned the King of this city; whereupon the King of the Christians cried, Ah! — and said, No one in the world hath overcome me except the King of such a city; and whosoever will contrive means for me to slay him, I will give him every thing that he shall desire. So I advanced to him, and said to him, If I contrive means for thee to slay him, wilt thou emancipate me and my wife and my children? And he answered me, Yes: I will emancipate you, and I will give thee all that thou shalt desire. I then agreed with him to do this, and he sent me in a galleon to this city. So I went up to this King, and he built for me this bath, and there remaineth nothing for me to do but to kill him, and go to the King of the Christians, redeem my children and my wife, and demand of him what I desire. — I therefore said, And what is the stratagem that thou hast contrived in order to kill him? And he answered me, It is an easy stratagem; the easiest that can be: for he will come to me in this bath, and I have made for him something wherein is poison; and when he cometh, I will say to him, Take this remedy, and apply it to any part from which thou wouldst remove hair; for the hair will fall off. So he will take it and apply it to himself, and the poison will operate within him a day and a night, until it penetrateth to his heart, and destroyeth him, and there will be an end of the affair. — Therefore, on my hearing from him these words, I feared for thee; because thy goodness hath imposed an obligation on me; and I have informed thee of this.

So when the King heard these words, he was violently enraged; and he said to the dyer, Conceal this secret. He then desired to go to the bath, that he might put an end to doubt by certain assurance; and when the King entered the bath, Aboo-Seer divested himself as he was accustomed to do, devoted himself to the service of the King and rubbed him with the bag; after which he said to him, O King of the age, I have made a remedy for clearing away the hair. So he said, Bring it to me. And he brought it before him; and the King perceived its smell to be abominable. It appeared sure to him, therefore, that it was poison; and he was enraged, and called out to the guards, saying, Seize him! Accordingly, the guards laid hold upon him, and the King went forth, infused with rage, no one knowing the cause of this rage; and by reason of the violence of the rage of the King, he informed not any one, nor did any one dare to ask him.

He then put on his clothes, and went up to the council-chamber, and, having caused Aboo-Seer to be brought before him, with his hands bound behind him, he summoned the sea-captain. So he came; and when the captain came, the King said to him, Take this villain, and put him into a sack, and put into the sack two hundred-weight of unslaked lime, and tie up its mouth over him and the lime; then put it into a boat, and come beneath my palace. Thou wilt see me sitting at its window, and do thou say to me, Shall I cast it in? Thereupon I will answer thee, Cast it. And when I have said to thee that, cast it, that the lime may be slaked upon him, and he may die drowned and burnt. — So he replied, I hear and obey. He then took him from before the King, to an island opposite the King's palace, and said to Aboo-Seer, O thou, I came to thee once in the bath, and thou treatedst me with honour, and didst what was requisite for me, and I derived great pleasure from thee: thou sworest also that thou wouldst not receive from me pay, and I have conceived for thee a violent love. Tell me then what was thy case with the King, and what abominable action hast thou done to him, that he hath become enraged against thee, and commanded me that thou shalt die this evil death. — So he replied, By Allah, I have not done any thing, and I have no knowledge of any crime that I have committed against him requiring this.

Upon this, the captain said to him, Verily thou enjoyedst, in the estimation of the King, great dignity, such as none attained before thee; and every one who is possessed of good things is envied. Perhaps then some one hath envied thee this good fortune, and said some words injurious to thee in the presence of the King, in consequence of which the King hath been thus enraged against thee. But welcome to thee! No harm awaiteth thee. For as thou treatedst me with honour without there existing any acquaintance between me and thee, I will liberate thee. But when I liberate thee, thou shalt remain with me on this island until a galleon shall depart from this city towards thy country, when I will send thee in it. — Aboo-Seer therefore kissed the hand of the captain, and thanked him for this. Then the captain brought the lime, and put it into a sack, and he put into it a great stone, as large as a man, and said, I place my reliance upon God. After that, he gave to Aboo-Seer a net, and said to him, Cast this net into the sea. Perhaps thou wilt catch some fish. For the fish for the King's kitchen are required of me every day, and I have been diverted from fishing by this calamity that hath befallen thee, and fear that the cook's young men may come to demand the fish and not find it; but if thou catch any thing, they will find it. Do so while I go and practise the stratagem that I have devised beneath the palace, and I will pretend that I have cast thee into the sea. — And Aboo-Seer replied, I will fish, and go thou, and may God aid thee!

The captain therefore put the sack into the boat, and proceeded until he came beneath the palace, when he saw the King sitting at the window, and said, O King of the age, shall I cast him in? And he answered, Cast him: — and he made a sign with his hand; and, lo, a thing gleamed: then dropped into the sea: and, behold, what dropped into the sea was the King's seal-ring. This ring was enchanted, so that, when the King was enraged against any one, and desired to slay him, he would make a sign to him with his right hand, upon which was the seal-ring, and there would proceed, from the ring, lightning, which would strike the person to whom he made the sign, and his head would fall from between his shoulders. And the troops obeyed him not, nor did he subdue mighty men, save by means of this seal-ring. So when the ring fell from his finger, he concealed the matter, being unable to say, My ring hath fallen into the sea, — through fear of the troops, lest they should rise against him, and slay him: wherefore he was silent.

But as to Aboo-Seer, after the departure of the captain, he took the net, and cast it in the sea, and drew it; and it came forth full of fish. Then he cast it a second time, and it came up full of fish again. He ceased not to cast it, and it came up every time full of fish, until there was before him a great heap of fish; whereupon he said within himself, By Allah, for a long time I have not eaten fish. And he chose for himself a large, fat fish, and said, When the captain cometh, I will tell him to fry for me this fish, that I may make my dinner of it. He then killed it with a knife that he had with him, and the knife stuck in its gill, and he saw the King's seal-ring in it; for the fish had swallowed it, and destiny had driven it to that island, and it had fallen into the net. So he took the ring, and put it on his little finger, not knowing its properties; and lo, two young men, of the servants of the cook, came to demand the fish: and when they were near Aboo-Seer, they said, O man, whither is gone the captain? He answered, I know not: — and made a sign with his right hand, and, behold, the heads of the two young men fell from between their shoulders when he made a sign to them and said, I know not. Aboo-Seer therefore wondered at that, and said, Who can have slain them? Their case grieved him, and he was reflecting upon this event when, lo, the captain approached, and saw a great heap of fish, and saw the two young men slain, and the seal-ring upon the finger of Aboo-Seer.

So he said to him, O my brother, move not thy hand upon which is the seal-ring; for if thou move it, thou wilt slay me. And he wondered at his saying, Move not thy hand upon which is the seal-ring; for if thou move it, thou wilt slay me. And when the captain came to him, he said, Who slew these two young men? Aboo-seer answered him, By Allah, O my brother, I know not. And the captain replied, Thou hast spoken truth; but inform me respecting this seal-ring, whence it came to thee. He said, I saw it in the gill of this fish. And the captain rejoined, Thou hast spoken truth; for I saw it descending gleaming from the palace of the King till it dropped into the sea, when he made a sign with respect to thee, and said to me, Cast him. And when he made the sign, I cast in the sack, and the ring had dropped from his finger, and fallen into the sea. Thereupon this fish swallowed it, and God drove the fish to thee, so that thou caughtest it: therefore this is thy lot. But knowest thou the properties of this seal-ring? — Aboo-Seer answered, I don't know its properties. And the captain said, Know that the troops of our King have not obeyed him save from fear of this seal-ring; because it is enchanted; and when the King was enraged against any one, and desired his slaughter, he used to make a sign to him with it, and his head would fall from between his shoulders; for a lightning would proceed from this ring, and its ray would reach the object of rage, who would die immediately. — So when Aboo-Seer heard these words, he rejoiced exceedingly, and said to the captain, Take me back to the city. And the captain replied, I will take thee back, since I no longer fear for thee with respect to the King; for when thou makest a sign with thy hand, and hast conceived the intention of slaying him, his head will fall down before thee; and if thou shouldst desire the slaughter of the King and all the troops, thou wouldst kill them without impediment.

He then embarked in the boat, and repaired with him to the city; and when he arrived there, he went up to the palace of the King, and entered the council-chamber, where he saw the King sitting with the troops before him, and he was in a state of excessive grief on account of the seal-ring, unable to inform any one of the soldiers of the loss of the ring. So when the King saw him he said to him, Did we not cast thee into the sea? How hast thou contrived that thou hast come forth from it? — And he answered him, O King of the age, when thou gavest orders to cast me into the sea, thy captain took me and proceeded with me to an island, and asked me respecting the cause of thy rage against me, saying to me, What hast thou done unto the King, that he hath given orders for thy death? I answered him, By Allah, I know not that I have done unto him any foul action. And he said to me, Verily thou enjoyedst great dignity in the estimation of the King, and perhaps some one hath envied thee, and said some words injurious to thee in the presence of the King, in consequence of which he hath become enraged against thee. But I came to thee in thy bath, and thou treatedst me with honour; and in requital of the honour that thou shewedst me in thy bath, I will save thee, and will send thee to thy country. — He then put into the boat a stone instead of me, and cast it into the sea. But when thou madest a sign to him with reference to me, the seal-ring fell from thy hand into the sea, and a fish swallowed it; and I was on the island, fishing, and that fish came up in the net among others. Thereupon I took it, desiring to broil it; and when I opened its body, I saw the seal-ring in it. So I took it, and put it on my finger; and there came to me two of the servants of the kitchen, demanding the fish, and I made a sign to them, not knowing the property of the seal-ring, and their heads fell off. Then the captain came, and he knew the ring which was upon my finger, and acquainted me with its magic influence. I have therefore brought it to thee; for thou hast acted kindly to me, and treated me with the utmost generosity, and the good actions that thou hast done me have not been lost upon me. This is thy seal-ring: so take it, and if I have done unto thee any thing requiring my slaughter, acquaint me with my crime, and slay me, and thou shalt be absolved of sin in shedding my blood. — He then pulled off the seal-ring from his finger, and handed it to the King.

Therefore when the King saw Aboo-Seer's beneficent conduct, he received the ring from him, and put it on his finger. His soul was restored to him, and, rising upon his feet, he embraced Aboo-Seer, and said, O man, thou art of the most excellent of the sons of the ingenuous! Blame me not; but pardon me for my injurious conduct to thee. Had any one but thyself got possession of this seal-ring, he had not given it to me. — Aboo-Seer replied, O king of the age, if thou desire that I should pardon thee, acquaint me with my crime that required thee to be enraged against me, so that thou gavest orders for my slaughter. The King said to him, By Allah, it hath become manifest to me that thou art innocent, and that thou art not guilty in aught, since thou hast done this kind action but the dyer said to me thus and thus.

And he acquainted him with that which the dyer had said; whereupon Aboo-Seer said, By Allah, O King of the age, I know not the King of the Christians, nor in my life have I gone to the country of the Christians, nor did it enter my mind to kill thee. But this dyer was my companion and my neighbour in the city of Alexandria, and our life there became difficult so we came forth from it, on account of the difficulty of obtaining our livelihood, and recited together the Fátéhah in confirmation of our agreement that the occupied should feed the unoccupied; and such and such events happened to me with him. — He acquainted him with all that had happened to him with Aboo-Keer the dyer, and how he had taken his money, and abandoned him sick in the chamber that was in the Khán, and that the door-keeper of the Khán used to expend upon him while he was sick, until God restored him.

Then he went forth and walked about the city with his apparatus, as he was accustomed to do; and while he was in the way, he saw a dyeing-shop before which the people were crowding, and, looking at the door of the dyeing shop, he saw Aboo-Keer sitting upon a mastabah there. So he entered to salute him, and he experienced from him that beating and injurious treatment; Aboo-Keer asserting that he was a thief, and inflicting upon him a painful beating. And he acquainted the King with all that had befallen him from first to last. Then he said, O King of the age, he is the person who said to me, Make the remedy, and present it to the King; for the bath is perfect in all things, saving that this remedy is wanting in it. And know, O King of the age, that this remedy injureth not: we make it in our country, and it is one of the requisites of the bath; but I had forgotten it; and when the dyer came to me, and I treated him with honour, he reminded me of it, and said to me, Make the remedy. Now send, O King of the age, and bring the door-keeper of such a Khán, and the workmen of the dyeing-shop, and ask them all respecting the things with which I have acquainted thee.

So the King sent to the door-keeper of the Khán, and to the workmen of the dyeing-shop; and when they all were present, he asked them, and they acquainted him with the case. He therefore sent to the dyer, and said, Bring ye him barefooted, with his head uncovered, and with his hands bound behind him. Now the dyer was sitting in his house, happy at the thought of the slaughter of Aboo-Seer, and he was not aware when the guards of the King rushed upon him, and blows fell upon the back of his neck. They then bound his hands behind his back, and came with him before the King; whereupon he saw Aboo-Seer sitting by the side of the King, and the door-keeper of the Khán and the workmen of the dyeing-shop standing before him. So the door-keeper of the Khán said to him, Is not this thy companion, whose money thou stolest, and whom thou leftest with me in the chamber sick, and to whom thou didst such and such things? And the workmen of the dyeing-shop said to him, Is not this he whom thou commandedst us to seize, and whom we beat? The baseness of Aboo-Keer, therefore, was manifest to the King, and his deserving more severe torture than that which is inflicted by Munkar and Nekeer: ¹³ so the King said, Take ye him, and parade him as an example through the city, and put him into a sack, and cast him into the sea.

Upon this, Aboo-Seer said, O King of the age, accept my intercession for him; for I have pardoned him all that he hath done unto me. But the King replied, If thou hast pardoned him for his injurious conduct to thee, I cannot pardon him for his injurious conduct to me. He then cried out and said, Take ye him! They therefore took him and paraded him; and after that, they put him into a sack, and put with him the lime, and cast him into the sea: so he died drowned and burnt. Then the King said, O Aboo-Seer, demand of me what thou wilt, and it shall be given thee. And he replied, I demand of thee that thou send me to my country; for I no longer desire to reside here.

The King therefore gave him an abundance of things, in addition to his former wealth and portion and gifts, and bestowed upon him a galleon laden with good things, the sailors of which were memlooks, whom, also, he gave to him, after he had proposed to him that he should make him Wezeer, and he consented not. Aboo-Seer then bade the King farewell, and set forth on his voyage; all that was in the galleon being his property; even the sailors being his memlooks; and he ceased not to pursue his voyage until he arrived at the district of Alexandria, and moored by the shore of Alexandria. Thereupon they landed; and one of his memlooks saw a sack by the shore: so he said, O my master, by the shore of the sea is a large, heavy sack, the mouth of which is tied, and I know not what is in it. Aboo-Seer therefore came and opened it, and he saw in it the body of Aboo-Keer; the sea having driven it towards Alexandria. And he took the body forth and buried it in the neighbourhood of Alexandria, and made for it a tomb for visitation, which he endowed with inalienable legacies; and he inscribed over the door of the building which enclosed the grave these verses: —

A man is known among others by his actions,¹⁴ and the deeds of the ingenuous and generous are like his origin.

Backbite not, lest thou be backbitten; for probably, of him who saith a thing, the like will be said:

And abstain from shameful words: utter them not when thou speakest seriously or when thou jestest;

For the dog, if he retain good qualities, is domesticated, while the lion is chained in consequence of his ignorance;

And the carcasses of the desert float upon the sea, while the fine pearl lies neglected on its lowest sands.

A sparrow would not offer molestation to a hawk, were it not for its folly, and the weakness of its sense.

In the sky is written, upon the pages of the air, He who doth kind actions will experience the like.

Attempt not to extract sugar from the colocynth; for the thing will prove to be, in taste, like its origin.

Then Aboo-Seer remained a while, after which, God took his soul, and they buried him near the sepulchre of his companion Aboo-Keer; and on that account, this place was called Aboo-Keer and Aboo-Seer; but it is commonly known now by the name of Aboo-Keer.¹⁵ — This is what hath been related to us of their story. — Extolled be the perfection of Him who endureth for ever, and by whose will the nights and days interchange!

'ABD-ALLAH OF THE LAND AND 'ABD-ALLAH OF THE SEA AND WHAT CAME OF THEIR MEETING

THERE was a fisherman named 'Abd-Allah, who had a numerous family: he had nine children and their mother, and was very poor, possessing nothing but his net. He used to go every day to the sea to fish; and when he caught little, he sold it, and expended its price upon his children, according as God supplied him; but if he caught much, he would cook a good dish, and buy fruit, and cease not to expend until there remained not aught in his possession; whereupon he would say within himself, The supply necessary for to-morrow will come to-morrow.

Now when his wife gave birth to another, his children became ten persons; and the man that day possessed not any thing whatever: so his wife said to him, O my master, seek for me something wherewith I may sustain myself. He answered her, Lo, I am going, relying upon the blessing of God (whose name be exalted!), to the sea this day, for the luck of this new-born child, that we may see its fortune. And she replied, Place thy dependence upon God. Accordingly he took the net, and repaired to the sea. He then cast the net for the luck of that little infant, and said, O Allah, make his subsistence easy, not difficult; and abundant, not little! He waited over it a while, and then drew it, and it came forth full of rubbish and sand and pebbles and grass; and he saw not in it any fish; neither many did he see, nor few. So he cast it a second time, and waited over it, and then drew it; but he saw not in it fish. And he cast a third time, and a fourth, and a fifth; but there came not up in it any fish. He therefore removed to another place, and begged his subsistence of God (whose name be exalted!), and ceased not to do thus till the close of the day; but caught not a single minnow.¹ And he wondered in his mind, and said, Hath God created this new-born child without allotting it subsistence? This can never be: for He who hath opened the jaws hath undertaken to provide for them the necessary subsistence; and God (whose name be exalted!) is bountiful, a liberal supplier of the necessities of life.

He then took up the net, and returned with broken spirit, his heart being occupied with care for his family, because he had left them without food, especially as his wife had just given birth to a child. He ceased not to walk on, saying within himself, What is to be done; and what shall I say to the children this night? Then he came before the oven of a baker, and saw a crowd before it. The time was a time of dearthness; and in those days, there existed not in the possession of the people more than a scanty supply of provisions, and the people were offering money to the baker, but he paid no attention to any one of them, on account of the greatness of the crowd.

The fisherman however stood looking and smelling the smell of the hot bread, and his soul desired it by reason of his hunger; and thereupon the baker saw him, and called out to him, saying, Come hither, O fisherman! So he advanced to him; and the baker said to him, Dost thou desire bread? And he was silent. The baker said to him, Speak, and be not abashed; for God is bountiful. If thou have not with thee money, I will give thee, and will have patience with thee until good shall betide thee. — The fisherman therefore replied, By Allah, O master, I have not money, but give me bread sufficient for my family, and I will leave this net in pawn with thee till to-morrow. But the baker said to him, O poor man, verily this net is as it were thy shop, and the door of thy subsistence; and if thou give it in pawn, with what wilt thou fish? Acquaint me then with the quantity that will suffice thee. — He replied, For ten nusef faddahs. And he gave him bread for ten nusefs; after which he gave him also ten nusef faddahs, and said to him, Take these ten nusefs, and cook for thee by their means a dish of food; so thou wilt owe twenty nusef faddahs, and to-morrow bring me their value in fish, or, if nought betide thee, come, receive thy bread and ten nusefs, and I will have patience with thee until good shall betide thee; and after that, bring me fish to the value of that which I shall be entitled to receive from thee. — So the fisherman replied, May God (whose name be exalted!) reward thee, and recompense thee for me with every thing good! He then took the bread and the ten nusef faddahs, and went away happy, and, having purchased for him what he easily could, went in to his wife; and he saw her sitting, soothing the children, who were weeping by reason of their hunger, and she was saying to them, This instant your father will bring something for you to eat. So when he went in to them, he put down for them the bread, and they ate; and he acquainted his wife with that which had happened to him; whereupon she said to him, God is bountiful.

And on the following day, he took up his net, and went forth from his house, saying, I beg thee, O Lord, to supply me, this day with that which shall whiten my face² in the eyes of the baker! And when he came to the sea he proceeded to cast the net and draw it; but there came not forth in it any fish. He ceased not to do so until the close of the day, and got nothing. So he returned in great grief; and the way to his house led by the oven of the baker. He therefore said within himself, By what way can I go to my house?³ But I will quicken my pace, that the baker may not see me. — And when he came to the oven of the baker, he saw a crowd; and he hastened in his pace, by reason of his abashment at the baker, in order that he might not see him: but, lo, the baker raised his eyes towards him, and cried out, saying, O fisherman, come hither; receive thy bread and the money for thy expenditure; for thou hast forgotten! He replied, No, by Allah; I forgot not; but I was abashed at thee; for I have not caught any fish this day. The baker said to him, Be not abashed. Did I not say to thee, Take thy leisure, until good shall betide thee? — Then he gave him the bread and the ten nusfs, and he went to his wife, and informed her of the news; upon which she said to him, God is bountiful. If it be the will of God, good will betide thee, and thou shalt pay him all that is due to him.

And he ceased not to continue thus for the space of forty days, every day going to the sea, and remaining from the rising of the sun to its setting, and returning without fish, and receiving bread, and money for his expenditures, from the baker, who mentioned not to him the fish any day of those days, nor neglected him as men generally would have done, but gave him the ten nusfs and the bread; and every time that the fisherman said to him, O my brother, reckon with me, — he would reply, Go this is not the time for reckoning: wait until good shall betide thee, and then I will reckon with thee. So he would pray for him, and depart from him thanking him. And on the one and fortieth day, he said to his wife, I desire to cut up this net, and be relieved of this mode of life. — Wherefore? said she. He answered her, It seemeth that my supply of subsistence from the sea is ended. And how long, he added, shall this state continue? By Allah, I am dissolved by abashment at the baker, and I will no more go to the sea, that I may not pass by his oven; for there is no way for me save by his oven; and every time that I pass by it, he calleth me, and giveth me the bread and the ten nusfs. How long then shall I run in debt to him? — But she replied, Praise be to God (whose name be exalted!) who hath moved his heart to favour thee so that he giveth thee the food! And what dost thou dislike in this? — He said, I now owe him a great sum of money, and inevitably he will demand his due. His wife said to him, Hath he vexed thee with words? He answered, No; nor would he reckon with me; but would say to me, Wait until good shall betide thee. — Then, replied his wife, when he demandeth of thee, say to him, Wait until the good that I and thou hope for shall betide. And he said to her, When will the good that we hope for come? She answered him, God is bountiful. And he replied, Thou hast spoken truth.

He then took up his net, and repaired to the sea, saying, O Lord, supply me, if only with one fish that I may give it to the baker! Then he cast the net in the sea, and drew it, and found it heavy; and he ceased not to labour at it until he was violently fatigued; but when he drew it forth he saw in it a dead ass, swollen, and of abominable odour: so his soul was wearied. He extricated it from the net, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! I have been tired of saying to this woman, There remaineth for me no means of subsistence in the sea: let me abandon this occupation: — and of her replying, God is bountiful: good will betide thee. Is then this dead ass that good? — Exceeding grief affected him, and he went to another place, that he might be remote from the smell of the ass, and took the net, and cast it, and waited over it some time. Then he drew it, and again found it heavy; and he ceased not to labour at it until blood issued

So he imagined that he was an 'Efreet, of those whom the lord Suleymán used to imprison in bottles of brass, and cast into the sea, and that, the bottle having broken by reason of the length of years, that 'Efreet had issued from it, and come up in the net. He therefore fled from him, and began to say, Mercy! Mercy! O 'Efreet of Suleymán! — But the human being cried out to him from within the net, saying, Come hither, O fisherman! Flee not from me, for I am a human being like thee. Liberate me then, that thou mayest obtain my recompense. — So when the fisherman heard his words, his heart became tranquillized, and he came to him and said to him, Art thou not an 'Efreet of the Jinn? He answered, No; but I am a man, a believer in God and his Apostle. The fisherman said to him, And who cast thee into the sea? He replied, I am of the children of the sea. I was going about, and thou threwest upon me the net. We are nations obedient to the ordinances of God, and we are compassionate to the creatures of God (whose name be exalted!); and were it not that I fear and dread being of the disobedient, I should have rent thy net; but I willingly submit to that which God hath decreed to befall me; and thou, if thou deliver me, wilt become my owner, and I shall become thy captive. Wilt thou then emancipate me with the desire of seeing the face of God⁵ (whose name be exalted!), and make a covenant with me, and become my companion? I will come to thee every day in this place, and thou shalt come to me, and bring for me a present of the fruits of the land. For with you are grapes and figs and water-melons and peaches and pomegranates and other fruits, and every thing that thou wilt bring me will be acceptable from thee. And with us are coral and pearls and chrysolites and emeralds and jacinths and other jewels. So I will fill for thee the basket in which thou wilt bring me the fruits with minerals consisting of the jewels of the sea. What then sayest thou, O my brother, of this proposal? — The fisherman answered him, Let the Fátehah be recited in confirmation of the agreement between me and thee as to this proposal.

Accordingly each of them recited the Fátehah, and the fisherman liberated him from the net, and said to him, What is thy name? He answered, My name is 'Abd-Allah of the Sea; and if thou come to this place, and see me not, call out and say, Where art thou, O 'Abd-Allah, O thou of the Sea? — And I will be with thee instantly. And thou (he added), what is thy name? The fisherman answered, My name is 'Abd-Allah. So the other replied, Thou art 'Abd-Allah of the Land, and I am 'Abd-Allah of the Sea. Now stay here while I go and bring thee a present. — And he said, I hear and obey. Then 'Abd-Allah of the Sea went into the sea; and thereupon 'Abd-Allah of the Land repented of his having liberated him from the net; and he said within himself, How do I know that he will return to me? He only laughed at me, so that I liberated him; and had I kept him, I might have diverted the people in the city with the sight of him, and received money from all the people for shewing him, and entered with him the houses of the great men.—Therefore he repented of his having liberated him, and said to himself, 'Thy prey hath gone from thy hand. But while he was lamenting his escape from his hand, lo, 'Abd-Allah of the Sea returned to him, with his hands filled with pearls and coral and emeralds and jacinths and other jewels, and said to him, Receive, O my brother, and blame me not; for I have not a basket; if I had, I would have filled it for thee. So thereupon 'Abd-Allah of the Land rejoiced, and received from him the jewels; and 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said to him, Every day thou shalt come to this place before sunrise. He then bade him farewell, and departed, and entered the sea.

But as to the fisherman, he entered the city, joyful, and ceased not to walk on until he came to the oven of the baker, when he said to him, O my brother, good hath betided us: therefore reckon with me. The baker replied, No reckoning is necessary. If thou have with thee any thing, give me; and if thou have not with thee any thing, receive thy bread, and the money for thy expenditure, and go, and wait until good shall betide thee. So he said to him, O my companion, good hath betided me from the bounty of God, and I owe thee a large sum; but receive this. And he took for him a handful of pearls and corals and jacinths and other jewels, that handful being half of what he had with him; and he gave it to the baker, and said to him, Give me some money that I may expend it this day, until I shall sell these minerals. He therefore gave him all the money that he had at his command, and all the bread that was in the basket which he had with him; and the baker was rejoiced with those minerals, and said to the fisherman, I am thy slave and thy servant.

He carried all the bread that he had with him on his head, and walked behind him to the house, and the fisherman gave the bread to his wife and his children. The baker then went to the market, and brought meat and vegetables and all kinds of fruit. He abandoned the oven, and remained all that day occupying himself with the service of 'Abd-Allah of the Land, and performing for him his affairs. So the fisherman said to him, O my brother, thou hast wearied thyself. The baker replied, this is incumbent on me; for I have become thy servant, and thy beneficence hath inundated me. But the fisherman said to him, Thou wast my benefactor in the time of distress and dearth. And the baker passed the ensuing night with him, enjoying good eating; and he became a faithful friend to the fisherman. The fisherman informed his wife of his adventure with 'Abd-Allah of the Sea, whereat she rejoiced, and she said to him, Conceal thy secret, lest the magistrates tyrannize over thee. But he replied, If I conceal my secret from all other people, I will not conceal it from the baker.

He arose in the morning of the following day, having filled a basket with fruits of all kinds in the preceding evening, and he took it up before sunrise, and repaired to the sea, put it down on the shore, and said, Where art thou, O 'Abd-Allah, O thou of the Sea? And he answered him, At thy service;—and came forth to him. He therefore presented to him the fruit, and he took it up, and descended with it, diving into the sea, and was absent a while; after which he came forth, having with him the basket full of all kinds of minerals and jewels. So 'Abd-Allah of the Land put it upon his head, and departed with it; and when he came to the oven of the baker, the baker said to him, O my master I have baked for thee forty shureyks,⁶ and sent them to thy house; and now I will bake bread of the finest flour, and when it is done, I will convey it to the house, and go to bring thee the vegetables and the meat. Upon this, 'Abd-Allah took for him, from the basket, three handfuls, and gave them to him, and went to the house, where he put down the basket, and took, of each kind of jewels, one jewel of great value. Then he repaired to the jewel-market and, stopping at the shop of the Sheykh of the market, said, Purchase of me these jewels. He replied, Shew them to me. So he shewed them to him; and the Sheykh said to him, Hast thou any beside these? He answered, I have a basket full. The Sheykh said to him, Where is thy house? He answered him, In such a quarter. And the Sheykh took from him the jewels, and said to his servants, Lay hold of him; for he is the thief who stole the things of the Queen, the wife of the Sultán.

He then ordered them to beat him, and they did so, and bound his hands behind his back; and the Sheykh arose, with all the people of the jewel-market, and they began to say, We have taken the thief. Some of them said, None stole the goods of such a one but this villain: — and others said, None stole all that was in the house of such a one but he: — and some of them said thus, and others said thus. All this while, he was silent; he returned not to any one of them a reply, nor did he utter to him a sentence, until they stationed him before the King; whereupon the Sheykh said, O King of the age, when the necklace of the Queen was stolen, thou testest and acquaintedst us, and requiredst of us the capture of the offender; and I strove above the rest of the people, and have captured for thee the offender. Lo, here he is before thee, and these jewels we have rescued from his hand. — The King therefore said to the eunuch, Take these minerals, and shew them to the Queen, and say to her, Are these thy goods that thou hast lost? Accordingly the eunuch took them, and went in with them before the Queen; and when she saw them, she wondered at them, and she sent to say to the King, I have found my necklace in my place, and these are not my property; but these jewels are better than the jewels of my necklace; therefore act not unjustly to the man; and if he will sell them, purchase them of him for thy daughter, Umm-es-So'ood,⁷ that we may put them for her upon a necklace.

So when the eunuch returned, and acquainted the King with that which the Queen had said, he cursed the Sheykh of the jewellers, him and his company, with the curse of 'Ád and Thamood;⁸ whereupon they said, O King of the age, we knew that this man was a poor fisherman; so we deemed those things too much for him to possess, and imagined he had stolen them. But he replied, O base wretches, do ye deem good things too much for a believer? Wherefore did ye not ask him? Perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) hath blessed him with them in a way he did not reckon upon; and wherefore do ye assert him to be a thief, and disgrace him among the people? Go forth! May God not bless you! — They therefore went forth in a state of fear. The King then said, O man, may God bless thee in that which He hath bestowed on thee! And thou hast promise of indemnity. But acquaint me with the truth. Whence came to thee these jewels? For I am a King, and the like of them exist not in my possession. — So he answered, O King of the age, I have a basket full of them; and the case is thus and thus. And he informed him of his companionship with 'Abd-Allah of the Sea, and said to him, An agreement hath been made between me and him, that I shall every day fill for him the basket with fruits, and he shall fill it for me with these jewels. The King therefore said to him, O man, this is thy lot; but wealth requireth an exalted station, and I will prevent men's domineering over thee in these days. Perhaps, however, I may be deposed, or may die, and another may be appointed in my stead, and may slay thee on account of his love of worldly goods, and covetousness. I therefore desire to marry thee to my daughter, and to make thee my Wezeer, and bequeath to thee the kingdom after me, that no one may covet thy possessions after my death.

Then the King said, Take ye this man, and conduct him into the bath. So they took him, and washed him, and they clad him in apparel of the apparel of Kings, and led him forth into the presence of the King, who thereupon appointed him Wezeer unto him. He sent also the couriers, and the soldiers of the guard, and all the wives of the great men, to his house; and they clad his wife in the apparel of the wives of Kings, clad her children likewise, and mounted her in a litter; ⁹ and all the wives of the great men, and the troops and the couriers, and the soldiers of the guard, walked before her, and conducted her to the King's palace, with the little infant in her bosom. They brought in her elder children to the King, who treated them with honour, took them upon his lap, and seated them by his side. And they were nine male children; and the King was destitute of male offspring, not having been blessed with any child except that daughter, whose name was Umm-es-So'ood. And as to the Queen, she treated the wife of 'Abd-Allah of the Land with honour, and bestowed favours upon her, and made her Wezeereh to her. The King gave orders to perform the ceremony of the contract of the marriage of 'Abd-Allah of the Land to his daughter, and he assigned as her dowry all the jewels and minerals that he had, and they commenced the festivity! the King commanding that a proclamation should be made to decorate the city on account of the marriage-festivity of his daughter.

Then, on the following day, after 'Abd-Allah of the Land had introduced himself to the King's daughter, the King looked from the window, and saw 'Abd-Allah carrying upon his head a basket full of fruits. So he said to him, What is this that is with thee, O my son-in-law, and whither goest thou? He answered, To my companion, 'Abd-Allah of the Sea. The King said to him, O my son-in-law, this is not the time to go to thy companion. But he replied, I fear to be unfaithful to him with respect to the time of promise; for he would reckon me a liar, and say to me, Worldly matters have diverted thee from coming to me. And the King said, Thou hast spoken truth. Go to thy companion. May God aid thee! ¹⁰ — So he walked through the city, on his way to his companion, and, the people having become acquainted with him, he heard them say, This is the son-in-law of the King, going to exchange the fruits for the jewels. And he who was ignorant of him, and knew him not, would say, O man, for how much is the pound? Come hither: sell to me. — Whereupon he would answer him, Wait for me until I return to thee. And he would not vex any one. Then he went, and met 'Abd-Allah of the Sea, and gave him the fruits; and 'Abd-Allah of the Sea gave him for them jewels in exchange. — He ceased not to do thus, and every day he passed by the oven of the baker, and saw it closed. He continued thus for the space of ten days; and when he had not seen the baker, and saw his oven closed, he said within himself, Verily this is a wonderful thing! Whither can the baker have gone? — He then asked his neighbour, saying to him, O my brother, where is thy neighbour the baker, and what hath God done with him? He answered O my master, he is sick: he doth not come forth from his house. So he said to him, Where is his house? The man answered him, In such a quarter.

He therefore repaired thither, and inquired for him; and when he knocked at the door, the baker looked from the window, and saw his companion the fisherman with a full basket upon his head. So he descended to him, and opened to him the door; and 'Abd-Allah of the Land threw himself upon him, and embraced him, and said to him, How art thou, O my companion? For every day I pass by the oven and see it closed. Then I asked thy neighbour, and he informed me that thou wast sick. I therefore inquired for thy house, that I might see thee. — The baker replied, May God recompense thee for me with every thing good! I have no disease; but it was told me that the King had taken thee, because some of the people lied to him, and asserted that thou wast a thief: so I feared, and closed the oven, and hid myself. — 'Abd-Allah of the Land said, Thou hast spoken truth. And he informed him of his case, and of the events that had happened to him with the King and the Sheykh of the jewel-market, and said to him, The King hath married me to his daughter, and made me his Wezeer. He then said to him, Take what is in this basket as thy lot, and fear not.

After that, he went forth from him, having dispelled from him his fear, and repaired to the King with the basket empty. So the King said to him, O my son-in-law, it seemeth that thou hast not met with thy companion 'Abd-Allah of the Sea this day. He replied, I went to him, and what he gave me I have given to my companion the baker; for I owe him kindness. The King said, Who is this baker? He answered, He is a man of kind disposition, and such and such events happened to me with him in the days of poverty, and he neglected me not any day, nor broke my heart. The King said, What is his name? He answered, His name is 'Abd-Allah the baker, and my name is 'Abd-Allah of the Land, and my other companion's name is 'Abd-Allah of the Sea. Upon this, the King said, And my name is 'Abd-Allah, and the servants of God¹¹ are all brethren. Send therefore to thy companion the baker: bring him that we may make him Wezeer of the Left. Accordingly he sent to him; and when he came before the King, the King invested him with the apparel of Wezeer, and appointed him Wezeer of the Left, appointing 'Abd-Allah of the Land Wezeer of the Right. 'Abd-Allah of the Land continued in this state a whole year, every day taking the basket full of fruits, and returning with it full of jewels and minerals; and when the fruits were exhausted from the gardens, he used to take raisins and almonds and hazel-nuts and walnuts and figs and other things; and all that he took to him he accepted from him, and he returned to him the basket full of jewels as was his custom.

Now it happened, one day, that he took the basket full of dried fruits, according to his custom, and his companion received them from him; after which, 'Abd-Allah of the Land sat upon the shore, and 'Abd-Allah of the Sea sat in the water, near the shore, and they proceeded to converse together, talking alternately, until they were led to mention the tombs. Thereupon 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said, O my brother, they say that the Prophet (may God bless and save him!) is buried among you in the land. Dost thou then know his tomb? — He answered, Yes. He asked, In what place? He answered, In a city called Teybeh.¹² He said, And do men, the people of the land, visit his tomb? He answered, Yes. And 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said, May you derive enjoyment, O people of the land, from visiting this generous, benign, merciful Prophet, whose visitor meriteth his intercession! And hast thou visited him, O my brother? — He answered, No; for I was a poor man, and found not what I should expend on the way, and I have not been independent save from the time when I first knew thee and thou conferredst upon me this prosperity. But the visiting him, after I shall have performed the pilgrimage to the Sacred House of God,¹³ hath become incumbent on me; and nothing hath prevented my doing that but my affection for thee; for I cannot separate myself from thee for one day.

Upon this, he of the Sea said to him of the Land, And dost thou prefer thy affection for me above visiting the tomb of Mohammad (may God bless and save him!), who will intercede for thee on the day of appearance before God, and will save thee from the fire, and by means of whose intercession thou wilt enter Paradise; and for the sake of the love of the world dost thou neglect to visit the tomb of thy Prophet Mohammad, may God bless and save him? He answered, No, by Allah: verily the visitation of him is preferred by me above everything else; but I desire of thee permission that I may visit him this year. He replied, I give thee permission to visit him; and when thou standest by his tomb, give him my salutation. I have also a deposite: so enter the sea with me, that I may take thee to my city, and conduct thee into my house, and entertain thee, and give thee the deposite, in order that thou mayest put it upon the grave of the Prophet (may God bless and save him!); and say thou to him, O Apostle of God, 'Abd-Allah of the Sea saluteth thee, and hath given to thee this present, and he beggeth thine intercession to save him from the fire.

So 'Abd-Allah of the Land said to him, O my brother, thou wast created in the water, and the water is thine abode, and it injureth thee not: then if thou come forth from it to the land, will injury betide thee? He answered, Yes; my body will dry up, and the breezes of the land will blow upon me, and I shall die. — And I in like manner, replied 'Abd-Allah of the Land, was created on the Land, and the land is my abode; and if I enter the sea, the water will enter into my body, and suffocate me, and I shall die. But the other said to him, Fear not that; for I will bring thee an ointment, with which thou shalt anoint thy body, and the water will not injure thee, even if thou pass the remainder of thy life going about in the sea; and thou shalt sleep and arise in the sea, and nought will injure thee. So he replied, If the case be so, no harm. Bring me the ointment, that I may try it.

'Abd-Allah of the Sea said, Be it so. And he took the basket, and descended into the sea, and was absent a little while. He then returned, having with him some fat like the fat of beef, the colour of which was yellow, like gold, and its scent was sweet; and 'Abd-Allah of the Land said to him, What is this, O my brother? He answered him, This is the fat of the liver of a kind of fish, called the dendán.¹⁴ It is the greatest of all kinds of fish, and the most violent of our enemies, and its form is larger than that of any beast of the land existing among you: if it saw the camel or the elephant, it would swallow it. — 'Abd-Allah of the Land said to him, O my brother, and what doth this unlucky creature eat? He answered him, It eateth of the beasts of the sea. Hast thou not heard that it is said in the proverb, Like the fish of the sea: the strong eateth the weak? ¹⁵ — He replied, Thou hast spoken truth. But have you (he added) many of these dendáns among you in the sea? 'Abd-Allah of the Sea answered, Among us are such as none can number except God, whose name be exalted! Then said 'Abd-Allah of the Land, Verily I fear that, if I descend with thee, this kind of creature may meet me and devour me.

But 'Abd-Allah of the Sea replied, Fear not; for when it seeth thee, it will know that thou art a son of Adam, and it will fear thee, and flee. It feareth not aught in the sea as it feareth a son of Adam; for when it hath eaten a son of Adam, it dieth instantly, because the fat of a son of Adam is a deadly poison to this kind of creature. And we collect not the fat of its liver save in consequence of a son of Adam's falling into the sea and being drowned: for his form becometh altered, and often his flesh is torn, and the dendán eateth it, imagining it to be of some of the animals of the sea, and dieth: then we happen to light on it dead, and take the fat of its liver, with which we anoint our bodies, and we go about in the sea. In whatever place is a son of Adam, if there be in that place a hundred or two hundred or a thousand or more of that kind of creature, and they hear the cry of the son of Adam, all of them die immediately at his crying once, and not one of them can move from its place.

Upon this, 'Abd-Allah of the Land said, I place my reliance upon God. He then pulled off the clothes that were upon him, and, having dug a hole on the shore, he buried his clothes; after which, he anointed his person from the parting of his hair to his feet with this ointment. Then he descended into the water, and dived; and he opened his eyes, and the water injured him not. He walked to the right and left; and if he would, he ascended; and if he would, he descended to the bottom. He saw the water of the sea forming as it were a tent over him, and it injured him not. And 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said to him, What seest thou, O my brother? He answered him, I see what is good, O my brother, and thou hast spoken truth in that which thou hast said; for the water doth not injure me. Then 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said to him, Follow me. So he followed him; and they ceased not to walk from place to place, while he saw before him, and on his right and on his left, mountains of water, and he diverted himself with the view of them and with the view of the different kinds of fish that were sporting in the sea, some great and some small. Among them were some resembling buffaloes, and some resembling oxen, and some resembling dogs, and some resembling human beings; and every kind to which they drew near fled at seeing 'Abd-Allah of the Land. He therefore said to him of the Sea, O my brother, wherefore do I see every kind to which we draw near flee from us? And he answered him, Through fear of thee; for every thing that God hath created feareth the son of Adam.

He ceased not to divert himself with the sight of the wonders of the sea until they came to a high mountain, and 'Abd-Allah of the Land walked by the side of that mountain, and suddenly he heard a great cry: so he looked aside, and he saw something black descending upon him from that mountain, and it was as large as a camel, or larger, and cried out. He therefore said to his companion, What is this, O my brother? He answered him, This is the dendán: it is descending in pursuit of me, desiring to devour me: so cry out at it, O my brother, before it reacheth us; for otherwise it will seize me and devour me. Accordingly, 'Abd-Allah of the Land cried out at it, and, lo, it fell down dead; and when he saw it dead, he said, Extolled be the perfection of God, and his praise! I struck it not with a sword, nor with a knife! How is it that, with the enormity of this creature, it could not bear my cry, but died? — But 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said to him, Wonder not: for by Allah, O my brother, were there a thousand or two thousand of this kind, they would not be able to endure the cry of a son of Adam.

They then walked to a city, and they saw its inhabitants to be all damsels, no males being among them. So 'Abd-Allah of the Land said, O my brother, what is this city, and what are these damsels? And his companion answered him, This is the city of the damsels; for its inhabitants are of the damsels of the Sea.¹⁶ The King of the Sea banisheth them to this city. Every one against whom he is incensed, of the damsels of the Sea, he sendeth hither, and she cannot come forth from it; for if she came forth from it, any of the beasts of the sea that saw her would devour her. But in other cities than this, there are men and women. — Then 'Abd-Allah of the Land proceeded to divert himself with the view of these damsels, and saw that they had faces like moons, and hair like the hair of women, but they had arms and legs in the fore part of the body, and tails like the tails of fishes. His companion, having diverted him with the view of the inhabitants of this city, went forth with him, and walked before him to another city, which he saw to be filled with people, females and males, whose forms were like the forms of the damsels before mentioned; and they had tails; but they had no selling nor buying like the people of the land. And he said, O my brother, how do they manage their marriages? His companion answered him, They do not all marry; for we are not all of one religion: among us are Muslims, unitarians; and among us are Christians and Jews and other sects; and those of us who marry are chiefly the Muslims. Whoso desireth to marry, they impose upon him, as a dowry, the gift of a certain number of different kinds of fish, which he catcheth; as many as a thousand or two thousand, or more or less, according to the agreement made between him and the father of the wife. And when he bringeth what is demanded, the family of the bridegroom and the family of the bride assemble and eat the banquet. Then they introduce him to his wife. And after that, he catcheth fish, and feedeth her; or, if he be unable, she catcheth fish, and feedeth him.

'Abd-Allah of the Sea then took him to another city, and after that to another, and so on, until he had diverted him with the sight of eighty cities; and he saw the inhabitants of each city to be unlike the inhabitants of another city; and he said, O my brother, are there any more cities in the sea? His companions said, And what hast thou seen of the cities of the sea, and its wonders? By the generous, benign, merciful Prophet, were I to divert thee a thousand years, every day with the sight of a thousand cities, and shew thee in every city a thousand wonders, I should not shew thee a twenty-fourth part of the cities of the sea, and its wonders. I have only diverted thee with the view of our own region and her land, and nothing more. — So 'Abd-Allah of the Land said to him, O my brother, since the case is so, enough for me is that with the sight of which I have diverted myself; for I have become weary of eating fish and have spent eighty days in thy company, during which thou hast not fed me, morning and evening, with aught but raw fish, neither boiled nor cooked in any way. But thou hast not diverted me with a sight of thy city. — He replied, As to my city, we have gone a considerable distance beyond it, and it is near the shore from which we came.

Then he returned with him to his city, and when he came to it, he said to him, This is my city. And he saw it to be a small city in comparison with those with the sight of which he had diverted himself. He entered the city, accompanied by 'Abd-Allah of the Sea, who proceeded until he came to a cavern, when he said to him, This is my house; and all the houses of this city are likewise caverns, great and small, in the mountains, as are also all those of all the cities of the sea. For every one who desireth to make for himself a house goeth to the King, and saith to him, I desire to make me a house in such a place. Thereupon the King sendeth with him a tribe of fish called the peckers,¹⁷ assigning as their wages a certain quantity of fish; and they have beaks which crumble rock. They come to the mountain that the intended owner of the house hath chosen, and excavate in it the house with their beaks; and the owner of the house catcheth fish for them, and putteth them into their mouths, until the cavern is completed, when they depart, and the owner of the house taketh up his abode in it. All the people of the sea are in this state: they transact not affairs of commerce, one with another, nor do they serve one another, save by means of fish; and their food is fish.

Then he said to him, Enter. So he entered. And 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said, O my daughter! And lo, his daughter advanced to him. She had a face round like the moon, and long hair and heavy hips, and black-edged eyes and a slender waist; but she had a tail. And when she saw 'Abd-Allah of the Land with her father, she said to him, O my father, what is this tail-less creature whom thou hast brought with thee? He answered her, O my daughter, this is my companion of the land, from whom I used to bring thee the fruits of the land. Come hither: salute him.—She therefore advanced and saluted him, with an eloquent tongue and fluent speech; and her father said to her, Bring some food for our guest, by whose arrival blessing hath betided us. And she brought him two large fishes, each of them like a lamb; and he said to him, Eat. So he ate in spite of himself, by reason of his hunger; for he was weary of eating fish, and they had nothing else. And but a short time had elapsed when the wife of 'Abd-Allah of the Sea approached. She was of beautiful form, and with her were two children, each child having in his hand a young fish, of which he was craunching bits as a man crauncheth bits of a cucumber.

And when she saw 'Abd-Allah of the Land with her husband, she said, What is this tail-less creature? The two children also advanced with their sister and their mother, and they looked at 'Abd-Allah of the Land, and said, Yea, by Allah: verily he is tail-less! And they laughed at him. So 'Abd-Allah of the Land said to his companion, O my brother, hast thou brought me to make me a laughing-stock to thy children and thy wife? 'Abd-Allah of the Sea answered him, Pardon, O my brother: for he who hath no tail existeth not among us; and when one without a tail is found, the Sultán taketh him to laugh at him. But, O my brother, be not displeased with these young children and the woman, since their intellects are defective.—Then he cried out at his family, and said to them, Be ye silent! So they feared, and were silent; and he proceeded to appease his mind.

And while he was conversing with him, lo, ten persons, great, strong, and stout, advanced to him, and said O 'Abd-Allah it hath been told to the King that thou hast with thee a tail-less creature of the tail-less creatures of the land. So he replied, Yes; and he is this man; for he is my companion: he hath come to me as a guest, and I desire to take him back to the land. But they said to him, We cannot go save with him; and if thou desire to say aught, arise and take him, and come with him before the King, and what thou sayest to us, say to the King. Therefore 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said to him, O my brother, the excuse is manifest, and it is impossible for us to disobey the King; but go with me to the King, and I will endeavour to liberate thee from him, if it be the will of God. Fear not; for when he seeth thee, he will know that thou art of the children of the land; and when he knoweth that thou art of the land, he will without doubt treat thee with honour, and restore thee to the land. — So 'Abd-Allah of the Land replied, It is thine to determine; and I will place my dependence upon God, and go with thee. He then took him and proceeded with him until he came to the King; and when the King saw him, he laughed, and said, Welcome to the tail-less! And every one who was around the King began to laugh at him, and to say, Yea, by Allah: verily he is tail-less!

Then 'Abd-Allah of the Sea advanced to the King, and acquainted him with the circumstances, and said to him, This is of the children of the land, and he is my companion, and he cannot live among us; for he loveth not the eating of fish unless it be fried or otherwise cooked; and I desire that thou give me permission to restore him to the land. The King therefore replied, Since the case is so, and he cannot live among us, I give thee permission to restore him to his place after entertainment. Then the King said, Bring to him the banquet. And they brought him fish of various shapes and colours, and he ate in obedience to the command of the King; after which the King said to him, Demand of me what thou wilt. And 'Abd-Allah of the Land replied, I demand of thee that thou give me jewels. So he said, Take ye him to the jewel-house, and let him select what he requireth. Accordingly his companion took him to the jewel-house, and he selected as many as he desired. He then returned with him to his city, and, producing to him a purse, he said to him, Take this as a deposite, and convey it to the tomb of the Prophet, may God bless and save him! And he took it, not knowing what was in it.

Then 'Abd-Allah of the Sea went forth with him, to conduct him to the land; and he saw, in his way, people engaged in singing and festivity, and a table of fish spread; and the people were eating and singing, and in a state of great rejoicing. So he said to 'Abd-Allah of the Sea, Wherefore are these people in a state of great rejoicing? Is a wedding being celebrated among them? — And he of the Sea answered, There is no wedding being celebrated among them; but a person among them is dead. 'Abd-Allah of the Land therefore said to him, Do ye, when a person dieth among you, rejoice for him, and sing and eat? His companion answered, Yes. And ye, O people of the land, he added, what do ye? 'Abd-Allah of the Land answered, When a person among us dieth, we mourn for him, and weep, and the women slap their faces, and rend the bosoms of their garments, in grief for him who is dead.

And upon this, 'Abd-Allah of the Sea stared at 'Abd-Allah of the Land, and said, Give me the deposite. So he gave it to him. Then 'Abd-Allah of the Sea took him forth to the land, and said to him, I have broken off my companionship with thee, and my friendship for thee, and after this day thou shalt not see me, nor will I see thee. — Wherefore, said 'Abd-Allah of the Land, are these words? 'Abd-Allah of the Sea said, Are ye not, O people of the Land, a deposite of God? — Yes, answered he of the Land. And the other rejoined, Then how is it that it is not agreeable to you that God should take his deposite, but on the contrary ye weep for it? And how should I give thee the deposite for the Prophet (may God bless and save him!), seeing that ye, when the new-born child cometh to you, rejoice in it, though God (whose name be exalted!) putteth into it the soul as a deposite? Then, when He taketh that soul, how is it that it grieveth you, and ye weep and mourn? Such being the case, we have no need of your companionship. — He then left him, and went back to the sea.

So upon this, 'Abd-Allah of the Land put on his clothes, and took his jewels, and repaired to the King, who met him with a longing desire to see him, and rejoiced at his return, and said to him, How art thou, O my son-in-law, and what hath been the cause of thine absence from me during this period? He therefore told him his story and what he had seen of the wonders in the sea; whereat the King wondered. He acquainted him also with that which 'Abd-Allah of the Sea had said; and he replied, Thou art the person who erred, in thy giving this information. 'Abd-Allah of the Land persevered for a length of time in going to the shore of the sea, and calling out to 'Abd-Allah of the Sea; but he answered him not, nor came to him. So 'Abd-Allah of the Land relinquished the hope of seeing him again, and he and the King his father-in-law and their family resided in the most happy state and in the practice of good deeds until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions, and they all died. — Extolled be the perfection of the Living who dieth not, and to whom belongeth the dominion that is apparent and the dominion that is hidden, and who is able to accomplish every thing, and is gracious and knowing with respect to his servants! ¹⁸

EL-KHASEEB,¹ the lord of Egypt, had a son, named Ibráheem, than whom there was none more beautiful; and by reason of his fear for him, he would not allow him to go out, save to the Friday-prayers. Now he passed, going forth from the Friday-prayers, by an old man, with whom were many books, and he alighted from his horse, and seated himself by him, and, turning over the books and examining them, he saw in one of them a picture of a woman, which almost spoke: none more beautiful than she had been seen upon the face of the earth. Thereupon his reason was captivated, and his mind was stupefied, and he said to the man, O sheykh, sell me this picture. And he kissed the ground before him, and replied, O my lord, without price. So he gave him a hundred pieces of gold, and took the book in which was this picture; and he occupied himself with looking at it, and weeping, night and day. He abstained from food and drink and sleep, and he said within himself, Had I asked the bookseller respecting the painter of this picture, who he was, probably he had informed me; and if the original of it be living, I might gain access to her; and if it be a picture not representing any particular person, I would cease to be enamoured of it, and not torment myself on account of a thing that hath no real existence.

So when the next Friday arrived, he passed by the bookseller, who rose up to him, and he said to him, O uncle, inform me who painted this picture. He replied, O my lord, a man of the inhabitants of Baghdád, named Abu-l-Kásim Es-Sandalánee, who resideth in a quarter called the quarter of El-Karkh, painted it, and I know not whose portrait it is. The youth therefore arose and left him, and he acquainted not any one of the people of the empire with his state.

He performed the Friday-prayers, and returned to the palace, and, taking a leathern bag, he filled it with jewels and gold, and the value of the jewels was thirty thousand pieces of gold. He then waited until the morning, and went forth, not having informed any one; and he overtook a caravan, and saw a Bedawee, and said to him, O uncle, what distance is between me and Baghdád? He replied, O my son, where art thou, and where is Baghdád? Verily between thee and it is a space of two months' journey. — And the youth said to him, O uncle, if thou wilt conduct me to Baghdád, I will give thee a hundred pieces of gold and this mare that is beneath me, the value of which is a thousand pieces of gold. Upon this, the Bedawee replied, God is witness of what we say. But thou shalt not lodge this night save with me. — And the young man assented to that which he said, and passed the night with him; and when daybreak appeared, the Bedawee took him, and proceeded with him quickly by a near way, in eagerness for that mare which he had promised to give him. They ceased not to journey on until they arrived at the walls of Baghdád, when the Bedawee said to him, Praise be to God for safety! O my master, this is Baghdád. — So the young man rejoiced exceedingly, and he alighted from the mare, and gave her to the Bedawee, her and the hundred pieces of gold.

He then took the leathern bag, and walked on, inquiring for the quarter of El-Karkh, and for the place of abode of the merchants, and destiny drove him to a by-street in which were ten chambers, five facing five, and at the upper end of the street was an entrance with two folding doors, and with a ring of silver. At this entrance were two mastabahs of marble, spread with the best of furniture, and upon one of them was sitting a man of reverend appearance, of handsome form, and clad in sumptuous apparel, before whom were five memlooks, like moons. When the young man saw this, he knew the indication which the bookseller had mentioned to him; and he saluted the man, who returned his salutation, and welcomed him, and seated him, and asked him respecting his state. So the young man said to him, I am a stranger, and I desire of thy beneficence that thou wouldst see for me, in this street, a house in which I may reside. And the man called out, saying, O Ghazáleh! ² — whereupon a slave-girl came forth to him, and said, At thy service, O my master! And he said, Take with thee some servants, and go ye to a chamber, and clean it, and spread furniture in it, and put in it all that is requisite of vessels and other things, for the sake of this young man, the beautiful in form.

Accordingly the slave-girl went forth, and did as he had ordered her; after which, the sheykh took him and shewed him the dwelling; and the young man said to him, O my master, how much is the rent of this dwelling? He answered him, O comely-faced, I will not receive from thee rent as long as thou remainest in it. The young man therefore thanked him for that. Then the sheykh called another slave-girl, and there came forth a slave-girl like the sun, and he said to her, Bring the apparatus for chess. So she brought it, and a memlook spread the chess-table, and the sheykh said to the young man, Wilt thou play with me? He answered, Yes. And he played with him several times, and the young man beat him. He therefore said, Thou hast done well, O young man, and thy qualities are perfect. By Allah, there is not in Baghdád the person who can beat me, and thou hast beaten me!

And after they had prepared the dwelling with the furniture and every thing else that was requisite, the sheykh delivered to him the keys, and said to him, O my master, wilt thou not enter my abode and eat of my bread, that we may be honoured by thee? And the young man assented to this, and went with him; and when they came to the house, he beheld a handsome, beautiful house, decorated with gold, and in it were all kinds of pictures, and varieties of furniture and other things, such as the tongue cannot describe. The sheykh then complimented him, and gave orders to bring the food; whereupon they brought a table of the manufacture of San'â of El-Yemen, and it was put, and they brought extraordinary dishes of food, than which there existed none more excellent, nor any more delicious. So the young man ate until he was satisfied, and washed his hands; and he proceeded to look at the house and the furniture. And after that, he looked for the leathern bag that was with him; and saw it not. So he said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! I have eaten a morsel worth a piece of silver or two pieces of silver, and there hath gone from me a leathern bag containing thirty thousand pieces of gold. But I seek aid of God.

Then he was silent, and was unable to speak; and the sheykh again caused the apparatus for chess to be brought forward, and said to the young man, Wilt thou play with me? He answered, Yes: — and played, and the sheykh beat him; whereupon the young man said, Thou hast done well: — and he gave over playing, and rose. So the sheykh said to him, What aileth thee, O young man? He answered, I desire the leathern bag. And upon this the sheykh arose and brought it out to him, and said, Lo, here it is, O my master. Wilt thou resume the playing with me? — He answered Yes. And he played with him, and the young man beat him. The man therefore said, When thy mind was occupied with thinking of the leathern bag, I beat thee; and when I had brought it to thee, thou beatest me. Then he said to him, O my son, inform me from what country thou art. So he answered, From Egypt. And the sheykh said to him, And what is the reason of thy coming to Baghdád? He therefore produced to him the picture, and said, Know, O uncle, that I am the son of El-Khaseeb, the lord of Egypt; and I saw this picture in the possession of a bookseller, and my reason was captivated: so I asked respecting the painter of it, and it was told me that the painter of it was a man in the quarter of El-Karkh, named Abu-l-Kásim Es-Sandalánee, in a street called Darb ez-Zaafarán. I therefore took with me some wealth, and came alone, no one knowing of my case; and I desire of thy perfect beneficence that thou wouldst direct me to him, in order that I may ask him the cause of his painting this picture, and whose portrait it is; and whatsoever he shall desire of me, I will give him it.

Upon this, the sheykh said, By Allah, O my son, I am Abu-l-Kásim Es-Sandalánee, and this is a wonderful thing. How is it that destiny hath driven thee to me? — And when the young man heard his words, he rose to him and embraced him, and kissed his head and his hands, and said to him, By Allah I conjure thee that thou tell me whose portrait it is. And he replied, I hear and obey. He then arose and opened a closet, and took forth from it a number of books in which he had painted this picture, and said, Know, O my son, that the original of this portrait is the daughter of my paternal uncle. She is in El-Basrah, and her father is Governor of El-Basrah. He is named Abu-l-Leys, and she is named Jemeeleh; ³ and there is not on the face of the earth a person more beautiful than she; but she is averse from men, and cannot bear the mention of a man in her company. I went to my uncle, desiring that he should marry me to her, and I was lavish of wealth to him; but he consented not to my proposal; and when his daughter knew thereof, she was enraged, and sent to me a message, saying in it, If thou have sense, remain not in this city: for if thou do, thou wilt perish and thy sin will be on thine own neck. And she is a virago among viragoes. I therefore went forth from El-Basrah with broken heart, and I painted this portrait in the books, and dispersed them in the countries, thinking that they might fall into the hand of a young man of beautiful form, like thee, and he might contrive means of gaining access to her; for perhaps she would become enamoured of him; and I would previously exact of him a promise that, when he should have gained possession of her, he should shew her to me, if he only granted me a look from a distance.

So when Ibráheem, the son of El-Khaseeb, heard his words, he hung down his head a while, meditating. And Es-Sandalánee said to him, O my son, I have not seen in Baghdád any one more beautiful than thou; and I imagine that she, if she see thee, will love thee. Canst thou then, if thou obtain an interview with her, and get possession of her, shew her to me, and grant me even a look from a distance? — He answered, Yes. And the sheykh said, Since the case is so, reside with me until thou shalt set forth. But the young man replied, I cannot remain; for an exceeding fire is in my heart on account of my passion for her. So the sheykh said to him, Wait until I prepare for thee a vessel in the course of three days, that thou mayest go in it to El-Basrah. He therefore waited until he had prepared for him a vessel, and put in it all that he required, of food and drink and other things; and after the three days the sheykh said to the young man, Prepare for the voyage; for I have fitted out for thee a vessel, in which are all things that thou requirest, and the vessel is my property, and the boatmen are of my servants, and in the vessel is what will suffice thee until thou shalt return; and I have charged the boatmen to serve thee till thou shalt return in safety.

So the young man arose, and embarked in the vessel, bade farewell to the sheykh, and proceeded until he arrived at El-Basrah, when he took forth a hundred pieces of gold for the boatmen; but they said to him, We have received the pay from our master. He however replied, Receive it as a present, and I will not inform him of it. They therefore received it from him, and prayed for him. The young man then entered El-Basrah, and asked where was the place of abode of the merchants; whereupon they answered him, In a Khán called the Khán of Hamdán. So he walked on until he came to the market in which was the Khán; and the eyes of the people were cast upon him, gazing at him, on account of his excessive beauty and loveliness. Then he entered the Khán with a boatman, and inquired for the door-keeper. They therefore directed him to him; and he saw him to be an old, reverend sheykh. He saluted him, and the door-keeper returned his salutation; and he said, O uncle, hast thou an elegant chamber? He answered, Yes; — and, taking him, together with the boatman, he opened for them an elegant chamber, decorated with gold, and said, O young man this chamber is suitable to thee. And thereupon the young man took forth two pieces of gold, and said to him, Receive these two as the gratuity for the key.⁴ So he took them, and prayed for him.

And the young man ordered the boatman to return to the vessel. He then entered the chamber, and the door-keeper of the Khán remained with him, and served him, and said to him, O my master, happiness hath betided us by thy coming. And the young man gave him a piece of gold, saying to him, Buy for us with it some bread and meat and sweetmeat and wine. Accordingly he took it, and repaired to the market, and returned to him, having bought those things for ten pieces of silver, and gave him the remainder. But the young man said to him, Expend it upon thyself. And the door-keeper of the Khán rejoiced thereat exceedingly. Then the young man ate, of the things that he had demanded, one cake of bread with a little savoury food, and said to the door-keeper of the Khán, Take this to the people of thy dwelling. He therefore took it, and went with it to the people of his dwelling, and said to them, I imagine not that any one on the face of the earth is more generous than the young man who hath taken up his abode with us this day, or more sweet than he; and if he remain with us, richness will betide us.

Then the door-keeper of the Khán went in to Ibráheem, and saw him weeping: so he sat, and began to rub and press gently his feet; after which he kissed them, and said, O my master, wherefore dost thou weep? May God not cause thee to weep! — And the young man said, O uncle, I desire to drink with thee this night. The door-keeper therefore replied, I hear and obey. And the young man took forth and gave him five pieces of gold, saying to him, Buy for us, with them, fruits and wine. He then gave him five other pieces of gold, and said to him, Buy for us, with these, dried fruits and perfumes and five fat fowls and bring me a lute. So he went forth and brought for him what he had ordered him to get, and said to his wife, Prepare this food, and strain for us this wine, and let that which thou shalt prepare be excellent; for this young man hath extended to all of us his beneficence. His wife therefore did as he commanded her to the utmost of his desire, and he took the provisions and went in with them to Ibráheem the son of the Sultán. So they ate and drank and were merry; and afterwards the young man wept and recited these two verses: —

O my friend, if I gave my life in my endeavour, and all my wealth, and the world with what is in it,
And the Garden of Eternity, and Paradise,⁶ all together, for the hour of union, my heart would purchase it.

Then he uttered a great groan, and fell down in a fit; whereat the door-keeper of the Khán sighed; and when he recovered, he said to him, O my master, what causeth thee to weep, and who is she to whom thou alludest in these verses; for she cannot be aught but as dust to thy feet? And the young man arose, and, taking forth a wrapper containing some of the most beautiful of women's apparel, said to him, Take this to thy hareem. So he received it from him, and gave it to his wife, who thereupon came with him, and went in to the young man; and, lo, he was weeping. She therefore said to him, Thou hast crumbled our livers. Tell us then what beautiful woman thou desirest, and she shall not be aught but a slave in thine abode. — And he said (addressing the door-keeper), O uncle, know that I am the son of El-Khaseeb, the lord of Egypt, and that I am enamoured of Jemeeleh, the daughter of Abu-l-Leys, the chief. So the wife of the door-keeper of the Khán said, Allah! Allah! O my brother, abstain from uttering these words, lest any one hear of us, and we perish; for there is not upon the face of the earth any one more violent than she, and no one can mention to her the name of a man, since she is averse from men. Then, O my son, turn from her to another.

And when he heard her words, he wept violently. The door-keeper of the Khán therefore said to him, I have nought but my life to give, and I will expose it to peril for love of thee, and contrive for thee a plan by which thy desire may be attained. Then they both went forth from him. And when the morning came, the young man entered the bath, and put on a suit of the apparel of Kings; and, lo, the door-keeper of the Khán, with his wife, advanced to him and said to him, O my master, know that here is a tailor who is humpbacked and he is the tailor of the lady Jemeeleh. So repair to him, and acquaint him with thy state, and perhaps he will direct thee to a means of thine attaining thy desires.

The youth therefore arose and went to the shop of the humpbacked tailor; and he went in to him, and found with him ten memlooks, like moons. He saluted them, and they returned his salutation, and were delighted with him, and they seated him, and were confounded at the sight of his charms and his loveliness. And when the humpback saw him, his mind was amazed at the beauty of his form. The young man then said to him, I desire of thee that thou sew for me my pocket. So the tailor advanced, and took a needleful of silk, and sewed it. And the young man had torn his pocket purposely. And when the tailor had sewed it, he took forth for him five pieces of gold, and gave them to him; after which, he departed to his chamber. The tailor therefore said, What have I done for this young man, that he hath given me the five pieces of gold? Then he passed the night thinking upon his beauty and his generosity.

And when the morning came, the young man repaired again to the shop of the humpbacked tailor. He entered and saluted him, and he returned his salutation, treated him with honour, and welcomed him; and when the young man sat, he said to the humpback, O uncle, sew for me my pocket; for it hath been torn a second time. So he replied, O my son, on the head and the eye. And he advanced and sewed it; and the young man gave him ten pieces of gold. The tailor therefore took them and became amazed at his beauty and generosity, and said, By Allah, O young man, there must be some reason for this conduct of thine, and this is not for the sewing of a pocket. But inform me of the truth of thy case. — And he replied, O uncle, this is not the place for talking; for my story is wonderful, and my case is extraordinary. Upon this, the tailor said, Since the case is so, arise and come with us into a private place. Then the tailor arose, and, taking his hand, entered with him a chamber within the shop and said to him, O young man, tell me. So he related to him his case from first to last; and he was amazed at his words, and said, O young man, fear God with respect to thy case; for she whom thou hast mentioned is a virago, averse from men. Therefore guard, O my brother, thy tongue; otherwise thou wilt destroy thyself. — And when the young man heard his words, he wept violently, and, keeping hold of the skirt of the tailor, he said, Protect me, O uncle; for I am perishing; and I have left my kingdom and the kingdom of my father and my grandfather, and become in the land a stranger, solitary; and I have not patience to remain absent from her.

So when the tailor saw what had betided him, he pitied him, and said, O my son, I have nought but my life to give, and I will expose it to peril for love of thee; for thou hast wounded my heart; but to-morrow I will contrive for thee a plan by which thy heart shall be comforted. — He therefore prayed for him, and departed to the Khán; and he told the door-keeper of the Khán what the tailor had said; whereupon he replied, He hath acted with thee kindly. And when the next morning came, the young man attired himself in the most sumptuous of his apparel, and, taking with him a purse containing some pieces of gold, came to the humpback, and saluted him, and sat down. Then he said to him, O uncle, fulfil thy promise to me. And he replied Arise immediately, and take three fat fowls, and three ounces of sugar-candy, and two small jugs, which fill thou with wine, and take a cup. Put these things into a small bag, and embark, after the morning-prayers, in a small boat, with a boatman, and say to him I desire that thou go with me to the country below El-Basrah. And if he reply, I cannot go further than a league, — say thou to him, Thou shalt do as thou pleasest. But when he goeth, excite him with money, until he conveyeth thee further; and when thou hast arrived, the first garden that thou wilt see is the garden of the lady Jemeeleh. When thou seest it, go to its gate. Thou wilt see two high steps, on which is furniture of brocade; and a humpback man, like myself, sitting. Complain to him of thy state, and solicit his favour, and perhaps he will feel pity for thy state, and enable thee to see her, at least to obtain a sight from a distance. I have no expedient within my power but this; and if he be not moved with pity for thy state, I perish, and so dost thou. This is what I think advisable, and the affair must be committed to God, whose name be exalted — So the young man said, I seek aid of God. What God willeth must come to pass; and there is no strength nor power but in God.

He then arose and departed from the humpbacked tailor, and repaired to his chamber, took the things that he had directed him to procure, and put them into a neat, small bag. And when he arose in the following morning, he came to the bank of the Tigris, and, lo, he saw a boatman lying asleep. So he woke him, and gave him ten pieces of gold, saying to him, Convey me to the country below El-Basrah. The man replied, O my master, on the condition that I go not further than a league; for if I go a span beyond that distance, we both perish. And he said to him, As thou pleasest. He therefore took him, and proceeded with him down the river; and when he came near to the garden, he said, O my son, beyond this point I cannot go; for if I pass this limit, we both perish. So he took forth and gave him ten other pieces of gold, and said to him, Receive this money, that thou mayest have recourse to it to amend thy state. And the man was abashed at him, and said, I commit the affair to God, whose name be exalted! And he proceeded down the river with him; and when he arrived at the garden, the young man arose in his joy, leapt from the boat as far as a spear's throw, and threw himself down; and the boatman returned, fleeing.

The young man then advanced, and he saw all that the humpback had described to him with respect to the garden. He saw its gate open, and in the vestibule was a couch of ivory, on which was sitting a humpbacked man of comely countenance, clad in apparel ornamented with gold, and having in his hand a mace of gilt silver. So the young man went quickly and threw himself on his hand and kissed it; whereupon he said to him, Who art thou, and whence hast thou come, and who brought thee hither, O my son? And that man when he saw Ibráheem the son of El-Khaseeb, was amazed at his loveliness. Then Ibráheem said to him, O uncle, I am an ignorant, strange youth. And he wept; and the man was moved with pity for him, and took him up on the couch, wiped away his tears, and said to him, No harm shall befall thee. If thou be in debt, may God discharge thy debt; and if thou be in fear, may God appease thy fear! — So he replied, O uncle, I have no fear, nor am I in debt; but have with me abundant wealth, by the good pleasure of God, and his aid. The man therefore said to him, O my son, what is thine affair, that thou hast exposed thy life and thy beauty to peril by coming to a place of destruction?

And the young man related to him his story, and explained to him his case; and when the humpback heard his words, he hung down his head a while towards the ground, and said, Is the humpbacked tailor the person who directed thee to me? He answered him, Yes. And he rejoined, This is my brother, and he is a blessed man. Then he said, O my son, if affection for thee had not entered into my heart, and if I had not pitied thee, thou hadst perished, thou and my brother and the door-keeper of the Khán and his wife. And he said, Know that there is not on the face of the earth the like of this garden, and it is called the Garden of the Pearl.⁶ No one hath entered it, during the period of my life, except the Sultán and myself and its owner Jemeeleh [and her attendants]; and I have resided in it twenty years, and have not seen any man [except the Sultán] come to this place. In the course of every forty days, the lady Jemeeleh cometh hither in the vessel, and ascendeth amid her female slaves, in a canopy of satin, the borders of which, ten female slaves hold up with hooks of gold, till she entereth: so I have not seen of her aught. But I have nothing save my life to give, and I will expose it to peril for thy sake. — And thereupon the young man kissed his hand; and the humpback said to him, Sit with me until I contrive for thee a mode of proceeding.

After that, he took the hand of the young man and conducted him into the garden; and when Ibráheem saw that garden, he imagined that it was Paradise. He beheld the trees to be entangled, and the palm-trees tall, and the waters pouring, and the birds warbling with various notes. Then the humpback went with him to a dome-crowned pavilion, and said to him, This is the place in which the lady Jemeeleh sitteth. And he examined that pavilion, and found it to be one of the most wonderful of pleasure-houses. In it were all kinds of pictures in gold and ultramarine, and it had four doors, to which one ascended by five steps; and in the midst of it was a pool, to which one descended by steps of gold, those steps being set with minerals. In the midst of the pool was a fountain of gold, with images, large and small, from the mouths of which the water issued; and when the images produced various sounds at the issuing of the water, it seemed to the hearer that he was in Paradise. By⁷ the dome-crowned pavilion was a water-wheel, the pots of which were of silver; and it was covered with brocade. And on the left of the water-wheel was a lattice-window of silver, looking upon a green meadow,⁸ in which were all kinds of wild beasts, and gazelles, and hares; and on its right was a lattice-window looking upon a field in which were all kinds of birds, all of them warbling with various notes, amazing the hearer.

When the young man beheld this, he was moved with delight. He seated himself at the gate of the garden, and the gardener sat by his side, and said, How dost thou regard my garden? The young man answered him, It is the Paradise of the World. And the gardener laughed. Then he arose, and was absent from him a while, after which he returned, having with him a tray containing fowls and quails, and nice food, and sweetmeat of sugar; and he put it before the young man, and said to him, Eat until thou shalt be satiated. So I ate, says Ibráheem, until I was satisfied; and when he saw that I ate, he rejoiced, and said, By Allah, this is the manner of Kings, the sons of Kings!⁹ And he said, O Ibráheem, what is with thee in this small bag? I therefore opened it before him; and he said, Carry it with thee; for it will be of use to thee when the lady Jemeeleh cometh, since, when she cometh, I shall not be able to come in to thee with aught for thee to eat. — Then he arose and took my hand and brought me to a place opposite the dome-crowned pavilion of Jemeeleh; and he made an arbour amid the trees, and said, Ascend into this; and when she cometh, thou wilt see her, and she will not see thee. This is the utmost stratagem that I can employ, and upon God be our dependence. When she singeth, drink to her singing, and when she departeth, return to the place whence thou camest, if it be the will of God, with safety. — So the young man thanked him, and desired to kiss his hand; but he prevented him. Then the young man put the small bag into the arbour which the humpback had made for him; after which the gardener said to him, O Ibráheem, divert thyself in the garden, and eat of its fruits; for the appointed time of the coming of thy beloved is to-morrow. Ibráheem therefore proceeded to amuse himself in the garden, and to eat of its fruits.

He passed the night with the gardener, and when the morning came, and diffused its light and shone, Ibráheem recited the morning-prayers, and, lo, the gardener came to him, with sallow complexion, and said to him, Arise, O my son, and ascend to the arbour; for the female slaves have come to spread the furniture in the place, and she will come after them; and beware thou of spitting, or blowing thy nose, or sneezing; for if thou do, we shall both perish. The young man therefore arose and ascended to the arbour, and the gardener departed, saying, God grant thee safety, O my son! And while the young man was sitting, lo, there approached five slave-girls, the like of whom no one had beheld. They entered the dome-crowned pavilion, pulled off their outer garments, and washed the place, sprinkled it with rose-water, gave vent to the fumes of aloes-wood and ambergris, and spread the brocade. And there approached after them fifty female slaves, with musical instruments, and Jemeeleh was amid them, within a red canopy of brocade, and the female slaves held up the skirts of the canopy with hooks of gold until she entered the pavilion. So the young man saw not of her, nor of her apparel, aught; and he said within himself, By Allah, all my labour is lost; but I must wait until I see how the case will be. The female slaves brought forward the food and drink; so they ate, and washed their hands, and set for Jemeeleh a throne, on which she seated herself.

Then they all played on the musical instruments, and sang with mirth-exciting voices, of which there was not the like; after which an old woman, a kahramáneh, came forth, and clapped her hands, and danced; and the female slaves pulled her along. And, lo, the curtain was raised, and Jemeeleh came forth, laughing: and Ibráheem saw her. Upon her were ornaments and apparel, and on her head was a crown set with fine pearls and with jewels, and on her neck a necklace of pearls, and around her waist a girdle of oblong chrysolites, the strings of which were of jacinths and pearls. And thereupon the female slaves arose, and kissed the ground before her, while she laughed.

When I beheld her, says Ibráheem the son of El-Khaseeb, I became unconscious of my existence, and my reason was confounded, and my mind was perplexed, in consequence of my amazement at loveliness the like of which was not seen upon the face of the earth. I fell down in a fit, and recovered with weeping eyes, and recited these two verses: —

I see thee, and close not mine eye, that mine eyelids may not prevent my beholding thee.
If I gaze at thee with every glance, mine eyes would not see all thy charms.

— The old woman then said to the female slaves, Let ten of you arise and dance and sing. And when Ibráheem saw them, he said within himself, I wish that the lady Jemeenah would dance. And after the dancing of the ten slave-girls was ended, they went around her, and said, O our mistress, we wish that thou wouldst dance amid this assembly, that our happiness might be rendered complete thereby; for we have not seen a more delightful day than this. So Ibráheem said within himself, No doubt the gates of heaven have been opened,⁹ and God hath answered my prayer. Then the female slaves kissed her feet, and said to her, By Allah, we have not seen thy bosom dilated as it is this day. And they ceased not to excite her until she pulled off her outer clothing, and became only clad in a shirt woven with gold, embroidered with varieties of jewels, shewing the forms of a bosom like two pomegranates, and displaying a face like the moon in the night of its fulness. Ibráheem beheld motions the like of which he had not seen before in his life. And when she exhibited, in her dancing, an extraordinary mode, and wonderful invention, her performance was such (says Ibráheem) that she made us forget the dancing of the bubbles in the cups, and occasioned our thinking of the inclining of the turbans from the heads.¹⁰ She was such as the poet hath thus described: —

A dancer whose figure is like a willow-branch: my soul almost quitteth me at the sight of her movements.

No foot can remain stationary at her dancing. She is as though the fire of my heart were beneath her feet.

Now, while I was looking at her, says Ibráheem, lo, a glance of her eye was directed towards me, and she saw me; and when she beheld me, her countenance changed, and she said to her female slaves, Sing ye until I return to you. Then she took a knife half a cubit in length, and came towards me, saying, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! And when she drew near to me, I became unconscious of my existence; but when she saw me, and her face met mine, the knife fell from her hand, and she said, Extolled be the perfection of the Changer of hearts! She then said to me, O young man, be of good heart: thou art secure from that which thou fearest. And I began to weep, and she wiped away my tears with her hand, and said, O young man, inform me who thou art, and what brought thee to this place. So I kissed the ground before her, and kept hold of her skirt; and she said, No harm shall befall thee; for, by Allah, mine eye hath not been delighted with any male but thyself. Then tell me who thou art. — I therefore related to her my story from beginning to end; and she wondered thereat, and said to me, O my master, I conjure thee by Allah to tell me, art thou Ibráheem the son of El-Khaseeb? I answered, Yes. And she threw herself upon me, and said, O my master, thou art the person who made me averse from men; for when I heard that there existed in Egypt a young man than whom there was not upon the face of the earth any one more beautiful, I loved thee from the description, and my heart became fondly attached to thee, by reason of that which was told me of thee, concerning thy surpassing loveliness, and I became, with regard to thee, in the case thus expressed by the poet: —

Mine ear became enamoured of him before mine eye; for the ear is enamoured before the eye sometimes.

Therefore praise be to God who hath shown me thy face! By Allah, had it been any but thee, I had crucified the gardener, and the door-keeper of the Khán, and the tailor, and him who had had recourse to them! — Then she said to me, How shall I contrive means of procuring something for thee to eat without the knowledge of my female slaves? So I answered her, I have with me what we may eat and what we may drink. And I opened the small bag before her, and took a fowl, and she proceeded to feed me with morsels, I feeding her in like manner. And when I saw this conduct of hers, I imagined that the event was a dream. Then I brought forward the wine, and we drank. All that time, while she was with me, the female slaves were singing; and we ceased not to remain in this state from morn to noon, when she arose, and said, Arise now; prepare for thee a vessel, and wait for me in such a place until I come to thee; for there remaineth to me no patience to endure thy separation. So I replied, O my mistress, I have with me a vessel, which is my property, and the boatmen are hired by me, and they are expecting me. And she said, This is what we desire.

She then went to the female slaves, and said to them, Arise with us, that we may go to our palace. They therefore said to her, Why should we arise now, when it is our custom to remain three days? And she replied, Verily I experience in myself a great heaviness. It seemeth that I am sick, and I fear that this illness may become more heavy upon me. — So they said to her, We hear and obey. Accordingly they put on their apparel, went to the bank of the river, and embarked in the boat. And, lo, the gardener approached Ibráheem, having no knowledge of that which had happened to him, and said, O Ibráheem, thou hast not had the good fortune to delight thyself with beholding her; for it is her custom to remain here three days, and I fear that she hath seen thee. But Ibráheem replied, She saw me not, nor did I see her, nor did she come forth from the pavilion. And he said, Thou hast spoken truth, O my son; for had she seen thee, we had perished: but remain with me until she come next week, and thou shalt see her, and satiate thyself with gazing at her. Ibráheem, however, replied, O my master, I have with me wealth, and I fear for it. I have also left behind me men, and I fear that they will think me too long absent. — And the gardener said, O my son, verily thy separation will be grievous to me. Then he embraced him, and bade him farewell; and Ibráheem repaired to the Khán in which he was lodging, met the door-keeper of the Khán, and took his wealth. And the door-keeper said to him, Good news, if it be the will of God. But Ibráheem replied, I found no way of accomplishing my affair, and I desire to return to my family. So the door-keeper of the Khán wept, and bade him farewell, carried his goods, and conducted him to the vessel.

After that, Ibráheem repaired to the place of which Jemeeleh had told him, and there waited for her; and when the night became dark, lo, she approached him, in the garb of a valiant man, with a round beard, and her waist bound with a girdle, and in one of her hands were a bow and arrows, and in the other was a drawn sword; and she said to him, Art thou the son of El-Khaseeb, the lord of Egypt? So Ibráheem answered her, I am he. And she said to him, And what young wretch art thou, that thou hast come to corrupt the daughters of the Kings? Arise; answer the summons of the Sultán. — Upon this, says Ibráheem, I fell down in a fit; and as to the boatmen, they almost died in their skins from fear. Therefore, when she saw what had happened to me, she pulled off that beard, threw down the sword, and loosed the girdle; and I saw that she was the lady Jemeeleh, and said to her, By Allah, thou hast mangled my heart! Then I said to the boatmen, Hasten the course of the vessel.

Accordingly they loosed the sail, and hastened in their course, and only a few days had elapsed before we arrived at Baghdád. And, lo, there was a vessel lying stationary by the bank of the river; and when the boatmen who were in it saw us, they called out to the boatmen who were with us, and proceeded to say, O such-a-one! and O such-a-one! we congratulate you on your safety! They then drove their vessel against ours; and we looked, and, behold, in it was Abu-l-Kásim Es-Sandalánee, who, when he saw us, said, Verily this is the object of my search. Go ye, in the keeping of God. I desire to repair to accomplish an affair. — And there was before him a candle. Then he said to me Praise be to God for thy safety! Hast thou accomplished thine affair? — I answered, Yes. And thereupon he put the candle near to us, and when Jemeeleh saw him, her state became changed, and her complexion became sallow; and when Es-Sandalánee saw her, he said, Depart ye in the safe keeping of God. I am going to El-Basrah, on business for the sultán: but the gift is for him who is present. — He then produced a small box of sweetmeats, and threw it into our vessel, and there was in them benj. So Ibráheem said, O delight of mine eye, eat of this. But she wept, and said, O Ibráheem, knowest thou who this is? — I answered (says Ibráheem), Yes: this is such-a-one. And she rejoined, He is the son of my paternal uncle, and formerly he demanded me in marriage of my father, and I did not accept him and he is repairing to El-Basrah; so probably he will inform my father of us. But I said, O my mistress, He will not arrive at El-Basrah until we arrive at El-Mósil. — And they knew not what was concealed from them in the secret purpose of God.

Then I ate (says Ibráheem) somewhat of the sweetmeat, and it had not descended into my stomach before I struck the floor with my head. And when it was near daybreak I sneezed; where upon the benj issued from my nostril, and I opened my eye, and beheld myself stripped of my outer clothing, and thrown amid ruins. I therefore slapped my face, and said within myself. Verily this is a stratagem practised upon me by Es-Sandalánee. I knew not whither to repair, and had nothing upon me but a pair of trousers; and I arose and walked about a little; and, lo, the Wálee approached me, accompanied by a party of men with swords and leathern shields. So I feared, and, seeing a ruined bath, I hid myself in it. But my foot stumbled upon something; wherefore I put my hand upon it, and it became befouled with blood. I therefore wiped it upon my trousers, not knowing what it was, and stretched forth my hand to the thing a second time; whereupon it fell on a slain person, and the head came up in my hand. So I threw it down, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! I then entered one of the retired corners of the bath; and, behold, the Wálee stopped at the door of the bath, and said, Enter ye this place and search. And ten of them entered with cressets; and by reason of my fear, I retired behind a wall, and, taking a view of that slain person, I saw it to be a damsel, whose face was like the full moon; her head lying on one side, and her body on another; and upon her was costly apparel. Therefore, when I beheld her, a violent trembling affected my heart. And the Wálee entered, and said, Search throughout the bath. And they entered the place in which I was, and a man of them saw me, and came to me, having in his hand a knife half a cubit long; and when he drew near to me he said, Extolled be the perfection of God, the Creator of this beautiful face! O young man, whence art thou? — Then he took my hand, and said, O young man, wherefore didst thou slay this murdered female? So I answered, By Allah, I did not slay her, nor do I know who slew her, and I entered not this place save through fear of you. And I acquainted him with my case, and said to him, By Allah I conjure thee that thou wrong me not, for I am in anxiety for myself. And he took me and led me forward to the Wálee: and when he saw upon my hands the marks of blood he said, This requireth not proof: therefore strike off his head. So when I heard these words, I wept violently: the tears of my eyes flowed, and I recited these two verses —

We trod the steps appointed for us: and he whose steps are appointed must tread them. He whose death is decreed to take place in one land will not die in any land but that.

Then I uttered a groan, and fell down in a fit; whereupon the heart of the executioner was moved with pity for me, and he said, By Allah, this is not the face of him who hath committed a murder! But the Wálee said.

Strike off his head! They therefore seated me upon the skin of blood,¹¹ and bound over my eyes a covering, and the swordsman took his sword, asked permission of the Wálee, and was about to strike off my head. So I cried out, Alas for my distance from my home!

But, lo, a company of horsemen approached, and a speaker said, Leave ye him! Restrain thy hand, O swordsman! — And this was occasioned by a wonderful cause and an extraordinary circumstance, which was this. El-Khaseeb the lord of Egypt had sent his Chamberlain to the Khaleefeh Hároon Er-Rasheed, and with him presents and rarities, and also a letter, in which he wrote to him, My son hath been lost a year since, and I have heard that he is in Baghdád; and my desire of the beneficence of the Khaleefeh of God is that he would search for tidings of him, and strive in seeking him, and send him to me with the Chamberlain. So when the Khaleefeh read the letter, he ordered the Wálee to investigate the truth of his story; and the Wálee and the Khaleefeh ceased not to inquire for him, until it was told the Wálee that he was at El-Basrah. He therefore informed the Khaleefeh of that, and the Khaleefeh wrote a letter, and gave it to the Egyptian Chamberlain, ordering him to journey to El-Basrah, and to take with him a party of the dependents of the Wezeer.

And by reason of the eagerness of the Chamberlain to find the son of his lord, he went forth immediately, and he found the young man upon the skin of blood, with the Wálee. And when the Wálee saw the Chamberlain, and knew him, he dismounted to him; and the Chamberlain said to him, Who is this young man, and what is his case? So he acquainted him with the matter; and the Chamberlain said, not knowing that he was the son of the Sultán, Verily the face of this young man is the face of one that doth not murder. And he ordered the Wálee to loose his bonds; wherefore he loosed them; and he said, Bring him forward to me. Accordingly he led him forward to him. And his loveliness had departed in consequence of the severity of the horrors that he had endured. The Chamberlain therefore said to him, Acquaint me with thy history, O young man, and tell me wherefore this slain female is with thee. And when Ibráheem looked at the Chamberlain, he knew him: so he said to him, Wo to thee! Dost thou not know me? Am I not Ibráheem, the son of thy lord? Probably thou hast come to seek for me. — Upon this, the Chamberlain fixed his eyes intently upon him, and knew him perfectly: therefore, when he knew him, he threw himself upon his feet. And when the Wálee saw what the Chamberlain did, his complexion became sallow. The Chamberlain then said to him, Wo to thee, O oppressor! Was it thy desire to slay the son of my master El-Khaseeb the lord of Egypt? So the Wálee kissed the skirt of the Chamberlain, and said to him, O my lord, how could I know him? Verily we saw him in this plight, and we saw the damsel slain by his side. — But he replied, Wo to thee! Verily thou art not fit for the office of Wálee. This is a young man, fifteen years of age, and he hath not killed a sparrow. How then should he murder a human being? Didst thou not grant him any delay, and ask him respecting his state? — Then the Chamberlain and the Wálee said, Search ye for the murderer of the damsel. They therefore entered the bath a second time, and they saw her murderer: so they took him, and brought him to the Wálee, who took him and repaired with him to the palace of the Khaleefeh, and acquainted the Khaleefeh with the events that had happened.

Upon this, Er-Rasheed gave orders to slay the murderer of the damsel; after which he commanded to bring the son of El-Khaseeb. And when he presented himself before him, Er-Rasheed smiled in his face, and said to him, Acquaint me with thy history, and the events that have happened to thee. So he related to him his story from the beginning to the end: and it excited his wonder. He then called Mesroor the executioner, and said, Go this instant and assail the house of Abu-l-Kásim Es-Sandalánee, and bring him and the damsel to me. Accordingly he went immediately, and assailed his house, and he saw the damsel bound with her hair, and at the point of destruction. Mesroor therefore loosed her, and brought her with Es-Sandalánee; and when Er-Rasheed beheld her, he wondered at her loveliness. Then he looked towards Es-Sandalánee, and said, Take ye him, and cut off his hands with which he smote this damsel, and crucify him, and deliver his riches and his possessions to Ibráheem. And they did so. And while they were thus employed, lo, Abu-l-Leys, the Governor of El-Basrah, the father of the lady Jemeeleh, approached them, to demand aid of the Khaleefeh against Ibráheem the son of El-Khaseeb the lord of Egypt, and to complain to him that he had taken his daughter. But Er-Rasheed said to him, He was the cause of her deliverance from torture and slaughter. And he gave orders to bring the son of El-Khaseeb; and when he came, he said to Abu-l-Leys, Wilt thou not consent that this young man, the son of the Sultán of Egypt, shall be a husband to thy daughter? And he answered, I hear and obey God and thee, O Prince of the Faithful! So the Khaleefeh summoned the Kádee and the witnesses, and married the damsel to Ibráheem the son of El-Khaseeb. He also presented to him all the riches of Es-Sandalánee, and fitted him out for his return to his country. And he lived with her in the most perfect happiness and the most complete joy until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions. — Extolled be the perfection of the Living who dieth not! ¹²

MAAROOF, THE POOR COBBLER, WHO FOUND TREASURE, GAINED A ROYAL BRIDE, AND BECAME SULTÂN WITH THE HELP OF AN 'EFREET

THERE was, in the guarded city of Cairo,¹ a cobbler who mended old shoes. His name was Maaroofof,² and he had a wife whose name was Fátiméh, and whose nickname was El-'Orrah;³ and they gave her not that nickname save because she was a wicked, evil woman, of little modesty, a great mischief-maker. She ruled her husband, and every day used to revile him and curse him a thousand times; and he dreaded her malice, and feared her oppression; for he was a sensible man, who felt shame for his reputation: but he was poor in circumstances. When he worked for much, he expended his gains upon her; and when he worked for little, she revenged herself upon his body during the ensuing night, and deprived him of health, making his night like the record of his own actions.⁴ She was such a person as her in dispraise of whom the poet hath said,—

How many nights have I passed with my wife in the most unfortunate of conditions!
Would that, at the time of my first visit to her, I had produced some poison and poisoned her!

Now, among the events that happened to this man, proceeding from his wife, it chanced that she said to him, O Maaroofof, I desire of thee to-night that thou bring me some kunáfêh with bees' honey upon it. And he replied, May God (whose name be exalted!) make easy to me the means of obtaining its price, and I will bring it to thee to-night. By Allah, I have had no money this day; but our Lord may render the affair easy. — She, however, said to him, I know not these words. Whether He render it easy or do not render it easy, come not to me save with the kunáfêh with bees' honey; and if thou come without kunáfêh, I will make thy night like thy fortune when thou marriedst me and fellest into my hand. — So he replied, God is bountiful. Then that man went forth, with grief displaying itself in his person; and after he had performed the morning-prayers, he opened the shop, and said, I pray thee, O Lord, to supply me with the price of this kunáfêh, and to save me from the mischief of this wicked woman to-night! And he sat in the shop until mid-day, but no work betided him; wherefore his fear of his wife became violent, and he rose and closed the shop, and became perplexed respecting his case, on account of the kunáfêh, not having even any portion of the price of the bread.

He then passed by the shop of the seller of kunáfeh, and stopped in a state of stupefaction, and his eyes filled with tears. And the seller of kunáfeh, casting at him a sidelong glance, said, O master Maarooft, wherefore dost thou weep? Tell me what hath befallen thee. — He therefore told him his tale, and said to him, My wife is a virago, and she hath demanded of me kunáfeh, and I have sat in the shop until half the day hath passed, but not even the price of bread hath betided me, and I am in fear of her. And upon this, the seller of kunáfeh laughed, and said, No harm shall befall thee. How many pounds dost thou desire? — He answered, Five pounds. And he weighed for him five pounds, and said to him, I have the clarified butter; but I have not bees' honey: I have, however, drip-honey,⁵ better than bees' honey; and what will be the harm if it be with drip-honey? And Maarooft was abashed at him, because he was to wait for his paying the price. He therefore said to him, Give it me with drip-honey. And he fried for him the kunáfeh with the clarified butter, and saturated it with drip-honey, and it became fit to be presented to Kings. Then he said to him, Dost thou want bread and cheese? He answered, Yes. So he took for him four nusfs-worth of bread, and a nufst-worth of cheese, and the kunáfeh was for ten nusfs; and he said to him, Know, O Maarooft, that thy debt hath become fifteen nusfs. Go to thy wife, and make merry, and take this nufst to serve as payment for the bath. Thou shalt have a delay of a day, or two days, or three, until God shall supply thee; and distress not thy wife; for I will have patience with thee until thou shalt have money exceeding what will be requisite for thy expenditure.

So he took the kunáfeh and the bread and the cheese, and departed praying for him, and went with comforted heart, saying, Extolled be thy perfection, O my Lord! How beautiful art Thou! — Then he went into her, and she said to him, Hast thou brought the kunáfeh? He answered, Yes. And he placed it before her. So she looked at it, and saw it to be with honey of the sugar-cane; and upon this she said to him, Did I not say to thee, Bring it with bees' honey? Dost thou act contrary to my desire, and make it with honey of the sugar-cane? — He therefore apologized to her, and said to her, I bought it not save upon credit. But she replied, These are vain words. I will not eat kunáfeh save with bees' honey. — And she was angry with it, and threw it in his face, saying to him, Arise, you rascal: bring me some other kunáfeh! She then struck him with her fist upon the side of his face, knocking out one of his teeth, and the blood flowed down upon his bosom; and by reason of the violence of his rage, he struck her one slight blow upon her head; whereat she seized his beard, and began to cry out and to say, O Muslims! ⁶ The neighbours therefore entered, and extricated his beard from her hand; and they beset her with reproofs, and reproached her, and said, We all like to eat kunáfeh that is with honey of the sugar-cane. What is this oppressive conduct towards this poor man! Verily this is disgraceful to thee!

And they ceased not to soothe her until they effected a reconciliation between her and him. But after the departure of the people, she swore that she would not eat aught of the kunáfeh; and hunger tormented Maarroof: so he said within himself, She hath sworn that she will not eat: therefore I will eat. Then he ate; and when she saw him do so, she began to say to him, If it be the will of God, may it be a poison that shall destroy the body of the remote! ⁷ But he replied, It is not as thou sayest. And he proceeded to eat, and to laugh, and say, Thou hast sworn that thou wilt not eat of this. But God is bountiful; and if it be the will of God, to-morrow night I will bring thee kunáfeh that shall be with bees' honey, and thou shalt eat it by thyself. — And he proceeded to appease her, while she cursed him. She ceased not to revile him and abuse him until the morning; and when the morning came, she tucked up the sleeve from her arm to beat him: so he said to her, Grant me a delay, and I will bring thee some other kunáfeh.

He then went forth to the mosque, and said his prayers, and went to the shop, and opened it and sat. But he had not sat long when two officers from the Kádee came to him, and said to him, Rise; answer the summons of the Kádee; for thy wife hath complained of thee to him, and her appearance is so and so. And he knew her [by the description], and said, May God (whose name be exalted!) send trouble upon her! Then he arose and walked with them until he went in to the Kádee, when he saw his wife with her arm bound, and her face-veil befouled with blood, and she was standing weeping, and wiping away her tears. So the Kádee said to him, O man, dost thou not fear God, whose name be exalted? How is it that thou beatest this wife, and breakest her arm, and knockest out her tooth, and doest these deeds unto her? — And he replied, If I have beaten her, or knocked out her tooth, sentence me to what punishment thou choosest. Verily the case was so and so, and the neighbours made peace between me and her. — And he acquainted him with the case from beginning to end. And that Kádee was of the people of beneficence; so he took forth for him a quarter of a piece of gold, and said to him, O man, take this, and prepare for her with it some kunáfeh with bees' honey, and be thou reconciled to her. And he replied, Give it to her. She therefore took it; and the Kádee made peace between them, and said, O wife, obey thy husband; and thou O man, act kindly to her. And they went forth reconciled by means of the Kádee.

The woman went one way, and her husband went another way, to his shop, and lo, the sergeants came to him and said, Give us our fee. So he said to them, The Kádee took not from me aught: on the contrary, he gave me a quarter of a piece of gold. But they replied, We have no concern with the Kádee's giving to thee or taking from thee; and if thou give us not our fee, we will take it by force from thee. And they proceeded to drag him along through the market. He therefore sold his implements, and gave them half a piece of gold, and they went away from him. He then put his hand upon his cheek, and sat sorrowful, because he had not implements with which to work. And while he was sitting, lo, two men of hideous aspect advanced to him and said to him, Rise, O man; answer the summons of the Kádee; for thy wife hath complained of thee to him. He therefore replied, He hath made peace between me and her. But they said to him, We are from another Kádee; for thy wife hath complained of thee to our Kádee.

So he arose and went with them, praying for aid against her by ejaculating, God is our sufficiency, and excellent is the Protector! And when he saw her, he said to her, Have we not made peace with each other, O ingenuous woman? But she replied, There remaineth no longer peace between me and thee. And he advanced and related to the Kádee his story, saying to him, The Kádee such-a-one made peace between us just now. So the Kádee said to her, O impudent woman, since ye have made peace with each other, wherefore hast thou come complaining to me? She answered, He beat me after that. And the Kádee said to them, Make peace with each other, — and, addressing the man, he added, — and beat her not again, and she will not again oppose thee. They therefore made peace with each other, and the Kádee said to him, Give the servants their fee. Accordingly he gave them their fee, and he went to the shop and opened it, and sat in it, like one intoxicated, by reason of the anxiety that had befallen him.

And while he was sitting, lo, a man advanced to him and said to him, O Maarooft, rise; hide thyself; for thy wife hath complained of thee to the Sublime Court,⁸ and Aboo-Tabak⁹ is coming down upon thee. So he rose and closed the shop, and he fled in the direction of the Báb en-Nasr. And there had remained in his possession, five nuf faddahs, of the price of the lasts and the other implements. He therefore bought for four nusfs bread, and for one nuf cheese, as he fled from her. And this happened in the winter-quarter, at the time of afternoon-prayers; and when he went forth among the mounds, the rain descended upon him like streams pouring from the mouths of water-skins, and his clothes were wetted. So he entered the 'Ádileeyeh,¹⁰ and, seeing a ruined place, in which was a deserted cell, without a door, he entered to shelter himself in it from the rain; his clothes being wetted. Then tears descended from his eyelids, and he became oppressed in mind by his affliction, and said, Whither shall I flee from this vile woman? I pray thee, O Lord, to send to me some person who shall convey me to a distant country, whither she shall not know the way by which to reach me.

And while he was sitting weeping, lo, the wall clove asunder, and there came forth to him from it a person of tall stature, at the sight of whom the flesh quaked, and he said to him, O man, what aileth thee that thou hast disquieted me this night? I have been residing in this place for two hundred years, and have not seen any one enter it and do as thou hast done. Acquaint me then with thy desire, and I will accomplish thine affair; for compassion for thee hath affected my heart. — Upon this he said to him, Who art thou, and what mayest thou be? And he answered him, I am the haunter of this place. So he acquainted him with all that had happened to him with his wife; whereupon the Jinnee said to him, Dost thou desire that I should convey thee to a country whither thy wife shall know no way by which to reach thee? He answered, Yes. And the Jinnee said to him, Mount upon my back. Accordingly he mounted; and the Jinnee bore him and flew with him from after nightfall until the rising of the dawn, when he set him down upon the summit of a high mountain, and said, O human being, descend from the top of this mountain: thou wilt see the threshold of a city, and do thou enter it; for thy wife will not know any way by which to reach thee, nor will it be possible for her to gain access to thee. Then he left him, and departed.

Maaroor was in a state of confusion, perplexed in his mind, until the sun rose; whereupon he said within himself, I will arise, and descend from this mountain to the city; for in my sitting here is no advantage. So he descended to the foot of the mountain, and he saw a city with high walls, and lofty pavilions, and decorated buildings, and it was a delight to the beholders. He entered the gate of the city, and saw that it dilated the sorrowful heart; and when he walked through the market, the people of the city looked at him, diverting themselves with the sight of him, and they assembled around him, and wondered at his apparel; for his apparel resembled not theirs. And a man of the people of the city said to him, O man, art thou a stranger? He answered, Yes. He said to him, From what country? He answered, From the fortunate city of Cairo. He said to him, Hast thou long quitted it? He answered him, Yesterday in the afternoon. And thereupon he laughed at him, and said, O people, come hither; see this man, and hear what he saith! So they said, What saith he? He answered, He asserteth that he is from Cairo, and that he came forth from it yesterday in the afternoon. And they all laughed, and the people assembled round him and said, O man, art thou mad that thou sayest these words? How is it thou assertest that thou quittedst Cairo yesterday in the afternoon, and foundest thyself in the morning here, when between our city and Cairo is a space of a whole year's journey? — But he replied, None are mad but you: and as to me, I am veracious in my saying, and this is bread of Cairo: it hath not ceased to remain with me moist. And he shewed them the bread, and they diverted themselves with looking at it, and wondered at it; for it resembled not the bread of their country. The crowd became numerous around him, and they said one to another, This is bread of Cairo. Divert yourselves with the sight of it.

He became notorious in that city; and among the people, some believed him, and some belied and derided him; and while they were in this state, lo, a merchant advanced to them, riding upon a mule, and behind him were two black slaves. Thereupon the people became dispersed, and he said, O people, are ye not ashamed of collecting around this stranger and ridiculing him and laughing at him? What concern have ye with him? — And he ceased not to revile them until he drove them away from him, no one being able to return him a reply. He then said to Maaroor, Come hither, O my brother. No harm shall befall thee from these. Verily they have no shame. — He took him and proceeded with him until he conducted him into a spacious, decorated mansion, and he seated him in a royal chamber, and gave orders to the slaves, who thereupon opened for him a chest, and took forth for him a dress fit for a merchant possessing a thousand purses, and he clad him with it; and Maarooof was a comely person; so he became as though he were Sháh-Bandar of the merchants.

Then that merchant demanded the table; and they put before them a table containing every description of exquisite viands, of all kinds; and they ate and drank; after which the merchant said to Maarooof, O my brother, what is thy name? He answered, My name is Maarooof; and my trade is that of a cobbler: I mend old shoes. He said to him, From what country art thou? He answered, From Cairo. He said, From what quarter? Maarooof said to him, Dost thou know Cairo? The merchant replied, I am of its sons. So Maarooof replied, I am from the Darb el-Ahmar.¹¹ The merchant said to him, Whom dost thou know of the Darb el-Ahmar? He answered him, Such-a-one and such-a-one. And he enumerated to him many persons. The merchant said to him, Dost thou know the sheykh Ahmad the druggist? ¹² He answered him, He was my neighbour, wall adjoining wall. He said to him, Is he well? He answered, Yes. He said to him, How many children hath he? He answered, Three: Mustafà and Mohammad and 'Alee. He said to him, What hath God done with his children? He answered, As to Mustafà he is well, and he is a learned man, a professor: ¹³ and as to Mohammad, he is a druggist: he hath opened for himself a shop by the side of the shop of his father, after having married, and his wife hath borne him a son whose name is Hasan. And the merchant said, May God rejoice thee with good tidings!

Maarooof then said, And as to 'Alee, he was my companion when we were little children, and I used always to play with him, and we used to go, in the garb of the Christians, and enter the church, and steal the books of the Christians, and sell them, and buy, with their price, food. But it happened once that the Christians saw us, and laid hold of us with a book: so they complained of us to our families, and said to his father, If thou prevent not thy son from troubling us, we will complain of thee to the King. And he appeased them, and gave him a beating; and for this reason, he fled immediately, and no way of finding him was known. He hath been absent twenty years, and no one hath given any tidings of him.

Upon this, the merchant said to him, He is myself, 'Alee the son of the sheykh Ahmad the druggist, and thou art my companion, O Maarooof. They saluted each other, and after the salutation, the merchant said to him, O Maarooof, acquaint me with the reason of thy coming from Cairo to this city. So he acquainted him with the history of his wife Fátimèh El-'Orrah, and what she had done with him, and said to him, When her injurious conduct to me became excessive, I fled from her, in the direction of the Báb en-Nasr: and the rain descended upon me; wherefore I entered a ruined cell in the 'Ádileeyeh, and sat weeping, and there came forth to me the haunter of the place, who is an 'Efreet of the Jinn, and he questioned me. I therefore acquainted him with my state, and he mounted me upon his back, and flew with me all the night between heaven and earth: then he put me down upon the mountain, and informed me of the city: so I descended from the mountain, and entered the city, and the people collected around me, questioning me: and I said to them, I came forth yesterday from Cairo. But they believed me not. And thou camest, and repelledst the people from me, and broughtest me to this house. This was the cause of my coming forth from Cairo. And what was the cause of thy coming hither?

He answered him, Folly overcame me when my age was seven years, and from that time I have been going about from country to country and from city to city until I entered this city, the name of which is Ikhtiyán of El-Khutan; ¹⁴ whereupon I saw its inhabitants to be generous people, endued with compassion, and I saw that they confided in the poor man, and sold to him on credit, and whatever he said they believed him respecting it. I therefore said to them, I am a merchant, and I have come on before my merchandise, and I desire a place in which to deposit it. And they believed me, and appropriated a place to my exclusive use. Then I said to them, Is there among you one who will lend me a thousand pieces of gold until my merchandise shall arrive, when I will return to him what I receive from him? For I am in need of some commodities before my merchandise will enter the city. — And they gave me what I desired. I then repaired to the market of the merchants, and, seeing some goods, I bought them; and on the following day I sold them, and gained by them fifty pieces of gold, and bought other goods. I proceeded to associate with the people, and to treat them with generosity; and they loved me; and I betook myself to selling and buying, and my wealth became great. And know, O my brother, that the author of the proverb saith, The world is full of idle boasting, and artifice. And in the country in which no one knoweth thee, do whatsoever thou wilt. But if thou say to every one who asketh thee, I am, by trade, a cobbler, and a poor man, and I fled from my wife, and yesterday I came forth from Cairo, — they will not believe thee, and thou wilt become among them a laughingstock as long as thou shalt remain in this city. And if thou say, An 'Efreet conveyed me, — they will run away from thee in fear, and no one will come near thee; and they will say, This is a man possessed by an 'Efreet, and whosoever goeth near him, injury will happen to him. And this notoriety will be disgraceful to me and to thee; for they know that I am from Cairo.

Maaroorf then said, And how shall I act? He answered, I will teach thee how thou shalt act. If it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), I will give thee to-morrow a thousand pieces of gold, and a mule which thou shalt ride, and a black slave who shall walk before thee until he shall conduct thee to the gate of the market of the merchants. Then go in to them; and I will be sitting among the merchants; and when I see thee, I will rise to thee and salute thee, and I will kiss thy hand and honour thy station; and whenever I ask thee respecting any kind of stuff, saying to thee, Hast thou brought with thee any of such a kind? — answer, Abundance: — and if they ask me respecting thee, I will praise thee and magnify thee in their eyes. I will then say to them, Provide ye for him a magazine and a shop. And I will describe thee as a person of abundant wealth and generosity; and if a beggar come to thee, give him what thou canst easily afford: thereupon they will confide in my words, and believe in thy greatness and thy generosity, and they will love thee. After that I will invite thee, and I will invite all the merchants on thine account, and bring you and them together, that all of them may know thee, and that thou mayest know them, in order that thou mayest sell and buy and take and give with them; and no long period will pass over thee before thou wilt become a person of wealth. — Accordingly, when the morning came, he gave him a thousand pieces of gold, clad him in a suit of apparel, mounted him upon a mule, and gave him a black slave, saying, God acquit thee of responsibility with respect to the whole; for thou art my companion; so to treat thee with generosity is incumbent on me. Suffer not anxiety; but dismiss from thy mind the subject of thy wife, and mention her not to any one.

Maaroorf therefore said to him, May God recompense thee well! He then mounted the mule, and the slave walked before him until he had conducted him to the gate of the market of the merchants, who were all sitting there, and the merchant 'Alee was sitting among them: so when he saw him, he rose and threw himself upon him, saying to him, A blessed day, O merchant Maaroorf, O man of good works and of kindness! Then he kissed his hand before the merchants, and said, O our brothers, the merchant Maaroorf hath delighted you by his arrival. They therefore saluted him, and the merchant 'Alee made signs to them that they should shew him honour: so he was magnified in their eyes. His companion set him down from the back of the mule, and they saluted him again; and the merchant 'Alee proceeded to go apart with one of them after another, and to praise Maaroorf to him; and they said to him, Is this a merchant? He answered them, Yes: indeed he is the greatest of merchants, and there existeth not any one more wealthy than he; for his wealth and the wealth of his father and his forefathers are notorious among the merchants of Cairo; and he hath partners in El-Hind and Es-Sind and El-Yemen; and for generosity, his fame resteth on an excellent foundation. Therefore know his dignity, and extol his rank, and serve him; and know that his coming to this city is not for the sake of traffic; for his desire is for nothing but to divert himself with the sights of the countries of the world; because he is not in need of travelling to foreign parts for the sake of gain and profits, having wealth which fires cannot consume, and I am of the number of his servants.

He ceased not to praise him until they raised him above their heads, and they proceeded to acquaint one another with his qualities. Then they came together to him, and presented him with food for breakfast, and sherbet. Even the Sháh-Bandar of the merchants came to him, and saluted him; and the merchant 'Alee said to him, in the presence of the other merchants, O my master, probably thou hast brought with thee some of such a kind of stuff. So he answered him, Abundance. And on that day the merchant 'Alee had shewn him the various kinds of costly stuffs, and taught him the names of the stuffs, the dear and the cheap. Then one of the merchants said to him, O my master, hast thou brought with thee yellow cloth? He answered, Abundance. He said, And red, of gazelle's blood? ¹⁵ He answered, Abundance. And every time that he asked him respecting any thing, he answered him, Abundance. So thereupon he said, O merchant 'Alee, verily thy countryman, if he desired to transport a thousand loads of costly stuffs, could transport them. And he replied, He would do so from one of his magazines, and nought of its contents would be missing.

And while they were sitting, lo, a beggar came round to the merchants, and some of them gave him a nusf faddah, and some of them gave him a jedeed, and most of them gave him not aught, until he came to Maarroof, who took for him a handful of gold, and gave him it. So he prayed for him, and departed; and the merchants wondered thereat, and said, Verily this is the gift of kings; for he gave the beggar gold without counting it; and were he not of the persons of great riches, and possessing abundance, he had not given the beggar a handful of gold. And after a while there came to him a poor woman; whereupon he took another handful, and gave it to her, and she departed, praying for him, and told the other poor persons. So they advanced to him, one after another, and for every one who came to him he proceeded to take a handful and to give it him until he had disbursed the thousand pieces of gold; after which he struck hand upon hand, and said, God is our sufficiency, and excellent is the Protector! So the Sháh-Bandar of the merchants said to him, What aileth thee, O merchant Maarroof? He answered, It seemeth that most of the people of this city are poor and needy; and if I had known that they were so, I had brought with me in the saddle-bags a large sum of money and given it in alms to the poor. I fear that my absence from my country may be long, and it is a habit of my nature not to reject the beggar; but I have with me no gold remaining; therefore when a poor man cometh to me, what shall I say to him? — He answered him, Say to him, God sustain thee. — But he replied, It is not my custom, and anxiety hath come upon me on account of this. Would that I had a thousand pieces of gold more, that I might give them in alms until my merchandise come! — So he said, No harm. And he sent one of his dependants, who brought him a thousand pieces of gold, and he gave them to him.

Maarroof then proceeded to give every one of the poor who passed by him until the call to noon-prayers was chanted; whereupon they entered the mosque, and performed the noon-prayers, and what remained with him of the thousand pieces of gold he scattered over the heads of the worshippers. The attention of the people was therefore drawn to him, and they prayed for him, and the merchants wondered at the abundance of his generosity and his munificence. He then inclined to another merchant, and obtained from him a thousand pieces of gold, and distributed them; and the merchant 'Alee was observing his actions, but could not speak. He ceased not to do thus until the call to afternoon-prayers was chanted, when he entered the mosque and prayed, and distributed the remainder. And they closed not the gate of the market until he had received five thousand pieces of gold and distributed them; and to every one of whom he had received aught, he said, Wait until the merchandise shall arrive, when, if thou desire gold, I will give it thee, and if thou desire stuffs, I will give them thee; for I have abundance. And in the evening the merchant 'Alee invited him, and he invited with him all the merchants. He seated him at the upper end of the apartment, and he talked not of aught but of stuffs and jewels; and whenever they mentioned to him any thing, he said, I have abundance of it. And on the following day he repaired again to the market, and proceeded to incline to the merchants, obtain from them money, and distribute it to the poor.

He ceased not to do thus for the space of twenty days, until he had received from the people sixty thousand pieces of gold, and there came not to him merchandise nor a burning plague.¹⁶ So the people were clamorous for their money, and said, The merchandise of the merchant Maarooft hath not arrived, and how long shall he take people's money and give it to the poor? And one of them said, My opinion is, that we should speak with his countryman, the merchant 'Alee. Accordingly they came to him and said to him, O merchant 'Alee, the merchandise of the merchant Maarooft hath not arrived. And he replied, Be ye patient; for it must arrive soon. Then he had a private interview with him, and said to him, O Maarooft, what are these deeds? Did I say unto thee, Toast the bread — or Burn it? Verily the merchants have become clamorous for their money, and have informed me that they have become creditors to thee for sixty thousand pieces of gold, which thou hast received, and hast distributed to the poor. And how wilt thou pay thy debt to the people, when thou neither sellest nor buyest? — But he replied, What will be the consequence, and what are the sixty thousand pieces of gold? When the merchandise arriveth, I will give them, if they will, stuffs, and if they will, gold and silver. — Upon this, the merchant 'Alee said to him, God is most great! And hast thou merchandise? He answered, Abundance. And he said to him, Allah and the Rijál¹⁷ requite thee and thy turpitude! Did I teach thee this saying in order that thou shouldst utter it to me? Now will I inform the people of thee. — Maarooft replied, Go, without loquacity. Am I a poor man? Verily my merchandise compriseth an abundance of things; and when it arriveth they shall receive double the value of their property. I am in no need of them. — So thereupon the merchant 'Alee was enraged, and said to him, O thou of little good-breeding, I will without fail shew thee. How is it that thou liest to me and art not ashamed? — But he replied, What thou hast in thy power, do; and they shall wait until my merchandise arrive, and shall receive their property with addition.

He therefore left him, and departed, and he said within himself, I praised him before; and if I censure him now, I become a liar, and include myself among those to whom applieth the saying of him who said, He who praiseth and censureth, lieth twice.¹⁸ And he became perplexed respecting his case. Then the merchants came to him again, and said, O merchant 'Alee, hast thou spoken to him? He answered them, O people, I am abashed at him, and he oweth me a thousand pieces of gold, but I have not been able to speak to him respecting them. When ye gave him, ye consulted me not, and ye have nought to say to me. So demand of him by an application from yourselves to him; and if he give you not, complain of him to the King of the city, and say to him, He is an impostor, who hath imposed upon us. For the King will save you from being injured by him.

Accordingly they went to the King, and acquainted him with what had happened, and said, O King of the age, we are perplexed respecting our case with this merchant whose generosity is excessive; for he doth so and so, and every thing that he receiveth he distributeth to the poor by the handful. Now if he possessed little, his soul would not consent to his taking gold by the handful and giving it to the poor: yet were he of the people of affluence, his veracity had appeared to us by the arrival of his merchandise belonging to him, though he asserteth that he hath merchandise, and that he hath come on before it; and whenever we mentioned to him any kind of stuff, he would say, I have abundance of it. A considerable period hath elapsed; but no tidings of his merchandise have come; and he hath become indebted to us to the amount of sixty thousand pieces of gold, all of which he hath distributed to the poor. — And they proceeded to eulogize him and to praise his generosity.

And that King was covetous; more covetous than Ash'ab:¹⁹ so when he heard of his generosity and munificence, covetousness overcame him, and he said to his Wezeer, If this merchant did not possess abundant riches, all this generous conduct would not proceed from him; his merchandise will without fail arrive, and these merchants will come together to him, and he will disperse among them abundant riches. But I am more worthy of this wealth than they: therefore I desire to contract friendship with him, and to shew an affection for him, before his merchandise arriveth; and what these merchants will receive from him, I shall receive, and I will marry to him my daughter, and join his wealth with mine. — But the Wezeer replied, O King of the age, I imagine him not to be aught but an impostor; and the impostor hath ruined the house of the covetous. The King, however, said to him, O Wezeer, I will try him, and know whether he be an impostor or veracious, and whether he have been reared in affluence or not. The Wezeer said, With what wilt thou try him? The King answered, I have a jewel, and I will send for him and cause him to be brought to me; and when he hath seated himself I will treat him with honour, and give him the jewel; and if he know it, and know its price, he will be proved to be a person of riches and affluence; but if he know it not, he will be proved to be an impostor, an upstart, and I will slay him in the most abominable manner.

Then the King sent to him, and caused him to be brought; and when he came in to him, he saluted him, and the King returned his salutation, and seated him by his side, and said to him, Art thou the merchant Maaroofo? He answered, Yes. And the King said to him, The merchants assert that thou owest them sixty thousand pieces of gold. Now is that which they say true? — He answered, Yes. The King said to him, Wherefore hast thou not given to them their money? He answered, Let them wait until my merchandise arriveth, and I will give them double of what I have received; and if they desire gold, I will give it them, and if they desire silver, I will give it them, and if they desire merchandise I will give it them; and to him whom I owe a thousand I will give two thousand in return for that wherewith he hath veiled my face before the poor; for I have abundance. The King then said to him, O merchant, take this, and see what is its kind, and what is its value. And he gave him a jewel of the size of a hazel-nut, which the King had purchased for a thousand pieces of gold, and he had not another, and held it dear. So Maarooft took it in his hand, and he pressed upon it with his thumb and forefinger, and broke it; for the jewel was frail, and would not bear the pressure.

The King therefore said to him, Wherefore hast thou broken the jewel? And he laughed, and answered, O King of the age, this is not a jewel. This is a piece of mineral worth a thousand pieces of gold. How is it that thou sayest of it that it is a jewel? Verily the jewel is of the price of seventy thousand pieces of gold, and this is only called a piece of mineral; and the jewel that is not of the size of a hazel-nut hath no value in my estimation, nor do I care for it. How is it that thou art a King, and callest this a jewel, when it is a piece of mineral, the value of which is a thousand pieces of gold? But ye are excusable, because ye are poor, and have not in your possession treasures that are of value. — So the King said to him, O merchant, hast thou jewels of the kind that thou mentionest? He answered, Abundance. And thereupon covetousness overcame the King, and he said to him, Wilt thou give me perfect jewels? He answered him, When the merchandise cometh, I will give thee abundance; whatsoever thou desirest I have abundance thereof, and I will give thee without price. So the King rejoiced, and said to the merchants, Go your way, and be patient with him until the merchandise arriveth: then come, receive your money from me. And they departed. — Such was the case of Maarooft and the merchants.

But as to the King, he addressed the Wezeer, and said to him, Treat the merchant Maarooft with courtesy, and take and give with him in talk, and mention to him my daughter, in order that he may marry her, and we may gain these riches that are in his possession. But the Wezeer replied, O King of the age, verily the state of this man hath not pleased me, and I imagine that he is an impostor and a liar. Therefore desist from these words, lest thou lose thy daughter for nought. — And the Wezeer had before solicited the King to marry him the damsel, and he desired to marry her to him; but when this was told her, she consented not. — So thereupon the King said to him, O deceiver, thou dost not desire for me good fortune, because thou demandedst my daughter in marriage before, but she consented not to marry thee. So now thou interceptest the way of her marriage, and desirest that my daughter should remain as a waste land, in order that thou mayest take her. But hear from me this saying: Thou hast no concern with these words. How can he be an impostor, a liar, when he knew the price of the jewel, the price at which I purchased it, and broke it because it did not please him? He hath many jewels; and when he introduceth himself to my daughter, he will see her to be beautiful, and she will captivate his reason, and he will love her, and will give her jewels and treasures. But thou desirest to prevent my daughter and to prevent me from obtaining these riches.

So the Wezeer was silent, and feared the King's rage against him, and he said to him, Set the dogs upon the [wild] oxen. Then he inclined to the merchant Maarroof and said to him, His Majesty the King loveth thee, and he hath a daughter endowed with beauty and loveliness, whom he desireth to marry to thee. What then sayest thou? — And he answered him, No harm. But let him wait until my merchandise arriveth; for the dowry of the daughters of the Kings is large, and their rank requireth that they should not be endowed save with a dowry befitting their condition; and at this present time I have not with me wealth. Therefore let him have patience with me until the merchandise arriveth; for I have abundant riches, and I must give as her dowry five thousand purses. I shall also require a thousand purses to distribute to the poor and needy on the night of my introduction to the bride, and a thousand purses to give to those who shall walk in the marriage-procession, and a thousand purses wherewith to prepare the viands for the soldiers and others; and I shall require a hundred jewels to give to the Queen ²⁰ on the morning of the wedding, and a hundred jewels to distribute among the female slaves and the eunuchs, giving each a jewel in honour of the rank of the bride. I shall require moreover to clothe a thousand naked persons among the poor, and alms will be indispensable; and this is a thing that will be impossible until the merchandise arriveth. But I have abundance; and when the merchandise cometh, I care not for all these expenses.

The Wezeer therefore went and acquainted the King with that which he had said, and the King said, When this is his desire, how is it that thou assestest of him that he is an impostor, a liar? The Wezeer replied, And I cease not to say so. But the King chid him angrily, and threatened him, and said to him, By my head, if thou desist not from these words, I will slay thee! Return then to him, and bring him to me, and I will arrange with him. — So the Wezeer went to him, and said to him, Come hither: answer the summons of the King. And he replied, I hear and obey. Then he came to him, and the King said to him, Apologize not with these excuses; for my treasury is full: therefore take the keys into thy possession, and expend all that thou requirest, and give what thou wilt, and clothe the poor, and do what thou desirest, and mind not for the damsel and the female slaves. But when thy merchandise arriveth, shew what generosity thou wilt to thy wife, and we will have patience with thee for her dowry until the merchandise arriveth, and there shall never be any difference between me and thee. — He then ordered the Sheykh el-Islám ²¹ to perform the ceremony of the marriage-contract. So he performed the ceremony of the contract of the marriage of the King's daughter to the merchant Maaroofo.

The King commenced the celebration of the festivity, and gave orders to decorate the city, and the drums were beaten, and the tables of viands were spread with all kinds of dishes, and the performers of sports came. The merchant Maaroofo sat upon a throne in a mak'ad, and the performers of sports, and the exhibitors of cunning tricks, and the Jink,²² and the performers of extraordinary arts and wonderful games, were disposed in order before him, and he proceeded to order the Treasurer, and to say to him, Bring the gold and the silver. Accordingly he brought him the gold and the silver, and Maaroofo went round among the people who were diverting themselves, and gave to every one who played by the handful, and bestowed alms on the poor and needy, and clad the naked, and it was a noisy festivity. The Treasurer had not time to bring the money from the treasury, and the heart of the Wezeer almost burst with rage; but he could not speak. The merchant 'Alee also wondered at the squandering of this wealth, and said to the merchant Maaroofo, May Allah and the Rijāl retaliate upon thy temple! Hath it not sufficed thee that thou hast wasted the money of the merchants, but thou wilt also waste the money of the King? — But the merchant Maaroofo answered him, Thou hast no concern with it; and when the merchandise arriveth, I will compensate the King for this with double its value. — And he proceeded to scatter the money, and to say within himself, A burning plague! What will happen will happen; and from that which is predestined there is no escape.

The festivity ceased not for the space of forty days; and on the one-and-fortieth day they made the procession for the bride. All the emeers and the soldiers walked before her; and when they entered with her, Maaroofo scattered gold over the heads of the people. They made for her a magnificent procession, and Maaroofo expended a vast quantity of wealth. They introduced him to the Queen, and he sat upon the high mattress, and they let down the curtains, and closed the doors, and went forth, leaving him with the bride. And thereupon he smote hand upon hand, and sat sorrowful for some time, striking palm upon palm, and saying, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great? So the Queen said to him, O my lord, Allah preserve thee! What aileth thee that thou art sorrowful? — And he replied, How can I be otherwise than sorrowful when thy father hath disquieted me, and done to me a deed like the burning of the green corn? She said, And what hath my father done to thee? Tell me. — He answered, He hath introduced me to thee before my merchandise hath arrived, and I desired at least a hundred jewels to distribute among thy female slaves, to each one a jewel, that she might rejoice in it, and say, My lord gave me a jewel on the night of his introduction to my lady; — and this good deed would have been an act of honour to thy rank, and have increased thy glory; for I am not deficient in lavishing jewels, having of them an abundance. — But she said to him, Be not anxious for that, nor grieve thyself for this reason.

As to myself, thou hast no blame to fear from me; for I will have patience with thee until the merchandise arriveth; and as to the female slaves, thou hast nought to care for on their account. — So he was appeased.

And on the following morning he entered the bath, and put on a suit of the apparel of Kings, and, having gone forth from the bath, entered the King's council-chamber: whereupon those who were in it rose to him upon their feet, and received him with respect and honour, and congratulated him and blessed him. He sat by the side of the King, and said, Where is the Treasurer? They answered, Lo, he is here before thee. And he said, Bring the robes of honour, and invest all the wezeers and the emeers, and the men of office. Accordingly he brought him all that he demanded, and he sat giving to every one who came to him, and presenting to every man according to his rank.

He continued in this state for the space of twenty days, and there appeared not any merchandise belonging to him, nor aught else. Then the Treasurer became straitened by him to the utmost degree, and he went in to the King in the absence of Maarroof, when the King was sitting with the Wezeer, and no one beside, and he kissed the ground before him, and said, O King of the age, I will acquaint thee with a thing; for perhaps thou wouldst blame me for not acquainting thee therewith. Know that the treasury hath become almost empty; there remaineth not in it any money, except a small quantity, and after ten days we shall close it empty. — So the King said, O Wezeer, verily the merchandise of my son-in-law hath been backward in coming, and no tidings of it have appeared. And the Wezeer laughed, and said to him, May God be gracious to thee, O King of the age! Thou art none other than a careless person, with respect to the conduct of this impostor and liar. By thy head, there is no merchandise belonging to him, nor a plague to relieve us of him; but he hath only incessantly imposed upon thee until he hath consumed thy wealth, and married thy daughter for nothing. And how long wilt thou be heedless of this liar? — The King thereupon said to him, O Wezeer, how shall we act, that we may know the truth of his state? And he answered, O King of the age, no one will become acquainted with the man's secret except his wife. Therefore send to thy daughter, desiring that she may come behind the curtain, in order that I may ask her respecting the truth of his state, so that she may examine him and acquaint us with his state. — And he replied, There will be no harm in that. By my head, if it be proved that he is an impostor, a liar, I will surely slay him in the most unfortunate manner!

He then took the Wezeer, and entered with him into the sitting-chamber, and sent to his daughter. So she came behind the curtain; and this was during the absence of her husband; and when she came, she said, O my father, what dost thou desire? He answered, Speak to the Wezeer. Accordingly she said, O Wezeer, what wouldst thou? He answered, O my mistress, know that thy husband hath consumed the wealth of thy father, and he hath married thee without giving a dowry, and hath not ceased to promise us and to break his promise: no tidings of his merchandise have appeared; and, in short, we desire that thou wouldst inform us respecting him. She replied, Verily, his words are many, and he is constantly coming and promising me jewels and treasures and costly stuffs; but I have seen nothing. And he said, O my mistress, canst thou this night take and give with him in talk, and say to him, Acquaint me with the truth, and fear nothing; for thou hast become my husband, and I will not be neglectful of thee: so acquaint me with the truth of the case, and I will contrive for thee a plan by which thou shalt be made happy? After that, use nearness and remoteness of speech to him, and make a show of affection to him, and induce him to confess; and then acquaint us with the truth of his case. — And she said, O my father, I know how to examine him.

She then departed; and after nightfall, her husband Maarooft came in to her according to his custom. So she rose to him, and took him with her hand beneath his armpit, and beguiled him with excessive guile. (And sufficient is the guile of women when they have to request of men any thing of which they desire the accomplishment.) She ceased not to beguile him and to coax him with speech sweeter than honey until she stole his reason; and when she saw that he had inclined to her entirely, she said to him, O my beloved, O delight of mine eye, O joy of my heart, may God not make me desolate by thine absence, nor time make a separation between me and thee! for affection for thee hath taken up its abode in my heart, and the fire of desire for thee hath burned my liver, and there can be no neglect of thee ever. But I desire that thou wouldst acquaint me with the truth; for the stratagems of falsehood are not profitable, nor do they gain credit on all occasions. How long wilt thou impose, and lie to my father? I fear that thy case will be exposed to my father before we contrive a stratagem to avoid it, and that he will lay violent hands upon thee. Acquaint me then with the truth, and thou shalt experience nought but what will rejoice thee. When thou shalt have acquainted me with the truth of the case, thou shalt fear nothing that would injure thee. How often wilt thou assert that thou art a merchant, and a person of riches, and that thou hast merchandise? A long period hath passed during which thou hast been saying, My merchandise: my merchandise: — but no tidings of thy merchandise have appeared; and anxiety is manifest in thy countenance on this account. Now, if thy words have no truth, inform me, and I will contrive for thee a plan by means of which thou shalt be safe, if it be the will of God. — And he replied, O my mistress, I will acquaint thee with the truth, and whatever thou wilt, do. So she rejoined, Say, and take care to be veracious; for veracity is the ship of safety; and beware of falsehood; for it disgraceth its speaker. Divinely gifted was he who said, —

Take care to be veracious, even though veracity should cause thee to be burned with the threatened fire;

And seek God's approval; for the silliest of men is he who angereth the Lord and pleaseth his servants.

— And he said, O my mistress, know that I am not a merchant, and I have neither merchandise nor a burning plague. But in my country I was only a cobbler, and I have a wife whose name is Fátiméh El-'Orrah, and such and such things happened to me with her. — And he acquainted her with the story from its commencement to its end.

Upon this, she laughed, and said, Verily thou art skilful in the art of lying and imposition! He replied, O my mistress, may God (whose name be exalted!) preserve thee to veil faults and dissolve griefs! And she said, Know that thou hast imposed upon my father, and deceived him by the abundance of thine idle boasting, so that he hath married me to thee by reason of his covetousness. Then thou consumedst his wealth; and the Wezeer suspecteth thee for this conduct; and how often doth he speak of thee before my father, saying to him, Verily he is an impostor, a liar! But my father hath not complied with that which he had said, because he had demanded me in marriage, and I consented not that he should be to me a husband, and that I should be to him a wife. Then the time became tedious, and my father had become straitened, and he said to me, Make him confess. And I have made thee confess, and what was covered hath become exposed. Now my father is purposing mischief to thee on this account; but thou hast become my husband, and I will not neglect thee. For if I informed my father of this news, it would be proved to him that thou art an impostor, a liar, and that thou hast imposed upon the daughters of Kings, and squandered away their riches; and thine offence would not be forgiven by him, but he would slay thee without doubt, and it would become published among the people that I had married a man who was an impostor, a liar, and thou wouldst be a cause of disgrace to me. Moreover, if my father slew thee, probably he would desire to marry me to another, and this is a thing to which I would not consent even if I were to die for refusing. But arise now, and put on the dress of a memlook, and take with thee fifty thousand pieces of gold of my wealth; then mount upon a courser, and journey to a country to which the rule of my father doth not reach. There trade as a merchant, and write to me a letter, and send it by a courier who will bring it to me privately, that I may know in what country thou art, in order that I may send to thee all that my hand can procure. Thus thy wealth will become abundant; and if my father die, I will send to thee, and thou shalt come with respect and honour; and if thou die, or I die, departing to receive the mercy of God (whose name be exalted!), the day of resurrection will unite us. This is the right plan; and as long as thou continuest well, and I continue well, I will not cease to send thee letters and riches. Arise before the daylight cometh upon thee, and thou art perplexed, and destruction environeth thee. — So he said to her, O my mistress, I throw myself upon thy generosity, begging thee to bid me farewell with an embrace. And she replied, No harm. He then embraced her, and put on the dress of a memlook, and ordered the grooms to saddle for him a swift courser. They therefore saddled for him a courser, and he bade farewell to his wife, and went forth from the city at the close of the night, and departed, every one who saw him imagining that he was one of the memlooks of the Sultán going on a journey for the accomplishment of some affair.

And when the morning arrived, her father came with the Wezeer to the sitting-chamber, and her father sent to her. So she came behind the curtain, and her father said to her, O my daughter, what sayest thou? She answered, I say, May God blacken the face of thy Wezeer! For he desired to blacken my face in the eyes of my husband. — And how so? said the King. She answered, He came in to me yesterday, before I mentioned to him these words, and lo, Faraj, the eunuch, came in to me with a letter in his hand, and he said, Ten memlooks are standing beneath the window of the palace, and they gave me this letter, and said to me, Kiss for us the hands of our master Maaroof the merchant, and give him this letter; for we are of his memlooks who are with the merchandise, and it hath been told us that he hath married the daughter of the King; so we have come to him to acquaint him with the events that have happened to us on the way. — And I took the letter and read it, and saw in it, — From the five hundred memlooks, to the possessor of dignity, our master, the merchant Maaroof. — To proceed. — The news wherewith we acquaint thee is this. After thou leftest us, the Arabs came forth against us, and fought with us, and they were two hundred horsemen, while we were five hundred memlooks; and a severe contest ensued between us and the Arabs. They prevented our pursuing the way, and thirty days elapsed while we were contending with them, and this was the cause of our being behind the time in coming to thee. They have taken from us two hundred loads of stuffs, forming part of the merchandise, and killed of us fifty memlooks. — And when the news came to him, he said, May Allah disappoint them! Wherefore should they contend with the Arabs for the sake of two hundred loads of merchandise? And what are two hundred loads? It was not expedient for them to delay on that account; for the value of the two hundred loads is but seven thousand pieces of gold. But it is requisite that I go to them and hasten them; and as to what the Arabs have taken, the merchandise will not be the less for it, nor will it make any impression upon me, and I will reckon as though I had bestowed it in alms upon them.

Then he descended from me, laughing, and grieved not for what was lost of his wealth, nor for the slaughter of his memlooks; and when he descended, I looked from the window of the palace, and saw that the ten memlooks, who brought him the letter, were like moons, each one of them wearing a suit of apparel worth two thousand pieces of gold, and that there was not in the possession of my father a memlook resembling one of them. He then repaired with the memlooks who brought him the letter, in order that he might bring his merchandise. And praise be to God who prevented me from mentioning to him aught of the words which thou orderedst me to say! For he would have derided me and thee, and probably he would have looked upon me with the eye of disparagement, and would have hated me. But the fault is wholly in thy Wezeer, who speaketh against my husband words not suitable to him. — So the King said, O my daughter, verily the wealth of thy husband is abundant, and he thinketh not of it; and from the day that he entered our country he hath been constantly bestowing alms on the poor. If it be the will of God, he will soon come with the merchandise, and abundant good fortune will betide us from him. — He proceeded to appease her mind, and to threaten the Wezeer, and the stratagem deceived him.

But as to the merchant Maaroofo, he mounted the courser, and proceeded over the desert tract, perplexed, not knowing to what country to go; and by reason of the pain of separation, he moaned, and he suffered ecstasy and afflictions, and recited some verses; after which, he wept violently. The ways were obstructed in his face, and he preferred death above life. Then he went like one intoxicated, through the violence of his perplexity, and ceased not to proceed until the hour of noon, when he approached a village, and saw a ploughman near it, ploughing with a yoke of bulls; and hunger had violently affected him; so he went to the ploughman and said to him, Peace be on thee! And he returned his salutation, and said, Welcome to thee, O my master! Art thou of the memlooks of the Sultán? — He answered, Yes. And he said, Alight here with me for entertainment. He therefore knew that he was of the liberal, but he said to him, O my brother, I see not with thee any thing wherewith thou canst feed me. How is it then that thou invitest me? — The ploughman answered, O my master, good things are at hand. Alight thou; and, behold, the village is near; so I will go and bring thee dinner, and fodder for thy horse. — Maaroofo replied; Since the village is near, I shall arrive at it in the same time in which thou wouldst arrive there, and I will buy what I desire from the market, and eat. But he said to him, O my master, verily the village is a hamlet, and there is not in it a market, nor selling nor buying. I conjure thee by Allah that thou alight here with me, and comfort my heart; and I will go thither, and will return to thee quickly. — So he alighted; and the peasant left him, and went to the village to bring him the dinner. Maaroofo therefore sat waiting for him. Then he said within himself, Verily we have diverted this poor man from his work; but I will arise and plough in his stead, until he come, to compensate for my having hindered him from his work.

Accordingly he took the plough, and drove on the bulls, and ploughed a little; and the plough struck against something, whereupon the beasts stopped. So he urged them; but they could not proceed; and he looked at the plough, and saw that it was caught in a ring of gold. He therefore removed from it the earth, and he found that ring to be in the middle of a stone of alabaster, of the size of the nether millstone; and he laboured at it until he pulled it up from its place, when there appeared beneath it a subterranean place with stairs; and he descended those stairs, and saw a place like a bath, with four leewáns. The first leewán was full of gold, from the floor to the roof; and the second leewán was full of emeralds and pearls and coral, from the floor to the roof; and the third leewán was full of jacinths and balass-rubies and turquoises; and the fourth leewán was full of diamonds and precious minerals of all kinds of jewels. Also, at the upper end of that place was a chest of clear crystal, full of incomparable jewels, each jewel of them being of the size of a hazel-nut; and upon that chest was a little box, of the size of a lemon, and it was of gold. So when he beheld this, he wondered, and rejoiced exceedingly; and he said, What can be in this little box?

Then he opened it, and he saw in it a seal-ring of gold, on which were engraved names and talismans, like the marks made by the creeping of ants. And he rubbed the seal-ring; and, lo, a speaker said, At thy service! At thy service! O my master. Demand then, and thou shalt receive. Dost thou desire to build a town, or to ruin a city, or to slay a King, or to dig a river, or any thing of that kind? For whatsoever thou demandest, it will happen, by permission of the Almighty King, the Creator of the night and the day. — So he said to him, O creature of my Lord, who art thou, and what mayest thou be? He answered, I am the servant of this seal-ring, acting in the service of its possessor; and whatever object of desire he demandeth, I accomplish it for him; and there is no excuse for my neglecting what he commandeth me to do; for I am Sultán over 'Óns of the Jánn, and the number of my troops is two and seventy tribes. The number of each tribe is two and seventy thousand, and every one of the thousand ruleth over a thousand Márids, and each Márid ruleth over a thousand 'Óns, and every 'Ón ruleth over a thousand Devils, and every Devil ruleth over a thousand Jinnees, and all of them are under my authority, and they are unable to disobey me. But I am bound by enchantment to this seal-ring, and I cannot disobey him who possesseth it. Lo, thou hast possessed it, and I have become thy servant. Demand then what thou wilt; for I will hear thy saying and obey thy command; and when thou requirest me at any time, on land or on the sea, rub the seal-ring, and thou wilt find me with thee. But beware of rubbing it twice successively; for thou wouldst burn me with the fire of the names [engraved thereon], and lose me, and repent for me after that. Now I have acquainted thee with my state; and peace be on thee!

Upon this, Maarooof said to him, What is thy name? He answered, My name is Abu-s-Sa'ádát.²³ And he said to him, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, what is this place, and who enchanted thee in this little box? He answered, O my master, this place is a treasure, called the treasure of Sheddád the son of 'Ád, who constructed Irem Zát el-'Emád, the like of which hath not been made in the countries of the earth. I was his servant during his life, and this was his seal-ring, and he deposited it in his treasure; but it is thy lot. — Maarooof then said to him, Canst thou take forth what is in this treasure and place it on the face of the earth? He answered, Yes; it will be the easiest of actions. And Maarooof said, Take forth all that is in it, and leave not of it aught. And he made a sign with his hand towards the ground, whereupon it clove asunder. Then he descended, and was absent a little while; and lo, young, elegant boys, with beautiful faces, came forth carrying baskets of gold, and those baskets were full of gold, and they emptied them; after which they went and brought more; and they ceased not to transport the gold and jewels, and not more than a short time had elapsed when they said, There remaineth not in the treasure aught.

Upon this, Abu-s-Sa'ádát came up to him, and said to him, O my master, thou hast seen that we have transported all that was in the treasure. And he said to him, Who are these beautiful boys? He answered, These are my children; for this work deserved not that I should collect for it the 'Óns, and my children have accomplished thine affair, and have been honoured by serving thee. Now demand what thou desirest beside this. — So he said to him, Canst thou bring me mules and chests, and put these riches into the chests, and place the chests upon the mules? He answered, This will be the easiest affair that can be. Then he uttered a great cry, whereupon his children presented themselves before him; and they were eight hundred. And he said to them, Let some of you become transformed into the semblance of mules, and some of you into the semblance of beautiful memlooks, such that the like of the least of them existeth not in the possession of any of the Kings, and some of you into the semblance of those who let out beasts of burden, and some of you into the semblance of servants. And they did as he had commanded them; after which he called out to the 'Óns, who presented themselves before him, and he ordered them that some of them should become transformed into the semblance of horses saddled with saddles of gold set with jewels. And when Maaróof beheld this, he said, Where are the chests? They therefore brought them before him. And he said, Pack the gold and the minerals, each kind by itself. So they packed them, and put them upon three hundred mules.

And Maaróof said, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, canst thou bring me loads of precious stuffs? He asked, Dost thou desire Egyptian stuffs, or Syrian, or Persian, or Indian, or Greek? He answered, Bring of the stuffs of each country a hundred loads upon a hundred mules. He replied, O my master, grant me a delay, until I arrange my 'Óns for that purpose, and order each company to go to a country in order to bring a hundred loads of its stuffs, and the 'Óns shall become transformed into the semblance of mules, and come carrying the goods. Maaróof said, What shall be the period of delay? He answered, The period of the blackness of the night; for the daylight shall not arise without thy having with thee all that thou desirest. And he said, I grant thee this period of delay.

He then commanded them to pitch for him a tent. So they pitched it, and he seated himself, and they brought him a table of viands; and Abu-s-Sa'ádát said to him, O my master, sit in the tent, and these my children are before thee to guard thee; therefore fear not aught; and I am going to collect my 'Óns, and send them to accomplish thine affair. Then Abu-s-Sa'ádát went his way, and Maaróof sat in the tent, with the table before him, and the children of Abu-s-Sa'ádát before him in the semblance of memlooks and servants and other dependants. And while he was sitting in this state, lo, the peasant approached, carrying a large wooden bowl of lentils, and a fodder-bag full of barley. So he saw the tent pitched, and the memlooks standing with their hands upon their bosom; and he imagined that Maarooof was the Sultán, who had come and alighted in that place. He therefore stood in a state of confusion, and said within himself, Would that I had killed two chickens, and fried them red with clarified cows' butter for the sake of the Sultán! And he desired to return, to kill two chickens wherewith to entertain the Sultán.

But Maarooof saw him, and cried out to him, and said to the memlooks, Bring him. They therefore carried him with the wooden bowl of lentils, and brought both before Maarooof, who said to him, What is this? He answered, This is thy dinner, and the fodder for thy horse; but blame me not; for I did not imagine that the Sultán would come to this place; and had I known that, I would have killed for him two chickens, and entertained him in a goodly manner. So Maarooof replied, The Sultán hath not come; but I am his son-in-law, and I was displeased with him, and he hath sent to me his memlooks, who have reconciled me, and I now desire to return to the city. However, thou hast prepared for me this entertainment without being acquainted with me, and thine entertainment is accepted, though it is of lentils, and I will not eat save of thy cheer.—He then ordered him to put the wooden bowl in the middle of the table, and ate from it until he was satisfied; but as to the peasant, he filled his stomach with food from those dishes of various exquisite viands. After that, Maarooof washed his hands, and gave permission to the memlooks to eat. So they fell upon the remains of the repast, and ate; and when the wooden bowl was emptied, Maarooof filled it for the peasant with gold, and said to him, Convey it to thy dwelling, and come to me in the city, and I will treat thee with generosity. He therefore took the wooden bowl full of gold, and drove the bulls, and went to his village, imagining that he [himself] was a relation of the king.

Maarooof passed that night in delight and joy, and they brought him damsels, of the brides of the treasures,²⁴ who played upon the instruments of music and danced before him. Thus he passed his night, and it was not to be reckoned among lives. And when the morning came, he was not aware when the dust rose and flew, and dispersed exposing to view mules bearing loads. They were seven hundred mules, carrying stuffs, and around them were young men like those who let out beasts of burden, and 'akkáms, and lightbearers; and Abu-s-Sa'ádát was riding upon a mule, being in the semblance of leader of the caravan, and before him was a takht-rawán²⁵ upon which were four ornaments²⁶ of brilliant red gold, set with jewels. When he arrived at the tent, he alighted from the back of the mule, and kissed the ground, and said, O my master, verily the affair is accomplished completely and perfectly, and in this takht-rawán is a suit of apparel from the treasures, of which there is not the like among the apparel of Kings: therefore put it on, and ride in the takht-rawán, and command us to do what thou desirest. And he replied, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, I desire to write for thee a letter, with which thou shalt repair to the city of Ikhtiyán²⁷ of El-Khutan, and go in to my uncle the King; and go not in to him save in the semblance of a human²⁸ courier. So he said to him, I hear and obey. He then wrote a letter and sealed it, and Abu-s-Sa'ádát took it, and proceeded with it until he went in to the King, when he saw him saying, O Wezeer, verily my heart is anxious for my son-in-law, and I fear that the Arabs may slay him. Would that I knew whither he is going, that I might follow him with the troops, and would that he had informed me thereof before his departure! — Upon this the Wezeer replied, May God be gracious to thee with respect to this state of heedlessness in which thou art! By thy head, the man hath known that we had become excited to suspect him, and he feared disgrace, and fled; and he is none other than an impostor, a liar.

And, lo, the courier entered, and he kissed the ground before the King, and offered up a prayer in his favour for the continuance of his glory and blessings, and for length of life. So the King said to him, Who art thou, and what is thine affair? And he answered him, I am a courier. Thy son-in-law hath sent me to thee, and he is approaching with the merchandise, and he hath sent thee by me a letter. Lo, here it is. — He therefore took it and read it, and saw in it, — After exceeding salutation to our uncle, the glorious King, I inform thee that I have come with the merchandise; so come forth and meet me with the troops. — And thereupon the King said, May Allah blacken thy face, O Wezeer! How often wilt thou speak against the reputation of my son-in-law, and assert him to be a liar and an impostor? He hath come with the merchandise, and thou art none other than a traitor. — So the Wezeer hung down his head towards the ground, in shame and confusion, and replied, O King of the age, I said not these words save on account of the long delay of the merchandise, and I was fearing the loss of the wealth that he hath expended. But the King said, O traitor, what are my riches! Since his merchandise hath come, he will give me instead of them an abundance of things.

Then the King gave orders to decorate the city, and went in to his daughter, and said to her, Good news for thee! Verily thy husband will soon come with his merchandise; and he hath sent to me a letter informing me of that event; and, lo, I am going forth to meet him. — The damsel therefore wondered at this circumstance, and said within herself, Verily this is a wonderful thing! Was he deriding me, and making game of me, or was he proving me, when he informed me that he was a poor man? But praise be to God that nothing injurious to him proceeded from me! — And as to the merchant 'Alee of Cairo, when he saw the decoration of the city, he inquired respecting the cause of it, and they said to him, The merchandise of the merchant Maarroof, the son-in-law of the King, hath arrived. So he said, God is most great! What is this calamity! Verily he came to me fleeing from his wife, and he was a poor man. Whence then came to him merchandise? But probably the daughter of the King hath contrived for him a stratagem, in fear of disgrace, and Kings are not unable to accomplish any thing. However, may God (whose name be exalted!) protect him, and not disgrace him! — And all the other merchants rejoiced and were glad because they would receive their money. The King then assembled the troops and went forth; and Abu-s-Sa'ádát had returned to Maarooft and informed him that he had delivered the letter; whereupon Maarooft said, Put ye on the loads. Accordingly they put them on; and he clad himself in the suit of the apparel of the treasures, and got up into the takht-rawán, and became a thousand times greater and more majestic than the King. He proceeded as far as half the way, and, lo, the King met him with the troops; and when he came to him, he saw him wearing that dress, and riding in the takht-rawán, and he threw himself upon him, saluted him, and congratulated him on his safety. All the great men of the empire also saluted him, and it appeared that Maarooft was veracious, and that there was no falsehood in him.

He entered the city in a stately procession that would have made the gall-bladder of the lion to burst, and the merchants came to him and kissed the ground before him. Then the merchant 'Alee said to him, Thou hast done this deed, and it hath been successfully accomplished by thee, O sheykh of the impostors! But thou art deserving: therefore may God (whose name be exalted!) increase to thee his bounty! — And Maarooft laughed. And when he entered the palace, he seated himself upon the throne, and said, Put ye the loads of gold into the treasury of my uncle the King, and bring ye the loads of stuffs. So they brought them forward to him, and proceeded to open them, load after load, and to take forth their contents, until they had opened the seven hundred loads; whereupon he selected the best of them, and said, Take them in to the Queen, that she may distribute them among her female slaves; and take ye this chest of jewels, and carry it in to her, that she may distribute the jewels among the female slaves and the eunuchs. Next he proceeded to give to the merchants to whom he was indebted, stuffs in payments of the debts; and to whom he owed a thousand, he gave stuffs worth two thousand, or more; after which, he distributed to the poor and needy, while the King looked on, and was unable to prevent him.

He ceased not to give and bestow until he had distributed the seven hundred loads; when he looked towards the soldiers, and betook himself to distributing among them minerals and emeralds and jacinths and pearls and coral and other things, not giving the jewels save by handfuls, without numbering. So the King said to him, O my son, these gifts are sufficient; for there remaineth not of the merchandise more than a small quantity. But he replied, I have abundance. And his veracity had become publicly manifest, and no one could any longer belie him. He became careless as to giving; for the servant of the seal-ring brought him whatever he demanded. Then the Treasurer came to the King, and said, O King of the age, verily the treasury is filled, and will not hold the rest of the loads, and where shall we put what remaineth of the gold and minerals? So he pointed out to him another place. And when his wife beheld this thing, her joy was excessive, and she wondered, and said within herself, Whence can all this wealth have come to him? In like manner also the merchants rejoiced at the things that he had given them, and they prayed for him. And as to the merchant 'Alee, he wondered too, and said within himself, How is it that he hath imposed and lied so that he hath gained possession of all these treasures? For if they were from the daughter of the King, he would not have distributed them to the poor. But how excellent is the saying of him who said, —

When the King of Kings bestoweth, inquire not respecting the cause.
God will give to whom he pleaseth: so keep within the bounds of reverence.

— But as to the King, he wondered extremely at what he beheld of the actions of Maaroofo, and his generosity and munificence in lavishing the wealth.

After that, Maaroofo went in to his wife, who met him smiling, laughing, and joyful, and kissed his hand, and said, Wast thou making game of me, or didst thou try me by thy saying, I am a poor man, and fleeing from my wife? Praise be to God that nothing injurious to thee proceeded from me! Thou art my beloved, and there is none more dear in my estimation, whether thou be rich or poor; and I wish that thou wouldst inform me what thou desiredst by these words. — He replied, I desired to try thee, that I might see whether thine affection were sincere, or on account of wealth, and covetousness of worldly goods; and it hath become manifest to me that thine affection is sincere; and since thou art true in affection, welcome to thee! I have known thy value. — Then he went into a place by himself, and rubbed the seal-ring. So Abu-s-Sa'adât presented himself to him, and said to him, At thy service! Demand then what thou wilt. — He replied, I desire of thee a suit of the apparel of the treasures for my wife, and ornaments of the treasures, comprising a necklace of forty incomparable jewels. And he said, I hear and obey. Then he brought to him what he had commanded him to procure, and Maaroofo took the suit of apparel and the ornaments, after he had dismissed the servant, and, going in to his wife, he put them before her, and said to her, Take and put them on; and welcome to thee!

And when she looked at those things, her reason fled in consequence of her joy; and she saw, among the ornaments, two anklets of gold set with jewels, the work of the magicians, and bracelets and earrings and a nose-ring,²⁹ which no riches would suffice to purchase. She put on the suit of apparel and the ornaments, and said, O my master, I desire to treasure them up for festivals and holidays. But he replied, Wear them always, for I have abundance beside them. And when she put them on, and the female slaves beheld her, they rejoiced, and kissed her hands. He then left them, and went apart by himself, and again rubbed the seal-ring. The servant therefore presented himself to him, and he said to him, Bring me a hundred suits of apparel, with the ornaments of gold appropriate to them. And he replied, I hear and obey, — and brought him the suits of apparel, each suit having its ornaments of gold within it; and Maaroofo took them, and called out to the female slaves. So they came to him, and he gave to each of them a suit; and they put on the suits, and became like the Hooreeyehs, the Queen being among them like the moon among the stars. And one of the female slaves informed the King thereof; wherefore the King came in to his daughter, and saw that she and her female slaves amazed the beholder; and he wondered at this extremely.

He then went forth and summoned his Wezeer, and said to him, O Wezeer, such and such things have happened, and what sayest thou of this case? He answered, O King of the age, verily this conduct proceedeth not from merchants; for pieces of linen remain in the possession of the merchant for years, and he selleth them not save for gain. How should merchants have generosity like this generosity, and how can they accumulate the like of these riches and jewels such as exist not in the possession of Kings, save in small quantities? How then can loads of them exist in the possession of merchants? There must be a cause for this. But, if thou wilt comply with my advice, I will make manifest to thee the truth of the case. — And he replied, I will comply with thy advice, O Wezeer. So the Wezeer said to him, Have an interview with him, and shew affection for him, and converse with him, and say to him, O my son-in-law, I have it in my heart to go with thee and the Wezeer, and none else, to a garden, for the sake of diversion. And when we have gone forth to the garden, we will put the wine-table, and I will constrain him, and give him to drink; and when he hath drunk the wine, his reason will be lost, and his right judgment will quit him, and we will ask him respecting the truth of his case; for he will acquaint us with his secrets. Wine is a betrayer; and divinely gifted was he who said, —

When we had drunk it, and it had crept as far as the place of secrets, I said to it, Stop; — Fearing lest its influence should overcome me, and my companions discover my hidden secret.

Then, when he hath informed us of the truth of the case, we shall know his state, and may do with him as we like and choose; for I fear for thee the results of this state in which he is. Probably his soul may be ambitious of obtaining the kingdom, and the troops may be collected by means of generosity and the lavishing of wealth, and he may depose thee, and take the kingdom from thee. — And the King replied, Thou hast spoken truth.

They passed the night agreeing as to this plan; and when the morning came, the King went forth to the mak'ad, and seated himself; and, lo, the servants and grooms came in to him in affliction. So he said to them, What hath befallen you? And they answered, O King of the age, the grooms curried the horses, and gave fodder to them and to the mules that brought the merchandise; and when we arose in the morning, we found that the memlooks had stolen the horses and mules, and we searched the stables, but saw not horses nor mules; and we entered the place of the memlooks, but saw not in it any one; and we know not how they fled. The King therefore wondered at that; for he imagined that the 'Ôns were horses and mules and memlooks, and knew not that they were the 'Ôns of the servant of the talisman. And he said to them, O ye accursed! How is it that a thousand beasts, and five hundred memlooks, and servants besides, fled, and ye perceived them not? — They replied, We know not how it happened to us that they fled. And he said, Depart, and wait until your master cometh forth from the Hareem, and acquaint him with the news.

So they departed from before the King, and sat perplexed respecting this matter; and while they were sitting in this state, lo, Maarooof came forth from the Hareem, and saw them sorrowful, and he said to them, What is the news? They therefore acquainted him with that which had happened. But he said, And what is their value, that ye are sorrowful on account of them? Go your way. — And he sat laughing, and was neither angry nor sorrowful on account of this event. And the King looked in the face of the Wezeer, and said, What is this man, in whose estimation wealth is of no value? There must be a cause for this. — Then they conversed with him a while, and the King said, O my son-in-law, I desire to go with thee and the Wezeer to a garden, for the sake of diversion. What then sayest thou? — And he replied, No harm.

So thereupon they departed, and repaired to a garden containing two kinds of every fruit, and its rivers were flowing, and its trees were tall, and its birds were warbling. They entered, within it, a pavilion, that would dispel grief from hearts, and sat conversing, the Wezeer relating extraordinary tales, and introducing ludicrous witticisms, and mirth-exciting sayings, and Maarooof listening to the conversation, until the dinner came up. They placed the table of viands, and the jar of wine; and after they had eaten, and washed their hands, the Wezeer filled the cup, and gave it to the King, who drank it; and he filled the second, and said to Maarooof, Take the cup of the beverage in reverence of which the understanding bows the neck. So Maarooof said, What is this, O Wezeer? The Wezeer answered, This is the old maid, and the virgin long kept in her home, and the imparter of joy to hearts, of which the poet hath said, —

The stout, foreign infidels' feet went round treading her, and she hath avenged herself upon the heads of the Arabs.

One of the daughters of the infidels, like the full moon amid darkness, whose eyes are the strongest cause of temptation, presenteth her.³⁰

And among other pieces of poetry, he recited this verse: —

I wonder at the pressers of it, how they have died, and have left to us the water of life.

And this couplet: —

By Allah, there is no other alchemy than this; and all is false that is said of the modes of other kinds.

Pour a carat's weight of wine upon a hundred-weight of grief, and the latter is instantly converted into joys.

He ceased not to excite his desire for the wine, mentioning to him such of its good qualities as he relished, and reciting to him what occurred to his mind of verses on the subject of it, and pleasant stories, until he inclined to put his lips to the mouth of the cup, and had no longer a desire for any thing else. And the Wezeer continued to fill for him, and he drank and delighted and was merry, till he lost his reason, and distinguished not his wrong conduct from his right. So when he knew that his intoxication had become extreme, and exceeded the utmost point that was required, he said to him, O merchant Maaroofo, by Allah, I wonder whence came to thee these jewels of which the like exist not in the possession of the royal Kisràs; and in our lives we have never seen a merchant who hath accumulated riches like thee, nor any one more generous than thou; for thine actions are the actions of Kings, and they are not the actions of merchants. I conjure thee then by Allah that thou inform me, in order that I may know thy rank and thy station.—And he proceeded to ply him and beguile him while he was bereft of reason. Maaroofo therefore said to him, I am not a merchant, nor one of the Kings. And he acquainted him with his story from beginning to end. So the Wezeer said to him, I conjure thee by Allah, O my master Maaroofo, to divert us with a sight of this seal-ring, that we may see of what kind is its make. And he pulled off the ring, in his intoxication, and said, Take it, and divert yourselves with the sight of it. And the Wezeer took it, and turned it over, and said, If I rub it, will the servant present himself? Maaroofo answered, Yes: rub it: and he will present himself to thee; and divert thou thyself by beholding him.

The Wezeer therefore rubbed it; and, lo, a speaker said, At thy service, O my master! Demand: thou shalt receive! Wilt thou ruin a city, or build a city, or slay a King? For whatever thou desirest, I will do it for thee, without disobedience.—And the Wezeer made a sign to Maaroofo, and said to the servant, Take up this erring man: then cast him down in the most desolate of deserted lands, so that he may not find in it what he may eat nor what he may drink, and may perish of hunger, and die in sorrow, no one knowing of him. So the servant seized him, and flew with him between heaven and earth. And when Maaroofo beheld this, he felt sure of destruction, and grievous embarrassment; and he wept, and said, O Abu-s-Sa'ádát, whither art thou going with me? He answered him, I am going to cast thee down in the deserted quarter³¹ of the earth, O thou of little good-breeding! Who possesseth a talisman like this and giveth it to people that they may divert themselves with the sight of it? But thou deservest what hath befallen thee; and, but that I fear God, I would cast thee down from the distance of a thousand fathoms, and thou wouldst not reach the earth until the winds should have torn thee in pieces.—So he was silent, and spoke not to him until he arrived with him at the deserted quarter; whereupon he threw him down there; and he returned, and left him in the desolate land.—Meanwhile, the Wezeer, having possessed the seal-ring, said to the King, How thinkest thou now? Did I not say to thee that this man was a liar, an impostor? But thou didst not believe me.—And he replied, Thou art right, O my Wezeer! God give thee health! Give me this seal-ring, that I may divert myself with a sight of it.

But the Wezeer looked at him angrily, and spat in his face, and said to him, O thou of little sense, how should I give it to thee, and become thy servant, after I have become thy master? But I will no longer suffer thee to exist. — Then he rubbed the seal-ring, and the servant presented himself, and he said to him, Take up this person of little good-breeding, and throw him down in the place where thou hast cast his son-in-law, the impostor. So he took him up, and flew away with him, and the King said to him, O creature of my Lord, what is my offence? The servant answered him, I know not: but my master hath commanded me to do this, and I cannot disobey him who possesseth the seal-ring containing this talisman. He ceased not to fly on with him until he threw him down in the place in which was Maarroof. He then returned, and left him there. And the King heard Maarroof weeping: wherefore he came to him and informed him of his case, and they sat weeping for that which had befallen them, and found neither food nor drink.

But as to the Wezeer, after he had separated Maarroof and the King from their home, he arose and went forth from the garden, and, having sent to all the soldiers, held a court, and acquainted them with what he had done with Maarroof and the King. He told them also the story of the seal-ring, and said to them, If ye make me not Sultán over you, I will command the servant of the seal-ring to carry you all off and cast you down in the deserted quarter, and ye will die of hunger and thirst. So they replied, Do us no injury; for we consent to thy being Sultán over us, and we will not disobey thy command. They agreed, against their wish, to his being Sultán over them, and he conferred upon them robes of honour, and proceeded to demand all that he desired of Abu-s-Sa'ádát, who presented it before him immediately.

He seated himself upon the throne, and the troops obeyed him; and he sent to the daughter of the King, saying to her, Prepare thyself; for I am coming to take thee as my wife this night, being full of desire to be with thee. Upon this, she wept; and the case of her father and her husband grieved her; and she sent to say to him, Let me remain until the period of widowhood ³² shall have been completed: then perform the ceremony of the contract of my marriage, and take me as thy wife legally. But he sent to say to her, I know no period of widowhood nor length of time, nor do I require a contract of marriage, nor do I know lawful from unlawful. I must without fail take thee as my wife this night. — And she sent to say to him, Welcome to thee! And there will be no harm in that. — But this proceeding was a stratagem of hers. And when the reply was brought to him, he rejoiced, and his bosom became dilated; for he was passionately enamoured of her. He then gave orders to place the viands among all the people, and said, Eat ye this food, as it is the banquet of the wedding-festivity; for I purpose to take the Queen as my wife this night. The Sheykh

El-Islám therefore said, It is not lawful for thee to take her as thy wife until her period of widowhood shall have been completed and thou shalt have performed the ceremony of the contract of thy marriage to her. But he replied, I know not a period of widowhood nor any other period: therefore multiply not thy words to me. So the Sheykh El-Islám was silent, and feared his malice, and said to the soldiers, Verily this is an infidel, and he hath no religion nor religious opinion.

Then, when the evening came, he went in to her, and saw her wearing the most magnificent of the apparel that she possessed, and adorned with the most beautiful of ornaments; and when she beheld him, she received him laughing, and said to him, A blessed night! But hadst thou slain my father and my husband, it had been better in my opinion! — So he replied, I must without fail slay them. And she seated him, and proceeded to jest with him, and to make a show of affection for him; and when she caressed him, and smiled in his face, his reason fled. But she only beguiled him by caresses in order that she might get possession of the seal-ring, and convert his joy into calamity upon his head; and she did not with him these deeds save in accordance with the idea of him who said, —³³

I have attained by means of my stratagem what could not be attained by the swords. Then I returned with plunder of which the plucked fruits were sweet.

Then suddenly she retired to a distance from him, and wept, and said, O my lord, dost thou not see the man that is looking at us? I conjure thee by Allah to veil me from his eye! — And thereupon he was enraged, and said, Where is the man? She answered, Lo, he is in the stone of the seal-ring, putting forth his head, and looking at us. He therefore imagined that the servant of the seal-ring was looking at them; and he laughed, and said, Fear not. This is the servant of the seal-ring, and he is under my authority. — She replied, I am afraid of 'Efreet: so pull it off, and throw it to a distance from me. Accordingly he pulled it off, and put it on the cushion, and drew near to her. But she kicked him with her foot upon his stomach, so that he fell upon his back senseless; and she called out to her dependants, who came to her quickly, and she said to them, Lay hold upon him! So forty female slaves seized him, and she hastily took the seal-ring from the fellow, and rubbed it; and, lo, Abu-s-Sa'ádát approached, saying, At thy service, O my mistress! And she said, Take up this infidel, and put him into the prison, and make his shackles heavy.

He therefore took him, and confined him in the Prison of Anger, and returned and said to her, I have imprisoned him. She then said to him, Whither conveyedst thou my father and my husband? He answered, I threw them down in the deserted quarter. And she said, I command thee to bring them to me this instant. So he replied, I hear and obey. And he flew from before her, and ceased not to fly on until he arrived at the deserted quarter, and descended upon them, when he beheld them sitting weeping, and complaining, each to the other; and he said to them, Fear ye not. Relief hath come to you. — He acquainted them with that which the Wezeer had done, and said to them, I have imprisoned him with mine own hand, in obedience to her; and she commanded me to bring you back. They therefore rejoiced at the news that he told them. Then he took them up, and flew away with them, and not more than a little while had elapsed before he went in with them to the King's daughter, who arose and saluted her father and her husband, and seated them, and presented to them the viands and the sweet-meat.

They passed the remainder of the night; and on the following day, she clad her father in a magnificent suit of apparel, and clad her husband in like manner, and said, O my father, sit thou upon thy throne, a King as thou wast at first, and make my husband thy Wezeer of the right hand; then acquaint thy troops with the events that have happened, and bring the Wezeer from the prison, and slay him, and after that, burn him; for he is an infidel, and he desired to take me as his wife unlawfully, without the rite of marriage. He hath avowed of himself that he is an infidel, and that he hath no religion which he holdeth. And do thou act well to thy son-in-law, whom thou hast appointed thy Wezeer of the right hand. — He replied, I hear and obey, O my daughter: but give me the seal-ring, or give it to thy husband. But she said, Verily it befitteth not thee nor him. The seal-ring shall remain only in my possession, and probably I shall take more care of it than ye would. Whatever ye desire, demand it of me, and I will demand for you of the servant of the seal-ring. Fear ye not any harm as long as I live; and after my death, do as ye will with the seal-ring. — And her father replied, This is the right plan, O my daughter. Then he took his son-in-law, and went up to the council-chamber.

Now the troops had passed the night in excessive affliction, on account of the King's daughter, and what the Wezeer had [as they imagined] done with her, taking her as his wife unlawfully, without the rite of marriage, and his ill-treatment of the King and his son-in-law; and they feared that the law of El-Islám would be dishonoured; for it had become manifest to them that he was an infidel. Then they assembled in the council-chamber, and began to reproach the Sheykh El-Islám, saying to him, Wherefore didst thou not prevent him from taking the Queen as his wife unlawfully? So he answered them, O people, verily the man is an infidel, and he hath become possessor of the seal-ring, and I and ye are unable to do aught against him. But God (whose name be exalted!) will recompense him for his conduct; and be ye silent, lest he slay you. — And while the soldiers were assembled in the council-chamber, conversing on this subject, lo, the King came in to them in the council-chamber, and with him his son-in-law Maarroof. So when the soldiers beheld him, they rejoiced at his coming, and rose to him upon their feet, and kissed the ground before him. He then seated himself upon the throne, and acquainted them with the story. Therefore their grief quitted them. And he gave orders to decorate the city, and caused the Wezeer to be brought from the prison; and as he passed by the soldiers, they cursed him and reviled him and threatened him until he came to the King; and when he stood before him, he gave orders to slay him in the most abominable manner. So they slew him: then they burned him; and he went to Hell in the most evil of conditions: and well did one say of him,—

May the Compassionate shew no mercy to the tomb where his bones will lie, and may Munkar and Nekeer incessantly remain in it!

Then the King appointed Maaroof his Wezeer of the right hand, and the times were pleasant to them, and their joys were unsullied.

They remained thus five years; and in the sixth year the King died; and thereupon the King's daughter made Maaroof Sultán in the place of her father; but she gave him not the seal-ring. And during this period, she had borne him a boy, of surprising loveliness, of surpassing beauty and perfection; and he ceased not to remain in the laps of the nurses until he had attained the age of five years. Then his mother fell into a fatal sickness: so she summoned Maaroof, and said to him, I am sick. He replied, God preserve thee, O beloved of my heart! But she rejoined, Probably I shall die, and thou requirest not that I should charge thee respecting thy son. I only charge thee to take care of the seal-ring, from fear for thee and for this boy. — He said, No harm will befall him whom God preserveth. And she pulled off the ring, and gave it to him; and on the following day, she was admitted to the mercy of God, whose name be exalted!

Maaroof still remained King, and applied himself to the affairs of government. And it happened one day that he shook the handkerchief, and the soldiers dispersed themselves from before him to their abodes, and he entered the sitting-chamber, and sat there until the day had passed, and the night came with its thick darkness. Then the great men who were his boon-companions came in to him, according to their custom, and sat up with him for the sake of enjoyment and amusement until midnight, when they asked permission to depart, and he gave them permission, and they went forth from him to their houses. After that, there came in to him a slave-girl, who was employed to attend to his bed, and she spread for him the mattress, pulled off his clothes, and clad him in the apparel of sleep, and he laid himself down. The damsel then proceeded to rub and press gently the soles of his feet until sleep overcame him; whereupon she went forth from him to her sleeping-place, and slept. And the King Maaroof was sleeping, and suddenly he found something by his side in the bed. So he awoke terrified, and said, I seek refuge with God from Satan the accursed! Then he opened his eyes, and saw by his side a woman of hideous aspect; and he said to her, Who art thou? She answered, Fear not. I am thy wife, Fátimèh El-'Orrah.

Upon this, he looked in her face, and knew her by the hideousness of her shape, and the length of her dog-teeth; and he said, How camest thou in to me, and who brought thee to this country? She said to him, In what country art thou at present? He answered, In the city of Ikhtiýán of El-Khutan. And thou (he added), when didst thou quit Cairo? She answered, Just now. He said to her, And how so? She answered, Know that when I wrangled with thee, and the Devil had incited me to do thee mischief, and I complained of thee to the magistrates, they searched for thee, and found thee not; and the Kádees inquired respecting thee; but they saw thee not. Then, after two days had passed, repentance seized me, and I knew that the fault was mine; but repentance did not profit me. I remained for a period of days weeping for thy separation, and my means became diminished, so that it was necessary for me to beg for the sake of food. I proceeded to beg of every emulated man of wealth and every detested pauper; and from the time when thou quittedst me, I have been eating the food obtained by ignominious begging. I became in the most evil of conditions, and every night I sat weeping for thy separation, and for what I had endured since thy departure, of ignominy and contempt and disappointment and injury. — She continued to relate to him what had happened to her, while he was in amazement at her, until she said, And yesterday I went about all the day begging; but no one gave me aught. Every time that I accosted any one, and begged him for a bit of bread, he reviled me, and gave me not aught. So when the night came, I passed it without supper, and hunger tormented me; what I endured was grievous to me, and I sat weeping. And, lo, a person appeared before me, and said to me, O woman, wherefore dost thou weep? I therefore answered, I had a husband who expended upon me and accomplished my desires, and he hath been lost to me, and I know not whither he hath gone, and I have endured embarrassment since his departure. Thereupon he said, What is the name of thy husband? I answered, His name is Maaroofo. And he said, I am acquainted with him. Know that thy husband is now Sultán in a city; and if thou desire that I should convey thee to him, I will do so. — I therefore said to him, I throw myself upon thy generosity, begging thee to convey me to him! And he took me up, and flew with me between heaven and earth until he conveyed me to this palace, when he said, Enter this chamber. Thou wilt see thy husband sleeping upon the couch. — So I entered, and saw thee in this state of sovereignty. Now it was not my wish that thou shouldst forsake me. I am thy companion; and praise be to God who hath united me with thee!

Upon this he said to her, Did I forsake thee, or didst thou forsake me? ³⁴ Thou complainedst of me to Kádee after Kádee, and finishedst by complaining of me to the Sublime Court, so that thou causedst Abou-Tabak to come down upon me from the Citadel. Therefore I fled in spite of myself. — And he proceeded to relate to her what had happened to him until he became Sultán and married the King's daughter. He told her also that she had died, and that he had by her a son, whose age was seven years. And she said to him, What hath happened was predestined by God (whose name be exalted!), and I have repented. I throw myself upon thy generosity, entreating thee not to forsake me; but let me eat bread in thine abode as alms.

She ceased not to humble herself to him until his heart was moved with compassion for her, and he said to her, Repent of evil conduct, and reside with me, and thou shalt experience nothing but what will rejoice thee. But if thou do any evil act, I will slay thee, and will not fear any one; so let it not occur to thy mind that thou mayest complain of me to the Sublime Court, and that Aboo-Tabak will come down to me from the Citadel; for I have become a Sultán, and the people fear me; but I fear not any one except God (whose name be exalted!), since I have a seal-ring that hath a servant in subjection to it. When I rub it, the servant of the ring appeareth to me: his name is Abu-s-Sa'ádát; and whatever I demand of him, he bringeth it to me. Now if thou desire to return to thy country, I will give thee what will suffice thee all thy life, and send thee to thy country speedily. And if thou desire to reside with me, I will appropriate to thee exclusively a pavilion, and furnish it for thee with the best of silks, appoint for thee twenty female slaves to serve thee, and assign for thee good food and magnificent apparel, so that thou shalt become a Queen, and live in exceeding affluence until thou shalt die, or I die. What then sayest thou respecting this proposal? — She answered, I desire to remain with thee. Then she kissed his hand, and vowed repentance of evil conduct.

He therefore appropriated to her a pavilion for herself alone, and bestowed upon her female slaves and eunuchs, and she became a Queen. And the boy used to repair to her and to his father; but she hated the boy because he was not her son; and when the boy saw that she looked upon him with the eye of anger and hatred, he shunned her and hated her. Maarooft then became occupied with love of the beautiful slave-girls, and thought not of his wife Fátimé El-'Orrah, because she had become a half-gray old woman, with hideous form, and a person whose hair was falling off, more ugly than the speckled, black and white, serpent; but especially because she had ill-treated him in a manner that could not be exceeded; and the author of the proverb saith, Ill-treatment eradicateth desire, and soweth fierce hatred in the soil of hearts. Divinely gifted was he who said, —

Beware of losing hearts in consequence of injury, for the bringing them back, after flight, is difficult.

Verily hearts, when affection hath fled from them, are like glass, which, when broken, cannot be made whole again.

Maarooft did not receive her to reside in his abode on account of any praiseworthy quality that she possessed; but he treated her in this generous manner only from a desire of obtaining the approval of God, whose name be exalted! And when she saw that he withheld himself from her, and became occupied with others, she hated him, and jealousy overcame her, and Iblees suggested that she should take the seal-ring from him, and slay him, and make herself Queen in his place. Then she went forth one night, and walked from her pavilion to the pavilion in which was her husband, the King Maarooft. Now it was his custom, when he slept, to take off the seal-ring and conceal it; and she knew this: so she went forth by night to go in to him in the pavilion when he was drowned in sleep, and to steal this ring in such a manner that he should not see her. But the King's son, at that time, was awake, in a private chamber with the door open; and when she came forth from her pavilion, he saw her carefully walking towards the pavilion of his father, and he said within himself, Wherefore hath this sorceress come forth from her pavilion in the hour of darkness, and wherefore do I see her repairing to the pavilion of my father? There must be a cause for this event.

He then went forth behind her, and followed her steps without her seeing him. And he had a short, jewelled sword; ³⁵ and he used not to go forth to the council-chamber of his father without having this sword hung by his side, because he prized it highly; and when his father saw him, he used to laugh at him, and say, God's will! Verily thy sword is excellent, O my son! But thou hast not gone down with it to battle, nor cut off with it a head. — And thereupon he used to reply, I shall not fail to cut with it a neck that shall be deserving of the cutting. And his father would laugh at his words. — Now when he walked behind his father's wife, he drew the sword from its scabbard and followed her until she entered the pavilion of his father, when he stood watching her at the door of the pavilion; and as he continued looking at her, he saw her searching, and saying, Where hath he put the seal-ring? He therefore understood that she was looking about for the ring; and he ceased not to wait, observing her, until she found it, when she said, Lo, here it is. And she picked it up, and was about to come forth. So he hid himself behind the door; and when she came forth from the door, she looked at the ring, and turned it over in her hand, and was about to rub it. But he raised his hand with the sword, and struck her upon her back, and she uttered one cry; then fell down slain.

Upon this, Maarooft awoke, and beheld his wife laid prostrate, and her blood flowing, and his son with the sword drawn in his hand. So he said to him, What is this, O my son? He replied, O my father, how often hast thou said to me, Verily thy sword is excellent; but thou hast not gone down with it to battle, nor cut off with it a head? and I answered thee, I shall not fail to cut with it a neck deserving of the cutting! Lo, now I have cut for thee with it a neck deserving of the cutting. — And he acquainted him with her case. Then he searched for the seal-ring; but he saw it not. And he ceased not to search her person until he saw her hand closed upon it. Maarooft therefore took it from her, and said to the boy, Thou art my son without doubt or uncertainty. May God relieve thee from trouble in this world and in the next, as thou hast relieved me from this base woman! Her course only led her to her own destruction; and divinely gifted was he who said, —

When God's aid promoteth the business of a man, his wish, in every case, is easily accomplished:

But if the aid of God be not granted to a man, the first thing that harmeth him is his own endeavour.

Then the King Maarooft called out to some of his dependants, who came to him quickly, and he acquainted them with that which his wife Fátiméh El-'Orrah had done, and commanded them to take her and put her in a place until the morning. So they did as he commanded them; after which he appointed a number of the eunuchs to take charge of her; and they washed her and shrouded her, made for her a funeral-procession, and buried her. Thus her coming from Cairo was only a journey to her grave. Divinely gifted was he who said, —

We trod the steps appointed for us: and he whose steps are appointed must tread them. He whose death is decreed to take place in one land will not die in any land but that.

And how excellent is this saying of the poet: —

I know not, when I journey to a land, desiring good fortune, whether will betide me
The good fortune of which I am in pursuit, or the misfortune that pursueth me.

The King Maarooft then sent to summon the ploughman who had entertained him when he was a fugitive; and when he came, he appointed him his Wezeer of the right and, and his counsellor.³⁶ And he learned that he had a daughter of surprising beauty and loveliness, of generous qualities, of noble race, of high dignity: so he took her to wife. And after a period of time, he married his son. And they remained a long time enjoying the most comfortable life; their times were unsullied, and their joys were sweet, until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions, and the ruiner of flourishing houses, and him who maketh sons and daughters orphans. — Extolled be the perfection of the Living who dieth not, and in whose hands are the keys of the dominion that is apparent and the dominion that is hidden!

THE FORTUNE THAT BEFELL SHAHRAZÁD

SHAHRAZÁD, during this period, had borne the King three male children; and when she had ended these tales, she rose upon her feet, and kissed the ground before the King, and said to him, O King of the time, and incomparable one of the age and period, verily I am thy slave, and during a thousand and one nights I have related to thee the history of the preceding generations, and the admonitions of the people of former times: then have I any claim upon thy majesty so that I may request of thee to grant me a wish? And the King answered her, Request: thou shalt receive, O Shahrazád. So thereupon she called out to the nurses and the eunuchs, and said to them, Bring ye my children. According they brought them to her quickly; and they were three male children: one of them walked, and one crawled, and one was at the breast.

And when they brought them, she took them and placed them before the King, and, having kissed the ground, said, O King of the age, these are thy children, and I request of thee that thou exempt me from slaughter, as a favour to these infants; for if thou slay me, these infants will become without a mother, and will not find among women one who will rear them well. And thereupon the King wept, and pressed his children to his bosom, and said, O Shahrazád, by Allah, I pardoned thee before the coming of these children, because I saw thee to be chaste, pure, ingenuous, pious. May God bless thee, and thy father and thy mother, and thy root and thy branch! I call God to witness against me that I have exempted thee from every thing that might injure thee. — So she kissed his hands and his feet, and rejoiced with exceeding joy; and she said to him, May God prolong thy life, and increase thy dignity and majesty!

Joy spread through the palace of the King until it became diffused throughout the city, and it was a night not to be reckoned among lives: its colour was whiter than the face of day. The King rose in the morning happy, and with prosperity inundated; and he sent to all the soldiers, who came; and he conferred upon his Wezeer, the father of Shahrazád, a sumptuous and magnificent robe of honour, saying to him, May God protect thee, since thou hast married to me thy generous daughter, who hath been the cause of my repenting of slaying the daughters of the people, and I have seen her to be ingenuous, pure, chaste, virtuous. Moreover, God hath blessed me by her with three male children; and praise be to God for this abundant favour! — Then he conferred robes of honour upon all the wezeers and emeers and lords of the empire, and gave orders to decorate the city thirty days; and he caused not any one of the people of the city to expend aught of his wealth; for all the expense and disbursements were from the King's treasury.

So they decorated the city in a magnificent manner, the like of which had not been seen before, and the drums were beaten and the pipes were sounded, and all the performers of sports exhibited their arts, and the King rewarded them munificently with gifts and presents. He bestowed alms also upon the poor and needy, and extended his generosity to all his subjects, and all the people of his dominions. And he and the people of his empire continued in prosperity and joy and delight and happiness until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions.

Extolled be the perfection of Him whom the vicissitudes of times do not destroy, and to whom no change happeneth, whom no circumstance diverteth from another circumstance, and who is alone distinguished by the attributes of perfection! And blessing and peace be on the Imám of his Majesty, and the elect from among his creatures, our Lord Mohammad, the lord among mankind, through whom we supplicate God for a happy end!

NOTES TO THE INTRODUCTORY STORY

NOTE 1. On the Initial Phrase, and on the Mohammadan Religion and Laws. It is a universal custom of the Muslims to write this phrase at the commencement of every book, whatever may be the subject, and to pronounce it on commencing every lawful act of any importance. This they do in imitation of the Kur-án (every chapter of which, excepting one, is thus prefaced), and in accordance with a precept of their Prophet. The words which I translate "Compassionate" and "Merciful" are both derived from the same root, and have nearly the same meaning: the one being of a form which is generally used to express an accidental or occasional passion or sensation; the other, to denote a constant quality: but the most learned of the 'Ulamà (or professors of religion and law, &c.) interpret the former as signifying "Merciful in great things;" and the latter, "Merciful in small things." Sale has erred in rendering them conjunctly, "Most merciful."

In the books of the Muslims, the first words, after the above phrase, almost always consist (as in the work before us) of some form of praise and thanksgiving to God for his power and goodness, followed by an invocation of blessing on the Prophet; and in general, when the author is not very concise in these expressions, he conveys in them some allusion to the subject of his book. For instance, if he write on marriage, he will commence his work with some such form as this (after the phrase first mentioned) — "Praise be to God, who hath created the human race, and made them males and females," &c.

The exordium of the present work, showing the duty imposed upon a Muslim by his religion, even on the occasion of his commencing the composition or compilation of a series of fictions, suggests to me the necessity of inserting a brief prefatory notice of the fundamental points of his faith, and the principal laws of the ritual and moral, the civil, and the criminal code; leaving more full explanations of particular points to be given when occasions shall require such illustrations.

The confession of the Muslim's faith is briefly made in these words: — "There is no deity but God: Mohammad is God's Apostle:" — which imply a belief and observance of everything that Mohammad taught to be the word or will of God. In the opinion of those who are commonly called orthodox, and termed "Sunnees" (the only class whom we have to consider; for they are Sunnee tenets and Arab manners which are described in this work in almost every case, wherever the scene is laid), the Mohammadan code is founded upon the Kur-án, the Traditions of the Prophet, the concordance of his principal early disciples, and the decisions which have been framed from analogy or comparison. This class consists of four sects, Hanafees, Sháfe'ees, Málíkees, and Hambelees; so called after the names of their respective founders. The other sects, who are called "Shiya'ees" (an appellation particularly given to the Persian sect, but also used to designate generally all who are not Sunnees, are regarded by their opponents in general nearly in the same light as those who do not profess El-Islám (or the Mohammadan faith); that is, as destined to eternal or severe punishment.

The Mohammadan faith embraces the following points:

1. Belief in God, who is without beginning or end, the sole Creator and Lord of the universe, having absolute power, and knowledge, and glory, and perfection.

2. Belief in his Angels, who are impeccable beings, created of light; and Genii (Jinn), who are peccable, created of smokeless fire. The Devils, whose chief is Iblees, or Satan, are evil Genii.

3. Belief in his Scriptures, which are his uncreated word, revealed to his prophets. Of these there now exist, but held to be greatly corrupted, the Pentateuch of Moses, the Psalms of David, and the Gospels of Jesus Christ; and, in an uncorrupted and incorruptible state, the Kur-án, which is held to have abrogated, and to surpass in excellence, all preceding revelations.

4. Belief in his Prophets and Apostles; the most distinguished of whom are Adam, Noah, Abraham, Moses, Jesus, and Mohammad. Jesus is held to be more excellent than any of those who preceded him; to have been born of a virgin, and to be the Messiah, and the word of God, and a Spirit proceeding from Him, but not partaking of his essence, and not to be called the Son of God. Mohammad is held to be more excellent than all; the last and greatest of prophets and apostles; the most excellent of the creatures of God.

5. Belief in the general resurrection and judgment, and in future rewards and punishments, chiefly of a corporeal nature; that the punishments will be eternal to all but wicked Mohammadans; and that none but Mohammadans will enter into a state of happiness.

6. Belief in God's predestination of all events, both good and evil.

The principal Ritual and Moral Laws are on the following subjects, of which the first four are the most important.

1. Prayer (es-saláh, commonly pronounced es-salah), including preparatory purifications. There are partial or total washings to be performed on particular occasions which need not be mentioned. The ablution which is more especially preparatory to prayer (and which is called wudoó) consists in washing the hands, mouth, nostrils, face, arms (as high as the elbow, the right first), each three times; and then the upper part of the head, the beard, ears, neck, and feet, each once. This is done with running water, or from a very large tank, or from a lake, or the sea.—Prayers are required to be performed five times in the course of every day; between daybreak and sunrise, between noon and the 'asr (which latter period is about mid-time between noon and nightfall), between the 'asr and sunset, between sunset and the 'eshè (or the period when the darkness of night commences), and at, or after, the 'eshè. The commencement of each of these periods is announced by a chant (called adán), repeated by a crier (muëddin) from the mád'neh, or menaret, of each mosque; and it is more meritorious to commence the prayer then than at a later time. On each of these occasions, the Muslim has to perform certain prayers held to be ordained by God, and others ordained by the Prophet; each kind consisting of two, three, or four "rek'ahs;" which term signifies the repetition of a set form of words, chiefly from the Kur-án, and ejaculations of "God is most Great!" &c., accompanied by particular postures; part of the words being repeated in an erect posture; part, sitting; and part, in other postures: an inclination of the head and body, followed by two prostrations, distinguishing each rek'ah. These prayers may in some cases be abridged, and in others entirely omitted. Other prayers must be performed on particular occasions. 1. On Friday, the Mohammadan Sabbath. These are congregational prayers, and are similar to those of other days, with additional prayers and exhortations by a minister, who is called Imám, or Khateeb. 2. On two grand annual festivals. 3. On the nights of Ramadán, the month of abstinence. 4. On the occasion of an eclipse of the sun or moon. 5. For rain. 6. Previously to the commencement of battle. 7. In pilgrimage. 8. At funerals.

2. Alms-giving. An alms, called "zekáh," commonly pronounced "zekah," is required by law to be given annually, to the poor, of camels, oxen (bulls and cows), and buffaloes, sheep and goats, horses and mules and asses, and gold and silver (whether in money or in vessels, ornaments, &c.), provided the property be of a certain amount, as five camels, thirty oxen, forty sheep, five horses, two hundred dirhems, or twenty deenárs. The proportion is generally one-fortieth, which is to be paid in kind, or in money, or other equivalent.

3. Fasting (es-siyám). The Muslim must abstain from eating and drinking, and from every indulgence of the senses, every day during the month of Ramadán, from the first appearance of daybreak until sunset, unless physically incapacitated.—On the first day of the following month, a festival called the Minor Festival, is observed with public prayer, and with general rejoicing, which continues three days.

4. Pilgrimage (el-hajj). It is incumbent on the Muslim, if able, to perform, at least once in his life, the pilgrimage to Mekkeh and Mount 'Arafát. The principal ceremonies of the pilgrimage are completed on the 9th of the month of Zu-l-Hejjeh: on the following day, which is the first of the Great Festival, on the return from 'Arafát to Mekkeh, the pilgrims who are able to do so perform a sacrifice, and every other Muslim who can is required to do the same: part of the meat of the victim he should eat, and the rest he should give to the poor. This festival is observed otherwise in a similar manner to the minor one, above mentioned; and lasts three or four days.

The less important ritual and moral laws may here be briefly mentioned in a single paragraph.—One of these is circumcision, which is not absolutely obligatory.—The distinctions of clean and unclean meats are nearly the same in the Mohammadan as in the Mosaic code. Camels' flesh is an exception; being lawful to the Muslim.

Swine's flesh, and blood, are especially condemned; and a particular mode of slaughtering animals for food is enjoined, accompanied by the repetition of the name of God.—Wine and all inebriating liquors are strictly forbidden.—So also are gaming and usury.—Music is condemned; but most Muslims take great delight in hearing it.—Images and pictures representing living creatures are contrary to law.—Charity, probity in all transactions, veracity (excepting in a few cases), and modesty, are virtues indispensable.—Cleanliness in person, and decent attire, are particularly required. Clothes of silk, and ornaments of gold or silver, are forbidden to men, but allowed to women: this precept, however, is often disregarded.—Utensils of gold and silver are also condemned: yet they are used by many Muslims.—The manners of Muslims in society are subject to particular laws or rules, with respect to salutations, &c.

Of the Civil Laws, the following notices will at present suffice.—A man may have four wives at the same time, and, according to common opinion, as many concubine slaves as he pleases.—He may divorce a wife twice, and each time take her back again; but if he divorce her a third time, or by a triple sentence, he cannot make her his wife again unless by her own consent, and by a new contract, and after another man has consummated a marriage with her, and divorced her.—The children by a wife and those by a concubine slave inherit equally, if the latter be acknowledged by the father. Sons inherit equally: so also do daughters; but the share of a daughter is half that of a son. One-eighth is the share of the wife or wives of the deceased if he have left issue, and one-fourth if he have left no issue. A husband inherits one-fourth of his wife's property if she have left issue, and one-half if she have left no issue. The debts and legacies of the deceased must be first paid. A man may leave one-third of his property in any way he pleases.—When a concubine slave has borne a child to her master, she becomes entitled to freedom on his death.—There are particular laws relating to commerce. Usury and monopoly are especially condemned.

Of the Criminal Laws, a few only need here be mentioned. Murder is punishable by death, or by a fine to be paid to the family of the deceased, if they prefer it.—Theft, if the property stolen amount to a quarter of a deenár, is to be punished by cutting off the right hand, except under certain circumstances.—Adultery, if attested by four eye-witnesses, is punishable by death (stoning): fornication, by a hundred stripes, and banishment for a year.—Drunkenness is punished with eighty stripes.—Apostasy, persevered in, by death.

NOTE 2.—On the Arabian System of Cosmography. The words translated "as a bed" would be literally rendered "and the bed;" but the signification is that which I have expressed. (See the Kur-án, ch. lxxviii. v. 6; and, with respect to what is before said of the heavens, idem, ch. xiii. v. 2.) These, and the preceding words, commencing with "the Beneficent King," I have introduced (in the place of the "Lord of all creatures") from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, as affording me an opportunity to explain here the Arabian system of Cosmography, with which the reader of this work cannot be too early acquainted.

When we call to mind how far the Arabs surpassed their great master, Aristotle, in natural and experimental philosophy, and remember that their brilliant discoveries constituted an important link between those of the illustrious Greek and of our equally illustrious countryman, Roger Bacon, their popular system of cosmography becomes an interesting subject for our consideration.

According to the common opinion of the Arabs (an opinion sanctioned by the Kur-án, and by assertions of their Prophet, which almost all Muslims take in their literal sense), there are Seven Heavens, one above another, and Seven Earths, one beneath another; the earth which we inhabit being the highest of the latter, and next below the lowest heaven. The upper surface of each heaven, and that of each earth, are believed to be nearly plane, and are generally supposed to be circular; and are said to be five hundred years' journey in width. This is also said to be the measure of the depth or thickness of each heaven and each earth, and of the distance between each heaven or earth and that next above or below it. Thus is explained a passage of the Kur-án, (ch. lxxv. last verse), in which it is said, that God hath created seven heavens and as many earths, or stories of the earth, in accordance with traditions from the Prophet.—This notion of the seven heavens appears to have been taken from the "seven spheres;" the first of which is that of the Moon; the second, of Mercury; the third, of Venus; the fourth, of the Sun; the fifth, of Mars; the sixth, of Jupiter; and the seventh, of Saturn; each of which orbs was supposed to revolve round the earth in its proper sphere. So also the idea of the seven earths seems to have been taken from the division of the earth into seven climates; a division which has been adopted by several Arab geographers.—But to return to the opinions of the religious and the vulgar.

Traditions differ respecting the fabric of the seven heavens. In the most credible account, according to a celebrated historian, the first is described as formed of emeralds; the second, of white silver; the third, of large white pearls; the fourth, of ruby; the fifth, of red gold; the sixth, of yellow jacinth; and the seventh, of shining light.

Some assert Paradise to be in the seventh heaven; and, indeed, I have found this to be the general opinion of my Muslim friends: but the author above quoted proceeds to describe, next above the seventh heaven, seven seas of light; then, an undefined number of veils, or separations, of different substances, seven of each kind; and then, Paradise, which consists of seven stages, one above another; the first (Dár el-Jelâl, or the Mansion of Glory), of white pearls; the second (Dár es-Selâm, or the Mansion of Peace), of ruby; the third (Jennet el-Ma-wâ, or the Garden of Rest) of green chrysolite; the fourth (Jennet el-Khuld, or the Garden of Eternity), of green coral; the fifth (Jennet en-Na'eem, or the Garden of Delight), of white silver; the sixth (Jennet el-Firdós, or the Garden of Paradise), of red gold; and the seventh (Jennet 'Adn, or the Garden of Perpetual Abode, or — of Eden), of large pearls; this overlooking all the former, and canopied by the Throne, or rather Empyrean, of the Compassionate ('Arsh Er-Ramân), i. e. of God.—These several regions of Paradise are described in some traditions as forming so many degrees, or stages, ascended by steps.

Though the opinion before mentioned respecting the form of the earth which we inhabit is that generally maintained by the Arabs, there have been, and still are, many philosophical men among this people who have argued that it is a globe, because, as El-Kazweenee says, an eclipse of the moon has been observed to happen at different hours of the night in eastern and western countries. Thus we find Ptolemy's measurement of the earth quoted and explained by Ibn-El-Wardee:—The circumference of the earth is 24,000 miles, or 8,000 leagues; the league being three miles; the mile, 3,000 royal cubits; the cubit, three spans; the span, twelve digits; the digit, five barley-corns placed side by side; and the width of the barley-corn, six mule's-hairs. El-Makreezee also, among the more intelligent Arabs, describes the globular form of the earth, and its arctic and antarctic regions, with their day of six months, and night of six months, and their frozen waters, &c.

For ourselves, however, it is necessary that we retain in our minds the opinions first stated, with regard to the form and dimensions of our earth; agreeing with those Muslims who allow not philosophy to trench upon revelation or sacred traditions. It is written, say they, that God hath "spread out the earth," "as a bed," and "as a carpet;" and what is round or globular cannot be said to be spread out, nor compared to a bed, or a carpet. It is therefore decided to be an almost plane expanse. The continents and islands of the earth are believed by the Arabs (as they were by the Greeks in the age of Homer and Hesiod) to be surrounded by "the Circumambient Ocean," "el-Bahr el-Moheet;" and this ocean is described as bounded by a chain of mountains called Káf, which encircle the whole as a ring, and confine and strengthen the entire fabric. With respect to the extent of the earth, our faith must at least admit the assertion of the Prophet, that its width (as well as its depth or thickness) is equal to five hundred years' journey: allotting the space of two hundred to the sea, two hundred to uninhabited desert, eighty to the country of Yájooj and Májooj (or Gog and Magog), and the rest to the remaining creatures: nay, vast as these limits are, we must rather extend than contract them, unless we suppose some of the heroes of this work to travel by circuitous routes. Another tradition will suit us better, wherein it is said, that the inhabited portion of the earth is, with respect to the rest, as a tent in the midst of a desert. But even according to the former assertion, it will be remarked, that the countries now commonly known to the Arabs (from the western extremity of Africa to the eastern limits of India, and from the southern confines of Abyssinia to those of Russia) occupy a comparatively insignificant portion of this expanse. They are situated in the middle; Mekkeh, according to some,—or Jerusalem, according to others,—being exactly in the centre. Adjacent to the tract occupied by these countries are other lands and seas, partially known to the Arabs. On the north-west, with respect to the central point, lies the country of the Christians, or Franks, comprising the principal European nations; on the north, the country of Yájooj and Májooj, before mentioned, occupying, in the maps of the Arabs, large tracts of Asia and Europe; on the north-east, central Asia; on the east, Es-Seen (or China); on the south-east, the sea, or seas, of El-Hind (or India), and Ez-Zinj (or Southern Ethiopia), the waves of which (or of the former of which) mingle with those of the sea of Es-Seen, beyond; on the south, the country of the Zinj; on the south-west, the country of the Soodán, or Blacks: on the west is a portion of the Circumbient Ocean, which surrounds all the countries and seas already mentioned, as well as immense unknown regions adjoining the former, and innumerable islands interspersed in the latter. These terre incognitæ are the scenes of some of the greatest wonders described in the present work; and are mostly peopled with Jinn, or Genii. On the Moheet, or Circumbient Ocean, is the 'Arsh Iblees, or Throne of Iblees: in a map accompanying my copy of the work of Ibn-El-Wardee, a large yellow tract is marked with this name, adjoining Southern Africa. The western portion of the Moheet is often called "the Sea of Darkness" (Bahr-ez-Zulumát, or, —ez-Zulmeh). Under this name (and the synonymous appellation of el-Bahr el-Muzlim) the Atlantic Ocean is described by the author just mentioned; though, in the introduction to his work, he says that the Sea of Darkness surrounds the Moheet. The former may be considered either as the western or the more remote portion of the latter. In the dark regions (Ez-Zulumát, from which, perhaps, the above-mentioned portion of the Moheet takes its name), in the south-west quarter of the earth, according to the same author, is the Fountain of Life, of which El-Khidr drank, and by virtue of which he still lives, and will live till the day of judgment. This mysterious person, whom the vulgar and some others regard as a prophet, and identify with Ilyás (Elias, or Elijah), and whom some confound with St. George, was, according to the more approved opinion of the learned, a just man, or saint, the Wezeer and counsellor of the first Zu-l-Karneyn, who was a universal conqueror, but an equally doubtful personage, contemporary with the patriarch Ibráheem, or Abraham. El-Khidr is said to appear frequently to Muslims in perplexity, and to be generally clad in green garments; whence, according to some, his name. The Prophet Ilyás (or Elias) is also related to have drunk from the Fountain of Life. During the day-time, it is said, El-Khidr wanders upon the seas, and directs voyagers who go astray; while Ilyás perambulates the mountains or deserts, and directs persons who chance to be led astray by the Ghoools: but at night, they meet together, and guard the rampart of Yájooj and Májooj, to prevent these people from making irruptions upon their neighbours. Both, however, are generally believed by the modern Muslims to assist pious persons in distress in various circumstances, whether travelling by land or by water. — The mountains of Káf, which bound the Circumbient Ocean, and form a circular barrier round the whole of our earth, are described by interpreters of the Kur-án as composed of green chrysolite, like the green tint of the sky. It is the colour of these mountains, said the Prophet, that imparts a greenish hue to the sky. It is said, in a tradition, that beyond these mountains are other countries; one of gold, seventy of silver, and seven of musk, all inhabited by angels, and each country ten thousand years' journey in length, and the same in breadth. Some say that beyond it are creatures unknown to any but God: but the general opinion is, that the mountains of Káf terminate our earth, and that no one knows what is beyond them. They are the chief abode of the Jinn, or Genii. — Such is a concise account of the earth which we inhabit, according to the notions of the Arabs.

We must now describe what is beneath our earth. — It has already been said, that this is the first, or highest, of seven earths, which are all of equal width and thickness, and at equal distances apart. Each of these earths has occupants. The occupants of the first are men, genii, brutes, &c.: the second is occupied by the suffocating wind that destroyed the infidel tribe of 'Ad: third, by the stones of Jahennem (or Hell), mentioned in the Kur-án, in these words, "the fuel of which is men and stones:" the fourth by the sulphur of Jahennem: the fifth, by its serpents: the sixth, by its scorpions, in colour and size like black mules, and with tails like spears: the seventh, by Iblees and his troops. Whether these several earths are believed to be connected with each other by any other means, and if so, how, we are not expressly informed; but, that they are supposed to be so is evident. With respect to our earth in particular, as some think, it is said that it is supported by a rock, with which the mountains of Káf communicate by means of veins or roots; and that, when God desires to effect an earthquake at a certain place, He commands the mountain [or rock] to agitate the vein that is connected with that place. — But there is another account, describing our earth as upheld by certain successive supports of inconceivable magnitude, which are under the seventh earth; leaving us to infer that the seven earths are in some manner connected together. This account, as inserted in the work of one of the writers above quoted, is as follows:—The earth [under which appellation are here understood the seven earths] was, it is said, originally unstable; “therefore God created an angel of immense size and of the utmost strength, and ordered him to go beneath it, [i. e. beneath the lowest earth,] and place it on his shoulders; and his hands extended beyond the east and west, and grasped the extremities of the earth [or, as related in Ibn-El-Wardee, the seven earths], and held it [or them]. But there was no support for his feet: so God created a rock of ruby, in which were seven thousand perforations; and from each of these perforations issued a sea, the size of which none knoweth but God, whose name be exalted: then He ordered his rock to stand under the feet of the angel. But there was no support for the rock: wherefore God created a huge bull, with four thousand eyes, and the same number of ears, noses, mouths, tongues, and feet; between every two of which was a distance of five hundred years’ journey: and God, whose name be exalted, ordered this bull to go beneath the rock: and he bore it on his back and his horns. The name of this bull is Kuyootà. But there was no support for the bull: therefore God, whose name be exalted, created an enormous fish, that no one could look upon, on account of its vast size, and the flashing of its eyes and their greatness; for it is said that if all the seas were placed in one of its nostrils, they would appear like a grain of mustard-seed in the midst of a desert: and God, whose name be exalted, commanded the fish to be a support to the feet of the bull. The name of this fish is Bahamoot. He placed, as its support, water; and under the water, darkness: and the knowledge of mankind fails as to what is under the darkness.”—Another opinion is, that the [seventh] earth is upon water; the water, upon the rock; the rock, on the back of the bull; the bull, on a bed of sand; the sand, on the fish; the fish, upon a still, suffocating wind; the wind, on a veil of darkness; the darkness on a mist; and what is beneath the mist is unknown.

It is generally believed, that, under the lowest earth, and beneath seas of darkness of which the number is unknown, is Hell, which consists of seven stages, one beneath another. The first of these, according to the general opinion, is destined for the reception of wicked Mohammadans; the second, for the Christians; the third, for the Jews; the fourth, for the Sabians; the fifth, for the Magians; the sixth, for the Idolaters; the seventh, by general consent, for the Hypocrites. “Jahennem” is the general name for Hell, and the particular name for its first stage. The situation of Hell has been a subject of dispute; some place it in the seventh earth; and some have doubted whether it be above or below the earth which we inhabit.

At the consummation of all things, God, we are told, will take the whole earth in his [left] hand, and the heavens will be rolled together in his right hand; and the earth will be changed into another earth; and the heavens [into other heavens]; and Hell will be brought nigh [to the tribunal of God].

NOTE 3. The phrase “God is all-knowing,” or “surpassing in knowledge,” or, as some say, simply “knowing,” is generally used by an Arab writer when he relates anything for the truth of which he cannot vouch; and Muslims often use it in conversation, in similar cases, unless when they are uttering intentional falsehoods, which most of them are in the frequent habit of doing. It is worthy of remark, that, though falsehood is permitted by their religion in some cases, their doctors of religion and law generally condemn all works of fiction (even though designed to convey useful instruction), excepting mere fables, or apologies of a high class.

NOTE 4. In my usual standard-copy of the original work, as also in that from which the old translation was made, and in the edition of Breslau, this prince is called a king of the dynasty of Sásán; but as he is not so designated in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, I have here omitted, in my translation, what would render the whole work full of anachronisms.

NOTE 5. Shahriyár is a Persian word, signifying “Friend of the City.” The name of the elder King is thus written in the Calcutta edition above mentioned; in the edition of Cairo (which I generally follow) it is written Shahrabáz by errors in diacritical marks; and in that of Breslau, Shahrabán.

NOTE 6. This name, Sháh-Zemán, is a compound of Persian and Arabic, and signifies “King of the Age.” By the omission of a diacritical point, in the Cairo edition, it is written Sháh-Remán.

NOTE 7. In the Calcutta edition before mentioned, the elder brother is called King of Sarmarkand; and the younger, King of China.

NOTE 8.—On the title and office of Wezeer. Wezeer is an Arabic word, and it is pronounced by the Arabs as I have written it; but the Turks and Persians pronounce the first letter V. There are three opinions respecting the etymology of this word. Some derive it from "wizr" (a burden); because the Wezeer bears the burdens of the King: others, from "wezer" (a refuge); because the King has recourse to the counsels of his Wezeer, and his knowledge and prudence: others, again, from "azr" (back or strength); because the King is strengthened by his Wezeer as the human frame is by the back.

The proper and chief duties of a Wezeer are explained by the above, and by a saying of the Prophet:—"Whosoever is in authority over Muslims, if God would prosper him, He giveth him a virtuous Wezeer, who, when he forgetteth his duty, remindeth him, and when he remembereth, assisteth him: but if He would do otherwise, He giveth him an evil Wezeer, who, when he forgetteth, doth not remind him, and when he remembereth, doth not assist him."

The post of Wezeer was the highest that was held by an officer of the pen; and the person who occupied it was properly the next to the Sultán: but the Turkish Sultáns of Egypt made the office of Náib (or Viceroy) to have the pre-eminence. Under them, the post of Wezeer was sometimes occupied by an officer of the sword, and sometimes by an officer of the pen; and, in both cases, the Wezeer was also called "the Sáheb." The Sultán Barkook so degraded this office, by intrusting its most important functions to other ministers, that the Wezeer became, in reality, the King's purveyor, and little else; receiving the indirect taxes, and employing them in the purchase of provisions for the royal kitchen. It is even said, that he was usually chosen, by the Turkish Sultáns of Egypt, from among the Copts (or Christian Egyptians); because the administration of the taxes had, from time immemorial, been committed to persons of that race. This, it would seem, was the case about the time of the Sultán Barkook. But in the present work, we are to understand the office of Wezeer as being what it was in earlier times,—that of Prime Minister; though we are not hence to infer that the editions of the Tales of a Thousand and One Nights known to us were written at a period anterior to that of the Memlook Sultáns of Egypt and Syria; for, in the time of these monarchs, the degradation of the office was commonly known to be a recent innovation, and it may have been of no very long continuance.

NOTE 9. The paragraph to which this note relates is from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights..

NOTE 10.—On Presents. The custom of giving presents on the occasion of paying a visit, or previously, which is of such high antiquity as to be mentioned in the book of Genesis, has continued to prevail in the East to this day. Presents of provisions of some kind, wax candles, &c., are sent to a person about to celebrate any festivity by those who are to be his guests: but after paying a mere visit of ceremony, and on some other occasions, only money is commonly given to the servants of the person visited. In either case, the latter is expected to return the compliment on a similar occasion by presents of equal value. To reject a present generally gives great offence; being regarded as an insult to him who has offered it. When a person arrives from a foreign country, he generally brings some articles of the produce or merchandise of that country as presents to his friends. Thus, pilgrims returning from the holy places bring water of Zemzem, dust from the Prophet's tomb, &c., for this purpose.—Horses, and male and female slaves, are seldom given but by kings or great men. Of the condition of slaves in Mohammadan countries, an account will be given hereafter.

NOTE 11.—On the Letters of Muslims. The letters of Muslims are distinguished by several peculiarities dictated by the rules of politeness. The paper is thick, white, and highly polished: sometimes it is ornamented with flowers of gold, and the edges are always cut straight with scissors. The upper half is generally left blank: and the writing never occupies any portion of the second side. A notion of the usual style of letters will be conveyed by several examples in this work. The name of the person to whom the letter is addressed, when the writer is an inferior or an equal, and even in some other cases, commonly occurs in the first sentence, preceded by several titles of honor; and is often written a little above the line to which it appertains; the space beneath it in that line being left blank: sometimes it is written in letters of gold, or red ink. A king, writing to a subject, or a great man to a dependent, usually places his name and seal at the head of his letter. The seal is the impression of a signet (generally a ring, worn on the little finger of the right hand), upon which is engraved the name of the person commonly accompanied by the words "His [i. e. God's] servant," or some other words expressive of trust in God, &c. Its impression is considered more valid than the sign-manual, and is indispensable to give authenticity to the letter. It is made by dabbing some ink upon the surface of the signet, and pressing this upon the paper: the place which is to be stamped being first moistened, by touching the tongue with a finger of the right hand, and then gently rubbing the part with that finger. A person writing to a superior, or to an equal, or even an inferior to whom he wishes to show respect, signs his name at the bottom of his letter, next the left side or corner, and places the seal immediately to the right of this: but if he particularly desire to testify his humility, he places it beneath his name, or even partly over the lower edge of the paper, which consequently does not receive the whole of the impression. The letter is generally folded twice, in the direction of the writing, and enclosed in a cover of paper, upon which is written the address, in some such form as this:—"It shall arrive, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted, at such a place, and be delivered into the hand of our honoured friend, &c., such a one, whom God preserve." Sometimes it is placed in a small bag, or purse, of silk embroidered with gold.

NOTE 12. The custom of sending forth a deputation to meet and welcome an approaching ambassador, or other great man, is still observed in Eastern countries; and the rank of the persons thus employed conveys to him some intimation of the manner in which he is to be received at the court: he therefore looks forward to this ceremony with a degree of anxiety. A humorous illustration of its importance in the eye of an Oriental ambassador, is given in "The Adventures of Hajji Baba in England."

NOTE 13.—On Hospitality. The hospitable custom here mentioned is observed by Muslims in compliance with a precept of their Prophet. "Whoever," said he, "believes in God and the day of resurrection must respect his guest; and the time of being kind to him is one day and one night; and the period of entertaining him is three days; and after that, if he does it longer, he benefits him more; but it is not right for a guest to stay in the house of the host so long as to incommode him." He even allowed the "right of a guest" to be taken by force from such as would not offer it. The following observations, respecting the treatment of guests by the Bedaweess, present an interesting commentary upon the former precept, and upon our text:—"Strangers who have not any friend or acquaintance in the camp, alight at the first tent that presents itself: whether the owner be at home or not, the wife or daughter immediately spreads a carpet, and prepares breakfast or dinner. If the stranger's business requires a protracted stay, as, for instance, if he wishes to cross the Desert under the protection of the tribe, the host, after a lapse of three days and four hours from the time of his arrival, asks whether he means to honour him any longer with his company. If the stranger declares his intention of prolonging his visit, it is expected that he should assist his host in domestic matters, fetching water, milking the camel, feeding the horse, &c. Should he even decline this, he may remain; but will be censured by all the Arabs of the camp: he may, however, go to some other tent of the nezel [or encampment], and declare himself there a guest. Thus, every third or fourth day he may change hosts, until his business is finished, or he has reached his place of destination."

NOTE 14.—On different modes of Obeisance. Various different modes of obeisance are practised by the Muslims. Among these, the following are the more common or more remarkable: they differ in the degree of respect that they indicate, nearly in the order in which I shall mention them; the last being the most respectful:—1. Placing the right hand upon the breast.—2. Touching the lips and the forehead or turban (or the forehead or turban only) with the right hand.—3. Doing the same, but slightly inclining the head during that action.—4. The same as the preceding, but inclining the body also.—5. As above, but previously touching the ground with the right hand.—6. Kissing the hand of the person to whom the obeisance is paid.—7. Kissing his sleeve.—8. Kissing the skirt of his clothing.—9. Kissing his feet.—10. Kissing the carpet or ground before him.—The first five modes are often accompanied by the salutation of "Peace be on you!" to which the reply is, "On you be peace, and the mercy of God, and his blessings!" The sixth mode is observed by servants or pupils to masters, by the wife to the husband, and by children to their father, and sometimes to the mother. It is also an act of homage paid to the aged by the young; or to learned or religious men by the less instructed or less devout. The last mode is seldom observed but to kings; and in Arabian countries it is now very uncommon.

NOTE 15. It might seem unnecessary to say, that a King understood what he read, were it not explained that the style of Arabic epistolary compositions, like that of the literature in general, differs considerably from that of common conversation.

NOTE 16. The party travelled chiefly by night, on account of the heat of the day.

NOTE 17.—On the occasional Decorations of Eastern Cities. On various occasions of rejoicing in the palace of the king or governor, the inhabitants of an Eastern city are commanded to decorate their houses, and the tradesmen, in particular, to adorn their shops, by suspending shawls, brocades, rich dresses, women's ornaments, and all kinds of costly articles of merchandise; lamps and flags are attached to cords drawn across the streets, which are often canopied over; and when sufficient notice has been given, the shops, and the doors, &c., of private houses, are painted with gay colors.—Towards the close of the year 1834, the people of Cairo were ordered to decorate their houses and shops previously to the arrival of Ibrâheem Bâshâ, after his victorious campaigns in Syria and Asia Minor. They ornamented the lower parts of their houses with whitewash and red ochre, generally in broad, alternate, horizontal stripes; that is, one course of stone white, and the next red; but the only kind of oil-paint that they could procure in large quantities was blue, the color of mourning; so that they were obliged to use this as the ground upon which to paint flowers and other ornamental devices on their shops; but they regarded this as portending a pestilence; and the awful plague of the following spring confirmed them in their superstitious notions.

NOTE 18. As the notes to this introductory portion are especially numerous, and the chase is here but cursorily alluded to, I shall reserve an account of the mode of hunting to be given on a future occasion.

NOTE 19.—On the opinions of the Arabs respecting Female Beauty. The reader should have some idea of the qualifications or charms which the Arabs in general consider requisite to the perfection of female beauty; for erroneous fancies on this subject would much detract from the interest of the present work. He must not imagine that excessive fatness is one of these characteristics; though it is said to be esteemed a chief essential to beauty throughout the greater part of Northern Africa: on the contrary, the maiden whose loveliness inspires the most impassioned expressions in Arabic poetry and prose is celebrated for her slender figure: she is like the cane among plants, and is elegant as a twig of the oriental willow. Her face is like the full moon, presenting the strongest contrast to the colour of her hair, which (to preserve the nature of the simile just employed) is of the deepest hue of night, and descends to the middle of her back. A rosy blush overspreads the centre of each cheek; and a mole is considered an additional charm. The Arabs, indeed, are particularly extravagant in their admiration of this natural beauty-spot; which, according to its place, is compared to a globule of ambergris upon a dish of alabaster or upon the surface of a ruby. The eyes of the Arab beauty are intensely black, large, and long; of the form of an almond; they are full of brilliancy; but this is softened by a lid slightly depressed, and by long silken lashes, giving a tender and languid expression, which is full of enchantment, and scarcely to be improved by the adventitious aid of the black border of kohl; for this the lovely maiden adds rather for the sake of fashion than necessity; having, what the Arabs term, natural kohl. The eyebrows are thin and arched; the forehead is wide, and fair as ivory; the nose, straight; the mouth, small; the lips are of a brilliant red and the teeth, "like pearls set in coral." The forms of the bosom are compared to two pomegranates; the waist is slender; the hips are wide and large; the feet and hands, small; the fingers, tapering, and their extremities dyed with the deep orange-red tint imparted by the leaves of the hennâ. The person in whom these charms are combined exhibits a lively image of "the rosy-fingered Aurora;" her lover knows neither night nor sleep in her presence, and the constellations of heaven are no longer seen by him when she approaches. The most bewitching age is between fourteen and seventeen years; for then the forms of womanhood are generally developed in their greatest beauty; but many a maiden in her twelfth year possesses charms sufficient to fascinate every youth or man who beholds her.

The reader may perhaps desire a more minute analysis of Arabian beauty. The following is the most complete that I can offer him.—"Four things in a woman should be black; the hair of the head, the eyebrows, the eyelashes and the dark part of the eyes: four white; the complexion of the skin, the white of the eyes, the teeth, and the legs: four red; the tongue, the lips, the middle of the cheeks, and the gums: four round; the head, the neck, the fore-arms, and the ankles: four long; the back, the fingers, the arms, and the legs: four wide; the forehead, the eyes, the bosom, and the hips: four fine; the eyebrows, the nose, the lips, and the fingers: four thick; the lower part of the back, the thighs, the calves of the legs, and the knees: four small; the ears, the breasts, the hands, and the feet."

NOTE 20. Mes'ood is a common proper name of men, and signifies "happy," or "made happy."

NOTE 21.—On the Jinn, or Genii. The frequent mention of Genii in this work, and the erroneous accounts that have been given of these fabulous beings by various European writers, have induced me to examine the statements respecting them in several Arabic works; and I shall here offer the result of my investigation, with a previous account of the Angels.

The Muslims, in general, believe in three different species of created intelligent beings; namely, Angels, who are created of light; Genii, who are created of fire; and Men, created of earth. The first species are called "Meláikeh" (sing. "Melek"); the second, "Jinn" or "Ginn" (sing. "Jinnee" or "Ginnee"); the third, "Ins" (sing. "Insee"). Some hold that the Devils (Sheytáns) are of a species distinct from Angels and Jinn; but the more prevailing opinion, and that which rests on the highest authority, is, that they are rebellious Jinn.

"It is believed," says El-Kazweenee, "that the Angels are of a simple substance, endowed with life, and speech, and reason; and that the difference between them and the Jinn and Sheytáns is a difference of species. Know," he adds, "that the Angels are sanctified from carnal desire and the disturbance of anger: they disobey not God in what He hath commanded them, but do what they are commanded. Their food is the celebrating of his glory; their drink, the proclaiming of his holiness; their conversation, the commemoration of God, whose name he exalted; their pleasure, his worship: they are created in different forms, and with different powers." Some are described as having the forms of brutes. Four of them are Archangels; Jebræel or Jibreel (or Gabriel), the angel of revelations; Meekael or Meekál (or Michael), the patron of the Israelites; 'Azrael, the angel of death; and Isráfeel, the angel of the trumpet, which he is to sound twice or as some say thrice, at the end of the world: one blast will kill all living creatures (himself included): another, forty years after, (he being raised again for this purpose, with Jebræel and Meekael), will raise the dead. These Archangels are also called Apostolic Angels. They are inferior in dignity to human prophets and apostles, though superior to the rest of the human race: the angelic nature is held to be inferior to the human nature, because all the Angels were commanded to prostrate themselves before Adam. Every believer is attended by two guardian and recording angels; one of whom writes his good actions; the other, his evil actions, or, according to some, the number of these angels is five, or sixty, or a hundred and sixty. There are also two Angels called Munkar (vulg. Nákir) and Nekeer, who examine all the dead, and torture the wicked, in their graves.

The species of Jinn is said to have been created some thousands of years before Adam. According to a tradition from the Prophet, this species consists of five orders or classes; namely, Jánn (who are the least powerful of all), Jinn, Sheytáns (or Devils), 'Efreet, and Márids. The last, it is added, are the most powerful; and the Jánn are transformed Jinn; like as certain apes and swine were transformed men.—It must, however, be remarked here, that the terms Jinn and Jánn are generally used indiscriminately, as names of the whole species (including the other orders above mentioned), whether good or bad; and that the former term is the more common. Also, that "Sheytán" is commonly used to signify any evil Jinnee. An 'Efreet is a powerful evil Jinnee: a Márid, an evil Jinnee of the most powerful class. The Jinn (but generally speaking, evil ones) are called by the Persians "Deevs," the most powerful evil Jinn, "Narabs" (which signifies "males," though they are said to be males and females); the good Jinn, "Perees;" though this term is commonly applied to females.

In a tradition from the Prophet, it is said, "The Jánn were created of a smokeless fire." The word which signifies "a smokeless fire" has been misunderstood by some as meaning "the flame of fire:" El-Jóharee (in the Seháh) renders it rightly; and says that of this fire was the Sheytán (Iblees) created. "El-Jánn" is sometimes used as a name for Iblees; as in the following verse of the Kur-án:—"And the Jánn [the father of the Jinn; i. e. Iblees] we had created before [i. e. before the creation of Adam] of the fire of the samoom [i. e. of fire without smoke]." "Jánn" also signifies "a serpent;" as in other passages of the Kur-án; and is used in the same book as synonymous with "Jinn." In the last sense it is generally believed to be used in the tradition quoted in the commencement of this paragraph. There are several apparently contradictory traditions from the Prophet which are reconciled by what has been above stated: in one, it is said, that Iblees was the father of all the Jánn and Sheytáns; Jánn being here synonymous with Jinn: in another, that Jánn was the father of all the Jinn; here, Jánn being used as a name of Iblees.

"It is held," says El-Kazweenee, "that the Jinn are aerial animals, with transparent bodies, which can assume various forms. People differ in opinion respecting these beings: some consider the Jinn and Sheytáns as unruly men; but these persons are of the Moatezileh [a sect of Muslim free-thinkers]; and some hold, that God, whose name be exalted, created the Angels of the light of fire, and the Jinn of its flame [but this is at variance with the general opinion], and the Sheytáns of its smoke [which is also at variance with the common opinion]; and that [all] these kinds of beings are [usually] invisible to men, but that they assume what forms they please, and when their form becomes condensed they are visible."—This last remark illustrates several descriptions of Jinnees in this work; where the form of the monster is at first undefined, or like an enormous pillar, and then gradually assumes a human shape and less gigantic size. The particular forms of brutes, reptiles, &c., in which the Jinn most frequently appear will be mentioned hereafter.

It is said that God created the Jánn [or Jinn] two thousand years before Adam [or, according to some writers, much earlier]; and that there are believers and infidels and every sect among them, as among men.—Some say that a prophet, named Yoosuf, was sent to the Jinn: others, that they had only preachers, or admonishers: others again, that seventy apostles were sent, before Mohammad, to Jinn and men conjointly. It is commonly believed that the preadamite Jinn were governed by forty (or, according to some, seventy-two) kings, to each of whom the Arab writers give the name of Suleymán (or Solomon); and that they derived their appellation from the last of these, who was called Jánn Ibn-Jánn, and who, some say, built the Pyramids of Egypt. The following account of the preadamite Jinn is given by El-Kazweenee.—"It is related in histories, that a race of Jinn, in ancient times, before the creation of Adam, inhabited the earth, and covered it, the land and the sea, and the plains and the mountains; and the favours of God were multiplied upon them, and they had government, and prophecy, and religion, and law; but they transgressed and offended, and opposed their prophets, and made wickedness to abound in the earth; whereupon God, whose name be exalted, sent against them an army of Angels, who took possession of the earth, and drove away the Jinn to the regions of the islands, and made many of them prisoners; and of those who were made prisoners was 'Azázeel [afterwards called Iblees, from his despair]; and a slaughter was made among them. At that time, 'Azázeel was young: he grew up among the Angels [and probably for that reason was called one of them], and became learned in their knowledge, and assumed the government of them; and his days were prolonged until he became their chief; and thus it continued for a long time, until the affair between him and Adam happened, as God, whose name be exalted, hath said, 'When we said unto the Angels, Worship ye Adam, and [all] worshipped except Iblees [who] was [one] of the Jinn.'"

"Iblees," we are told by another authority, "was sent as a governor upon the earth, and judged among the Jinn a thousand years, after which he ascended into heaven, and remained employed in worship until the creation of Adam." The name of Iblees was originally, according to some, 'Azázeel (as before mentioned); and according to others, El-Háarith: his patronymic is Abou-Murrah, or Abul-l-Ghimr.—It is disputed whether he was of the Angels or of the Jinn. There are three opinions on this point.—1. That he was of the Angels, from a tradition from Ibn-'Abbás.—2. That he was of the Sheytáns (or evil Jinn); as it is said in the Kur-án, "except Iblees, [who] was [one] of the Jinn:" this was the opinion of El-Hasan El-Basree, and is that commonly held.—

3. That he was neither of the Angels nor of the Jinn; but created alone, of fire.—Ibn-'Abbás founds his opinion on the same text from which El-Hasan El-Basree derives his: "When we said unto the Angels, Worship ye Adam, and [all] worshipped except Iblees, [who] was [one] of the Jinn" (before quoted): which he explains by saying, that the most noble and honourable among the Angels are called "the Jinn," because they are veiled from the eyes of the other Angels on account of their superiority; and that Iblees was one of these Jinn. He adds, that he had the government of the lowest heaven and of the earth, and was called the Táooos (literally, Peacock) of the Angels; and that there was not a spot in the lowest heaven but he had prostrated himself upon it: but when the Jinn rebelled upon the earth, God sent a troop of Angels who drove them to the islands and mountains; and Iblees being elated with pride, and refusing to prostrate himself before Adam, God transformed him into a Sheytán.—But this reasoning is opposed by other verses, in which Iblees is represented as saying, "Thou has created me of fire, and hast created him [Adam] of earth." It is therefore argued, "If he were created originally of fire, how was he created of light? for the Angels were [all] created of light."—The former verse may be explained by the tradition, that Iblees, having been taken captive, was exalted among the Angels; or perhaps there is an ellipsis after the word "Angels;" for it might be inferred that the command given to the Angels was also (and a fortiori) to be obeyed by the Jinn.

According to a tradition, Iblees and all the Sheytáns are distinguished from the other Jinn by a longer existence. "The Sheytáns," it is added, "are the children of Iblees, and die not but with him; whereas, the [other] Jinn die before him;" though they may live many centuries. But this is not altogether accordant with the popular belief: Iblees and many other evil Jinn are to survive mankind; but they are to die before the general resurrection; as also even the Angels; the last of whom will be the Angel of Death, 'Azrael: yet not all the evil Jinn are to live thus long: many of them are killed by shooting stars, hurled at them from heaven; wherefore, the Arabs, when they see a shooting star (shiháb), often exclaim, "May God transfix the enemy of the faith!"—Many also are killed by other Jinn; and some, even by men. The fire of which the Jinnee is created circulates in his veins, in place of blood: therefore, when he receives a mortal wound, this fire, issuing from his veins, generally consumes him to ashes.—The Jinn, it has been already shown, are peccable. They also eat and drink, and propagate their species, sometimes in conjunction with human beings; in which latter case, the offspring partake of the nature of both parents. In all these respects they differ from the Angels. Among the evil Jinn are distinguished the five sons of their chief, Iblees; namely, Teer, who brings about calamities, losses, and injuries; El-Aawar, who encourages debauchery; Sót, who suggests lies; Dásim, who causes hatred between man and wife; and Zelemboor, who presides over places of traffic.

The most common forms and habitations or places of resort of the Jinn must now be described.

The following traditions from the Prophet are the most to the purpose that I have seen.—The Jinn are of various shapes; having the forms of serpents, scorpions, lions, wolves, jackals, &c.—The Jinn are of three kinds; one on the land; one in the sea; and one in the air. The Jinn consist of forty troops; each troop consisting of six hundred thousand.—The Jinn are of three kinds; one have wings, and fly; another are snakes, and dogs; and the third move about from place to place like men.—Domestic snakes are asserted to be Jinn on the same authority.

The Prophet ordered his followers to kill serpents and scorpions if they intruded at prayers; but on other occasions, he seems to have required first to admonish them to depart, and then, if they remained, to kill them. The Doctors, however, differ in opinion whether all kinds of snakes or serpents should be admonished first; or whether any should; for the Prophet, say they, took a covenant of the Jinn [probably after the above-mentioned command], that they should not enter the houses of the faithful: therefore, it is argued, if they enter, they break their covenant, and it becomes lawful to kill them without previous admonishment. Yet it is related that 'Aisheh, the Prophet's wife, having killed a serpent in her chamber, was alarmed by a dream, and, fearing that it might have been a Muslim Jinnee, as it did not enter her chamber when she was undressed, gave in alms, as an expiation, twelve thousand dirhems (about £300), the price of the blood of a Muslim.

The Jinn are said to appear to mankind most commonly in the shapes of serpents, dogs, cats, or human beings. In the last case, they are sometimes of the stature of men, and sometimes of a size enormously gigantic. If good, they are generally resplendently handsome: if evil, horribly hideous. They become invisible at pleasure (by a rapid extension and rarefaction of the particles which compose them), or suddenly disappear in the earth or air, or through a solid wall. Many Muslims in the present day profess to have seen and held intercourse with them.

The Zóba'ah, which is a whirlwind that raises the sand or dust in the form of a pillar of prodigious height, often seen sweeping across the deserts and fields, is believed to be caused by the flight of an evil Jinnee. To defend themselves from a Jinnee thus "riding in the whirlwind," the Arabs often exclaim, "Iron! Iron!" (Hadeed! Hadeed!), or "Iron! thou unlucky!" (Hadeed! yá mashoom!), as the Jinn are supposed to have a great dread of that metal: or they exclaim, "God is most great!" (Alláhu akbar!). A similar superstition prevails with respect to the water-spout at sea, as the reader may have discovered from the first instance of the description of a Jinnee in the present work, which occasions this note to be here inserted.

It is believed that the chief abode of the Jinn is in the Mountains of Káf, which are supposed (as mentioned on a former occasion) to encompass the whole of our earth. But they are also believed to pervade the solid body of our earth, and the firmament; and to choose, as their principal places of resort, or of occasional abode, baths, wells, the latrina, ovens, ruined houses, market-places, the junctures of roads, the sea, and rivers. The Arabs, therefore, when they pour water, &c., on the ground, or enter a bath, or let down a bucket into a well, or visit the latrina, and on various other occasions, say, "Permission!" or "Permission, ye blessed!" (Destoor! or, Destoor yá mubárakeen!).—The evil spirits (or evil Jinn), it is said, had liberty to enter any of the seven heavens till the birth of Jesus, when they were excluded from three of them; on the birth of Mohammad, they were forbidden the other four. They continue, however, to ascend to the confines of the lowest heaven, and there listening to the conversation of the Angels respecting things decreed by God, obtain knowledge of futurity, which they sometimes impart to men, who, by means of talismans, or certain invocations, make them to serve the purposes of magical performances. To this particular subject it will be necessary to revert.—What the Prophet said of Iblees, in the following tradition, applies also to the evil Jinn over whom he presides:—His chief abode [among men] is the bath; his chief places of resort are the markets, and the junctures of roads; his food is whatever is killed without the name of God being pronounced over it; his drink, whatever is intoxicating; his muéddin, the mizmár (a musical pipe; i. e. any musical instrument); his kur-án, poetry; his written character, the marks made in geomancy; his speech, falsehood; his snares are women.

That particular Jinnees presided over particular places, was an opinion of the early Arabs. It is said in the Kur-án, "And there were certain men who sought refuge with certain of the Jinn." In the Commentary of the Jeláley, I find the following remark on these words:—"When they halted, on their journey, in a place of fear, each man said, 'I seek refuge with the lord of this place, from the mischief of his foolish ones!'" In illustration of this, I may insert the following tradition, translated from El-Kazweene:—"It is related by a certain narrator of traditions, that he descended into a valley, with his sheep, and a wolf carried off a ewe from among them; and he arose, and raised his voice, and cried, 'O inhabitant of the valley!' whereupon he heard a voice saying, 'O wolf, restore to him his sheep!' and the wolf came with the ewe, and left her, and departed."—The same opinion is held by the modern Arabs, though probably they do not use such an invocation.—A similar superstition, a relic of ancient Egyptian credulity, still prevails among the people of Cairo. It is believed that each quarter of this city has its peculiar guardian-genius, or Agathodæmon, which has the form of a serpent.

It has already been mentioned that some of the Jinn are Muslims; and others, infidels. The good Jinn acquit themselves of the imperative duties of religion; namely, prayers, alms-giving, fasting during the month of Ramadán, and pilgrimage to Mekkeh and Mount 'Arafát; but in the performance of these duties they are generally invisible to human beings. Some examples of the mode in which good Jinn pay the alms required of them by the law, I have given in a former work.

Of the services and injuries done by Jinn to men, some account must be given.

It has been stated, that, by means of talismans, or certain invocations, men are said to obtain the services of Jinn; and the manner in which the latter are enabled to assist magicians, by imparting to them the knowledge of future events, has been explained. No man ever obtained such absolute power over the Jinn as Suleymán Ibn-Dáood (Solomon, the Son of David). This he did by virtue of a most wonderful talisman, which is said to have come down to him from heaven. It was a seal-ring, upon which was engraved "the most great name" of God; and was partly composed of brass, and partly of iron. With the brass he stamped his written commands to the good Jinn; with the iron (for a reason before mentioned), those to the evil Jinn, or Devils. Over both orders he had unlimited power; as well as over the birds and the winds, and, as is generally said, the wild beasts. His Wezeer, Asaf the son of Bark-hiyà, is also said to have been acquainted with "the most great name," by uttering which, the greatest miracles may be performed; even that of raising the dead. By virtue of this name, engraved on his ring, Suleymán compelled the Jinn to assist in building the Temple of Jerusalem, and in various other works. Many of the evil Jinn he converted to the true faith; and many others of this class, who remained obstinate in infidelity, he confined in prisons. He is said to have been monarch of the whole earth. Hence, perhaps, the name of Suleymán is given to the universal monarchs of the preadamite Jinn; unless the story of his own universal dominion originated from confounding him with those kings of the Jinn.

The injuries related to have been inflicted upon human beings by evil Jinn are of various kinds. Jinnees are said to have often carried off beautiful women, whom they have forcibly kept as their wives or concubines. I have mentioned in a former work, that malicious or disturbed Jinnees are asserted often to station themselves on the roofs, or at the windows, of houses, and to throw down bricks and stones on persons passing by. When they take possession of an uninhabited house, they seldom fail to persecute terribly any person who goes to reside in it. They are also very apt to pilfer provisions, &c. Many learned and devout persons, to secure their property from such depredations, repeat the words "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful!" on locking the doors of their houses, rooms, or closets, and on covering the bread-basket, or anything containing food. During the month of Ramadán, the evil Jinn are believed to be confined in prison; and therefore, on the last night of that month, with the same view, women sometimes repeat the words above mentioned, and sprinkle salt upon the floors of the apartments of their houses.

To complete this sketch of Arabian mythology, an account must be added of several creatures generally believed to be of inferior orders of the Jinn.

One of these is the Ghool, which is commonly regarded as a kind of Sheytán, or evil Jinnee, that eats men; and is also described by some as a Jinnee or an enchanter who assumes various forms. The Ghools are said to appear in the forms of various animals, and of human beings, and in many monstrous shapes; to haunt burial-grounds and other sequestered spots; to feed upon dead human bodies; and to kill and devour any human creature who has the misfortune to fall in their way: whence the term "Ghool" is applied to any cannibal. An opinion quoted by a celebrated author, respecting the Ghool, is, that it is a demoniacal animal, which passes a solitary existence in the deserts, resembling both man and brute; that it appears to a person travelling alone in the night and in solitary places, and, being supposed by him to be itself a traveller, lures him out of his way. Another opinion stated by him is this: that, when the Sheytáns attempt to hear words by stealth [from the confines of the lowest heaven], they are struck by shooting stars; and some are burnt; some, falling into a sea, or rather a large river (bahr), become converted into crocodiles; and some, falling upon the land, become Ghools. The same author adds the following tradition:—"The Ghool is any Jinnee that is opposed to travels, assuming various forms and appearances;" and affirms that several of the Companions of the Prophet saw Ghools in their travels; and that 'Omar, among them, saw a Ghool while on a journey to Syria, before El-Islám, and struck it with his sword.—It appears that "Ghool" is, properly speaking, a name only given to a female demon of the kind above described: the male is called "Kutrub." It is said that these beings, and the Ghaddár, or Gharrár, and other similar creatures which will presently be mentioned, are the offspring of Iblees and of a wife whom God created for him of the fire of the Samoom (which here signifies, as in an instance before mentioned, "a smokeless fire"); and that they sprang from an egg. The female Ghool, it is added, appears to men in the deserts, in various forms, converses with them, and sometimes prostitutes herself to them.

The Sealáh, or Saaláh, is another demoniacal creature, described by some [or rather, by most authors] as of the Jinn. It is said that it is mostly found in forests, and that when it captures a man, it makes him dance, and plays with him as the cat plays with the mouse. A man of Isfahán asserted that many beings of this kind abounded in his country; that sometimes the wolf would hunt one of them by night, and devour it, and that, when it had seized it, the Sealáh would cry out, "Come to my help, for the wolf devoureth me!" or it would cry, "Who will liberate me? I have a hundred deenárs, and he shall receive them!" but the people knowing that it was the cry of the Sealáh, no one would liberate it; and so the wolf would eat it.—An island in the sea of Es-Seen (or China) is called "the Island of the Sealáh," by Arab geographers, from its being said to be inhabited by the demons so named: they are described as creatures of hideous forms, supposed to be Sheytáns, the offspring of human beings and Jinn, who eat men.

The Ghaddár, or Gharrár (for its name is written differently in two different MSS. in my possession), is another creature of a similar nature, described as being found in the borders of El-Yemen, and sometimes in Tihámeh, and in the upper parts of Egypt. It is said that it entices a man to it, and either tortures him in a manner not to be described, or merely terrifies him, and leaves him.

The Delhán is also a demoniacal being, inhabiting the islands of the seas, having the form of a man, and riding on an ostrich. It eats the flesh of men whom the sea casts on the shore from wrecks. Some say that a Delhán once attacked a ship in the sea, and desired to take the crew; but they contended with it; whereupon it uttered a cry which caused them to fall upon their faces, and it took them.—In my MS. of Ibn-El-Wardee, I find the name written "Dahlán." He mentions an island called by this name, in the Sea of 'Omán; and describes its inhabitants as cannibal Sheytáns, like men in form, and riding on birds resembling ostriches.

The Shikk is another demoniacal creature, having the form of half a human being (like a man divided longitudinally); and it is believed that the Nesnás is the offspring of a Shikk and of a human being. The Shikk appears to travellers; and it was a demon of this kind who killed, and was killed by, 'Alkamah, the son of Safwán, the son of Umeiyeh; of whom it is well known that he was killed by a Jinnee. So says El-Kazweenee.

The Nesnás (above mentioned) is described as resembling half a human being; having half a head, half a body, one arm, and one leg, with which it hops with much agility; as being found in the woods of El-Yemen, and being endowed with speech: "but God," it is added, "is all-knowing." It is said that it is found in Hadramót as well as El-Yemen; and that one was brought alive to El-Mutawekkil: it resembled a man in form, excepting that it had but half a face, which was in its breast, and a tail like that of a sheep. The people of Hadramót, it is added, eat it; and its flesh is sweet. It is only generated in their country. A man who went there asserted that he saw a captured Nesnás, which cried out for mercy, conjuring him by God and by himself. A race of people whose head is in the breast is described as inhabiting an island called Jábeh (supposed to be Java), in the Sea of El-Hind, or India. A kind of Nesnás is also described as inhabiting the Island of Ráij, in the Sea of Es-Seen, or China, and having wings like those of the bat.

The Hátif is a being that is heard, but not seen; and is often mentioned by Arab writers. It is generally the communicator of some intelligence in the way of advice, or direction, or warning.

Here terminating this long note, I must beg the reader to remark, that the superstitious fancies which it describes are prevalent among all classes of the Arabs, and the Muslims in general, learned as well as vulgar. I have comprised in it much matter not necessary to illustrate the introductory portion of this work, in order to avoid frequent recurrence to the same subject. Another apology for its length may also be offered:—its importance as confuting Schlegel's opinion, that the frequent mention of Genii is more consistent with Indian than with Arab notions.

NOTE 22. This chest is described in some copies as formed of glass.

NOTE 23. The term "Efreet" has been explained above, in Note 21.

NOTE 24. Most of the copies of the original, it appears, make the number of rings ninety-eight; therefore, I have substituted this, as less extraordinary, for five hundred and seventy, which is the number mentioned in the Cairo edition.

NOTE 25. Almost every Muslim who can afford it has a seal-ring, for a reason shown in a former note (No. 11).

In a great collection of Indian tales, the "Kathá Sarit Ságara," is a story which may have been the original of that to which this note refers. "Two young Brahmans travelling are benighted in a forest, and take up their lodging in a tree near a lake. Early in the night a number of people come from the water, and having made preparation for an entertainment, retire; a Yaksha, a genie, then comes out of the lake with his two wives, and spends the night there: when he and one of his wives are asleep, the other, seeing the youths, invites them to approach her, and to encourage them, shows them a hundred rings received from former gallants, notwithstanding her husband's precautions, who keeps her locked up in a chest at the bottom of the lake. The Hindu storyteller is more moral than the Arab. The youths reject her advances; she wakes the genie, who is going to put them to death, but the rings are produced in evidence against the unfaithful wife, and she is turned away with the loss of her nose. The story is repeated in the next section with some variation; the lady has ninety and nine rings, and is about to complete the hundredth, when her husband, who is here a Naga, a snake-god, wakes, and consumes the guilty pair with fire from his mouth." — British and Foreign Review, No. xxi. page 266.

NOTE 26. For the story of Yoosuf and Zeleekha (or Joseph and the wife of Potiphar), see the Kur-án, ch. xii.

NOTE 27.—On the wickedness of Women. The wickedness of women is a subject upon which the stronger sex among the Arabs, with an affected feeling of superior virtue, often dwell in common conversation. That women are deficient in judgment or good sense is held as a fact not to be disputed even by themselves, as it rests on an assertion of the Prophet; but that they possess a superior degree of cunning is pronounced equally certain and notorious. Their general depravity is pronounced to be much greater than that of men. "I stood," said the Prophet, "at the gate of Paradise; and lo, most of its inmates were the poor: and I stood at the gate of Hell; and lo, most of its inmates were women." In allusion to women, the Khaleefeh 'Omar said, "Consult them, and do the contrary of what they advise." But this is not to be done merely for the sake of opposing them; nor when other advice can be had. "It is desirable for a man," says a learned Imám, "before he enters upon any important undertaking, to consult ten intelligent persons among his particular friends; or, if he have not more than five such friends, let him consult each of them twice; or, if he have not more than one friend, he should consult him ten times, at ten different visits: if he have not one to consult, let him return to his wife, and consult her; and whatever she advises him to do, let him do the contrary: so shall he proceed rightly in his affair, and attain his object." A truly virtuous wife is, of course, excepted in this rule: such a person is as much respected by Muslims as she is (at least, according to their own account) rarely met with by them. When woman was created, the Devil, we are told, was delighted, and said, "Thou art half of my host, and thou art the depository of my secret, and thou art my arrow, with which I shoot, and miss not." What are termed by us affairs of gallantry were very common among the Pagan Arabs, and are scarcely less so among their Muslim posterity. They are, however, unfrequent among most tribes of Bedaweess, and among the descendants of those tribes not long settled as cultivators. I remember being roused from the quiet that I generally enjoyed in an ancient tomb in which I resided at Thebes, by the cries of a young woman in the neighbourhood, whom an Arab was severely beating for an impudent proposal that she had made to him.

NOTE 28.—On the cruelty ascribed to Shahriyár. I wish that I could accuse the author of inventing, in this case, an incident of an incredible nature, and entirely unparalleled; but, alas, acts of equal cruelty are recorded of Arab princes: traits of benevolence, and crimes of the blackest hue, are related in their histories, sometimes in the same page. I have not read of any case exactly resembling that to which this note relates; but the following anecdote will show, that if conduct still more atrocious had been described in the latter, it might have been founded on fact. "In the year of the Flight 423, the Khaleefeh of Egypt, Ez-Záhir, the son of El-Hákim, collected together all the female slaves that were in the palace, and said to them, 'Assemble together, and I will make a day of pleasure for you, such as hath not before been seen in Egypt.' He ordered, also, that every person who had a female slave should bring her, and that none of them should come but with her ornaments of jewels and gold. They did so; and there was not a single one that did not come. He then placed them in a chamber, and, calling some masons, made them build up the door of the chamber upon them, and so they all died. This happened on Friday (the Mohammadan Sabbath), the 6th of Showwâl. The number of them was two thousand six hundred and sixty female slaves. After they had remained six months, he heaped lighted combustibles upon them, and burned them, together with their clothes and ornaments. May God [says the narrator] show no mercy to him!"

NOTE 29. I here deviate a little from my original, in which Shahrazâd is made to say, "Either I shall live, or I shall be a ransom for the daughters of the Muslims, and the cause of their deliverance from him." Upon this, the sheykh Mohammad 'Eiyâd has remarked in a marginal note, "It would seem that she had contrived some stratagem to prevent his marrying again if he determined to kill her: otherwise, the mere killing her would not be a means of rescuing the other maidens."

NOTE 30.—On the Language of Birds, &c. It is commonly believed by the Muslims (learned and unlearned), that all kinds of birds, and many (if not all) beasts, have a language by which they communicate their thoughts to each other; and we are told in the Kur-ân, that Suleymân (or Solomon) was taught the language of birds. I thought that I could boast of an accomplishment very rare in Christian countries, in having learned, in Egypt, somewhat of this language; for instance, that the common cry of the pigeon is "Allâh! Allâh!" ("God! God!"); that of the ringdove, "Keerem! Towwâb!" ("Bountiful! Propitious!"—an ejaculation addressed to God); that of the common dove, "Wahhidoo rabbakumu-lleze khalakakum, yeghfir-lakum zembakum!" ("Assert the unity of your Lord who created you, so will He forgive you your sin!") but I afterwards found that several specimens of this language were given by Ez-Zamakhsheree, and had been published in Europe: see "Alcoranus Marraccii," p. 511. The cock cries, "Uzkuru-llâha, yâ ghâfiloon!" ("Commemorate God, O ye negligent!"): the katâ (a kind of grouse), "Men seket selim!" ("He who is silent is safe!"). The latter, however, would do better if it did itself attend to the maxim it utters; for its cry, which, to the uninstructed in the language of birds, sounds merely, "katâ! katâ!" as its own name, tells where it is to be found by the sportsman, and thus causes its own destruction. Hence the proverb—"More veracious than the katâ."

NOTE 31. In the houses of persons of the middle classes in Arabian countries, there is generally an apartment on the ground-floor fitted up as a stable for a horse, mule, or ass, or for two or more such animals; and the cattle of the farmer, if not very numerous, are usually lodged during the night in similar quarters, or in an open court enclosed within, or immediately adjacent to, his house.

NOTE 32. It is a common custom in the East to sprinkle the ground, during the summer, in order to cool the air.

NOTE 33. Cut straw is the usual fodder of asses and other beasts of burden in Egypt and other countries of the East.

NOTE 34. The phrase with which the bull commences his address to the ass, is one dictated by an indispensable rule of Muslim politeness, which requires that these or some similar words should be uttered by a person whenever he sees another with food before him, and does not partake of it. If this were not done, it would be feared that the food had been poisoned, or rendered of no avail, by an envious eye.

NOTE 35. The peasants in the East use a hand-mill for grinding their corn. The larger mills used for this and other purposes are turned by cattle.

NOTE 36. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, the ass is made to quote verses to the bull. Hast thou not, he asks him, heard the poet say:—

I occupy myself every day and night in anxious service of him in whose prosperity I have no enjoyment:

Like the bleacher who blackens his face in the sun, while he watches the whitening of the clothes of others.

NOTE 37. I read "nat'an," as in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, instead of "kita'an" in the Cairo edition. The nata is a large round piece of leather, which, spread upon the ground, serves as a table for dinner, &c. It is particularly convenient, and therefore much used, in travelling. Around the edge is a running string, which, being drawn, converts it into a bag to hold what is left of the food.

NOTE 38.—On the office of Kâdee. The Kâdee is a judge, or minister of justice, who passes sentence in all cases of law, religious, moral, civil, and criminal. This he generally does, in the present day, in accordance with the decision of a Muftée, or doctor of the law. In small towns and villages, he is often employed to draw up written contracts of various kinds.

NOTE 39. The famous Saadee attained the age here mentioned; but instances of equal longevity, among the Orientals, are rare.

NOTE 40. To perform the ablution preparatory to prayer in the expectation of almost immediate death, is a supererogatory act which, I believe, is seldom observed.

NOTE 41. Both religion and climate make the Muslim an early riser. It is his duty to perform the first of the five daily prayers at, or soon after, daybreak; and he generally awakes before this period. While Shahriyár, therefore, was waiting for the dawn of day to acquit himself of this duty, in accordance with the common custom of Mohammadan kings, Shahrazád amused him by the recitation of her tales. That he should be described as thus strict with regard to religious exercises, when about to give orders for the murder of his innocent wife, need not excite our surprise: such conduct is consistent with the character of many Muslims. In the year 1834, when I was residing in Cairo, a General in the service of Mohammad 'Alee hired a large party of men to perform a recital of the Kur-án, in his house in that city, and then went up into his hareem, and strangled his wife, in consequence of a report which accused her of incontinence. The religious ceremony was designed as preparatory to this act, though the punishment of the woman was contrary to the law, since her husband neither produced four witnesses of the imputed crime, nor allowed her to clear herself of the charge by her own oath. Another case of diligence in the performance of a religious duty accompanied by the contemplation of murder, but murder on a larger scale, occurred in the same city shortly after. Suleymán Ágha, the Siláhdár, being occupied in directing the building of a public fountain, as a work of charity to place to the account of a deceased brother, desired to extend the original plan of the structure; and to do this, it was necessary that he should purchase two houses adjoining the plot in which the foundations had been laid: but the owners of these houses refused to sell them, and he therefore employed a number of workmen to undermine them by night, and cause them to fall upon their inhabitants. His scheme, however, but partially succeeded, and no lives were sacrificed. This man was notorious for cruelty, but he was a person of pleasing and venerable countenance, and engaging manners: whenever I chanced to meet him, I received from him a most gracious salutation. He died before I quitted Egypt.

NOTE 1. The words "in a garden" are omitted in my original; but they are required by the sequel. I may here remark, that, in future, when I find trifling insertions of this kind to be requisite in my translation, I shall not deem it necessary to mention them in a note.

NOTE 2. An Eastern traveller often makes a long journey with no other encumbrance than a well-filled pair of saddlebags: in one bag he puts his provisions; and in the other, such articles of clothing as he may require in addition to those in which he sets out, including a spare shirt, and perhaps no other clean linen: for he is as indifferent with regard to this comfort as he is careful respecting his personal cleanliness.

NOTE 3. Perhaps no reader of this work will require to be told that the date has not a shell. I only make this remark on account of an error in the old translation. — As dates are very nutritious, and are preserved by being merely dried in the sun, they are an excellent article of provision for travellers.

NOTE 4. The merchant was culpably careless: before throwing aside the date-stone with sufficient force to kill a Jinnee who happened to be near him (though at the time invisible), he should have asked permission by the exclamation "Destoor!" as explained in a note appended to the Introduction.

NOTE 5. — On Fate and Destiny. The belief in fate and destiny ("el-kadà wa-lkadar") exercises a most powerful influence upon the actions and character of the Muslims; and it is therefore highly important that the reader of the present work should be acquainted with the notions which these people entertain respecting such matters of faith. I use two words (perhaps the best that our language affords) to express corresponding Arabic terms, which some persons regard as synonymous, but others distinguish by different shades of meaning. On what I consider the best authority, the word which I render "fate" respects the decrees of God in a general sense; while that which I translate "destiny" relates to the particular applications of those decrees. In such senses these terms are here to be understood when separately employed.

Many Muslims hold that fate is, in some respects, absolute and unchangeable; in others, admitting of alteration; and almost all of them act, in many of the affairs of life, as if this were their belief. In the former case, it is called "el-kadā el-Mohkam:" in the latter, "el-kadā el-Mubram" (which term, without the explanation here given, might be regarded as exactly synonymous with the former). Hence, the Prophet, it is said, prayed to be preserved from the latter, as knowing that it might be changed; and in allusion to this changeable fate, God, we are told, says, "God will cancel what He pleaseth, and confirm;" while, on the contrary, the fate which is termed "Mohkam" is appointed "destiny" decreed by God.

Many doctors have argued, that destiny respects only the final state of a certain portion of men (believers and unbelievers); and that, in general, man is endowed with free will, which he should exercise according to the laws of God and his own conscience and judgment, praying to God for a blessing on his endeavours, or imploring the intercession of the Prophet, or of any of the saints, in his favour, and propitiating them by offering alms or sacrifices in their names; relying upon God for the result, which he may then, and then only, attribute to fate or destiny. They hold, therefore, that it is criminal to attempt resistance to the will when its dictates are conformable with the laws of God and our natural consciences and prudence, and so passively to await the fulfilment of God's decrees.—The doctrine of the Kur-án and the Traditions respecting the decrees of God, or fate and destiny, appears, however, to be, that they are altogether absolute and unchangeable,—written, in the beginning of the creation, on the "Preserved Tablet," in heaven; that God hath predestined every event and action, evil as well as good; at the same time commanding and approving good, and forbidding and hating evil; and that the "cancelling" mentioned in the preceding paragraph relates (as the context seems to show) to the abrogation of former scriptures, or revelations; not of fate. But still it must be held that He hath not predestined the will; though He sometimes inclines it to good, and the Devil sometimes inclines it to evil. It is asked, then, If we have the power to will, but not the power to perform otherwise than as God hath predetermined, how can we be regarded as responsible beings? The answer to this is, that our actions are judged good or evil according to our intentions, if we have faith: good actions or intentions, it should be added, only increase, and do not cause, our happiness, if we are believers; and evil actions or intentions only increase our misery if we are unbelievers or irreligious: for the Muslim holds that he is to be admitted into heaven only by the mercy of God, on account of his faith; and to be rewarded in proportion to his good works.

The Prophet's assertions on the subject of God's decrees are considered of the highest importance as explanatory of the Kur-án.—"Whatever is in the universe," said he, "is by the order of God."—"God hath pre-ordained five things on his servants; the duration of life, their actions, their dwelling-places, their travels, and their portions."—"There is not one among you whose sitting-place is not written by God, whether in the fire or in paradise."—Some of the Companions of the Prophet, on hearing the last-quoted saying, asked him, "O Prophet, since God hath appointed our places, may we confide in this, and abandon our religious and moral duties?" He answered, "No: because the happy will do good works, and those who are of the miserable will do bad works."—The following of his sayings further illustrate this subject.—"When God hath ordered a creature to die in any particular place, He causeth his wants to direct him to that place."—A Companion asked, "O Prophet of God, inform me respecting charms, and the medicines which I swallow, and shields which I make use of for protection, whether they prevent any of the orders of God." Mohammad answered, "These also are by the order of God." "There is a medicine for every pain: Then, when the medicine reaches the pain, it is cured by the order of God."—When a Muslim, therefore, feels an inclination to make use of medicine for the cure of a disease, he should do so, in the hope of its being predestined that he shall be so cured.

On the predestination of diseases, I find the following curious quotation and remark in a manuscript work, by Es-Suyootee, in my possession.—“El-Haleemee says, ‘Communicable or contagious diseases are six: smallpox, measles, itch or scab, foul breath or putridity, melancholy, and pestilential maladies; and diseases engendered are also six: leprosy, hectic, epilepsy, gout, elephantiasis, and phthisis.’ But this does not contradict the saying of the Prophet, ‘There is no transition of diseases by contagion or infection, nor any omen that brings evil:’ for the transition here meant is one occasioned by the disease itself; whereas the effect is of God, who causes pestilence to spread when there is intercourse with the diseased.”—A Bedawee asked the Prophet, “What is the condition of camels which stay in the deserts? Verily, you might say, they are deer, in health and in cleanness of skin; then they mix with mangy camels, and they become mangy also.” Mohammad said, “What made the first camel mangy?”

Notwithstanding, however, the arguments which have been here adduced, and many others that might be added declaring or implying the unchangeable nature of all God's decrees, I have found it to be the opinion of my own Muslim friends, that God may be induced, by supplication, to change certain of his decrees; at least, those regarding degrees of happiness or misery in this world and the next; and that such is the general opinion, appears from a form of prayer which is repeated in the mosques on the eve of the middle (or fifteenth day) of the month of Shaabân; when it is believed that such portions of God's decrees as constitute the destinies of all living creatures for the ensuing year, are confirmed and fixed. In this prayer it is said, “O God, if Thou hast recorded me in thine abode, upon ‘the Original of the Book’ [the Preserved Tablet], miserable, or unfortunate, or scanted in my sustenance, cancel, O God, of thy goodness, my misery, and misfortune, and scanty allowance of sustenance, and confirm me, in thine abode, upon the Original of the Book, as happy, and provided for, and directed to good,” &c.

The Arabs in general constantly have recourse both to charms and medicines, not only for the cure, but also for the prevention of diseases. They have, indeed, a strange passion for medicine, which shows that they do not consider fate as altogether unconditional. Nothing can exceed the earnestness with which they often press a European traveller for a dose; and the more violent the remedy, the better are they pleased. The following case will serve as an example:—Three donkey-drivers, conveying the luggage of two British travellers from Boolák to Cairo, opened a bottle which they observed in a basket, and finding it to contain, as they had suspected, brandy, emptied it down their throats: but he who had the last, on turning up the bottle, got the tail of a scorpion into his mouth; and, looking through the bottle, to his great horror, saw that it contained a number of these reptiles, with tarantulas, vipers, and beetles. Thinking that they had poisoned themselves, but not liking to rely upon fate, they persuaded a man to come to me for medicine. He introduced the subject by saying, “O Efendee, do an act of kindness: there are three men poisoned; in your mercy give them medicine, and save their lives:” and then he related the whole affair, without concealing the theft. I replied, that they did not deserve medicine; but he urged that, by giving it, I should obtain an immense reward. “Yes,” said I; “he who saveth a soul alive shall be as if he had saved the lives of all mankind.” I said this to try the feeling of the applicant, who, expressing admiration of my knowledge, urged me to be quick, lest the men should die; thus showing himself to be no unconditional fatalist. I gave him three strong doses of tartar emetic; and he soon came back to thank me, saying that the medicine was most admirable, for the men had hardly swallowed it, when they almost vomited their hearts and livers, and everything else in their bodies.

From a distrust in faith, some Muslims even shut themselves up during the prevalence of plague; but this practice is generally condemned. A Syrian friend of mine, who did so, nearly had his door broken by his neighbours. Another of my friends, one of the most distinguished of the ‘Ulamâ, confessed to me his conviction of the lawfulness of quarantine, and argued well in favour of it; but said that he dared not openly avow such an opinion. “The Apostle of God,” said he, “God bless and save him! hath commanded that we should not enter a city where there is pestilence, nor go out from it. Why did he say, ‘Enter it not?’—because by so doing, we should expose ourselves to the disease. Why did he say, ‘Go not out from it?’—because, by so doing, we should carry the disease to others. The Prophet was tenderly considerate of our welfare: but the present Muslims in general are like bulls [brute beasts]; and they hold the meaning of this command to be, Go not into a city where there is pestilence, because this would be rashness; and go not out from it, because this would be distrusting God's power to save you from it."

Many of the vulgar and ignorant among modern Muslims, believe that the unchangeable destinies of every man are written upon his head, in what are termed the sutures of the skull.

NOTE 6. The paragraph thus commencing, and the verses comprised in it, are translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights.

NOTE 7. It is a common custom for a Muslim, on a military expedition, or during a long journey, especially in the desert, to carry his grave-linen with him; for he is extremely careful that he may be buried according to the law. It seems to be implied in our tale, that the merchant hoped that the Jinnee, or some passing traveller, would wash, shroud, and bury him.

NOTE 8. It is thus that the Arab women generally do on the occasion of a funeral.

NOTE 9.—On the title of Sheykh. "Sheykh" is an appellation which literally signifies "an elder," or "an aged person," and in this sense it is here used; but it is also commonly employed as synonymous with our appellation of "Mister;" and particularly applied to a learned man, or a reputed saint. In every case, it is a title of respect, and never given to any but a Muslim.

NOTE 10. "Jánn" is here used as synonymous with "Jinn."

NOTE 11. A cousin (the daughter of a paternal uncle) is often chosen as a wife, on account of the tie of blood, which is likely to attach her more strongly to her husband; or on account of an affection conceived in early years. The various customs relating to marriage, I shall describe on a future occasion.

NOTE 12. A bride is called young, by the Arabs, when she is about twelve years of age. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, the wife in this tale is said to have been of this age when she was first married.

NOTE 13.—On Slaves. A slave, among Muslims, is either a person taken captive in war, or carried off by force, and being at the time of capture an infidel; or the offspring of a female slave by another slave, or by any man who is not her owner, or by her owner, if he does not acknowledge himself to be the father: but the offspring of a male slave by a free woman is free. A person who embraces the Mohammedan faith after having been made a slave, does not by this act become free, unless he flees from a foreign infidel master to a Muslim country, and there becomes a Mohammedan. A person cannot have as a slave one whom he acknowledges to be within the prohibited degrees of marriage. —The slaves of the Arabs are mostly from Abyssinia and the Negro countries: a few, mostly in the houses of wealthy individuals, are from Georgia and Circassia.

Slaves have no civil liberty; but are entirely under the authority of their owners, whatever may be the religion, sex, or age, of the latter; and can possess no property, unless by the owner's permission. The owner is entire master, while he pleases, of the person and goods of his slave; and of the offspring of his female slave, which, if begotten by him or presumed to be so, he may recognize as his own legitimate child, or not: the child, if recognized by him, enjoys the same privileges as the offspring of a free wife; and if not recognized by him, is his slave. The master may even kill his own slave with impunity for any offence; and he incurs but a slight punishment (as imprisonment for a period at the discretion of the judge) if he kills him wantonly. He may give away or sell his slaves, excepting in some cases which will be mentioned; and may marry them to whom he will, but not separate them when married. A slave, however, according to most of the doctors, cannot have more than two wives at the same time. Unemancipated slaves, at the death of their master, become the property of his heirs; and when an emancipated slave dies, leaving no male descendants or collateral relations, the former master is the heir; or, if he be dead, his heirs inherit the slave's property. As a slave enjoys less advantages than a free person, the law, in some cases, ordains that his punishment for an offence shall be half of that to which the free is liable for the same offence, or even less than half: if it be a fine, or pecuniary compensation, it must be paid by the owner, to the amount, if necessary, of the value of the slave, or the slave must be given in compensation.

The owner, but not the part-owner, may cohabit with any of his female slaves who is a Mohammadan, a Christian, or a Jewess, if he has not married her to another man; but not with two or more who are sisters, or who are related to each other in any of the degrees which would prevent their both being his wives at the same time if they were free: after having so lived with one, he must entirely relinquish such intercourse with her before he can do the same with another who is so related to her. He cannot have this intercourse with a pagan slave. A Christian or Jew may have slaves, but not enjoy the privilege above mentioned with one who is a Mohammadan. The master must wait a certain period (generally from a month to three months) after the acquisition of a female slave, before he can have such intercourse with her. If he find any fault in her within three days, he is usually allowed to return her.

When a man, from being the husband, becomes the master, of a slave, the marriage is dissolved, and he cannot continue to live with her but as her master, enjoying, however, all a master's privileges; unless he emancipates her; in which case he may again take her as his wife with her consent. In like manner, when a woman, from being the wife, becomes the possessor, of a slave, the marriage is dissolved, and cannot be renewed unless she emancipates him, and he consents to the re-union.

Complete and immediate emancipation is sometimes granted to a slave gratuitously, or for a future pecuniary compensation. It is conferred by means of a written document, or by a verbal declaration (expressed in the words, "Thou art free," or some similar phrase) in the presence of two witnesses, or by returning the certificate of sale obtained from the former owner. Future emancipation is sometimes covenanted to be granted on the fulfilment of certain conditions; and more frequently, to be conferred on the occasion of the owner's death. In the latter case, the owner cannot sell the slave to whom he has made this promise: and, as he cannot alienate by will more than one-third of the whole property that he leaves, the law ordains that, if the value of the said slave exceeds that portion, the slave must obtain and pay the additional sum. When a female slave has borne a child to her master, and he acknowledges the child to be his own, he cannot sell this slave, and she becomes free on his death.

Abyssinian and white female slaves are kept by many men of the middle and higher classes, and often instead of wives, as requiring less expense, and being more subservient; but they are generally indulged with the same luxuries as free ladies; their vanity is gratified by costly dresses and ornaments, and they rank high above free servants; as do also the male slaves. Those called Abyssinians appear to be a mixed race between negroes and whites; and are from the territories of the Gallas. They are mostly kidnapped and sold by their own countrymen. The negro female slaves, as few of them have considerable personal attractions (which is not the case with the Abyssinians, many of whom are very beautiful), are usually employed only in cooking, and other menial offices. The female slaves of the higher classes are often instructed in plain needlework and embroidery, and sometimes in music and dancing. Formerly, many of them possessed sufficient literary accomplishments to quote largely from esteemed poems, or even to compose extemporary verses, which they would often accompany with the lute. The condition of many concubine slaves is happy; and that of many, quite the contrary. These, and all other slaves of either sex, are generally treated with kindness; but at first they are usually importuned, and not unfrequently used with much harshness, to induce them to embrace the Mohammadan faith; which almost all of them do. Their services are commonly light: the usual office of the male white slave, who is called "memlook," is that of a page, or a military guard. Eunuchs are employed as guardians of the women; but only in the houses of men of high rank, or of great wealth: on account of the important and confidential office which they fill, they are generally treated in public with especial consideration. I used to remark, in Cairo, that few persons saluted me with a more dignified and consequential air than these pitiable but self-conceited beings. Most of them are Abyssinians or Negroes. Indeed, the slaves in general take too much advantage of the countenance of their masters, especially when they belong to men in power. The master is bound to afford his slaves proper food and clothing, or to let them work for their own support, or to sell, give away, or liberate them. It is, however, considered disgraceful for him to sell a slave who has been long in his possession; and it seldom happens that a master emancipates a female slave, without marrying her to some man able to support her, or otherwise providing for her.

The Prophet strongly enjoined the duty of kindness to slaves. "Feed your mem-looks," said he, "with food of that which ye eat, and clothe them with such clothing as ye wear; and command them not to do that which they are unable."—These precepts are generally attended to, either entirely or in a great degree. Some other sayings of the Prophet on this subject well deserve to be mentioned; as the following:—"He who beats his slave without fault, or slaps him on the face, his atonement for this is freeing him."—"A man who behaves ill to his slave will not enter into paradise."—"Whoever is the cause of separation between mother and child, by selling or giving, God will separate him from his friends on the day of resurrection."—"When a slave wishes well to his master, and worships God well, for him are double rewards."—It is related of 'Othmán, "that he twisted the ear of a memlook belonging to him, on account of disobedience, and afterwards, repenting of it, ordered him to twist his ear in like manner: but he would not. 'Othmán urged him, and the memlook advanced, and began to wring it by little and little. He said to him, 'Wring it hard; for I cannot endure the punishment of the day of judgment [on account of this act].' The memlook answered, 'O my master, the day that thou fearest, I also fear.'"—"It is related also of Zeyn-el-'Ábideen, that he had a memlook who seized a sheep, and broke its leg; and he said to him, 'Why didst thou this?' He answered, 'To provoke thee to anger.' 'And I,' said he, 'will provoke to anger him who taught thee; and he is Ibrees: go, and be free, for the sake of God.'"—Many similar anecdotes might be added; but the general assertions of travellers in the East are more satisfactory evidence in favour of the humane conduct of most Muslims to their slaves.

It sometimes happens, though rarely, that free girls are sold as slaves. A remarkable instance is related in the "Mir-át ez-Zemán."—Fátiméh, surnamed Ghareeb, a slave of the Khaleefeh El-Moatasim, the son of Hároon, was a poetess, accomplished in singing and calligraphy, and extremely beautiful. Her mother was an orphan; and Jaafar, the famous Wezeer of Hároon Er-Rasheed, took her as his wife; but his father, Yahyà, reproached him for marrying a woman whose father and mother were unknown, and he therefore removed her from his own residence to a neighbouring house, where he frequently visited her; and she bore him a daughter, the above-mentioned Ghareeb, and died. Jaafar committed her infant to the care of a Christian woman, to nurse; and, on the overthrow of his family, this woman sold her young charge as a slave. El-Emeen, the successor of Er-Rasheed, bought her of a man named Sumbul, but never paid her price; and when he was killed, she returned to her former master; but on the arrival of El-Ma-moon at Baghdád, she was described to him, and he compelled Sumbul to sell her to him. This Sumbul loved her so passionately, that he died of grief at her loss. On the death of El-Ma-moon, his successor, El-Moatasim, bought her for a hundred thousand dirhems, and emancipated her. The historian adds, that she composed several well-known airs and verses.

NOTE 14. An Arab who is married to his cousin generally calls her by this appellation rather than that of wife, as the tie of blood is, to him, in every respect, stronger than that of matrimony.

NOTE 15.—On Magic. The Arabs and other Mohammadans enjoy a remarkable advantage over us in the composition of works of fiction: in the invention of incidents which we should regard as absurd in the extreme, they cannot be accused by their countrymen of exceeding the bounds of probability. A case similar to that here described was related to me as a fact, in Cairo. A person in that city, I was told, was suddenly surprised by the disappearance of his brother, and by finding, in his place, an ass: but this animal increased his astonishment, and that of every person who beheld him, by manifesting a sagacity singularly opposed to the proverbial dulness of the generality of his species. Yet, strange as it may seem, it was not imagined that this brute was the lost man in a transformed state, till, one day, an old woman, seeing him, quickly covered her face, and declared the fact. She discovered this by her knowledge of magic; and, by her skill in this art, she agreed to restore the enchanted person to his proper shape. Having collected a number of herbs, she boiled them in a large vessel; and when the decoction had cooled, she took the vessel, and, muttering a certain spell, threw its contents over the animal, endeavouring to do so in such a manner that every part of it should be wetted. Every part of it was wetted, excepting one hind-foot; and, accordingly, it was restored to the original human form, with the exception of one foot, which remained like that of an ass.

An implicit belief in magic is entertained by almost all Muslims; and he, among them, who denies its truth, they regard as a freethinker, or an infidel. Some are of opinion that it ceased on the mission of Mohammad; but these are comparatively few. Many of the most learned Muslims, to the present age, have deeply studied it; and a much greater number of persons of inferior education (particularly school-masters) have, more or less, devoted their time and talents to the pursuit of this knowledge. Recourse is had to it for the discovery of hidden treasures, for alchymical purposes, for the acquisition of the knowledge of futurity, to procure offspring, to obtain the affection of a beloved object, to effect cures, to guard against the influence of the evil eye, to afflict or kill an enemy or a rival, and to attain various other objects of desire.

There are two descriptions of magic; one is spiritual, and regarded by all but freethinkers as true; the other, natural, and denounced by the more religious and enlightened as deceptive.

I. Spiritual magic, which is termed "er-Roohánee" (vulgo "Rowhánée"), chiefly depends upon the virtues of certain names of God, and passages from the Kur-án, and the agency of Angels and Jinn, or Genii. It is of two kinds: High and Low ("Ilwee" and "Suflee"), or Divine and Satanic ("Rahmánée," i. e. relating to "the Compassionate" [who is God], and "Sheytánée").

1. Divine magic is regarded as a sublime science, and is studied only by good men, and practised only for good purposes. Perfection in this branch of magic consists in the knowledge of "the most great name" of God ("el-Ism el Aazam"); but this knowledge is imparted to none but the peculiar favourites of Heaven. By virtue of this name, which was engraved on his sealing, Suleymán (or Solomon) subjected to his dominion the Jinn and the birds and the winds, as mentioned in a former note. By pronouncing it, his minister Ásaf, also, transported, in an instant, to the presence of his sovereign, in Jerusalem, the throne of the Queen of Sheba. But this was a small miracle to effect by such means; for, by uttering this name, a man may even raise the dead. Other names of the Deity, commonly known, are believed to have particular efficacies when uttered or written; as also are the names of the Prophet; and Angels and good Jinn are said to be rendered subservient to the purposes of divine magic by means of certain invocations. Of such names and invocations, together with words unintelligible to the uninitiated in this science, passages from the Kur-án, mysterious combinations of numbers, and peculiar diagrams and figures, are chiefly composed written charms employed for good purposes. Enchantment, when used for benevolent purposes, is regarded by the vulgar as a branch of lawful or divine magic; but not so by the learned; and the same remark applies to the science of divination.

2. Satanic magic, as its name implies, is a science depending on the agency of the Devil and the inferior evil Jinn, whose services are obtained by means similar to those which propitiate, or render subservient, the good Jinn. It is condemned by the Prophet and all good Muslims, and only practised for bad purposes.—Enchantment, which is termed "es-Sehr," is almost universally acknowledged to be a branch of satanic magic; but some few persons assert (agreeably with several tales in this work), that it may be, and by some has been, studied with good intentions, and practised by the aid of good Jinn; consequently, that there is such a science as good enchantment, which is to be regarded as a branch of divine or lawful magic. The metamorphoses are said to be generally effected by means of spells, or invocations to Jinn, accompanied by the sprinkling of water or dust, &c., on the object to be transformed.

Persons are said to be enchanted in various ways: some, paralyzed, or even deprived of life; others, affected with irresistible passion for certain objects; others, again, rendered demoniacs; and some, transformed into brutes, birds, &c. The evil eye is believed to enchant in a very powerful and distressing manner. This was acknowledged even by the Prophet. Diseases and death are often attributed to its influence. Amulets, which are mostly written charms, of the kind above described, are worn by many Muslims with the view of counteracting, or preserving from, enchantment; and for the same purpose, many ridiculous ceremonies are practised.—Divination, which is termed "el-Kiháneh," is pronounced, on the highest authority, to be a branch of satanic magic; though not believed to be so by all Muslims. According to an assertion of the Prophet, what a fortune-teller says may sometimes be true; because one of the Jinn steals away the truth, and carries it to the magician's ear: for the Angels come down to the region next the earth (the lowest heaven), and mention the works that have been pre-ordained in heaven; and the Devils (or evil Jinn) listen to what the Angels say, and hear the orders predestined in heaven, and carry them to the fortune-tellers. It is on such occasions that shooting-stars are hurled at the Devils. It is said that "the diviner obtains the services of the Sheytán by magic arts, and by names [invoked], and by the burning of perfumes, and he informs him of secret things: for the Devils, before the mission of the Apostle of God," it is added, "used to ascend to heaven, and hear words by stealth." That the evil Jinn are believed still to ascend sufficiently near to the lowest heaven to hear the conversation of the Angels, and so to assist magicians, appears from the former quotation, and is asserted by all Muslims. The discovery of hidden treasures, before alluded to, is one of the objects for which divination is most studied.—The mode of divination called "Darb el-Mendel" is by some supposed to be effected by the aid of evil Jinn; but the more enlightened of the Muslims regard it as a branch of natural magic. Some curious performances of this kind, by means of a fluid mirror of ink, have been described in my "Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians," and in No. 117 of the "Quarterly Review."

There are certain modes of divination which cannot properly be classed under the head of spiritual magic, but require a place between the account of this science and that of natural magic.—The most important of these branches of Kiháneh is Astrol-ogy, which is called "Ilm en-Nujoom." This is studied by many Muslims in the present day; and its professors are often employed by the Arabs to determine a fortunate period for laying the foundation of a building, commencing a journey, &c.; but more frequently by the Persians and Turks. The Prophet pronounced astrology to be a branch of magic.—Another branch of Kiháneh is Geomancy, called "Darb er-Raml;" a mode of divination from certain marks made on sand (whence its appellation), or on paper; and said to be chiefly founded on astrology.—The science called "ez-Zijr" or "el-'Eyáfah," is a third branch of Kiháneh; being divination or auguration chiefly from the motions and positions, or postures, of birds, or of gazelles and other beasts of the chase. Thus, what was termed a "Sáneh," that is, such an animal standing or passing with its right side towards the spectator, was esteemed among the Arabs as of good omen; and a "Báreh," or an animal of this kind with its left side towards the spectator, was held as inauspicious.—"El-Kiyáfah," under which term are included Chiromancy and its kindred sciences, is a fourth branch of Kiháneh.—"Et-Tefá-ul," or the taking an omen, particularly a good one, from a name or words accidentally heard or seen, or chosen from a book, belongs to the same science. The taking a "fál," or omen, from the Kur-án is generally held to be lawful.—Various trifling events are considered as ominous. For instance, a Sultán quitting his palace with his troops, a standard happened to strike a "thureiyà" (a cluster of lamps, so called from resembling the Pleiades), and broke them: he drew from this an evil omen, and would have relinquished the expedition; but one of his chief officers said to him, "O our lord, thy standards have reached the Pleiades;"—and, being relieved by this remark, he proceeded, and returned victorious.—The interpretation of dreams "Taabeer el-Menámát," must also be classed among the branches of this science. According to the Prophet, it is the only branch of divination worthy of dependence. "Good dreams," said he, "are one of the parts of prophecy," and "nothing else of prophecy remains." "Good dreams are from God; and false dreams, from the Devil." "When any one of you has a bad dream, spit three times over your left shoulder, and seek protection with God from the Devil thrice; and turn from the side on which the dream was, to the other." This rule is observed by many Muslims. Dreams are generally so fully relied upon by them as to be sometimes the means of deciding contested points in history and science. The sight, in a dream, of anything green or white, or of water, is considered auspicious; anything black or red, or fire, inauspicious.—The distinction of fortunate and unfortunate days should also here be mentioned. Thursday and Friday, especially the latter, are considered fortunate; Monday and Wednesday, doubtful; Sunday, Tuesday, and Saturday, especially the last, unfortunate. It is said that there are seven evil days in every [lunar] month; namely, the third, on which Kábeel (or Cain) killed Hábeel (Abel); the fifth, on which God cast down Adam from paradise, and afflicted the people of Yoonus (Jonas), and on which Yoosuf (or Joseph) was cast into the well; the thirteenth, on which God took away the wealth of Eiyooab (or Job), and afflicted him, and took away the kingdom from Suleymán (or Solomon), and on which the Jews killed the prophets; the sixteenth, on which God exterminated and buried the people of Loot (or Lot), and transformed three hundred Christians into swine, and Jews into apes, and on which the Jews sawed asunder Zekereeyà (or Zachariah); the twenty-first, on which Pharaoh was born, and on which he was drowned, and on which his nation was afflicted with the plagues; the twenty-fourth, on which Numrood (or Nimrod) killed seventy women, and cast El-Khaleel (or Abraham) into the fire, and on which was slaughtered the camel of Sáleh; and the twenty-fifth on which the suffocating wind was sent upon the people of Hood.

II. Natural magic, which is called "es-Seemiyà," is regarded by most persons of the more enlightened classes of Muslims as altogether a deceptive art, no more worthy of respect than legerdemain; but it seems to be nearly allied to enchantment; for it is said to effect, in appearance, the most wonderful transformations, and to cause the most extraordinary visions; affecting the senses and imagination in a manner similar to opium. This and other drugs are supposed, by some persons, to be the chief means by which such illusions are caused; and perfumes, which are generally burnt in these performances, may operate in a similar manner. As such things are employed in performances of the kind called "Darb el-Mendel," before mentioned, these feats are regarded by many as effected by natural magic, notwithstanding what has been said above respecting the services of evil Jinn being procured by means of perfumes.—Alchymy ("el-Keemiyà") is a branch of natural magic. It is studied by many Muslims of the present day, and by some of considerable talents and attainments.

The most celebrated of the magicians who have gained notoriety in Egypt during the course of the last hundred years, was the sheykh Ahmad Sádóomeh, who flourished somewhat more than sixty years ago—I write in 1837. Several persons of Cairo, men of intelligence and of good education, have related to me various most marvellous stories of his performances, on the authority of eye-witnesses whom they considered veracious; but a more credible account of this magician I have found in the work of an excellent historian of Modern Egypt. This author mentions the sheykh Sádóomeh as an aged man, of venerable appearance, who derived his origin from the town of Semennood, in the Delta, and who acquired a very great and extensive celebrity for his attainments in spiritual and natural magic, and for holding converse, face to face, with Jinn, and causing them to appear to other persons, even to the blind, as men acquainted with him informed the historian. His contemporaries, says this writer, entertained various opinions respecting him; but, among them, a famous grammarian and general scholar, the sheykh Hasan El-Kafráwee, regarded him as a first-rate saint, who performed evident miracles; this learned man pronouncing as such the effects of "his legerdemain and natural magic." His fame he describes as having increased until he was induced to try an unlucky experiment. A Memlook chief, Yoosuf Bey, saw some magic characters written on the body of one of his female slaves, and, exasperated by jealousy, commanded her, with a threat of instant death, to tell him who had done this. She confessed that a woman had taken her to the sheykh Sádóomeh, and that he had written this charm to attract to her the Bey's love. Upon hearing this, he instantly sent some attendants to seize the magician, and to put him to death, and throw him into the Nile; which was done. But the manner in which the seizure was made, as related to me by one of my friends, deserves to be mentioned. Several persons, one after another, endeavoured to lay hold upon him; but every arm that was stretched forth for this purpose was instantly paralyzed, through a spell muttered by the magician; until a man behind him thrust a gag into his mouth, and so stopped his enchantments.

Of the stories related to me of Sádóomeh's miracles, the following will serve as a specimen:—In order to give one of his friends a treat, he took him to the distance of about half an hour's walk into the desert on the north of Cairo; here they both sat down, upon the pebbly and sandy plain, and, the magician, having uttered a spell, they suddenly found themselves in the midst of a garden, like one of the gardens of paradise, abounding with flowers and fruit-trees of every kind, springing up from a soil clothed with verdure brilliant as the emerald, and irrigated by numerous streamlets of the clearest water. A repast of the most delicious viands and fruits and wines was spread before them by invisible hands; and they both ate to satiety, taking copious draughts of the various wines. At length, the magician's guest sank into a deep sleep; and when he awoke, he found himself again in the pebbly and sandy plain, with Sádóomeh still by his side.—The reader will probably attribute this vision to a dose of opium or some similar drug; and such I suppose to have been the means employed; for I cannot doubt the integrity of the narrator, though he would not admit such an explanation; regarding the whole as an affair of magic, effected by the operation of Jinn, like similar relations in the present work.

It may be remarked that most of the enchantments described in this work are said to be performed by women; and reputed witches appear to have been much more numerous in all countries than wizards. This fact the Muslims readily explain by a saying of their Prophet:—That women are deficient in sense and religion:—whence they argue that they are more inclined than men to practise what is unlawful.

NOTE 16.—On the Two Grand Festivals. The Muslims observe two grand 'Eeds, or Festivals, in every year. The first of these immediately follows Ramadán, the month of abstinence, and lasts three days: it is called the Minor Festival. The other, which is called the Great Festival, commences on the tenth of Zu-l-Hejjeh, the day when the pilgrims, halting on their return from Mount 'Arafát to Mekkeh, in the Valley of Minè (vulgarly called Munà), perform their sacrifice: the observance of this festival also continues three days, or four.

Early in the first morning, on each of these festivals, the Muslim is required to perform a lustration of his whole person, as on the mornings of Friday; and on the first morning of the Minor Festival, he should break his fast with a few dates or some other light food; but on the Great Festival, he abstains from food until he has acquitted himself of the religious duties now to be mentioned. Soon after sunrise, on the first day of each festival, the men, dressed in new or in their best clothes, repair to the mosque, or to a particular place appointed for the performance of the prayers of the 'Eed. On going thither, they should repeat, frequently, "God is most great!"—this, on the Minor Festival, they should do inaudibly: on the other, aloud. The congregation, having assembled, repeat the prayers of two rek'ahs; after which the Khateeb recites a khutbeh; i. e. an exhortation and a prayer. On each of these festivals, in the mosque, or place of prayer, and in the street, and at each other's houses, friends congratulate and embrace one another; generally paying visits for this purpose; and the great receive visits from their dependants. The young, on these occasions, kiss the right hand of the aged; and servants or dependants do the same to their masters or superiors, unless the latter be of high rank, in which case they kiss the end of the hanging sleeve, or the skirt of the outer garment. Most of the shops are closed excepting those at which eatables and sweet drink are sold; but the streets are filled with people in their holiday clothes.

On the Minor Festival, which, as it terminates an arduous fast, is celebrated with more rejoicing than the other, servants and other dependants receive presents of new articles of clothing from their masters or patrons; and the servant receives presents of small sums of money from his master's friends, whom, if they do not visit his master, he goes to congratulate; as well as from any former master, to whom he often takes a plateful of kahks. These are sweet cakes, or biscuits, of an annular form, composed of flour and butter, with a little 'ajameeyeh (which is a thick paste consisting of butter, honey, a little flour, and some spices) inside. They are also often sent as presents on this occasion by other people. Another custom required of the faithful on this festival is the giving of alms.

On the Great Festival, after the prayers of the congregation, every one who can afford it performs, with his own hand, or by that of a deputy, a sacrifice of a ram, he-goat, cow or buffalo, or she-camel; part of the meat of which he eats, and part he gives to the poor, or to his friends or dependants. The ram or goat should be at least one year old; the cow or buffalo, two years; and the camel, five years; and the victim should not have any considerable mutilation or infirmity. A cow or buffalo, or a camel, is a sufficient sacrifice for seven persons. The clothes which were put on new at the former festival are generally worn on this occasion; and the presents which are given to servants and others are usually somewhat less.

On each of the two festivals it is also customary, especially with the women, to visit the tombs of relations. The party generally take with them a palm-branch, and place it, broken in several pieces, or merely its leaves, upon the tomb or monument; or some, instead of this, place sweet basil or other flowers. They also usually provide themselves with sweet cakes, bread, dates, or some other kind of food, to distribute to the poor. But their first duty, on arriving at the tomb, is to recite the Fâtehah (the opening Chapter of the Kur-án) or to employ a person to recite previously a longer chapter; generally the thirty-sixth (or Soorat Yâ-Seen); or even the whole of the book: or sometimes the visitors recite the Fâtehah, and, after having hired a person to perform a longer recitation, go away before he commences. The women often stay all the days of the festival in the cemeteries, either in tents, or in houses of their own, erected there for their reception on these and other occasions. The tent of each party surrounds the tomb which is the object of their visit. In the outskirts of the cemeteries, swings and whirligigs are erected; and story-tellers, dancers, and jugglers, amuse the populace.

NOTE 17.—On the Mode of Slaughtering of Animals for Food. In the old translation, the sheykh is described as preparing to slaughter the cow with a mallet. This is a mistake of a serious nature; as the flesh of the victim, if so killed, would be legally unclean. The Muslims are required to slaughter animals for food in a particular manner. Sheep, goats, cows or bulls, and buffaloes, must be killed by cutting the throat, at the part next the head, or any other part; dividing the windpipe, gullet, and carotid arteries. The camel is to be slaughtered by stabbing the throat at the part next the breast. Poultry, also, must be killed by cutting the throat; and so must every tame animal of which the flesh is lawful food. The slaughterer, in every case, must be a Muslim, a Christian, or a Jew; of either sex. On commencing the operation, he must say, "In the name of God! God is most great!"—or at least, "In the name of God!"—but not add, "the Compassionate, the Merciful"—for an obvious reason. Birds or beasts of the chase may be killed by an arrow, a dog, a hawk, &c.; but the name of God must be uttered at the time of discharging the arrow, or slipping the dog, &c. When the beast or bird is not killed at once by the arrow, &c., it must be slaughtered as soon as possible, in the same manner as sheep and poultry: the law, as well as humanity, requires this.

NOTE 18.—On the Influence of Eloquence and Tales upon the Arabs. The main incident upon which this work is founded, the triumph of the fascination of the tongue over a cruel and unjust determination which nothing else could annul, might be regarded, by persons unacquainted with the character and literature of the Arabs, as a contrivance too improbable in its nature; but such is not the case. Perhaps there are no other people in the world who are such enthusiastic admirers of literature, and so excited by romantic tales, as those above named. Eloquence, with them, is lawful magic: it exercises over their minds an irresistible influence. "I swear by God," said their Prophet, "verily abuse of infidels in verse is worse to them than arrows." This, of course, alludes to Arab unbelievers.

In the purest, or Heroic Age of Arabic literature, which was anterior to the triumph of the Mohammadan religion, the conquest which the love of eloquence could achieve over the sanguinary and vindictive feelings of the Arabs was most remarkably exemplified in the annual twenty days' fair of 'Okáz, or 'Okádh. Respecting this fair, I shall here insert a few particulars borrowed from an author who is at the present devoting talents of the very highest order to the study and illustration of the history and literature of the early Arabs, and to whose conversation and writings I must acknowledge myself indebted for most valuable information, which will often be of great utility to me in this undertaking, as well as in every branch of my Arabic studies.

The fair of 'Okáz "was not only a great mart opened annually to all the tribes of Arabia; but it was also a literary congress, or rather a general concourse of virtues, of glory and of poetry, whither the hero-poets resorted to celebrate their exploits in rhyming verse, and peacefully to contend for every kind of honour. This fair was held in the district of Mekkeh, between Et-Táif and Nakhleh, and was opened at the new moon of Zu-l-Kaadeh; that is to say, at the commencement of a period of three sacred months, during which all war was suspended, and homicide interdicted. . . . How is it possible to conceive that men whose wounds were always bleeding, who had always acts of vengeance to execute, vengeance to dread, could at a certain epoch impose silence upon their animosities, so as tranquilly to sit by a mortal enemy? How could the brave who required the blood of a father, a brother, or a son, according to the phraseology of the desert and of the Bible, who long, perhaps, had pursued in vain the murderer,—meet him, accost him peacefully at 'Okáz, and only assault with cadences and rhymes him whose presence alone seemed to accuse him of impotence or cowardice,—him whom he was bound to slay, under pain of infamy, after the expiration of the truce? In fine, how could he hear a panegyric celebrating a glory acquired at his own expense, and sustain the fire of a thousand looks, and yet appear unmoved? Had the Arabs no longer any blood in their veins during the continuance of the fair?—These questions, so embarrassing, ... were determined [to a great degree], during the age of Arab paganism, in a manner the most simple and most refined. — At the fair of 'Okáz, the heroes were masked [or veiled]. — In the recitations and improvisations, the voice of the orator was aided by that of a rhapsodist or crier, who was stationed near him, and repeated his words. There is a similar office in the public prayers: it is that of the muballigh (transmitter), who is employed to repeat in a loud voice what is said in a lower tone by the Imám. These two facts have been revealed to me by the same manuscript which I am translating, and upon which I am commenting. The use of the mask [or veil] might, however, be either adopted or dispensed with, ad libitum; as is proved by the narratives of a great number of quarrels begun and ended at 'Okáz. . . . It was in this congress of the Arab poets (and almost every warrior was a poet at the age which I am considering) that the dialects of Arabia became fused into a magic language, the language of the Hejáz, which Mohammad made use of to subvert the world; for the triumph of Mohammad is nothing else than the triumph of speech." — The Kur-án is regarded by the Arabs as an everlasting miracle, surpassing all others, appealing to the understanding of every generation by its inimitable eloquence. A stronger proof of the power of language over their minds could hardly be adduced; unless it be their being capable of receiving as a credible fact the tradition that both genii and men were attracted by the eloquent reading of David, when he recited the Psalms; that the wild beasts and the birds were alike fascinated; and that sometimes they were borne out from his assembly as many as four hundred corpses of men who died from the excessive delight with which he thus inspired them! It may be added that the recitation, or chanting, of the Kur-án is a favourite means of amusing the guests at modern private festivities.

In what may be termed the Middle Age of Arabic literature, commencing from the triumph of the Mohammadan religion, and extending to the foundation of the Empire of Baghdád, the power of eloquence over the educated classes of the Arabs probably increased in proportion as it became less familiar to them: for, early in this age, they began to simplify their spoken language in consequence of their intercourse with strangers, who could not generally acquire the difficult, old dialect of their conquerors: this, therefore, then began to be confined to literary compositions. That such a change took place at this period appears from several anecdotes interspersed in Arabic works. The Khaleefeh El-Weleed (who reigned near the close of the first century of the Flight), the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, spoke so corrupt a dialect that he often could not make himself understood by the Arabs of the desert. A ridiculous instance of the mistakes occasioned by his use of the simplified language which is now current is related by Abu-l-Fidá. The same author adds, that the father and predecessor of this prince was a man of eloquence, and that he was grieved by the corrupt speech of his son, which he considered as a defect that incapacitated him to be a future ruler of the Arabs, as they were still great admirers of purity of speech, though so large a proportion of them spoke a corrupt dialect; wherefore, he sent him to a house to be instructed by a grammarian; but after the youth had remained there a long time, he returned to his father more ignorant than before. Vulgarisms, however, would sometimes escape from the mouth of 'Abd-El-Melik himself; yet, so sensible was he to eloquence, that, when a learned man, with whom he was conversing, elegantly informed him of an error of this kind, he ordered his mouth to be filled with jewels. "These," said his courteous admonisher, "are things to be treasured up; not to be expended." — and for this delicate hint, he was further rewarded with thirty thousand pieces of silver, and several costly articles of apparel. — It may be aptly added, that this Khaleefeh was, in the beginning of his reign, an unjust monarch; and as he thus bore some slight resemblance to our Shahriyár, so was he reclaimed to a sense of his duty by means somewhat similar. Being, one night, unable to sleep, he called for a person to tell him a story for his amusement. "O Prince of the Faithful," said the man thus bidden, "there was an owl in El-Mósil, and an owl in El-Basrah; and the owl of El-Mósil demanded in marriage, for her son, the daughter of the owl of El-Basrah: but the owl of El-Basrah said, 'I will not, unless thou give me, as her dowry, a hundred desolate farms.' 'That I cannot do,' said the owl of El-Mósil, 'at present; but if our sovereign (may God, whose name be exalted, preserve him!) live one year, I will give thee what thou desirest.'" — This simple fable sufficed to rouse the prince from his apathy, and he thenceforward applied himself to fulfil the duties of his station.

In the most flourishing age of Arabic poetry and general literature and science, commencing from the foundation of the Empire of Baghdád, and extending to the conquest of Egypt by the 'Osmánlee Turks, the influence of eloquent and entertaining language upon the character of the Arab sovereigns was particularly exemplified. A few illustrative anecdotes may here be inserted.

It is related by El-Asma'ee, that Hároon Er-Rasheed, at a grand fête which he was giving, ordered the poet Abu-l-'Atábiyeh to depict, in verse, the voluptuous enjoyments of his sovereign. The poet began thus:

"Live long in safe enjoyment of thy desires, under the shadow of lofty palaces!"

"Well said!" exclaimed Er-Rasheed:
"and what next?"

"May thy wishes be abundantly fulfilled, whether at eventide or in the morning!"

"Well!" again said the Khaleefeh:
"then what next?"

"But when the rattling breath struggles in the dark cavity of the chest,
Then shalt thou know surely, that thou hast been only in the midst of illusions."

— Er-Rasheed wept; and Fadl, the son of Yahyà, said, "The Prince of the Faithful sent for thee to divert him, and thou hast plunged him into grief." "Suffer him," said the prince; "for he hath beheld us in blindness, and it displeased him to increase it."

The family of the Barmekes (one of the most brilliant ornaments of which was the Wezeer Jaafar, who has been rendered agreeably familiar to us by the many scenes in which he is introduced in the present work) earned a noble and enduring reputation by their attachment to literature, and the magnificent rewards they conferred on learned men. It was peculiarly hard, therefore, that literature contributed to their melancholy overthrow. Poets were employed by their enemies to compose songs artfully pointed against them, to be sung before the prince to whom they owed their power. Of one of these songs, the following lines formed a part:—

"Would that Hind had fulfilled the promises she made us, and healed the disease under which we suffer!
That she had once, at least, acted for herself!
for imbecile, indeed, is he who doth not so."

"Yea! By Allah! Imbecile!" exclaimed the Khaleefeh, on hearing these verses: his jealousy was roused; and his vengeance soon after fell heavily upon his former favourites.

One of the Khaleefehs having invited the poets of his day to his palace, a Bedawee, carrying a water-jar to fill at the river, followed them, and entered with them. The Khaleefeh, seeing this poor man with the jar on his shoulder, asked him what brought him thither. He returned for answer these words:—

"Seeing that this company had girded on the saddles
To repair to thy overflowing river, I came with my jar."

The Khaleefeh, delighted with his answer, gave orders to fill his jar with gold.

In the present declining age of Arabian learning (which may be said to have commenced about the period of the conquest of Egypt by the 'Osmánlees), literary recreations still exert a magic influence upon the Arabs. Compositions of a similar nature to the tales of a Thousand and One Nights (though regarded by the learned as idle stories unworthy of being classed with their literature) enable numbers of professional story-tellers to attract crowds of delighted listeners to the coffee-shops of the East; and now that the original of the present work is printed, and to be purchased at a moderate price, it will probably soon, in a great measure, supersede the romances of Aboo-Zeyd, Ez-Záhir, and 'Antar. As a proof of the powerful fascinations with which the tales of a Thousand and One Nights affect the mind of a highly-enlightened Muslim, it may be mentioned that the latest native historian of Modern Egypt, the sheykh 'Abd-El-Rahmán El-Jabartee, so delighted in their perusal that he took the trouble of refining the language of a copy of them which he possessed, expunging or altering whatever was grossly offensive to morality without the somewhat redeeming quality of wit, and adding many facetiæ of his own, and of other literati. What has become of this copy, I have been unable, though acquainted with several of his friends, to discover.

NOTE 19. It is a common custom among the Muslims to give a present to a person who brings good tidings. The word (bis-hárah) which I render "a reward for bringing good news," literally signifies merely "good news;" but it is often used, as in this case, in the former sense.

NOTE 20. A Mohammadan woman is not allowed to show her face to any men excepting certain near relations and others whom the law prohibits her from marrying. Who these are will be mentioned in a future note, descriptive of the general laws and ceremonies of marriage. Respectable females consider it a great disgrace to be seen unveiled by any men but those above alluded to.

NOTE 21.—On the Deenár and Dirhem. The standards of gold and silver coin, among the Arabs, were the deenár and the dirhem: therefore, in this work, I call the former “a piece of gold,” and the latter “a piece of silver.” Their values have varied considerably at different periods; but in the present work, we shall sufficiently approximate to the truth, if we understand the average value of the former to be about ten shillings or half a guinea; and that of the latter, about sixpence.

NOTE 22.—Description of Shops. In Eastern cities, most of the great thoroughfare-streets, and many others, have a row of shops along each side, not communicating with the superstructures; which latter are divided into separate lodgings, inhabited by different families, and seldom by the persons who rent the shops beneath. These streets are called, in Arabic, “Sooks;” and are generally termed by us, “Bázárs.” A whole street of this description, or a portion of such a street, commonly contains only or chiefly shops appropriated to a particular trade; and is called the Sook of that trade. In general, the shop is a small recess or cell, about six or seven feet high, and between three and four feet wide, the floor of which is even with the top of a raised seat of stone or brick, called “mastabah,” between two and three feet high, and about the same in breadth; upon which the shopkeeper usually sits. The front of the shop is furnished with shutters; which, when closed at night, are secured by a wooden lock.

NOTE 23. Distrust in his governors and relations and acquaintances often induces an Arab to hide his money under the paved floor of a room, or in some other place, in his house.

NOTE 24. These words, “I give myself to thee,” uttered by a woman to a man, even without the presence of witnesses, if they cannot be easily procured, render her his lawful wife, if he replies that he accepts her, and gives her a dowry.

NOTE 25. I have substituted “Jinneeyeh” (agreeably with the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and because the context requires it) for “’Efreeteh,” which signifies a powerful and evil female genie.—The tale to which this note refers may be illustrated by the following anecdote, which was related to me by a Persian with whom I was acquainted in Cairo, named Abu-l-Kásim, a native of Geelán, then superintendent of the Báshá’s Printing-office at Boolák.

One of this person’s countrymen, whom he asserted to be a man of indubitable veracity, was sitting on the roof of a house which he had hired, overlooking the Ganges, and was passing the closing hour of the day, according to his usual custom, smoking his Persian pipe, and feasting his eyes by gazing at the beautiful forms of Indian maidens bathing in the river, when he beheld among them one so lovely that his heart was overpowered with desire to have her for his wife. At nightfall she came to him, and told him that she had observed his emotion, and would consent to become his wife; but on the condition that he should never admit another female to take or share her place, and that she should only be with him in the night-time. They took the marriage-vow to each other, with none for their witness but God; and great was his happiness, till, one evening, he saw again among a group of girls in the river, another who excited in him still more powerful emotions. To his surprise, this very form stood before him at the approach of night. He withstood the temptation, mindful of his marriage-vow: she used every allurement; but he was resolute. His fair visitor then told him that she was his wife; that she was a Jinneeyeh; and that she would always thenceforward visit him in the form of any female whom he might chance to prefer.

NOTE 26. This form of benediction is almost always added when the Prophet is mentioned in a book by any of his followers, and often also in conversation.

NOTE 27. Perhaps it is needless to explain this proverb by the words of the Bible—“Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord.” (Romans, xii. 19.) For the honour of the Muslims I must say that this maxim is often observed by them, excepting in cases to which the law of retaliation applies.

NOTE 28. The houses in Arabian countries generally have flat roofs, upon which, in the summer, some of the inhabitants often sleep: the interior, therefore, is as accessible from the roof as from the common entrance.

NOTE 29. I here steer a middle course between my usual standard copy—which gives the story of the third sheykh more fully than I have done—and the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, which omits it altogether, as does also the copy from which the old translation was made, perhaps on account of its uninteresting nature.

NOTES TO CHAPTER SECOND

NOTE 1. The sentiment expressed in this verse is one which is often heard from the mouth of a Muslim; but generally when his toil is ended, and its result seen; though not unfrequently as an excuse for indolence.

NOTE 2. The bottle is here described (by the term "kumkum") as of a kind commonly used for sprinkling rose-water, &c., having a spherical or wide body, with a long and narrow neck. I remember seeing a gilt brass bottle of this kind, of very beautiful workmanship, for which nearly as much as ten pieces of gold was demanded.

NOTE 3. The seal of Suleymán, or Solomon, has twice been mentioned in former notes; in No. 21 of the notes appended to the Introduction, and in No. 15 of those to the first chapter.

NOTE 4. It is necessary to remark, that this and many other descriptions in the present work are not designed to be understood in their literal sense. The reader will often be required to make some allowance for Oriental hyperbole, and to distinguish between expressions characterised by this figure, and such as are purely accordant with Eastern grandeur and magnificence, or with Muslim superstition.

NOTE 5. The end of the winnowing-fork bears a rude resemblance to a gigantic hand; having several long prongs of wood.

NOTE 6. Instead of "ibreck" (a ewer), in the Cairo edition, I read "abwák" (trumpets), as in other editions.

NOTE 7. This appellation has been mentioned in a former note, as signifying an evil Jinnee of the most powerful class.

NOTE 8. It is a rule observed in decent society, by the Arabs, to avoid, as much as possible, the mention of opprobrious epithets, lest any person present should imagine such empithets to be addressed insidiously to himself. For this reason, when any malediction or offensive language is repeated in a story, it is usual with them to designate the object of such language by this term, which signifies both remote or absent from the person or persons in whose presence the words are repeated, and remote from virtue or good. In the present instance, "remote" is an epithet substituted by Shahrazád for some other of a gross nature, from respect to the king to whom she is relating the story.

NOTE 9. I read "Sakhr el-Jinnee" for "Sakhr el-Jinn."—Sakhr was an evil Jinnee, and a terrible enemy of Solomon. His last act of treachery to that monarch, and his fate, are thus related by commentators on the Kur-án.—Solomon having, through negligence, suffered one of his women to practice idolatry under his roof, God saw fit to punish him. It was the custom of this King, on certain occasions, "to intrust his signet, on which his kingdom depended, with a concubine of his, named El-Emeeneh. One day, therefore, when she had the ring in her custody, a devil [or evil Jinnee], named Sakhr, came to her in the shape of Solomon, and received the ring from her; by virtue of which he became possessed of the kingdom, and sat on the throne in the shape which he had borrowed, making what alterations in the law he pleased. Solomon, in the meantime, being changed in his outward appearance, and known to none of his subjects, was obliged to wander about, and beg alms for his subsistence; till at length, after the space of forty days, which was the time the image had been worshipped in his house, the devil flew away, and threw the signet into the sea. The signet was immediately swallowed by a fish, which being taken and given to Solomon, he found the ring in its belly; and having by this means recovered the kingdom, he took Sakhr, and, tying a great stone to his neck, threw him into the Lake of Tiberias."

NOTE 10. "Umm-'Ámir" is an appellation of the hyena. It is scarcely necessary to mention, that the proverb here quoted is said to have originated from the fact of a man's having been devoured by a hyena whom he had aided against an enemy.

NOTE 11. In some copies, the personage here mentioned is called "Melik el-Yoonán," that is, "King of Ancient Greece," or—"of the Ancient Greeks." I have followed the Cairo edition, and that of the first two hundred nights, printed at Calcutta, in which "Yoonán" is used as the King's proper name. See also Note 13.

NOTE 12. This is the name of the sage in most copies; but in the Cairo edition he is called "Rooyán."

NOTE 13. In the Calcutta edition, the king is merely said to have reigned "in the country of the Persians," as in my translation; but in the Cairo edition, he is said to have been "in the city of the Persians, and the country of Roomán;" which may perhaps mean (though this is hardly allowable) the [eastern] Roman, or later Greek, empire; an unnecessary contradiction. (See Note 22 to Chapter x.) It is obviously more agreeable with the story to regard him as a Persian King.

NOTE 14. "The Ornament of the Good," or—"of the Comely," is an appellation of the Arabian prophet, who is related to have said, "The sun never riseth until it hath saluted me." "The sun's saluting the Ornament of the Good," or "Comely," is therefore, a phrase not unfrequently used by Muslims merely to signify its rising.

NOTE 15.—On the Rewards of Men of Literature and Science. It has long been a common custom of Eastern princes to bestow dresses of honour upon men of literature and science, as well as upon their great officers and other servants. These dresses were of different kinds for persons of different classes or professions. The most usual kind was an ample coat. With dresses of this description were often given gold-embroidered turbans; and sometimes, to Eméers (or great military officers), neck-rings or collars (called tóks), some of which were set with jewels; as also, bracelets, and swords ornamented with precious stones, &c.; and to Wezeers, instead of the tók, a necklace of jewels.—The following striking record will convey an idea of the magnificence of some of these dresses of honour; or, in other words, of the liberality of a Muslim prince, and, at the same time, of the very precarious nature of his favour. A person, chancing to look at a register kept by one of the officers of Hároon Er-Rasheed, saw in it the following entry:—"Four hundred thousand pieces of gold, the price of a dress of honour for Jaafar, the son of Yahyà, the Wezeer."—A few days after, he saw beneath this written,—"Ten keeráts, the price of naphtha and reeds, for burning the body of Jaafar, the son of Yahyà."—The keerát of Baghdád was the twentieth part of a deenár, or piece of gold.

Arab princes and other great men have generally been famous for highly respecting, and liberally rewarding, men of literature and science, and especially poets. El-Mamoon and many others are well known to us for their patronage of the learned. Er-Rasheed carried his condescension to them so far as to pour the water on the hands of a blind man, Abou-Mo'áwiye, one of the most learned persons of his time, previously to his eating with him, to shew his respect for science. An anecdote of a Khaleefeh ordering the mouth of a learned man to be filled with jewels, I have related in a former note. To cram the mouth with sugar or sweetmeats for a polite or eloquent speech, or piece of poetry, has been more commonly done; but the usual presents to learned men were, and are, dresses of honour and sums of money. Ibn-'Obeyd El-Bakhteree, an illustrious poet and traditionist, who flourished in the reign of El-Musta'een, is said to have received so many presents, that, after his death, there were found, among the property which he left, a hundred complete suits of dress, two hundred shirts, and five hundred turbans. A thousand pieces of gold were often given, and sometimes ten, twenty, or thirty, thousand, and even more, for a few verses; nay, for a single couplet.

The prodigality of Arab princes to men of learning may be exemplified by the following anecdote:—Hammád, surnamed

Er-Ráwiyeh, or the famous reciter, having attached himself to the Khaleefeh El-Weleed, the son of 'Abd-el-Melik, and shewn a contrary feeling towards his brother Hishám, on the accession of the latter fled to El-Koofeh. While there, a letter arrived from Hishám, commanding his presence at Damascus: it was addressed to the governor, who, being ordered to treat him with honour, gave him a purse containing a thousand pieces of gold, and despatched him with the Khaleefeh's messenger. On his arrival at Damascus, he was conducted before Hishám, whom he found in a splendid saloon, seated under a pavilion of red silk, surmounted by a dome of yellow brocade, attended by two female slaves of beauty unsurpassed, each holding a crystal ewer of wine. His admission during the presence of members of the King's harem, the reader will remark as a very unusual and high honour: the mention of the wine may also surprise him; but this is a subject upon which much may be said, and which will be considered on a future occasion. After Hammád had given the salutation, and the Khaleefeh had returned it, the latter told him that he had sent for him to ask respecting a couplet of which he (the Khaleefeh) could only remember that it ended with the word "ibreek," which signifies "a ewer." The reciter reflected a while, and the lines occurred to his mind, and he repeated them. Hishám cried out, in delight, that the lines were those he meant; drank a cup of wine, and desired one of the female slaves to hand a cup to Hammád. She did so; and the draught, he says, deprived him of one-third of his reason. The Khaleefeh desired him to repeat the lines again, and drank a second cup; and Hammád was deprived of another third of his reason in the same manner; and said, "O Prince of the Faithful, two-thirds of my reason have departed from me." Hishám laughed, and desired him to ask what he would before the remaining third should have gone; and the reciter said, "One of these two female slaves." The Khaleefeh laughed again, and said, "Nay, but both of them are thine, and all that is upon them, and all that they possess, and, beside them, fifty thousand pieces of gold."—"I kissed the ground before him," says Hammád, "and drank a third cup, and was unconscious of what happened after: I did not awake till the close of the night, when I found myself in a handsome house, surrounded by lighted candles, and the two female slaves were putting in order my clothes and other things: so I took possession of the property, and departed, the happiest of the creatures of God."

A whimsical story is told of a King, who denied to poets those rewards to which usage had almost given them a claim. This King, whose name is not recorded, had the faculty of retaining in his memory an ode after having only once heard it; and he had a memlook who could repeat an ode that he had twice heard, and a female slave who could repeat one that she had heard thrice. Whenever a poet came to compliment him with a panegyric ode, the King used to promise him that, if he found his verses to be his original composition, he would give him a sum of money equal in weight to what they were written upon. The poet, consenting, would recite his ode; and the King would say, "It is not new; for I have known it some years;" and would repeat it as he had heard it; after which he would add, "And this memlook also retains it in his memory;" and would order the memlook to repeat it; which, having heard it twice, from the poet and the King, he would do. The King would then say to the poet, "I have also a female slave who can repeat it;" and on his ordering her to do so, stationed behind the curtains, she would repeat what she had thus thrice heard: so the poet would go away empty-handed. The famous poet El-Asma'ee, having heard of this proceeding, and guessing the trick, determined upon outwitting the King; and accordingly composed an ode made up of very difficult words; but this was not his only preparative measure; another will be presently explained; and a third was, to assume the dress of a Bedawee, that he might not be known, covering his face, the eyes only excepted, with a lithám (a piece of drapery) in accordance with a custom of Arabs of the desert. Thus disguised, he went to the palace, and, having asked permission, entered, and saluted the King, who said to him, "Whence art thou, O brother of the Arabs, and what dost thou desire?" The poet answered, "May god increase the power of the King! I am a poet of such a tribe, and have composed an ode in praise of our lord the Sultán."—"O brother of the Arabs," said the King, "hast thou heard of our condition?"—"No," answered the poet; "and what is it, O King of the age?"—"It is," replied the King, "that if the ode be not thine, we give thee no reward; and if it be thine, we give thee the weight in money of what it is written upon."—"How," said El-Asma'ee, "should I assume to myself that which belongs to another, and knowing, too, that lying before kings is one of the basest of actions? But I agree to this condition, O our lord the Sultán." So he repeated his ode. The King, perplexed, and unable to remember any of it, made a sign to the memlook—but he had retained nothing; and called to the female slave, but she also was unable to repeat a word. "O brother of the Arabs," said he, "thou hast spoken truth, and the ode is thine without doubt: I have never heard it before: produce, therefore, what it is written upon, and we will give thee its weight in money, as we have promised."—"Wilt thou," said the poet, "send one of the attendants to carry it?"—"To carry what?" asked the King; "is it not upon a paper here in thy possession?"—"No, O our lord the Sultán," replied the poet; at the time I composed it I could not procure a piece of paper upon which to write it, and could find nothing but a fragment of a marble column left me by my father; so I engraved it upon this; and it lies in the court of the palace." He had brought it, wrapped up, on the back of a camel. The King, to fulfil his promise, was obliged to exhaust his treasury; and to prevent a repetition of this trick (of which he afterwards discovered El-Asma'ee to have been the author), in future rewarded the poets according to the usual custom of kings.

The following case is also related as an exception to the common custom of great men, with regard to the bestowal of rewards on poets:—"A poet praised a governor in some verses, and the latter ordered an ass's barda'ah (or stuffed saddle) and girth to be given to him. The poet went away with them on his shoulder; and, being asked what he had got, answered, 'I have praised our honoured lord in the best of my verses, and he hath bestowed on me some of the most magnificent articles of his apparel.'"

NOTE 16.—On the Bath. The hammám, or bath, is a favourite resort of both men and women of all classes among the Muslims who can afford the trifling expense which it requires; and (it is said) not only of human beings, but also of evil genii; on which account, as well as on that of decency, several precepts respecting it have been dictated by Mohammad. It is frequented for the purpose of performing certain ablutions required by the religion, or by a regard for cleanliness, and for its salutary effects, and for mere luxury.

The following description of a public bath will convey a sufficient notion of those in private houses, which are on a smaller scale, and generally consist of only two or three chambers. The public bath comprises several apartments, with mosaic or tessellated pavements, composed of white and black marble, and pieces of fine red tile, and sometimes other materials. The inner apartments are covered with domes, having a number of small, round, glazed apertures, for the admission of light. The first apartment is the meslakh, or disrobing room, which has, in the centre, a fountain of cold water, and, next the walls, wide benches or platforms, encased with marble. These are furnished with mattresses and cushions for the higher and middle classes, and with mats for the poorer sort. The inner division of the building, in the more regularly planned baths, occupies nearly a square: the central and chief portion of it is the principal apartment, or harárah, which generally has the form of a cross. In its centre is a fountain of hot water, rising from a base encased with marble, which serves as a seat. One of the angles of the square is occupied by the beyt-owwal, or antechamber of the harárah: in another, is the fire over which is the boiler; and each of the other two angles is generally occupied by two small chambers: in one of these is a tank filled with warm water, which pours down from a spout in the dome: in the other are two taps, side by side; one of hot, and the other of cold water, with a small trough beneath, before which is a seat. The inner apartments are heated by the steam which rises from the fountain and tanks, and by the contiguity of the fire; but the beyt-owwal is not so hot as the harárah, being separated from it by a door. In cold weather, the bather undresses in the former, which has two or three raised seats, like those of the meslakh.

With a pair of wooden clogs to his feet, and having a large napkin round his loins, and generally a second wound round his head like a turban, a third over his chest, and a fourth covering his back, he enters the harárah, the heat of which causes him immediately to perspire profusely. An attendant of the bath removes from him all the napkins excepting the first, and proceeds to crack the joints of his fingers and toes, &c., and several of the vertebræ of the back and neck; kneads his flesh; and rubs the soles of his feet with a coarse earthen rasp, and his limbs and body with a woollen bag which covers his hand as a glove; after which, the bather, if he please, plunges into one of the tanks. He is then thoroughly washed with soap and water, and fibres of the palm-tree, and shaved, if he wish it, in one of the small chambers which contain the taps of hot and cold water; and returns to the beyt-owwal. Here he generally reclines upon a mattress, and takes some light refreshment, while one of the attendants rubs the soles of his feet, and kneads the flesh of his body and limbs, previously to his resuming his dress. It is a common custom, now, to take a pipe and a cup of coffee during this period of rest.

The women are especially fond of the bath, and often have entertainments there; taking with them fruits, sweetmeats, &c., and sometimes hiring female singers to accompany them. An hour or more is occupied by the process of plaiting the hair, and applying the depilatory, &c.; and, generally, an equal time is passed in the enjoyment of rest, or recreation, or refreshment. All necessary decorum is observed on these occasions by most females; but women of the lower orders are often seen in the bath without any covering. Some baths are appropriated solely to men; others, only to women; and others, again, to men during the forenoon, and in the afternoon to women. When the bath is appropriated to women, a napkin, or some other piece of drapery, is suspended over the door, to warn men from entering.

Before the time of Mohammad, there were no public baths in Arabia; and he was so prejudiced against them, for the reasons already alluded to, that he at first forbade both men and women from entering them: afterwards, however, he permitted men to do so, if for the sake of cleanliness, on the condition of their having a cloth round the waist; and women also on account of sickness, child-birth, &c., provided they had not convenient places for bathing in their houses. But, notwithstanding this license, it is held to be a characteristic of a virtuous woman, not to go to a bath even with her husband's permission: for the Prophet said, "Whatever woman enters a bath, the devil is with her." As the bath is a resort of the Jinn, prayer should not be performed in it, nor the Kur-án recited. The Prophet said, "All the earth is given to me as a place of prayer, and as pure, except the burial-ground and the bath." Hence also, when a person is about to enter a bath, he should offer up an ejaculatory prayer for protection against evil spirits; and should place his left foot first over the threshold.—Infidels have often been obliged to distinguish themselves in the bath, by hanging a signet to the neck, or wearing anklets, &c., lest they should receive those marks of respect which should be paid only to believers.

NOTE 17.—On Meals, and the Manner of Eating. The King (with the sage as his guest) is here described as eating in the presence of his court, agreeably with a common custom of Eastern princes and other great men in the present day; the simple manner in which the meal is served and eaten occasioning but a slight interruption.

The Muslim takes a light breakfast after the morning-prayers, and dinner after the noon-prayers; or a single meal instead of these two, before noon. His principal meal is supper, which is taken after the prayers of sunset. A man of rank or wealth, when he has no guest, generally eats alone; his children eat after him, or with his wife or wives. In all his repasts he is moderate with regard to the quantity which he eats, however numerous the dishes.

In the times to which most of the tales in the present work relate, it appears that the dishes were sometimes, I believe generally, placed upon a round embroidered cloth spread on the floor, and sometimes on a tray, which was either laid on the floor or upon a small stand or stool. The last is the mode now always followed in the houses of the higher and middle classes of the Arabs. The table is usually placed upon a round cloth, spread in the middle of the floor, or in a corner, next two of the dewáns, or low seats which generally extend along three sides of the room. It is composed of a large round tray of silver, or of tinned copper, or of brass, supported by a stool, commonly about fifteen or sixteen inches high, made of wood, and generally inlaid with mother-of-pearl and ebony or other wood, or tortoise-shell, &c. When there are numerous guests, two or more such tables are prepared. The dishes are of silver, or of tinned copper, or of china. Several of these are placed upon the tray; and around them are disposed some round, flat cakes of bread, with spoons of box-wood, ebony, or other material, and, usually, two or three limes, cut in halves, to be squeezed over certain of the dishes. When these preparations have been made, each person who is to partake of the repast receives a napkin; and a servant pours water over his hands. A basin and ewer of either of the metals first mentioned are employed for this purpose; the former has a cover with a receptacle for a piece of soap in its centre, and with numerous perforations through which the water runs during the act of washing, so that it is not seen when the basin is brought from one person to another. It is indispensably requisite to wash at least the right hand before eating with the fingers anything but dry food; and the mouth, also, is often rinsed, the water being taken up into it from the right hand. The company sit upon the floor, or upon cushions, or some of them on the deewán, either cross-legged, or with the right knee raised: they retain the napkins before mentioned; or a long napkin, sufficient to surround the tray, is placed upon their knees; and each person, before he begins to eat, says, "In the name of God," or "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful." The master of the house begins first: if he did not so, some persons would suspect that the food was poisoned. The thumb and two fingers of the right hand serve instead of knives and forks; and it is the usual custom for a person to help himself to a portion of the contents of a dish by drawing it towards the edge, or taking it from the edge, with a morsel of bread, which he eats with it: when he takes too large a portion for a single mouthful, he generally places it on his cake of bread. He takes from any dish that pleases him; and sometimes a host hands a delicate morsel with his fingers to one of his guests. It is not allowable to touch food with the left hand (as it is used for unclean purposes), excepting in a few cases, when both hands are required to divide a joint.

Among the more common dishes are the following:—lamb or mutton cut into small pieces, and stewed with various vegetables, and sometimes with peaches, apricots, or jujubes and sugar; cucumbers or small gourds, or the fruit of the black or white eggplant, stuffed with rice and minced meat, &c.; vine-leaves or pieces of lettuce-leaf or cabbage-leaf, enclosing a similar composition; small morsels of lamb or mutton, roasted on skewers, and called "kebáb;" fowls simply roasted or boiled, or boned, and stuffed with raisins, pistachio-nuts, crumbled bread, and parsley; and various kinds of pastry, and other sweets. The repast is frequently commenced with soup; and is generally ended with boiled rice, mixed with a little butter, and seasoned with salt and pepper; or after this, is served a water-melon or other fruit, or a bowl of a sweet drink composed of water with raisins, and sometimes other kinds of fruit, boiled in it, and then sugar, and with a little rose-water added to it when cool. The meat, having generally little fat, is cooked with clarified butter, and is so thoroughly done that it is easily divided with the fingers.

A whole lamb, stuffed in the same manner as the fowls above mentioned, is not a very uncommon dish; but one more extraordinary, of which 'Abd-El-Lateef gives an account as one of the most remarkable that he had seen in Egypt, I am tempted to describe. It was an enormous pie, composed in the following manner:—Thirty pounds of fine flour being kneaded with five pounds and a half of oil of sesame, and divided into two equal portions, one of these was spread upon a round tray of copper, about four spans in diameter. Upon this were placed three lambs, stuffed with pounded meat fried with oil of sesame and ground pistachio-nuts, and various hot aromatics, such as pepper, ginger, cinnamon, mastic, coriander-seed, cumin-seed, cardamom, nut [or nutmeg?], &c. These were then sprinkled with rose-water infused with musk; and upon the lambs, and in the remaining spaces, were placed twenty fowls, twenty chickens, and fifty smaller birds; some of which were baked, and stuffed with eggs; some, stuffed with meat; and some, fried with the juice of sour grapes, or that of limes, or some similar acid. To the above were added a number of small pies; some filled with meat, and others with sugar and sweetmeats; and sometimes, the meat of another lamb, cut into small pieces, and some fried cheese. The whole being piled up in the form of a dome, some rose-water infused with musk and aloes-wood was sprinkled upon it; and the other half of the paste first mentioned was spread over, so as to close the whole: it was then baked, wiped with a sponge, and again sprinkled with rose-water infused with musk.—A dish still more extraordinary will be described in a note on public Royal feasts.

With respect to clean and unclean meats, the Muslim is subject to nearly the same laws as the Jew. Swine's flesh, and blood, are especially forbidden to him; but camel's flesh is allowed. The latter, however, being of a coarse nature, is never eaten when any other meat can be obtained, excepting by persons of the lower classes, and by Arabs of the desert. Of fish, almost every kind is eaten (excepting shell-fish), usually fried in oil: of game, little; partly in consequence of frequent doubt whether it have been lawfully killed. The diet consists, in a great measure, of vegetables, and includes a large variety of pastry. A very common kind of pastry is a pancake, which is made very thin, and folded over several times like a napkin; it is saturated with butter, and generally sweetened with honey or sugar; as is also another common kind, which somewhat resembles vermicelli.

The usual beverage at meals is water, which is drunk from cooling, porous, earthen bottles, or from cups of brass or other metal: but in the houses of the wealthy, sherbet is sometimes served instead of this, in covered glass cups, each of which contains about three quarters of a pint. The sherbet is composed of water made very sweet with sugar, or with a hard conserve of violets or roses or mulberries, &c. After every time that a person drinks, he says, "Praise be to God;" and each person of the company says to him, "May it be productive of enjoyment:" to which he replies, "May God cause thee to have enjoyment." The Arabs drink little or no water during a meal, but generally take a large draught immediately after. The repast is quickly finished; and each person, as soon as he has done, says, "Praise be to God," or "Praise be to God, the Lord of all creatures." He then washes, in the same manner as before, but more thoroughly; well lathering his beard, and rinsing his mouth.

NOTE 18. This mode of shewing honour to a meritorious individual, or distinguished guest, which is at least as ancient as the time of Ahasuerus, is still observed in Muslim countries.

NOTE 19. The influence of the stars upon the dispositions and fortunes of mankind is firmly believed by the generality of Muslims, and is often a matter of consideration previous to the uniting of two persons in marriage; though the absurdity of such an opinion is declared in their law.

NOTE 20.—On the Distribution of Virtues and Vices among Mankind. I have heard Arabs confess that their nation possesses nine-tenths of the envy that exists among all mankind collectively; but I have not seen any written authority for this. Ibn-'Abbás assigns nine-tenths of the intrigue or artifice that exists in the world to the Copts; nine-tenths of the perfidy, to the Jews; nine-tenths of the stupidity, to the Maghrabees; nine-tenths of the hardness, to the Turks; and nine-tenths of the bravery, to the Arabs. According to Kaab-El-Ahbár, reason and sedition are most peculiar to Syria; plenty and degradation, to Egypt; and misery and health, to the Desert. In another account, faith and modesty are said to be most peculiar to El-Yemen; fortitude and sedition, to Syria; magnificence, or pride, and hypocrisy, to El-'Erák; wealth and degradation, to Egypt; and poverty and misery, to the Desert.—Of women, it is said, by Kaab-El-Ahbár, that the best in the world (excepting those of the tribe of Kureysh mentioned by the Prophet) are those of El-Basrah; and the worst in the world, those of Egypt.

NOTE 21. In the Cairo edition, King Yoonán is made to say, "I should repent after it, as King Sindibád repented of killing the falcon;"—and thus is introduced an indifferent story in the place of that of the Husband and the Parrot; the former story describing a king as having, under an erroneous idea, killed a falcon that had prevented his drinking poison. The latter story I insert in preference, according to the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and the edition of Breslau.

NOTE 22.—On Miraculously-gifted Birds. An Arab historian would make it to appear, that the intelligence and talent ascribed to this parrot are not nearly so wonderful as those which some birds have been known to display. He mentions a parrot which recited the Soorat Yá-Seen (or 36th chapter of the Kur-án); and a raven which recited the Soorat es-Sijdeh (or 32nd chapter), and which, on arriving at the place of prostration (or verse which should be recited with prostration), would perform that action, and say, "My body prostrateth itself to Thee, and my heart confideth in Thee." But these are not the most remarkable cases of the kind. He affirms that there was a parrot in Cairo which recited the Kur-án from beginning to end. The Báshà, he says, desiring to try its talent, caused a man to recite a chapter of the Kur-án in its presence, and to pass irregularly from one chapter to another, with the view of leading the bird into error: but, instead of this being the result, the parrot corrected him!

NOTE 23. But a few years ago, it was a common custom for an Arab merchant or shopkeeper of the higher class to wear a sword; and this not only during a journey, but also during his ordinary walks or rides. I have seen many persons of this description so armed, and with a pair of pistols stuck in the girdle; though seldom excepting in the former case. A dagger or case-knife is a weapon now more commonly worn by such persons, both at home and abroad.

NOTE 24.—On Hunting and Hawking. Hunting and hawking, which were common and favourite diversions of the Arabs, and especially of their kings and other great men, have now fallen into comparative disuse among this people. They are, however, still frequently practised by the Persians, and in a manner the same as they are generally described in the present work. Sir John Malcolm was informed that these sports were nowhere found in greater perfection than in the neighbourhood of Aboo-Shahr, where he witnessed and took part in them: I shall, therefore, here avail myself of his observations on this subject.

"The huntsmen," he says, "proceed to a large plain, or rather desert, near the seaside: they have hawks and greyhounds; the former carried in the usual manner, on the hand of the huntsman; the latter led in a leash by a horseman, generally the same who carries the hawk. When the antelope is seen, they endeavour to get as near as possible; but the animal, the moment it observes them, goes off at a rate that seems swifter than the wind: the horsemen are instantly at full speed, having slipped the dogs. If it is a single deer, they at the same time fly the hawks; but if a herd, they wait till the dogs have fixed on a particular antelope. The hawks, skimming along near the ground, soon reach the deer, at whose head they pounce in succession, and sometimes with a violence that knocks it over. [They are commonly described as pecking at the poor creature's eyes until they blind it.] At all events, they confuse the animal so much as to stop its speed in such a degree that the dogs can come up with it; and, in an instant, men, horses, dogs, and hawks, surround the unfortunate deer, against which their united efforts have been combined. The part of the chase that surprised me most, was the extraordinary combination of the hawks and the dogs, which throughout seemed to look to each other for aid. This, I was told, was the result of long and skilful training.—The antelope is supposed to be the fleetest quadruped on earth; and the rapidity of the first burst of the chase I have described is astonishing. The run seldom exceeds three or four miles, and often is not half so much. A fawn is an easy victory; the doe often runs a good chase; and the buck is seldom taken. The Arabs are, indeed, afraid to fly their hawks at the latter, as these fine birds, in pouncing, frequently impale themselves on its sharp horns.—The hawks used in this sport are of a species that I have never seen in any other country. This breed, which is called

"Another mode of running down the antelope is practised here, and still more in the interior of Persia. Persons of the highest rank lead their own greyhounds in a long silken leash, which passes through the collar, and is ready to slip the moment the huntsman chooses. The well-trained dog goes alongside the horse, and keeps clear of him when at full speed, and in all kinds of country. When a herd of antelopes is seen, a consultation is held, and the most experienced determine the point towards which they are to be driven. The field (as an English sportsman would term it) then disperse, and, while some drive the herd in the desired direction, those with the dogs take their post on the same line, at the distance of about a mile from each other; one of the worst dogs is then slipped at the herd, and from the moment he singles out an antelope the whole body are in motion. The object of the horsemen who have greyhounds is to intercept its course, and to slip fresh dogs, in succession, at the fatigued animal. In rare instances, the second dog kills. It is generally the third or fourth; and even these, when the deer is strong, and the ground favourable, often fail. This sport, which is very exhilarating, was the delight of the late King of Persia, Aghà Mohammad Khán, whose taste is inherited by the present sovereign.

"The novelty of these amusements interested me, and I was pleased, on accompanying a party to a village, about twenty miles from Aboo-Shahr, to see a species of hawking peculiar, I believe, to the sandy plains of Persia, on which the Hobará, a noble species of bustard, is found on almost bare plains, where it has no shelter but a small shrub called 'geetuck.' When we went in quest of them, we had a party of about twenty, all well mounted. Two kinds of hawks are necessary for this sport; the first, the Cherkh (the same which is flown at the antelope), attacks them on the ground, but will not follow them on the wing; for this reason, the 'Bhyree,' a hawk well known in India, is flown the moment the Hobará rises.—As we rode along in an extended line, the men who carried the Cherkhs every now and then unhooded and held them up, that they might look over the plain. The first Hobará we found afforded us a proof of the astonishing quickness of sight of one of the hawks: he fluttered to be loose, and the man who held him gave him a whoop as he threw him off his hand, and set off at full speed. We all did the same. At first we only saw our hawk skimming over the plain, but soon perceived, at a distance of more than a mile, the beautiful speckled Hobàrà, with his head erect and wings outspread, running forward to meet his adversary. The Cherkh made several unsuccessful pounces, which were either evaded or repelled by the beak or wings of the Hobàrà, which at last found an opportunity of rising, when a Bhyree was instantly flown, and the whole party were again at full gallop. We had a flight of more than a mile, when the Hobàrà alighted, and was killed by another Cherkh, who attacked him on the ground. This bird weighed ten pounds. We killed several others, but were not always successful, having seen our hawks twice completely beaten, during the two days we followed this fine sport."

The hunting of the wild ass is another sport of the Persians and Arabs, but one of a more difficult nature. This animal is found in Syria, and in the Nubian deserts, as well as in Arabia and Persia. The more common kinds of game are gazelles, or antelopes, hares, partridges, the species of grouse called "katà," quails, wild geese, ducks, &c. Against all of these, the hawk is generally employed, but assisted in the capture of gazelles and hares by dogs. The usual arms of the sportsmen, in the times to which the present work relates, were the bow and arrow, the cross-bow, the spear, the sword, and the mace. When the game is struck down, but not killed, by any weapon, its throat is immediately cut. If merely stunned, and then left to die, its flesh is unlawful food. Some other laws respecting the killing of game have been mentioned in a former note; but one has been there omitted which is worthy of remark, though it is often disregarded; it is, that hunting is allowable only for the purpose of procuring food, or to obtain the skin of an animal, or for the sake of destroying ferocious and dangerous beasts. Amusement is certainly, in general, the main object of the Muslim huntsman, but he does not, with this view, endeavour to prolong the chase; on the contrary, he strives to take the game as quickly as possible; for this purpose, nets are often employed, and the hunting party, forming what is called the circle of the chase (halkat esseyd), surround the spot in which the game is found.

"On the eastern frontiers of Syria," says Burckhardt, "are several places allotted for the hunting of gazelles: these places are called 'masiade' [more properly, 'masyedehs']. An open space in the plain, of about one mile and a half square, is enclosed on three sides by a wall of loose stones, too high for the gazelles to leap over. In different parts of this wall, gaps are purposely left, and near each gap a deep ditch is made on the outside. The enclosed space is situated near some rivulet or spring to which, in summer, the gazelles resort. When the hunting is to begin, many peasants assemble, and watch till they see a herd of gazelles advancing from a distance towards the enclosure, into which they drive them: the gazelles, frightened by the shouts of these people, and the discharge of fire-arms, endeavour to leap over the wall, but can only effect this at the gaps, where they fall into the ditch outside, and are easily taken, sometimes by hundreds. The chief of the herd always leaps first: the others follow him one by one. The gazelles thus taken are immediately killed, and their flesh is sold to the Arabs and neighbouring Fellâhs."

NOTE 25. In the Cairo edition, the word "jezeereh" (an island) is erroneously put for "kharâbeh" (a ruin).

NOTE 26. "Ghooleh" is the feminine of "Ghool." The Ghool is a fabulous being, of which some account has been given in No. 21 of the notes to the Introduction.

NOTE 27. This epithet of the Deity appears to be used in preference to others in this instance, in order to imply that God always decrees what is best for a virtuous man, even when the reverse would seem to us to be the case. He is here described as appointing that the sage should die a violent death; but this death, being unmerited, raised him, according to Mohammedan notions, to the rank of a martyr.

In the edition from which my translation is chiefly made, four poetical quotations are here inserted on the subject of fate, and the inutility of anxious forebodings. The first of these is as follows:—

"O thou who fearest thy fate, be at ease; commit thine affairs unto Him who spread out the earth.

For what is predestined cannot be cancelled; and thou art secure from every thing that is not predestined."

NOTE 28.—The Fable of the Crocodile. Perhaps the reader may desire to know what is the story which the sage Doobân declined to relate; I will therefore supply the omission as well as my memory will allow me. I have heard this fable differ-ently told by different persons; and it is sometimes spun out to a considerable length; but the principal points of it are these:—A crocodile, having crawled far from the Nile, over a desert tract, found his strength so exhausted by fatigue and thirst, that he despaired of being able to return to the river. While he was in this unhappy state, an Arab with his camel approached him, proceeding in the desired direction; and he appealed to his compassion, entreating that he would bind him on the back of the camel, and so convey him to the Nile, and promising that he would afterwards, in return for this favour, carry him across to the opposite bank. The Arab answered, that he feared the crocodile would, as soon as he was unbound, turn upon him, and devour him; but the monster swore so solemnly that he would gratefully requite the service he requested, that the man was induced to consent; and, making his camel lie down, bound the crocodile firmly upon his back, and brought him to the bank of the river. No sooner, however, was the horrid creature liberated, than, in spite of his vows, he opened his hideous jaws to destroy his benefactor, who, though he eluded this danger, was unable to rescue his camel. At this moment a fox drew near them. The man, accosting this cunning animal, related his tale; and the crocodile urged in his own excuse, that the man had spitefully bound him on the back of the camel in such a manner that he had almost killed him. The fox replied that he could quickly pursue and capture the man, but that he must act fairly, and first see the whole transaction repeated before him. The crocodile, assenting, and submitting to have a noose thrown over his jaws, was again bound on the back of the camel, and taken to the place whence he was brought; and as soon as this was done, the man, by the direction of the fox, holding with one hand the halter of his camel, with the other cut the ropes which secured his burden, and hasted away with his beast, leaving the ungrateful and treacherous monster in the same hopeless state in which he had found him.

NOTE 29. This comparison is perfectly just. My first visit to Egypt was not too late for me to witness such a scene as that which is here alluded to; but now, throughout the Turkish dominions, the officers of government are obliged more or less, to assimilate their style of dress to that which commonly prevails in Europe; gaudy colours are out of fashion among them, and silk embroidery is generally preferred to gold: in Egypt, however, the dress worn by this class of persons has not been so much altered as in Turkey, still retaining an Oriental character, though wanting the shawl which was wound round the red cap, and formed the turban; while the dress worn by other classes has undergone no change.

NOTE 30. This story of the head speaking after it was cut off is not without a parallel in the writings of Arab historians. The head of Sa'eed, the son of Jubeyr, is said to have uttered the words, "There is no deity but God," after it had been severed from his body by order of El-Hajjáj, who is related to have killed a hundred and twenty thousand persons of note, besides those whom he slew in war.

NOTE 31. I do not remember to have read or heard the story of Umámeh and 'Átikeh, who, as their names import, were two females.

NOTE 32. The words here quoted are part of the 36th verse of the 17th chapter of the Kur-án.

NOTE 33. The title of "Sultán" is higher than that of "Melik" (or King): a Sultán, properly speaking, being a monarch who has kings or viceroys under his authority.

NOTE 34.—On Kohl, and the mode of applying it. Kohl is a black powder, with which most of the Arab, and many other, women blacken the edges of the eyelids. The most common kind is the smoke-black which is produced by burning a kind of frankincense. An inferior kind is the smoke-black produced by burning the shells of almonds. These are believed to be beneficial to the eyes; but are generally used merely for the sake of ornament. Among other kinds which are particularly employed for their beneficial effect upon the eye are several ores of lead, reduced to a fine powder. Antimony is said to have been, in former times, the most esteemed kind of kohl. The powder is applied by means of a small probe of wood, ivory, or silver, the end of which is moistened, and then dipped in the powder, and drawn along the edges of the eyelids.

NOTE 35. The Koofeeyeh is described in a great Arabic Lexicon (Táj el-'Aroos) as "a thing worn on the head; so called because of its roundness:" and this is the only description of it that I have been able to find. I was told in Cairo, that "koofeeyeh" is the correct appellation of the headkerchief commonly called "keffee-yeh:" but this is a mistake. The latter is a square kerchief, which is worn on the head, measuring about a yard in each direction, and of various colours, generally a dull, brownish red, bright green, and yellow, composing broad and narrow stripes, and having a deep fringe of strings and tassels along two opposite edges. The most common kind is entirely of cotton; another, of cotton interwoven with silk; and a third, of silk interwoven with gold. It is now chiefly worn by the Wahnâbees and several tribes of Bedawees; but the former wear only the first kind, as they hold articles of dress composed wholly or partly of silk or gold to be unlawful. In former times it was in common use among the inhabitants of the towns. It is mostly worn by men, and is doubled diagonally, and placed over the cap in such a manner that the two corners which are folded together hang down the back; and the other two corners, in front. A piece of woollen rope, or a strip of rag, or a turban, is generally wound round it; and the corners, or those only which usually hang down in front, are sometimes turned up, and tucked within the upper edge of the turban. The inhabitants of the towns usually wear the turban over the keffee-yeh. Burckhardt, who calls this headkerchief "keffie," mentions, that the Bedawees of Mekkeh and El-Yemen tie over it, instead of the woollen rope which is used by the Northern Bedawees, "a circle made of wax, tar, and butter, strongly kneaded together: this," he adds, "is pressed down to the middle of the head, and looks like the airy crown of a saint. It is about the thickness of a finger; and they take it off very frequently to press it between their hands, so that its shape may be preserved." The better kinds of keffee-yeh above mentioned are worn by some of the Turks, but not in the Arab manner; being wound tight round the cap.

NOTE. 36.—Anecdote of a Miraculous Fish. This story of the miraculous fish reminds me of one of a similar kind which is related as authentic. A certain just judge of the Israelites, in the time of Solomon, had a wife who, every time that she brought him his food, used to ejaculate a prayer that disgrace might befall every unfaithful wife. One day, this woman having placed before her husband a fried fish, and repeated her usual ejaculation, the fish leaped from the dish, and fell upon the floor. This happened three times; and, in consequence of a suspicion expressed by a devotee, who was consulted respecting the meaning of this strange event, the judge discovered that a supposed maid, whom he had purchased as a slave, was a disguised man.

NOTE 37. This comparison is not intended to be understood in its literal sense, for the smallest of the tribe of 'Ad is said to have been sixty cubits high: the largest, a hundred! The tribe of 'Ad were a race of ancient Arabs, who, according to the Kur-ân and Arab historians, were destroyed by a suffocating wind, for their infidelity, after their rejection of the admonitions of the prophet Hood.

NOTE 38. The Arabs generally calculate distances by time. The average distance of a day's journey is from twenty to twenty-five miles; the former being the usual rate of caravan-travelling.

NOTE 39.—On the Privacy of Arab Dwellings. In a palace, or large house, there is generally a wide bench of stone, or a wooden couch, within the outer door, for the accommodation of the door-keeper and other servants. The entrance-passage leads to an open court, and, for the sake of preventing persons at the entrance, or a little within it, from seeing into the court, it usually has two turnings. We may, therefore, understand the motive of the King in seating himself in the place here described to have been a desire that he might not, if discovered, be supposed to be prying impertinently into the interior of the palace. Respect for the privacy of another's house is a point that is deemed of so much importance that it is insisted upon in the Kur-ân, in these words:—"O ye who have become believers, enter not any houses, besides your own houses, until ye shall have asked leave, and saluted their inhabitants; this will be better for you: peradventure ye will be admonished. And if ye find not in them any person, enter them not, until leave be granted you; and if it be said unto you, Return, then do ye return; this will be more decent for you; and God knoweth what ye do. But it shall be no crime in you that ye enter uninhabited houses wherein ye may find a convenience. When a visitor finds the door open, and no servant below, he usually claps his hands as a signal for some person to come to him; striking the palm of his left hand with the fingers of the right: and even when leave has been granted him to enter, it is customary for him, when he has to ascend to an upper apartment, to repeat several times some ejaculation, such as "Permission!" or, "O Protector!" (that is, "O protecting God!"), as he goes up, in order that any female of the family, who may chance to be in the way, may have notice of his approach, and either retire or veil herself. Sometimes the servant who precedes him does this in his stead.

NOTE 40. These verses are translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, as more apposite than those which are inserted in their place in the edition of Cairo.

NOTE 41. That the reader may not form wrong conceptions of the characters of many persons portrayed in this work, it is necessary to observe, that weeping is not regarded by the Arabs as an evidence of an effeminate disposition, or inconsistent with even a heroic mind; though the Muslims in general are remarkable for the calmness with which they endure the heaviest afflictions.

NOTE 42. It is, perhaps, unnecessary to mention, that it is a common custom of the Orientals, as of other natives of warm climates, to take a nap in the afternoon. A tradesman is not unfrequently seen enjoying this luxury in his shop, and seldom, excepting in this case, is it considered allowable to wake a person.

NOTE 43.—Description of Arab Fans. The kind of fan most commonly used by the Arabs has the form of a small flag. The flap, which is about six or seven inches in width, and somewhat more in length, is composed of split palm-leaves of various colours, or some plain and others coloured, neatly plaited or woven together. The handle is a piece of palm-stick, about twice the length of the flap. This fan is used by men as well as women, and for the double purpose of moderating the heat and repelling the flies, which, in warm weather, are excessively annoying. It is more effective than the ordinary European fan, and requires less exertion. Arabian fans of the kind here described, brought from Mekkeh to Cairo as articles of merchandise, may be purchased in the latter city for a sum less than a penny each; they are mostly made in the Hejáz. Another kind of fan, generally composed of black ostrich-feathers, of large dimensions, and ornamented with a small piece of looking-glass on the lower part of the front, is often used by the Arabs. A kind of fly-whisk made of palm-leaves is also in very general use. A servant or slave is often employed to wave it over the master or mistress during a meal or an afternoon nap.

NOTE 44. Mes'oodeh is the feminine of Mes'ood, a name before explained, as signifying "happy," or "made happy."

NOTE 45. The word which I have here rendered "wine" (namely, "sharáb") is applied to any drink, and particularly to a sweet beverage; but, in the present case, the context shews that its signification is that which I have given it. The description of a carousal in the next chapter will present a more fit occasion for my considering at large the custom of drinking wine as existing among the Arabs.

NOTE 46.—On the Use of Hemp to induce Intoxication. The name of "benj," or "beng," is now, and, I believe, generally, given to henbane; but El-Kazwee-neh states that the leaves of the garden hemp (kinneb bustánee, or shahdánaj) are the benj which, when eaten, disorders the reason. This is an important confirmation of De Sacy's opinion respecting the derivation of the appellation of "Assassins" from Hashshásheen (hemp-eaters, or persons who intoxicate themselves with hemp); as the sect which we called "Assassins" are expressly said by the Arabs to have made frequent use of benj. To this subject I shall have occasion to revert. I need only add here, that the custom of using benj, and other narcotics, for purposes similar to that described in this tale, is said to be not very unfrequently practised in the present day; but as many Arab husbands are extremely suspicious of the character of women in general, perhaps there is but little ground for this assertion.

NOTE 47. Most Eastern cities and towns are partly or wholly surrounded by mounds of rubbish, close to the walls; and upon these mounds are thrown the carcasses of camels, horses, and other beasts, to be devoured by dogs and vultures. Immense mounds of this unsightly description entirely surrounded the city of Cairo; but those which extended along its western side, and, in a great measure, screened it from the views of persons approaching from the Nile, have lately been removed by order of the present Báshà of Egypt.

NOTE 48. "Kubbeh" generally signifies either a dome or a cupola, or a building or apartment surmounted by a dome. In the present instance it is to be understood in the latter sense. It is also applied to a closet, and to a tent.

NOTE 49. "Káf" is generally to be understood, as it is in the present case, to signify the chain of mountains believed, by the Muslims, to encircle our earth, as mentioned in a former note. It is also the name of the chain of Caucasus, and hence it has been supposed that the fable respecting the mountains before mentioned, originated from an early idea that the chain of Caucasus was the limit of the habitable earth; but it is possible that the latter mountains may have derived their name from an imaginary resemblance to the former.

NOTE 50. Rats, though unlawful food to the Muslim, are occasionally eaten by many of the peasants of the province of Lower Egypt called El-Boheyreh on the west of the western branch of the Nile. The extraordinary abundance of these animals, and mice, throughout Egypt, gave rise to an absurd fable, which is related by Diodorus Siculus as a matter worthy of serious consideration:—that these creatures are generated from the alluvial soil deposited by the Nile. The inundation drives many of them from the fields to the houses and deserts, and destroys the rest; but soon after the waters have subsided, vast numbers of them are seen again, taking refuge in the deep clefts of the parched soil.

NOTE 51.—On the Beverage called Boozah. Boozah, or boozeh, is a favourite beverage of the boatmen, and other persons of the lower class, in Egypt; and more especially of the Nubians and negroes; as it was, according to Herodotus and other writers, of the ancient Egyptians. It is an intoxicating liquor, a kind of beer, most commonly prepared from barley-bread, crumbled, mixed with water, strained, and left to ferment. It is also prepared from wheat and from millet in the same manner. The account of Herodotus has been confirmed by the discovery of large jars, containing the dregs of the barley-beer in ancient tombs at Thebes.

NOTE 52.—On the Apparel, &c., of Mourning. The wearing of mourning appears to have been a custom of both sexes among the Arabs in earlier times for the black clothing which distinguished the 'Abbásee Khaleefehs and their officers was originally assumed in testimony of grief for the death of the Imám Ibráheem Ibn-Mohammad. It has, however, ceased to be worn by men, as indicating a want of resignation to the decrees of Providence, and is only assumed by women on the occasion of the death of a husband or near relation, and not for an elderly person. In the former cases they dye their shirts, head-veils, face-veils, and handkerchiefs, of a blue or almost black colour, with indigo; and sometimes, with the same dye, stain their hands and arms as high as the elbows, and smear the walls of their apartments. They generally abstain from wearing any article of dress of a bright colour, leave their hair unbraided, and deck themselves with few or no ornaments. They also cease to make use of perfumes, kohl, and hennà; and often turn upside down the carpets, mats, cushions, and coverings of the deewáns.

NOTE 53. "Houses of Lamentations," erected in burial-grounds for the accommodation of ladies on the occasions of their visiting the tombs of their relations, have been mentioned in a former note respecting the two grand annual festivals.

NOTE 54. The kind of tomb here alluded to is generally a square building crowned by a dome.

NOTE 55. This passage deserves particular notice, as being one of those which assist us to form some opinion respecting the period when the present work, in the states in which it is known to us, was composed or compiled or remodelled. It is the same in all the copies of the original work that I have seen, and bears strong evidence of having been written subsequently to the commencement of the eighth century of the Flight, or fourteenth of our era, at which period, it appears, the Christians and Jews were first compelled to distinguish themselves by wearing, respectively, blue and yellow turbans, in accordance with an order issued by the Sultán of Egypt, Mohammad Ibn-Kaláoon. Thus the white turban became peculiar to the Muslims.—An eminent German critic has been unfortunate in selecting the incident of the four fish as affording an argument in favour of his opinion that the Tales of a Thousand and One Nights are of Indian origin, on the mere ground that the same word (varna) is used in Sanscrit to signify both "colour" and "caste."

NOTE 56. The Muslims often implore the intercession of their prophet, and of various members of his family and other holy persons, though their ordinary prayers are addressed solely to God. The regard which they pay to their reputed saints, both living and deceased, as mediators, is one of the heresies which the Wahhábees most vehemently condemn.

NOTE 57. This verse, translated from my usual prototype, the Cairo edition, is there followed by another, which I omit as being inapposite.

NOTE 58. In the first of the notes to the Introduction, I have mentioned that it is a general custom of the Muslims to repeat this phrase, "In the name of God!" on commencing every lawful action that is of any importance; it is, therefore, here employed, as it is in many similar cases, to express a readiness to do what is commanded or requested; and is equivalent to saying, "I this instant begin to execute thy orders."

NOTE 59. The condition and offices of memlooks, who are male white slaves, have been mentioned in the thirteenth note to the first chapter.

NOTE 60. Eastern histories present numerous instances of marriages as unequal as those here related; the reader, therefore, must not regard this part of the story as inconsistent.

NOTES TO CHAPTER THIRD

NOTE 1.—On the Uses of Palm-sticks in various Manufactures. The kind of crate here mentioned is made of jereeds, or palm-sticks, which (being very soft, and easily cut and punched, in their fresh state, and very tough, difficult to break, and light, when dry) are used in a great variety of manufactures. In making crates or baskets, and stools, bed-frames, coops, &c., a number of jereeds, being placed an inch or more apart, are fixed by two, three, or more, thicker ones, placed transversely. Round holes are punched in the latter, through which the former are inserted; and the whole becomes light and strong as soon as it is dry. Chests are made with thick jereeds placed close together, and others, pared thin, passing transversely through them.

NOTE 2.—Description of the Veils of Arab Women. The modern izár or eezár (for the word is written in two different ways), of Arab women, is a piece of drapery commonly worn by them when they appear in public. It is about two yards or more in width (according to the height of the wearer), and three yards in length: one edge of it being drawn from behind, over the upper part of the head and the forehead, and secured by a band sewed inside, the rest hangs down behind and on each side to the ground, or nearly so, and almost entirely envelops the person; the two ends being held so as nearly to meet in front. Thus it conceals every other part of the dress excepting a small portion of a very loose gown (which is another of the articles of walking or riding apparel), and the face-veil. It is now generally made of white calico, but a similar covering of black silk for the married, and of white silk for the unmarried, is now worn by females of the higher and middle classes, and is called a "habarah."

It appears that the kind of face-veil mentioned in the same passage (in Arabic, "kináa") is a piece of muslin, about a yard or more in length, and somewhat less in width, a portion of which is placed over the head, beneath the izár, the rest hanging down in front, to the waist, or thereabout, and entirely concealing the face. I have often seen Arab women, particularly those of the Wahhábees, wearing veils of this kind composed of printed muslin, completely concealing their features, yet of sufficiently loose fabric to admit of their seeing their way. But the more common kind of Arab face-veil is a long strip of white muslin, or of a kind of black crêpe, covering the whole of the face excepting the eyes, and reaching nearly to the feet. It is suspended at the top by a narrow band, which passes up the forehead, and which is sewed, as are also the two upper corners of the veil, to a band that is tied round the head. This veil is called "burko." The black kind is often ornamented with gold coins, false pearls, &c., attached to the upper part. It is not so genteel as the white veil, unless for a lady in mourning.

NOTE 3. "El-Mósil" is the name of the city which Europeans commonly call "Mosul," "Mosoul," &c.; a city long famous for its fine stuffs. Hence our word "muslin," often termed, in Arabic, "Mósil-lee," signifying, "of the manufacture of El-Mósil."

NOTE 4. The wine is mentioned in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, but not in the edition of Cairo. The lady went to a Christian to purchase her wine because Muslims are not allowed to sell it.

NOTE 5. The "Othmánee quinces" I suppose to be a kind so called after some person named Othmán who introduced it, or was famous for its culture. The term "Sultánee," applied to the citrons afterwards mentioned, signifies "imperial."

NOTE 6. A list of these sweets is given in my original, but I have thought it better to omit the names.

NOTE 7. The "willow-flower-water" is prepared from the sweet-scented flowers of the Oriental willow, called "bán" and "khláf" or "khaláf;" a twig of which is, among the Arabs, a favourite emblem of a graceful female.

NOTE 8. — On the Vessels used for Sprinkling and Perfuming. The sprinkling-bottle, here called "mirashsh," is more commonly called "kumkum," and has been alluded to in a former note, as having a spherical or wide body and a long and narrow neck. It is generally about eight inches high, and of plain or gilt silver, or of fine brass, or china, or glass; and has a cover pierced with a small hole. This vessel is used in the houses of the rich to sprinkle a guest or visitor, before he rises to take his leave, with rose-water; after which ceremony, a page or servant presents to him a kind of censer, called "mibkharah," which is generally of one or other of the metals above mentioned, and about the same height as the kumkum; and he wafts the smoke which rises from it towards his face, beard, &c., with the right hand. The body of the mibkharah, the form of which is nearly globular, surmounts a stem rising from the centre of a small circular tray; the upper half is a cover pierced with apertures for the escape of the smoke; and the lower half, in which some burning charcoal is placed, is lined, or half filled, with gypsum-plaster. Aloes-wood, previously moistened, or some other odoriferous substance, is placed upon the burning coals; and sometimes, in the houses of very wealthy persons, ambergris is used.

NOTE 9. This description of the outer door of a house in Baghdád is an obvious absurdity; but none of the copies of the original to which I have access authorizes my substituting "gilt" for "plated with gold;" all here agreeing in the use of words which have the latter sense.

NOTE 10. In their eagerness to obtain the earliest possible sight of the new moon which marks the period of the commencement of the Ramadán, lest they should not begin their fast as soon as the law requires, the Muslims often see the crescent one night earlier in this than in any other month. The comparison of an eyebrow to the new moon of Ramadán expresses, therefore, its extreme thinness, as well as its arched form. To reduce its natural thickness, and to give it this form, scissors are often used.

NOTE 11. "The seal of Suleymán" is a name given by the Arabs to a six-pointed star formed by two equilateral triangles intersecting each other, and to the flower which we, also, call "Solomon's seal." I fear that the reader will not consider the comparison very apposite, unless the allusion be to a beautiful red berry which, I am informed, is borne by the flower here mentioned.

NOTE 12. — Description of Apartments in Arab Houses. Most of the descriptions of interior domestic architecture which occur in the present work, I may aptly illustrate by availing myself of observations made in Cairo. In the houses of persons of the higher and middle classes in this city, the different apartments generally resemble each other in several respects, and are similarly furnished. The greater portion of the floor is elevated about half a foot, or somewhat more, above the rest. The higher portion is called "leewán" (a corruption of "eleewán"), and the lower, "durká'ah," from the Persian "dar-gáh." When there is but one leewán, the durká'ah occupies the lower end, extending from the door to the opposite wall. In a handsome house, it is usually paved with white and black marble, and little pieces of red tile, ihlaid in tasteful and complicated patterns; and if the room is on the ground-floor, and sometimes in other cases, it has, in the centre, a fountain which plays into a small, shallow pool, lined with coloured marbles, &c., like the surrounding pavement. The shoes, or slippers, are left upon the durká'ah previously to stepping upon the leewán. The latter is generally paved with common stone, and covered with a mat in summer, and a carpet over this in winter; and a mattress and cushions are placed against each of its three walls, composing what is called a "deewán," or divan. The mattress, which is commonly about three feet wide, and three or four inches thick, is placed either on the floor or on a raised frame or a slightly-elevated pavement; and the cushions, which are usually of a length equal to the width of the mattress, and of a height equal to half that measure, lean against the wall. Both mattresses and cushions are stuffed with cotton, and are covered with printed calico, cloth, or some more expensive stuff. The deewán which extends along the upper end of the leewán is called the "sadr," and is the most honourable; and the chief place on this seat is the corner which is to the right of a person facing this end of the room; the other corner is the next in point of honour; and the intermediate places on the same deewán are more honourable than those on the two side-deewáns. To a superior, and often to an equal, the master or mistress yields the chief place. The corners are often furnished with an additional mattress, of a square form, just large enough for one person, placed upon the other mattress, and with two additional (but smaller) cushions to recline against. The walls are, for the most part, plastered and whitewashed, and generally have two or more shallow cupboards, the doors of which, as well as those of the apartments, are fancifully constructed with small panels. The windows, which are chiefly composed of curious wooden lattice-work, serving to screen the inhabitants from the view of persons without, as also to admit both light and air, commonly project outwards, and are furnished with mattresses and cushions. In many houses there are, above these, small windows of coloured glass, representing bunches of flowers, &c. The ceiling is of wood, and certain portions of it, which are carved, or otherwise ornamented by fanciful carpentry, are usually painted with bright colours such as red, green, and blue, and sometimes varied with gilding; but the greater part of the wood-work is generally left unpainted.

The word in the original text which I translate "saloon," is "ká'ah." This term is applied to a large and lofty apartment, commonly having two leewáns, on opposite sides of the durká'ah. One of these is, in most instances, larger than the other, and is held to be the more honourable part. Some ká'ahs, containing three leewáns, one of these being opposite the entrance, or four leewáns composing the form of a cross with the durká'ah in the centre, communicate with small chambers or closets, or have elevated recesses which are furnished in the same manner as the leewáns. That part of the roof which is over the durká'ah rises above the rest, sometimes to nearly twice the height of the latter, and is generally surmounted by a lantern of wooden latticework to admit the air.

NOTE 13. In the Cairo edition, the couch is described as being in the midst of the saloon; but this is inconsistent with what follows.

NOTE 14. — Of Bâbil, and the Angels Hároot and Mároot. Bâbil, or Babel, is regarded by the Muslims as the fountain-head of the science of magic, which was, and, as most think, still is, taught there to mankind by two fallen angels, named Hároot and Mároot, who are there suspended by the feet in a great pit closed by a mass of rock. According to the account of them generally received as correct, these two angels, in consequence of their want of compassion for the frailties of mankind, were rendered, by God, susceptible of human passions, and sent down upon the earth to be tempted: they both sinned; and, being permitted to choose whether they would be punished in this life or in the other, chose the former; but they were sent down not merely to experience temptation, being also appointed to tempt others by means of their knowledge of magic; though it appears that they were commanded not to teach this art to any man "until they had said, 'Verily we are a temptation; therefore, be not an unbeliever.'" — The celebrated traditionist Mujâhid is related to have visited them, under the guidance of a Jew. Having removed the mass of rock from the mouth of the pit, or well, they entered. Mujâhid had been previously charged by the Jew not to mention the name of God in their presence; but when he beheld them, resembling upside-down, with irons attached to their necks and knees, he could not refrain from uttering the forbidden name; whereupon the two angels became so violently agitated that they almost broke the irons which confined them, and Mujâhid and his guide fled back in consternation.

NOTE 15. The meaning conveyed by this comparison is "tall and slender."

NOTE 16. In the MS. from which the old translation was made, it appears that this lady is called Zubeydeh (which was the name of the daughter of Jaafar the son of El-Mansoor, and wife of Er-Rasheed); the portress, Sâfiyeh; and the cateress, Âmineh; but no names are given to them in any of the copies of the original to which I have access.

NOTE 17. Literally, "two nusfs." "Nusf," vulgarly pronounced by the Egyptians "nuss," and signifying "half," is the name of a small Egyptian coin made of a mixture of silver and copper, and now equivalent to something less than a quarter of a farthing; but this name was originally given to the half-dirhems which were struck in the reign of the Sultân El-Mu'eyyad, in the early part of the ninth century of the Flight, or of the fifteenth of our era. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and in the edition of Breslau, we read here "two dirhems," instead of "two nusfs."

NOTE 18. The "menâreh" is the tower of a mosque, commonly called by English writers "minaret," which generally rises from a square base.

NOTE 19. It is a common custom in the East to seal the doors of store-houses with a lump of clay, lest the lock should be picked.

NOTE 20. I here deviate a little from the Cairo edition, in which the cateress is described as having drunk three cups of wine successively before she handed any to her sisters. My reason for this will presently be seen.

NOTE 21. Thus in two editions. In the Cairo edition, "tukellimuhu" is put for "telkumuhu."

* NOTE 22.—On Wine, Fruits, Flowers, and Music, in Illustration of Arab Carousals. I here pass over an extremely objectionable scene, which, it is to be hoped, would convey a very erroneous idea of the manners of Arab ladies; though I have witnessed, at private festivities in Cairo, abominable scenes, of which ladies, screened behind lattices, were spectators. Can the same be said with respect to the previous carousal? This is a question which cannot be answered in a few words.

The prohibition of wine, or, rather, of fermented and intoxicating liquors, being one of the most remarkable and important points of the Mohammadan religion, it might be imagined that the frequent stories in this work, describing parties of Muslims as habitually indulging in the use of forbidden beverages, are scandalous misrepresentations of Arab manners and customs. There are, however, many similar anecdotes interspersed in the works of Arab historians, which (though many of them are probably untrue in their application to particular individuals) could not have been offered to the public by such writers if they were not of a nature consistent with the customs of a considerable class of the Arab nation.

In investigating this subject, it is necessary, in the first place, to state, that there is a kind of wine which Muslims are permitted to drink. It is properly called "nebeedh" (a name which is now given to prohibited kinds of wine), and is generally prepared by putting dry grapes, or dry dates, in water, to extract their sweetness, and suffering the liquor to ferment slightly, until it acquires a little sharpness or pungency. The Prophet himself was in the habit of drinking wine of this kind, which was prepared for him in the first part of the night; he drank it on the first and second days following; but if any remained on the morning of the third day, he either gave it to his servants or ordered it to be poured out upon the ground. Such beverages have, therefore, been drunk by the strictest of his followers; and Ibn-Khaldoon strongly argues that nebeedh thus prepared from dates was the kind of wine used by the Khaleefehs Hâroon Er-Rasheed and El-Ma-moon, and several other eminent men, who have been commonly accused of habitually and publicly indulging in debauches of wine properly so called; that is, of inebriating liquors.

Nebeedh, prepared from raisins, is commonly sold in Arab towns, under the name of "zebeeb," which signifies "raisins." This I have often drunk in Cairo; but never could perceive that it was in the slightest degree fermented. Other beverages, to which the name of "nebeedh" has been applied (though, like zebeeb, no longer called by that name), are also sold in Arab towns. The most common of these is an infusion of licorice, and called by the name of the root, "erk-soos." The nebeedh of dates is sold in Cairo with the dates themselves in the liquor; and in like manner is that of figs. Under the same appellation of "nebeedh" have been classed the different kinds of beer now commonly called "boozeh," which have been mentioned in former pages. Opium, hemp, &c., are now more frequently used by the Muslims to induce intoxication or exhilaration. The young leaves of the hemp are generally used alone, or mixed with tobacco, for smoking; and the capsules, without the seeds, enter into the composition of several intoxicating conserves. Some remarks upon this subject have been inserted in a former note.

By my own experience I am but little qualified to pronounce an opinion respecting the prevalence of drinking wine among the Arabs; for, never drinking it myself, I had little opportunity of observing others do so during my residence among Muslims. I judge, therefore, from the conversations and writings of Arabs, which justify me in asserting that the practice of drinking wine in private, and by select parties, is far from being uncommon among modern Muslims, though certainly more so than it was before the introduction of tobacco into the East, in the beginning of the seventeenth century of our era; for this herb, being in a slight degree exhilarating, and at the same time soothing, and unattended by the injurious effects that result from wine, is a sufficient luxury to many who, without it, would have recourse to intoxicating beverages merely to pass away hours of idleness. The use of coffee, too, which became common in Egypt, Syria, and other countries, besides Arabia, a century earlier than tobacco, doubtless tended to render the habit of drinking wine less general. That it was adopted as a substitute for wine appears even from its name, "kahweh," an old Arabic term for wine; whence the Turkish "kahveh," the Italian "caffè," and our "coffee."

There is an Arabic work of some celebrity, and not of small extent, entitled "Halbet el-Kumeyt," apparently written shortly before the Arabs were in possession of the first of the above-mentioned substitutes for wine, nearly the whole of which consists of anecdotes and verses relating to the pleasures resulting from, or attendant upon, the use of wine; a few pages at the end being devoted to the condemnation of this practice, or, in other words, to prove the worthlessness of all that precedes. Of this work I possess a copy, a quarto volume of 464 pages. I have endeavoured to skim its cream; but found it impossible to do so without collecting, at the same time, a considerable quantity of most filthy scum, for it is characterised by wit and humour plentifully interlarded with the grossest and most revolting obscenity; yet it serves to confirm what has been above asserted. The mere existence of such a work (and it is not the only one of the kind), written by a man of learning, and I believe a Kádee, a judge, or one holding the honourable office of a guardian of religion and morality,—written, too, evidently with pleasure, notwithstanding his assertion to the contrary,—is a strong argument in favour of the prevalence of the practice which it paints in the most fascinating colours, and then condemns. Its author terminates a chapter (the ninth), in which many well-known persons are mentioned as having been addicted to wine, by saying, that the Khaleefehs, Emeers, and Wezeers, so addicted, are too numerous to name in such a work; and by relating a story of a man who placed his own wife in pledge in the hands of a wine-merchant, after having expended in the purchase of the forbidden liquor all the property that he possessed. He excuses himself (in his preface) for writing this book, by saying that he had been ordered to do so by one whom he could not disobey; thus giving us a pretty strong proof that a great man in his time was not ashamed of avowing his fondness for the prohibited enjoyment. If, then, we admit the respectable authority of Ibn-Khaldoon, and acquit of the vice of drunkenness those illustrious individuals whose characters he vindicates, we must still regard most of the anecdotes relating to the carousals of other persons as being not without foundation.

One of my friends, who enjoys a high reputation, ranking among the most distinguished of the 'Ulamâ of Cairo, is well known to his intimate acquaintances as frequently indulging in the use of forbidden beverages with a few select associates. I disturbed him and his companions by an evening visit on one of these occasions, and was kept waiting within the street-door while the guests quickly removed everything that would give me any indication of the manner in which they had been employed; for the announcement of my (assumed) name, and their knowledge of my abstemious character, completely disconcerted them. I found them, however, in the best humour. They had contrived, it appeared, to fill with wine a china bottle, of the kind used at that season (winter) for water; and when any one of them asked the servant for water, this bottle was brought to him; but when I made the same demand, my host told me that there was a bottle of water on the sill of the window behind that part of the deewan upon which I was seated. The evening passed away very pleasantly, and I should not have known how unwelcome was my intrusion had not one of the guests with whom I was intimately acquainted, in walking part of the way home with me, explained to me the whole occurrence. There was with us a third person, who, thinking that my antipathy to wine was feigned, asked me to stop at his house on my way, and take a cup of "white coffee," by which he meant brandy.

Another of my Muslim acquaintances in Cairo I frequently met at the house of a mutual friend, where, though he was in most respects very bigoted, he was in the habit of indulging in wine. For some time he refrained from this gratification when I was present; but at length my presence became so irksome to him, that he ventured to enter into an argument with me on the subject of the prohibition. The only answer I could give to his question, "Why is wine forbidden?"—was in the words of the Kur-án, "Because it is the source of more evil than profit." This suited his purpose, as I intended it should; and he asked, "What evil results from it?" I answered, "Intoxication and quarrels, &c."—"Then," said he, "if a man take not enough to intoxicate him there is no harm;"—and finding that I acquiesced by silence, he added, "I am in the habit of taking a little; but never enough to intoxicate. Boy, bring me a glass."—He was the only Muslim, however, whom I have heard to argue against the absolute interdiction of inebriating liquors.

Histories tell us that some of the early followers of the Prophet indulged in wine, holding the text above referred to as indecisive; and that Mohammad was at first doubtful upon this subject appears from another text, in which his followers were told not to come to prayer when they were drunk, until they should know what they would say; an injunction somewhat similar to one in the Bible: but when frequent and severe contentions resulted from their use of wine, the following more decided condemnation of the practice was pronounced:—"O ye who have become believers, verily wine and lots and images and divining-arrows are an abomination of the work of the Devil; therefore, avoid them, that ye may prosper." This law is absolute: its violation in the smallest degree is criminal. The punishment ordained by the law for drinking (or, according to most doctors, for even tasting) wine or spirits, or inducing intoxication by any other means, on ordinary occasions, is the infliction of eighty stripes in the case of a free man, and forty in that of a slave: but if the crime be openly committed in the course of any day of the month of Ramadán, when others are fasting, the punishment prescribed is death!

The prohibition of wine hindered many of the Prophet's contemporaries from embracing his religion. It is said that the famous poet El-Aashà, who was one of them, delayed to join his cause on this account, until death prevented him. A person passing by his tomb (at Menfooháh, in El-Yemámeh), and observing that it was moist, asked the reason, and was answered, that the young men of the place, considering him still as their cup-companion, drank wine over his grave, and poured his cup upon it. Yet many of the most respectable of the pagan Arabs, like certain of the Jews and early Christians, abstained totally from wine, from a feeling of its injurious effects upon morals, and, in their climate, upon health; or, more especially, from the fear of being led by it into the commission of foolish and degrading actions. Thus, Keys the son of 'Asim, being one night overcome with wine, attempted to grasp the moon, and swore that he would not quit the spot where he stood until he had laid hold of it: after leaping several times with the view of doing so, he fell flat upon his face; and when he recovered his senses, and was acquainted with the cause of his face being bruised, he made a solemn vow to abstain from wine ever after. A similar feeling operated upon many Muslims more than religious principle. The Khaleefeh 'Abd-El-Melik Ibn-Marwán took pleasure in the company of a slave named Naseeb, and one day desired him to drink with him. The slave replied, "O Prince of the Faithful, I am not related to thee, nor have I any authority over thee, and I am of no rank or lineage: I am a black slave, and my wit and politeness have drawn me into thy favour: how then shall I take that which will plunder me of these two qualities; and by what shall I then propitiate thee?" The Khaleefeh admired and excused him.

It was the custom of many Muslim princes, as might be inferred from the above anecdote, to admit the meanest of their dependants to participate in their unlawful carousals when they could have no better companions; but poets and musicians were their more common associates on these occasions; and these two classes, and especially the latter, are in the present day the most addicted to intoxicating liquors. Few modern Arab musicians are so well contented with extraordinary payment and mere sweet sherbet as with a moderate fee and plenty of wine and brandy; and many of them deem even wine but a sorry beverage.

It was usual with the host and guests at wine-parties to wear dresses of bright colours, red, yellow, and green; and to perfume their beards and mustaches with civet, or to have rose-water sprinkled upon them; and ambergris or aloes-wood, or some other odoriferous substance, placed upon burning coals in a censer, diffused a delicious fragrance throughout the saloon of the revels.

The wine, it appears, was rather thick; for it was necessary to strain it: it was probably sweet, and not strong; for it was drunk in large quantities. Frequently, perhaps, it was nebeddh of dry raisins kept longer than the law allows. It was usually kept in a large earthen vessel, called "denn," high, and small at the bottom, which was partly imbedded in the earth to keep it upright. The name of this vessel is now given to a cask of wood, but the kind above mentioned was of earth; for it was easily broken.—A famous saint, Abu-l-Hoseyn En-Nooree, seeing a vessel on the Tigris containing thirty dennis belonging to the Khaleefeh El-Moatadid, and being told that they contained wine, took a boat-pole, and broke them all, excepting one. When brought before the Khaleefeh to answer for this action, and asked by him, "Who made thee Moh-tesib?" he boldly answered, "He who made thee Khaleefeh!"—and was pardoned.—Pitch was used by the Arabs, as it was by the Greeks and Romans, for the purpose of curing their wine; the interior of the denn being coated with it. A smaller kind of earthen jar, or amphora, and a bottle of leather, or of glass, were also used. The wine was transferred for the table to glass jugs, or long-spouted ewers. These and the cups were placed upon a round embroidered cloth spread on the floor, or upon a round tray. The latter now is in general use, and is supported on a low stool, described in a former note, as being used at ordinary meals. The guests sat around, reclining against pillars; or they sat upon the deewán, and a page or slave handed the cup, having on his right arm a richly-embroidered napkin: the person after drinking took the end of this to wipe his lips. The cups are often described as holding a fluid pound, or little less than an English pint; and this is to be understood literally, or nearly so: they were commonly of cut glass; but some were of crystal, or silver, or gold. With these and the ewers or jugs were placed several saucers, or small dishes, of fresh and dried fruits; and fans and fly-whisks, of the kinds described on a former occasion, were used by the guests.

The most common and esteemed fruits in the countries inhabited by the Arabs may here be mentioned.

The date deserves the first place. The Prophet's favourite fruits were fresh dates and water-melons; and he ate them both together. "Honour," said he, "your paternal aunt, the date-palm, for she was created of the earth of which Adam was formed." It is said that God hath given this tree as a peculiar favour to the Muslims; that he hath decreed all the date-palms in the world to them, and they have accordingly conquered every country in which these trees are found; and all are said to have derived their origin from the Hejáz. The palm-tree has several well-known properties that render it an emblem of a human being; among which are these: that if the head be cut off, the tree dies; and if a branch be cut off, another does not grow in its place. Dates are preserved in a moist state by being merely pressed together in a basket or skin, and thus prepared are called "ajweh." There are many varieties of this fruit. The pith or heart of the palm is esteemed for its delicate flavour.

The water-melon, from what has been said of it above, ought to be ranked next; and it really merits this distinction. "Whoso eateth," said the Prophet, "a mouthful of water-melon, God writeth for him a thousand good works, and cancelleth a thousand evil works, and raiseth him a thousand degrees; for it came from Paradise;"—and again, "The water-melon is food and drink, acid and alkali, and a support of life," &c. The varieties of this fruit are very numerous.

The banana is a delicious fruit. The Prophet pronounced the banana-tree to be the only thing on earth that resembles a thing in Paradise; because it bears fruit both in winter and summer.

The pomegranate is another celebrated fruit. Every pomegranate, according to the Prophet, contains a fecundating seed from Paradise.

The other most common and esteemed fruits are the following:—the apple, pear, quince, apricot, peach, fig, sycamore-fig, grape, lote, jujube, plum, walnut, almond, hazel-nut, pistachio-nut, orange, Seville-orange, lime and lemon, citron, mulberry, olive, and sugar-cane.

Of a selection of these fruits consists the dessert which accompanies the wine; but the table is not complete without a bunch or two of flowers placed in the midst.

Though the Arabs are far from being remarkable for exhibiting taste in the planning of their gardens, they are passionately fond of flowers, and especially of the rose. — The Khaleefeh El-Mutawekkil monopolized roses for his own enjoyment; saying, "I am the King of Sultáns, and the rose is the king of sweet-scented flowers; therefore each of us is most worthy of the other for a companion." The rose, in his time, was seen nowhere but in his palace: during the season of this flower he wore rose-coloured clothes; and his carpets, &c., were sprinkled with rose-water. A similar passion for the rose is said to have distinguished a weaver, in the reign of El-Mamoon. He was constantly employed at his loom every day of the year, even during the congregational prayers of Friday, excepting in the rose-season, when he abandoned his work, and gave himself up to the enjoyment of wine, early in the morning and late in the evening, loudly proclaiming his revels by singing, —

"The season has become pleasant! The time of the rose has come! Take your morning potatoes, as long as the rose has blossoms and flowers!"

When he resumed his work, he made it known by singing aloud, —

"If my Lord prolong my life until the rose-season, I will take again my morning potatoes: but if I die before it, alas! for the loss of the rose and wine!"

"I implore the God of the supreme throne, whose glory be extolled, that my heart may continually enjoy the evening potatoes to the day of resurrection."

— The Khaleefeh was so amused with the humour of this man, that he granted him an annual pension of ten thousand dirhems to enable him to enjoy himself amply on these occasions. — Another anecdote may be added to shew the estimation of the rose in the mind of an Arab. It is said that Rowh Ibn-Hátim, the governor of the province of Northern Africa, was sitting one day, with a female slave, in an apartment of his palace, when a eunuch brought him a jar full of red and white roses, which a man had offered as a present. He ordered the eunuch to fill the jar with silver in return; but his concubine said, "O my lord thou hast not acted equitably towards the man; for his present to thee is of two colours, red and white." The Emeer replied, "Thou hast said truly;" and gave orders to fill the jar for him with silver and gold (dirhems and deenárs) intermixed. — Some persons preserve roses during the whole of the year, in the following manner. They take a number of rose-buds, and fill with them a new earthen jar, and, after closing its mouth with mud, so as to render it impervious to the air, bury it in the earth. Whenever they want a few roses, they take out some of these buds, which they find unaltered, sprinkle a little water upon them, and leave them for a short time in the air, when they open, and appear as if just gathered. — The rose is even a subject of miracles. It is related by Ibn-Kuteybeh, that there grows in India a kind of rose upon the leaves of which is inscribed, "There is no deity but God." But I find a more particular account of this miraculous rose. A person, who professed to have seen it, said, "I went into India, and I saw, at one of its towns, a large rose, sweet-scented, upon which was inscribed, in white characters, 'There is no deity but God; Mohammad is God's apostle: Aboo-Bekr is very veracious: 'Omar is the discriminator;' and I doubted of this, whether it had been done by art; so I took one of the blossoms not yet opened, and in it was the same inscription; and there were many of the same kind there. The people of that place worshipped stones, and knew not God, to whom be ascribed might and glory." — Roses are announced for sale in the streets of Cairo by the cry of "The rose was a thorn: from the sweat of the Prophet it blossomed!" in allusion to a miracle recorded of Mohammad. "When I was taken up into heaven," said the Prophet, "some of my sweat fell upon the earth, and from it sprang the rose; and whoever would smell my scent, let him smell the rose." In another tradition it is said, "The white rose was created from my sweat on the night of the Mearáj (the night of the Ascension); and the red rose, from the sweat of Jebrael (Gabriel, who accompanied the Prophet); and the yellow rose, from the sweat of El-Burák (the beast on which he rode from Mekkeh to Jerusalem previous to his ascension. These traditions are from Es-Suyootee, ubi supra). — The Persians take especial delight in roses; sometimes spreading them as carpets or beds on which to sit or recline in their revellings.

But there is a flower pronounced more excellent than the rose; that of the Egyptian privet, or Lawsonia inermis. Mohammad said, "The chief of the sweet-scented flowers of this world and of the next is the fághiyeh;" and this was his favourite flower. I approve of his taste; for this flower, which grows in clusters somewhat like those of the lilac, has a most delicious fragrance. But, on account of discrepancies in different traditions, a Muslim may, with a clear conscience, prefer either of the two flowers next mentioned.

The Prophet said of the violet, "The excellence of the extract of violets, above all other extracts, is as the excellence of me above all the rest of the creation: it is cold in summer and hot in winter;" and, in another tradition, "The excellence of the violet is as the excellence of El-Islâm above all other religions." A delicious sherbet is made of a conserve of sugar and violet-flowers.

The myrtle is the rival of the violet. "Adam," said the Prophet, "fell down from Paradise with three things; the myrtle, which is the chief of sweet-scented flowers in this world; an ear of wheat, which is the chief of all kinds of food in this world; and pressed dates, which are the chief of the fruits of this world."

The anemone was monopolized for his own enjoyment by Noamán Ibn-El-Mundhir (King of El-Heereh, and contemporary of Mohammad), as the rose was afterwards by El-Mutawekkil.

Another flower much admired and celebrated in the East is the gilliflower. There are three principal kinds; the most esteemed is the yellow, or golden-coloured, which has a delicious scent both by night and day; the next, the purple, and other dark kinds, which have a scent only in the night; the least esteemed, the white, which has no scent. The yellow gilliflower is an emblem of a neglected lover.

The narcissus is very highly esteemed. Galen says, "He who has two cakes of bread, let him dispose of one of them for some flowers of the narcissus; for bread is the food of the body, and the narcissus is the food of the soul." Hippocrates, too, gave a similar opinion.

The following flowers complete the list of those celebrated as most appropriate to add to the delights of wine: — the jasmine, eglantine, Seville-orange-flower, lily, sweet-basil, wild thyme, buphthalmum, chamomile, nuphar, lotus, pomegranate-flower, poppy, ketmia, crocus or saffron, safflower, flax, the blossoms of different kinds of bean, and those of the almond.

A sprig of Oriental willow adds much to the charms of a bunch of flowers, being the favourite symbol of a graceful female.

But I have not yet mentioned all that contributes to the pleasures of an Eastern carousal. For the juice of the grape is not fully relished without melodious sounds. "Wine is as the body; music, as the soul; and joy is their offspring." All the five senses should be gratified. For this reason, an Arab toper, who had nothing, it appears, but wine to enjoy, exclaimed, —

"Ho! give me wine to drink; and tell me, 'This is wine.'"

For, on drinking, his sight and smell and taste and touch would all be affected; but it was desirable that his hearing should also be pleased.

Music was condemned by the Prophet almost as severely as wine. "Singing and hearing songs," said he, "cause hypocrisy to grow in the heart, like as water promoteth the growth of corn:" — and musical instruments he declared to be among the most powerful means by which the Devil seduces man. An instrument of music is the Devil's muëddin, serving to call men to his worship, as stated in a former note. Of the hypocrisy of those attached to music, the following anecdote presents an instance: — A drunken young man with a lute in his hand was brought one night before the Khaleefeh 'Abd-El-Melik the son of Marwán, who, pointing to the instrument, asked what it was, and what was its use. The youth made no answer; so he asked those around him; but they also remained silent, till one, more bold than the rest, said, "O Prince of the Faithful, this is a lute: it is made by taking some wood of the pistachio-tree, and cutting it into thin pieces, and glueing these together, and then attaching over them these chords, which, when a beautiful girl touches them, send forth sounds more pleasant than those of rain falling upon a desert land; and my wife is separated from me by a triple divorce if every one in this council is not acquainted with it, and doth not know it as well as I do, and thou the first of them, O Prince of the Faithful." The Khaleefeh laughed, and ordered that the young man should be discharged.

The latter saying of the Prophet, respecting the Devil, suggests to me the insertion of another anecdote, related of himself by Ibráheem El-Mósilée, the father of Is-hák; both of whom were very celebrated musicians. I give a translation of it somewhat abridged. — "I asked Er-Rasheed," says Ibráheem, "to grant me permission to spend a day at home with my female slaves and brothers; and he gave me two thousand deenárs, and appointed the next Saturday for this purpose. I caused the meats and wine and other necessities to be prepared, and ordered the chamberlain to close the door, and admit no one: but while I was sitting, with my attendants standing in the form of a curved line before me, there entered, and approached me, a sheykh, reverend and dignified and comely in appearance, wearing short khuffs, and two soft gowns with a kalensuweh upon his head, and in his hand a silver-headed staff; and sweet odours were diffused from his clothes. I was enraged with the chamberlain for admitting him; but on his saluting me in a very courteous manner, I returned his salutation, and desired him to sit down. He then began to repeat to me stories, tales of war, and poetry; so that my anger was appeased, and it appeared to me that my servants had not presumed to admit him until acquainted with his politeness and courteousness; I therefore said to him, "Hast thou any inclination for meat?" He answered, "I have no want of it."—And the wine?" said I. He replied, "Yes." So I drank a large cupful and he did the same, and then said to me, "O Ibráheem, wilt thou let us hear some specimen of thy art in which thou hast excelled the people of thy profession?" I was angry at his words; but I made light of the matter, and, having taken the lute and tuned it, I played and sang; whereupon he said, "Thou hast performed well, O Ibráheem." I became more enraged, and said within myself, "He is not content with coming hither without permission, and asking me to sing, but he calls me by my name, and proves himself unworthy of my conversation." He then said, "Wilt thou let us hear more? If so, we will requite thee." And I took the lute, and sang, using my utmost care, on account of his saying, 'we will requite thee.' He was moved with delight, and said, 'Thou hast performed well, O my master Ibráheem:—adding, 'Wilt thou permit thy slave to sing?' I answered, 'As thou pleasest:—but thinking lightly of his sense to sing after me. He took the lute, and tuned it; and, by Allah! I imagined that the lute spoke in his hands with an eloquent Arab tongue. He proceeded to sing some verses commencing,—

'My heart is wounded! Who will give me, for it, a heart without a wound?'"

The narrator continues by saying, that he was struck dumb and motionless with ecstasy; and that the strange sheykh, after having played and sung again, and taught him an enchanting air (with which he afterwards enraptured his patron, the Khaleefeh), vanished. Ibráheem, in alarm, seized his sword; and was the more amazed when he found that the porter had not seen the stranger enter or leave the house; but he heard his voice again, outside, telling him that he was Abou-Murrah (the Devil).—Two other anecdotes of a similar kind are related in the work from which the above is taken.

Ibráheem El-Mósilee, his son Is-hák, and Mukhárik (a pupil of the former), were especially celebrated among the Arab musicians, and among the distinguished men of the reign of Hároon Er-Rasheed. Is-hák El-Mósilee relates, of his father Ibráheem, that when Er-Rasheed took him into his service, he gave him a hundred and fifty thousand dirhems, and allotted him a monthly pension of ten thousand dirhems, besides occasional presents [one of which is mentioned as amounting to a hundred thousand dirhems for a single song], and the produce of his (Ibráheem's) farms: he had food constantly prepared for him; three sheep every day for his kitchen, besides birds; three thousand dirhems were allowed him for fruits, perfumes, &c., every month, and a thousand dirhems for his clothing; "and with all this," says his son, "he died without leaving more than three thousand deenárs, a sum not equal to his debts, which I paid after his death."—Ibráheem was of Persian origin, and of a high family. He was commonly called the Nedeem (or cup-companion), being Er-Rasheed's favourite companion at the wine-table; and his son, who enjoyed the like distinction with El-Ma-moon, received the same appellation, as well as that of "Son of the Nedeem." Ibráheem was the most famous musician of his time, at least till his son attained celebrity.

Is-hák El-Mósilee was especially famous as a musician; but he was also a good poet, accomplished in general literature, and endowed with great wit. He was honoured above all other persons in the pay of El-Ma-moon, and enjoyed a long life; but for many years before his death he was blind.

Mukhárik appears to have rivalled his master Ibráheem. The latter, he relates, took him to perform before Er-Rasheed, who used to have a curtain suspended between him and the musicians. "Others," he says, "sang, and he was unmoved; but when I sang he came forth from behind the curtain, and exclaimed, 'Young man, hither!' and he seated me upon the seer [a kind of couch], and gave me thirty thousand dirhems." The following anecdote (which I abridge a little in translation) shews his excellence in the art which he professed, and the effect of melody on an Arab:—"After drinking with the Khaleefeh a whole night, I asked his permission," says he, "to take the air in the Rusáfeh, which he granted; and while I was walking there, I saw a damsel who appeared as if the rising sun beamed from her face. She had a basket, and I followed her. She stopped at a fruiterer's, and bought some fruit; and observing that I was following her, she looked back and abused me several times; but still I followed her until she arrived at a great door, after having filled her basket with fruits and flowers and similar things. When she had entered, and the door was closed behind her, I sat down opposite to it, deprived of my reason by her beauty; and knew that there must be in the house a wine-party. The sun went down upon me while I sat there; and at length there came two handsome young men on asses, and they knocked at the door, and when they were admitted I entered with them; the master of the house thinking that I was their companion, and they imagining that I was one of his friends. A repast was brought, and we ate, and washed our hands, and were perfumed. The master of the house then said to the two young men, 'Have ye any desire that I should call such a one?' (mentioning a female name). They answered, 'If thou wilt grant us the favour, well: '—so he called for her, and she came, and lo, she was the maiden whom I had seen before, and who had abused me. A servant-maid preceded her, bearing her lute, which she placed in her lap. Wine was then brought, and she sang while we drank, and shook with delight. 'Whose air is that?' they asked. She answered, 'Sedee Mukhárik's.' She then sang another air, which, also, she said was mine; while they drank by pints; she looking aside and doubtfully at me until I lost my patience, and called out to her to do her best: but in attempting to do so, singing a third air, she overstrained her voice, and I said, 'Thou hast made a mistake: '—upon which she threw the lute from her lap, in anger, so that she nearly broke it; saying, 'Take it thyself, and let us hear thee.' I answered, 'Well;' and, having taken it and tuned it perfectly, sang the first of the airs which she had sung before me; whereupon all of them sprang upon their feet, and kissed my head. I then sang the second air, and the third; and their reason almost fled, from ecstasy. The master of the house, after asking his guests, and being told by them that they knew me not, came to me, and, kissing my hand, said, 'By Allah, my master, who art thou?' I answered, 'By Allah, I am the singer Mukhárik.'—'And for what purpose,' said he, kissing both my hands, 'camest thou hither?' I replied, 'As a spunger; '—and related what had happened with respect to the maiden: whereupon he looked towards his two companions, and said to them, 'Tell me, by Allah, do ye not know that I gave for that girl thirty thousand dirhems, and have refused to sell her?' They answered, 'It is so.' Then said he, 'I take you as witnesses that I have given her to him.'—'And we,' said the two friends, 'will pay thee two-thirds of her price.' So he put me in possession of the girl, and in the evening, when I departed, he presented me also with rich dresses and other gifts, with all of which I went away; and as I passed the places where the maiden had abused me, I said to her, 'Repeat thy words to me;' but she could not, for shame. Holding the girl's hand, I went with her immediately to the Khaleefeh, whom I found in anger at my long absence; but when I related my story to him he was surprised, and laughed, and ordered that the master of the house and his two friends should be brought before him, that he might requite them: to the former he gave forty thousand dirhems; to each of his two friends, thirty thousand; and to me, a hundred thousand; and I kissed his feet, and departed."

It is particularly necessary for the Arab musician, that he have a retentive memory, well stocked with choice pieces of poetry, and with facetious or pleasant anecdotes, interspersed with songs; and that he have a ready wit, aided by dramatic talent, to employ these materials with good effect. If, to such qualifications, he adds fair attainments in the difficult rules of grammar, a degree of eloquence, comic humour, and good temper, and is not surpassed by many in his art, he is sure to be a general favourite. Very few Muslims of the higher classes have condescended to study music, because they would have been despised by their inferiors for doing so; or because they themselves have despised or condemned the art. Ibráheem, the son of the Khaleefeh El-Mahdee, and competitor of El-Mamoon, was a remarkable exception: he is said to have been an excellent musician, and a good singer.

In the houses of the wealthy, the vocal and instrumental performers were usually (as is the case in many houses in the present age) domestic female slaves, well instructed in their art by hired male or female professors. In the work before us, these slaves are commonly described as standing or sitting unveiled in the presence of male guests; but, from several descriptions of musical entertainments that I have met with in Arabic works, it appears that, according to the more approved custom in respectable society, they were concealed on such occasions behind a curtain, which generally closed the front of an elevated recess. In all the houses of wealthy Arabs that I have entered, one or each of the larger saloons has an elevated closet, the front of which is closed by a screen of wooden lattice-work, to serve as an orchestra for the domestic or hired female singers and instrumental performers. Of the hired performers, any further mention is not here required; but of the slaves and free ladies who supplied their place, a few words must be added, as very necessary to illustrate the preceding and many other tales in this work.

To a person acquainted with modern Arabian manners, it must appear inconsistent with truth to describe such females as exposing their faces before strange men, unless he can discover in sober histories some evidence of their having been less strict in this respect than the generality of Arab females at the present period. I find, however, a remarkable proof that such was the case in the latter part of the ninth century of the Flight, and the beginning of the tenth; that is, about the end of the fifteenth century of our era. The famous historian Es-Suyootee, who flourished at this period, in his preface to a curious work on wedlock, written to correct the corrupt manners of his age, says,—"Seeing that the women of this time deck themselves with the attire of prostitutes, and walk in the sooks (or market-streets), like female warriors against the religion, and uncover their faces and hands before men, to incline [men's] hearts to them by evil suggestions, and play at feasts with young men, thereby meriting the anger of the Compassionate [i. e. God], and go forth to the public baths and assemblies, with various kinds of ornaments and perfumes, and with conceited gait; for the which they shall be congregated in Hell-fire, for opposing the good, and on account of this their affected gait, while to their husbands they are disobedient, behaving to them in the reverse manner, excepting when they fear to abridge their liberty of going abroad by such conduct; for they are like swine and apes in their interior nature, though like daughters of Adam in their exterior appearance; especially the women of this age; not advising their husbands in matters of religion, but the latter erring in permitting them to go out to every assembly; sisters of devils and demons, &c., &c. . . . I have undertaken the composition of this volume." A more convincing testimony than this, I think, cannot be required.

The lute (el-'ood) is the only instrument that is generally described as used at the entertainments which we have been considering. Engravings of this and other musical instruments are given in my work on the Modern Egyptians. The Arab viol (called rabâb) was commonly used by inferior performers. (See also Note 26. below.)

The Arab music is generally of a soft and plaintive character, and particularly that of the most refined description, which is distinguished by a remarkable peculiarity, the division of tones into thirds. The singer aims at distinct enunciation of the words, for this is justly admired; and delights in a thrilling style. The airs of songs are commonly very short and simple, adapted to a single verse, or even to a single hemstitch; but in the instrumental music there is more variety.

NOTE 23. This is often said to a person whose presence is disagreeable to his companions.

NOTE 24.—On the Kalenderees. In the old translation, these three strangers are called "Calenders;" that is, "Kalenderees;" but in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and the edition of Breslau, they are designated as "Karendelees," "miserable or ridiculous beggars;" and in that of Cairo, the term applied to them is "sa'aleek," or, simply, "paupers," or "mendicants." Some may suppose the right reading to be "Kalenderees;" for it was a custom of this order of Darweeshes to shave their beards: they were forbidden to do so in the year of the Flight 761, by the Sultan of Egypt (El-Melik en-Nâsir El-Hasan); but whether they afterwards reverted to this habit, I do not know. The order of the Kalenderees, however, was not founded until about the commencement of the fifth century of the Flight, a period long posterior to that to which the tale relates.

NOTE 25. In the edition of Cairo, they are said to have arrived from Greece.

NOTE 26.—On the Persian Harp. This instrument is called in Arabic "junk," from the Persian "chang." It has almost fallen into disuse, and I have never seen it. The number of strings vary from 20 to 27.

NOTE 27. — On the Title and Office of Khaleefeh. As most of our best authors on Oriental subjects have for some years past deviated from our old general mode of writing this title, substituting (for "Caliph") "Khalif," "Khalifah," &c., I have taken the same liberty. It cannot be correctly written, at the same time congenially with our language and with its orthography in Arabic characters, otherwise than "Khaleefeh" or "Khaleefah;" and of these two modes I adopt the one which agrees with the manner in which the title is most generally pronounced by the Arabs. The meaning of this title is "Successor," or "Vicar;" and it was originally given to the universal sovereigns of the Muslim Arabs, as signifying "Successor of the Prophet;" but afterwards, in a more exalted sense, as "Vicar of God:" the Khaleefeh being the head of the religion as well as the supreme political governor, or at least arrogating to himself the right to possess such supremacy, throughout the whole Muslim world.

NOTE 28. The stories in which this justly-celebrated man is mentioned will, I think, be more agreeable to those readers who are unacquainted with his history, of which, therefore, I shall say nothing.

NOTE 29. Mesroor was a black eunuch, and a favourite servant of Er-Rasheed. The name signifies "happy."

NOTE 30. "Tabareeyeh" is the modern name for Tiberias.

NOTE 31. — Description of Kháns, or Wekálehs. A Khán is a building chiefly designed for the accommodation of merchants, and for the reception of their goods. In Egypt, a building of this kind is generally called a Wekáleh. I have described it, in a former work, as surrounding a square or oblong court, and having, on the ground-floor, vaulted magazines for merchandise, which face the court, and are sometimes used as shops. Above these are generally lodgings, which are entered from a gallery extending along each of the four sides of the court; or, in the place of these lodgings, there are other magazines; and in many kháns or wekálehs which have apartments designed as lodgings, these apartments are used as magazines. In general, the building has only one common entrance; the door of which is closed at night, and kept by a porter.

NOTE 32. It is customary for a guest or visitor to ask permission of the host, or master of the house, before taking his departure. A common form of speech used on this occasion is, "With your permission, I rise."

NOTE 33. Many Muslims perform the pilgrimage with the view of expiating their offences, and, at the Kaabeh, or at the tomb of the Prophet, make a vow to abstain from any glaring infringement of the law of which they may before have been guilty.

NOTE 34. I learn, from a marginal note in my copy of the original, by the sheykh Mohammad Et-Tantáwee, that these verses are the composition of Ibn-Sahl El-Ish-beelee. Three concluding verses of the same ode, and a second poetical quotation immediately following, I have passed over.

NOTE 35. In the original there are some errors in this part of the story, which the sequel requires me to correct. The cateress is described as having sung three successive songs, accompanying them with her lute. After the first song, the mistress of the house is said to have been affected in the manner described in the translation, and to have exposed to view the marks of beating. The second lady (namely, the portress) is represented as similarly excited by the second song; and the third lady (the cateress herself), by the third song. The last also is said to have exhibited upon her person those marks which, as the sequel shews, were borne by the second.

NOTE 36. The "mikra'ah," vulgarly called "makra'ah," is a portion of the thicker end of a palm-branch stripped of the leaves. It is often used to beat a person in sport; but in this case, two or three splits are usually made in the thicker part of it, to increase the sound of the blows.

NOTE 37. In the original, "the portress." See Note 35, above.

NOTE 38. Perhaps it is needless to explain that the wish here expressed, for a protractive trial on the day of judgment, is occasioned by the longing for reunion, and the fear of separation after that day. The Muslims usually pray for an easy (and consequently, a short) reckoning.

NOTE 39. I have omitted the third song of the cateress, and the description of its effects, mentioned in Note 35.

NOTE 40. See Note 47 to Chapter II.

NOTE 41. It seems to be implied that the lady discovered her guests, notwithstanding their disguise, to be persons of rank.

NOTE 42. I read "fukarâü aajâm" for "fukarâü-l-hojjâm:" the former, carelessly written (in Arabic characters), might easily be mistaken for the latter.

NOTE 43. This phrase is used to signify "Recover thy senses;" alluding to a person's drawing his hand over his head or face after a sleep or fit.

NOTE 44. The burial-grounds of Eastern cities are generally so extensive, that, with the varied structures which they contain, they may aptly be called "Cities of the Dead." It was with difficulty that I recognized the tomb of the lamented Burckhardt, in the great cemetery on the north of Cairo, even after I had carefully noticed its place on a former visit.

NOTE 45. I have ventured to make a slight alteration here; but it is one which does not in the least affect the consistency of the tale. Marriage with a foster-sister is as expressly forbidden by the Mohammedan law as that with a natural sister.

NOTE 46. "The Truth" is one of the ninety-nine names or epithets of God.

NOTE 47. Many an Arab would rather risk the loss of his head than part with his beard; for the latter is regarded by almost all Muslims with a superstitious respect; and to shave it off, at least after it has been suffered to grow for many days, they consider as sinful: this, however, is some times done by religious mendicants, as it is also by some of those persons who seek, or enjoy, the reputation of sanctity, and who are, or pretend to be, insane.

NOTE 48. By "the seven readings," we are to understand seven slightly different modes of reading the Kur-ân, seldom differing essentially as to the sense.

NOTE 49. Astrology (not astronomy) is here meant. Though a forbidden science, it is studied by many Muslims.

NOTE 50. A misplaced diacritical point occasions a wrong reading here, in the original, which I have corrected.

NOTE 51. The Mohammedan law requires that every man be acquainted with some art or occupation by which he may, in case of necessity, at least be able to obtain the means of supporting himself and such of his family as are dependant upon him, and of fulfilling all his religious as well as moral duties. Hence it has been a common custom of Muslim princes, in every age, to learn some useful art; and many of them have distinguished themselves by displaying exquisite skill in the work of their hands, and especially in caligraphy, of which the Orientals in general are great admirers.

NOTE 52. The 'Efreet (as we are told in some editions of the original) had taken this lady against the consent of his family, and therefore could not more frequently visit her.

NOTE 53. The term "kubbeh" is often applied to a closet or small chamber adjoining a saloon; and in this sense it appears to be here used.

NOTE 54. — On Sherbets. The Arabs have various kinds of sherbets, or sweet drinks; the most common of which is merely sugar and water, made very sweet. The most esteemed kind is prepared from a hard conserve of violets, made by pounding violet-flowers, and then boiling them with sugar. Other kinds are prepared from conserves of fruits, &c. The sherbet is served in covered glass cups, containing from two-thirds to three-quarters of an English pint; the same which I have described in a former note as used for wine. These are placed on a round tray, and covered with a round piece of embroidered silk, or cloth of gold; and on the right arm of the person who presents the sherbet, is hung a long napkin with a deep embroidered border of gold and coloured silks at each end, which is ostensibly offered for the purpose of wiping the lips after drinking, though the lips are scarcely touched with it.

NOTE 55. The Arabs are very fond of having their feet, and especially the soles, slowly rubbed with the hand; and this operation, which is one of the services commonly required of a wife or female slave, is a usual mode of waking a person.

NOTE 56. Here, and again in the same and a subsequent sentence, for "kheiyá-teen," I read "hattábeen." In the Breslau edition, "khattábeen" is put for the latter. The right reading is obvious.

NOTE 57. Falsehood was commended by the Prophet when it tended to reconcile persons at enmity with each other, and when practised in order to please one's wife, or to obtain any advantage in a war with infidels, though strongly reprobated in other cases.

NOTE 58. Four verses here inserted in the original appear to me to be a corruption of a couplet which better expresses the same meaning, and which I have therefore translated in the place of the former. As the lines to which I allude are particularly pleasing, I may perhaps be excused if I here introduce the original words, which are as follow:—

"Isháratunà fi-l-hobbi remzu 'oyooninà: wa-kullu lebeeibin bi-l-isháratí yefhamu.
Hawájibunà tekdi-l-hawájá beyenà: fa-nahnu sukootun wa-l-hawá yetekellemu."

NOTE 59. This is not meant to disparage the individual lady here mentioned, but is a saying of the Prophet applied to the sex in general.

NOTE 60. In the edition of Cairo, this story is omitted. I translate it from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights.

NOTE 61. "Faker" (which signifies "poor," and is particularly used in the sense of "poor in the sight of God," or rather, "in need of the mercy of God") is an appellation commonly given to poor persons who especially occupy themselves in religious exercises.

NOTE 62. The performances called "zikrs" will be briefly described towards the close of the next note.

NOTE 63.—On Muslim Saints, or Devotees. The tale of the Envied Sheykh, and several other stories in this work, require that the reader should be acquainted with the remarkable opinions which the Arabs entertain with respect to the offices and supernatural powers of their saints. Such matters form an important part of the mysteries of the Darweeshes, and are but imperfectly known to the generality of Muslims.

The distinguished individuals above mentioned are known by the common appellation of "Welees," or particular favourites of God. The more eminent among them compose a mysterious hierarchical body, whose government respects the whole human race, infidels as well as believers; but whose power is often exercised in such a manner that the subjects influenced by it know not from what person or persons its effects proceed. The general governor or Coryphæus of these holy beings is commonly called the "Kutb," which literally signifies a "pole," or an "axis," and is metaphorically used to signify a "chief," either in a civil or political, or in a spiritual sense. The Kutb of the saints is distinguished by other appellations: he is called "Kutb el-Ghós," or "—— el-Ghóth" ("the Kutb of Invocation for Help"), &c.; and simply "El-Ghós." The orders under the rule of this chief are called "'Omud (or Owtád), Akhyár, Abdál, Nujabá, and Nukabá:" I name them according to their precedence. Perhaps to these should be added an inferior order called "As-háb ed-Darak," which is said to mean "Watchmen," or "Overseers." The members are not known as such to their inferior, unenlightened fellow-creatures; and are often invisible to them. This is more frequently the case with the Kutb, who, though generally stationed at Mekkeh, on the roof of the Kaabeh, is never visible there, nor at any of his other favourite stations or places of resort; yet his voice is often heard at these places. Whenever he and the saints under his authority mingle among ordinary men, they are not distinguished by a dignified appearance, but are always humbly clad. These, and even inferior saints, are said to perform astonishing miracles, such as flying in the air, passing unhurt through fire, swallowing fire, glass, &c., walking upon water, transporting themselves in a moment of time to immense distances, and supplying themselves and others with food in desert places. Their supernatural power they are supposed to obtain by a life of the most exalted piety, and especially by constant self-denial, accompanied with the most implicit reliance upon God; by the services of good genii; and, as many believe, by the knowledge and utterance of "the most great name" of God. A miracle performed by a saint is distinguished by the term "karámeh" from one performed by a prophet, which is called "moajizeh."

El-Khidr and Ilyás (or Elias), of whom I have before had occasion to speak, are both believed to have been Kutbs, and the latter is called in the Kur-án an apostle; but it is disputed whether the former was a prophet or merely a welee. Both are said to have drunk of the Fountain of Life, and to be in consequence still living; and Ilyás is commonly believed to invest the successive Kutbs. The similarity of the miracles ascribed to the Kutbs and those performed by Elias or Elijah I have remarked in a former work. Another miracle, reminding us of the mantle of Elijah in the hands of his successor, may here be mentioned.—A saint who was the Kutb of his time, dying at Toonis (or Tunis), left his clothes in trust to his attendant, Mohammad El-Ashwam, a native of the neighbouring regency of Tripoli (now called Tarábulus), who desired to sell these relics, but was counselled to retain them, and accordingly, though high prices were bidden for them, made them his own by purchase. As soon as they became his property, he was affected, we are told, with a divine ecstasy, and endowed with miraculous powers.

Innumerable miracles are related to have been performed by Muslim saints, and large volumes are filled with the histories of their wonderful lives. The author of the work from which the above story is taken, mentions, as a fact to be relied on, in an account of one of his ancestors, that, his lamp happening to go out one night while he was reading alone in the riwák of the Jabart (of which he was the sheykh), in the great mosque El-Azhar, the forefinger of his right hand emitted a light which enabled him to continue his reading until his naakeb had trimmed and lighted another lamp.

From many stories of a similar kind that I have read, I select the following as a fair specimen: it is related by a very celebrated saint, Ibráheem El-Khowwás.—"I entered the desert [on pilgrimage to Mekkeh from El-'Erák], and there joined me a man having a belt round his waist, and I said, 'Who art thou?'—He answered, 'A Christian; and I desire thy company.' We walked together for seven days, eating nothing; after which he said to me, 'O monk of the Muslims, produce what thou hast in the way of refreshment; for we are hungry:' so I said, 'O my God, disgrace me not before this infidel:' and lo, a tray, upon which were bread and broiled meat and fresh dates and a mug of water. We ate, and continued our journey seven days more; and I then said to him, 'O monk of the Christians, produce what thou hast in the way of refreshment; for the turn is come to thee:' whereupon he leaned upon his staff, and prayed; and lo, two trays, containing double that which was on my tray. I was confounded, and refused to eat: he urged me, saying, 'Eat;' but I did it not. Then said he, 'Be glad; for I give thee two pieces of good news: one of them is, that I testify that there is no deity but God, and that Mohammad is God's Apostle: the other, that I said, O God, if there be worth in this servant, supply me with two trays:—so this is through thy blessing.' We ate, and the man put on the dress of pilgrimage, and so entered Mekkeh, where he remained with me a year as a student; after which he died, and I buried him in [the cemetery] El-Maala." "And God," says the author from whom I take this story, "is all-knowing:" i. e. He alone knoweth whether it be strictly true: but this is often added to the narration of traditions resting upon high authority.—The saint above mentioned was called "El-Khowwás" (or the maker of palm-leaf baskets, &c.) from the following circumstance, related by himself.—"I used," said he, "to go out of the town [Er-Rei] and sit by a river on the banks of which was abundance of palm-leaves; and it occurred to my mind to make every day five baskets [kuffehs], and to throw them into the river, for my amusement, as if I were obliged to do so. My time was so passed for many days: at length, one day, I thought I would walk after the baskets, and see whither they had gone: so I proceeded a while along the bank of the river, and found an old woman sitting sorrowful. On that day I had made nothing. I said to her, 'Wherefore do I see thee sorrowful?' She answered, 'I am a widow: my husband died leaving five daughters, and nothing to maintain them; and it is my custom to repair every day to this river, and there come to me, upon the surface of the water, five baskets, which I sell, and by means of them I procure food; but to-day they have not come, and I know not what to do.' Upon hearing this, I raised my head towards heaven, and said, 'O my God, had I known that I had more than five children to maintain, I had laboured more diligently!' He then took the old woman to his house, and gave her money and flour, and said to her, 'Whenever thou wantest anything, come hither and take what may suffice you."

An irresistible influence has often been exercised over the minds of princes and other great men by reputed saints. Many a Muslim Monarch has thus been incited (as the Kings of Christendom were by Peter the Hermit) to undertake religious wars, or urged to acts of piety and charity; or restrained from tyranny by threats of Divine vengeance to be called down upon his head by the imprecations of a welee. 'Alee, the favourite son of the Khaleefeh El-Ma-moon, was induced, for the sake of religion, to flee from the splendour and luxuries of his father's court, and, after the example of a self-denying devotee, to follow the occupation of a porter, in a state of the most abject poverty, at El-Basrah, fasting all the day, remaining without sleep at night in a mosque, and walking barefooted, until, under an accumulation of severe sufferings, he prematurely ended his days, dying on a mat. The honours which he refused to receive in life were paid to him after his death: his rank being discovered by a ring and paper which he left, his corpse was anointed with camphor and musk and aloes, wrapped in fine linen of Egypt, and so conveyed to his distressed father at Baghdád.

Self-denial I have before mentioned as one of the most important means by which to attain the dignity of a welee. A very famous saint, Esh-Shiblee, is said to have received from his father an inheritance of sixty millions of deenárs (a sum incredible, and probably a mistake for sixty thousand, or for sixty million dirhems), besides landed property, and to have expended it all in charity; also, to have thrown into the Tigris seventy hundredweight of books, written by his own hand during a period of twenty years.

Sháh El-Karmánee, another celebrated saint, had a beautiful daughter, whom the Sultán of his country sought in marriage. The holy man required three days to consider his sovereign's proposal, and in the meantime visited several mosques, in one of which he saw a young man humbly occupied in prayer. Having waited till he had finished, he accosted him, saying, "My son, hast thou a wife?" Being answered, "No," he said, "I have a maiden, a virtuous devotee, who hath learned the whole of the Kur-án, and is amply endowed with beauty. Dost thou desire her?"—"Who," said the young man, "will marry me to such a one as thou hast described, when I possess no more than three dirhems?"—"I will marry thee to her," answered the saint: "she is my daughter, and I am Sháh the son of Shujáa El-Karmánee: give me the dirhems that thou hast, that I may buy a dirhem's worth of bread, and a dirhem's worth of something savoury, and a dirhem's worth of perfume." The marriage-contract was performed; but when the bride came to the young man, she saw a stale cake of bread placed upon the top of his mug; upon which she put on her izár, and went out. Her husband said, "Now I perceive that the daughter of Sháh El-Karmánee is displeased with my poverty." She answered, "I did not withdraw from fear of poverty, but on account of the weakness of thy faith, seeing how thou layest by a cake of bread for the morrow."

One of my friends in Cairo, Abu-l-Kásim of Geelán, mentioned in a former note, entertained me with a long relation of the mortifications and other means which he employed to attain the rank of a welee. These were chiefly self-denial and a perfect reliance upon Providence. He left his home in a state of voluntary destitution and complete nudity, to travel through Persia and the surrounding countries, and yet more distant regions if necessary, in search of a spiritual guide. For many days he avoided the habitations of men, fasting from daybreak till sunset, and then eating nothing but a little grass or a few leaves or wild fruits, till by degrees he habituated himself to almost total abstinence from every kind of nourishment. His feet, at first blistered, and cut by sharp stones, soon became callous; and in proportion to his reduction of food, his frame, contrary to the common course of nature, became (according to his own account) more stout and lusty. Bronzed by the sun, and with his black hair hanging over his shoulders (for he had abjured the use of the razor), he presented, in his nudity, a wild and frightful appearance; and on his first approaching a town, was surrounded and pelted by a crowd of boys; he therefore retreated, and, after the example of our first parents, made himself a partial covering of leaves; and this he always after did on similar occasions; never remaining long enough in a town for his leafy apron to wither. The abodes of mankind he always passed at a distance, excepting when several days' fast, while traversing an arid desert, compelled him to obtain a morsel of bread or a cup of water from the hand of some charitable fellow-creature. One thing that he particularly dreaded was, to receive relief from a sinful man, or from a demon in the human form.

In passing over a parched and desolate tract, where for three days he had found nothing to eat, not even a blade of grass, nor a spring from which to refresh his tongue, he became overpowered with thirst, and prayed that God would send him a messenger with a pitcher of water. "But," said he, "let the water be in a green Baghdáhee pitcher, that I may know it be from Thee, and not from the Devil; and when I ask the bearer to give me to drink, let him pour it over my head, that I may not too much gratify my carnal desire."—"I looked behind me," he continued, "and saw a man bearing a green Baghdáhee pitcher of water, and said to him, 'Give me to drink;' and he came up to me, and poured the contents over my head, and departed! By Allah it was so!"—Rejoicing in this miracle, as a proof of his having attained to a degree of wiláyeḥ (or saintship), and refreshed by the water, he continued his way over the desert, more firm than ever in his course of self-denial, which, though imperfectly followed, had been the means of his being thus distinguished. But the burning thirst returned shortly after, and he felt himself at the point of sinking under it, when he beheld before him a high hill, with a rivulet running by its base. To the summit of this hill he determined to ascend, by way of mortification, before he would taste the water, and this point, with much difficulty, he reached at the close of the day. Here standing, he saw approaching, below, a troop of horsemen, who paused at the foot of the hill, when their chief, who was foremost, called out to him by name, "O Abu-l-Kásim! O Geelánee! Come down and drink!"—but, persuaded by this that he was Iblees with a troop of his sons, the evil Genii, he withstood the temptation, and remained stationary until the deceiver with his attendants had passed on, and were out of sight. The sun had then set; his thirst had somewhat abated; and he only drank a few drops. Continuing his wanderings in the desert, he found, upon a pebbly plain, an old man with a long white beard, who accosted him, asking of what he was in search. "I am seeking," he answered, "a spiritual guide; and my heart tells me that thou art the guide I seek." "My son," said the old man, "thou seest yonder a saint's tomb: it is a place where prayer is answered: go thither, enter it, and seat thyself: neither eat nor drink nor sleep; but occupy thyself solely, day and night, in repeating silently, 'Lá iláha illalláh' (There is no deity but God); and let not any living creature see thy lips move in doing so; for among the peculiar virtues of these words is this, that they may be uttered without any motion of the lips. Go, and peace be on thee."—"Accordingly," said my friend, "I went thither. It was a small square building, crowned by a cupola; and the door was open. I entered, and seated myself, facing the niche, and the oblong monument over the grave. It was evening, and I commenced my silent professions of the Unity, as directed by my guide; and at dusk I saw a white figure seated beside me, as if assisting in my devotional task. I stretched forth my hand to touch it; but found that it was not a material substance; yet there it was: I saw it distinctly. Encouraged by this vision, I continued my task for three nights and days without intermission, neither eating nor drinking, yet increasing in strength both of body and of spirit; and on the third day, I saw written upon the white-washed walls of the tomb, and on the ground, and in the air, wherever I turned my eyes, 'Lá iláha illa-lláh;' and whenever a fly entered the tomb, it formed these words in its flight. By Allah it was so! My object was now fully attained: I felt myself endowed with supernatural knowledge: thoughts of my friends and acquaintances troubled me not; but I knew where each of them was, in Persia, India, Arabia, and Turkey, and what each was doing. I experienced an indescribable happiness. This state lasted several years; but at length I was insensibly enticed back to worldly objects: I came to this country; my fame as a calligraphist drew me into the service of the government; and now see what I am, decked with pelisses and shawls, and with this thing [a diamond order] on my breast; too old, I fear, to undergo again the self-denial necessary to restore me to true happiness, though I have almost resolved to make the attempt."—Soon after this conversation, he was deprived of his office, and died of the plague. He was well known to have passed several years as a wandering devotee; and his sufferings, combined with enthusiasm, perhaps disordered his imagination, and made him believe that he really saw the strange sights which he described to me; for there was an appearance of earnestness and sincerity in his manner, such as I thought could hardly be assumed by a conscious impostor.

Insanity, however, if not of a very violent and dangerous nature, is commonly regarded by Muslims as a quality that entitles the subject of it to be esteemed as a saint; being supposed to be the abstrac-tion of the mind from worldly affairs, and its total devotion to God. This popular superstition is a fertile source of imposture; for, a reputation for sanctity being so easily obtained and supported, there are numbers of persons who lay claim to it from motives of indolence and licentiousness, eager to receive alms merely for performing the tricks of madmen, and greedy of indulging in pleasures forbidden by the law; such indulgences not being considered in their case as transgressions by the common people, but rather as indications of holy frenzy. From my own observation I should say that lunatics or idiots, or impostors, constitute the majority of the persons reputed to be saints among the Muslims of the present day; and most of those who are not more than slightly tinged with insanity are darweeshes.

A reputed saint of this description, in Cairo, in whom persons of some education put great faith, affected to have a particular regard for me. He several times accosted me in an abrupt manner, acquainted me with the state of my family in England, and uttered incoherent predictions respecting me, all of which communications, excepting one which he qualified with an "in shâa-l âh" (or "if it be the will of God"), I must confess, proved to be true; but I must also state that he was acquainted with two of my friends who might have materially assisted him to frame these predictions, though they protested to me that they had not done so. The following extract from a journal which I kept in Cairo during my second visit to Egypt, will convey some idea of this person, who will serve as a picture of many of his fraternity. — To-day (Nov. 6th, 1834), as I was sitting in the shop of the Bâshâ's booksellers, a reputed saint, whom I have often seen here, came and seated himself by me, and began, in a series of abrupt sentences, to relate to me various matters respecting me, past, present, and to come. He is called the sheykh 'Alee El-Leysee. He is a poor man, supported by alms; tall and thin and very dark, about thirty years of age, and wears nothing at present but a blue shirt and a girdle, and a padded red cap. "O Efendee," he said, "thou hast been very anxious for some days. There is a grain of anxiety remaining in thee yet. Do not fear. There is a letter coming to thee by sea, that will bring thee good news." He then proceeded to tell me of the state of my family, and that all were well excepting one, whom he particularized by description, and who he stated to be then suffering from an intermittent fever. [This proved to be exactly true.] "This affliction," he continued, "may be removed by prayer; and the excellences of the next night, the night of [i. e. preceding] the first Friday of the month of Regeb, of Regeb, the holy Regeb, are very great. I wanted to ask thee for something to-day; but I feared: I feared greatly. Thou must be invested with the wilâyeih [i. e. be made a welee]: the welees love thee; and the Prophet loves thee. Thou must go to the sheykh Mustafâ El-Munâdee, and the sheykh El-Bahâee. Thou must be a welee." He then took my right hand, in the manner commonly practised in the ceremony which admits a person a darweesh, and repeated the Fâtebah (commonly pronounced Fât'hah); after which he added, "I have admitted thee my darweesh." Having next told me of several circumstances relating to my family — matters of an unusual nature — with singular minuteness and truth, he added, "To-night, if it be the will of God, thou shalt see the Prophet in thy sleep, and El-Khidr and the seyyid El-Bedawee. This is Regeb, and I wanted to ask of thee — but I feared — I wanted to ask of thee four piastres, to buy meat and bread and oil and radishes. Regeb! Regeb! I have great offices to do for thee to-night." — Less than a shilling for all he promised was little enough: I gave it him for the trouble he had taken; and he uttered many abrupt prayers for me. — In the following night, however, I saw in my sleep neither Mohammed nor El-Khidr nor the seyyid El-Bedawee, unless, like Nebuchadnezzar, I was unable, on awaking, to remember my dreams.

Some reputed saints of the more respectable class, to avoid public notice, wear the general dress and manners of their fellow-countrymen, and betray no love of ostentation in their acts of piety and self-denial; or live as hermits in desert places, depending solely upon Providence for their support, and are objects of pious and charitable visits from the inhabitants of near and distant places, and from casual travellers. Others distinguish themselves by the habit of a darweesh, or by other peculiarities, such as a long and loose coat (called dilk) composed of patches of cloth of various colours, long strings of beads hung upon the neck, a ragged turban, and a staff with shreds of cloth of different colours attached to the top; or obtain a reputation for miraculous powers by eating glass, fire, serpents, &c. Some of those who are insane, and of those who feign to be so, go about, even in crowded cities, in a state of perfect nudity, and are allowed to commit, with impunity, acts of brutal sensuality which the law, when appealed to, should punish with death. Such practices are forbidden by the religion and law even in the cases of saints; but common and deeply-rooted superstition prevents their punishment. During the occupation of Egypt by the French, the Commander-in-chief, Menou, applied to the Sheykh (or 'Ulamà) of the city for their opinion "respecting those persons who were accustomed to go about in the streets in a state of nudity, crying out and screaming, and arrogating to themselves the dignity of wiláyeh, relied upon as saints by the generality of the people, neither performing the prayers of the Muslims nor fasting," asking whether such conduct was permitted by the religion, or contrary to the law. He was answered, "Conduct of this description is forbidden, and repugnant to our religion and law and to our traditions." The French General thanked them for this answer, and gave orders to prevent such practices in future, and to seize every one seen thus offending; if insane, to confine him in the Máristán (or hospital and lunatic asylum); and if not insane, to compel him either to relinquish his disgusting habits, or to leave the city.—Of reputed saints of this kind, thus writes an enlightened poet, El-Bedree El-Hejáze:—

"Would that I had not lived to see every fool esteemed among men as a Kutb!
 Their learned men take him as a patron; nay, even as Lord, in place of the Possessor of Heaven's throne.
 Forgetting God, they say, 'Such a one from all mankind can remove affliction.'
 When he dies, they make for him a place of visitation, and strangers and Arabs hurry thither in crowds:
 Some of them kiss his tomb, and some kiss the threshold of the door, and the very dust.
 Thus do the idolaters act towards their images, hoping so to obtain their favour."

These lines are quoted by El-Jabartee, in his account of a very celebrated modern saint, the seyyid 'Alee El-Bekree (events of Rabeea eth-Thánee, 1214). A brief history of this person will not be here misplaced, as it will present a good illustration of the general character and actions of those insane individuals who are commonly regarded as saints.

The seyyid 'Alee El-Bekree was a mejzoob (or insane person) who was considered an eminent welee, and much trusted in: for several years he used to walk naked about the streets of Cairo, with a shaven face, bearing a long nebbot (or staff), and uttering confused language, which the people attentively listened to, and interpreted according to their desires and the exigencies of their states. He was a tall, spare man, and sometimes wore a shirt and a cotton skull-cap; but he was generally barefooted and naked. The respect with which he was treated induced a woman, who was called the sheykhah Am-mooneh, to imitate his example further than decency allowed: she followed him whithersoever he went, covered at first with her izár (or large cotton veil thrown over the head and body), and muttering, like him, confused language. Entering private houses with him, she used to ascend to the hareems, and gained the faith of the women, who presented her with money and clothes, and spread abroad that the sheykh ('Alee) had looked upon her, and affected her with religious frenzy, so that she had become a weleeyeh, or female saint. Afterwards, becoming more insane and intoxicated, she uncovered her face, and put on the clothing of a man; and thus attired she still accompanied the sheykh, and the two wandered about, followed by numbers of children and common vagabonds; some of whom also stripped off their clothes in imitation of the sheykh, and followed, dancing; their mad actions being attributed (like those of the woman) to religious frenzy, induced by his look or touch, which converted them into saints. The vulgar and young, who daily followed them, consequently increased in numbers; and some of them, in passing through the market-streets, snatched away goods from the shops, thus exciting great commotion wherever they went. When the sheykh sat down in any place, the crowd stopped, and the people pressed to see him and his mad companions. On these occasions the woman used to mount upon the mastabah of a shop, or ascend a hillock, and utter disgusting language, sometimes in Arabic, and sometimes in Turkish, while many persons among her audience would kiss her hands to derive a blessing. After having persevered for some time in this course, none preventing them, the party entered one day the lane leading from the principal street of the city to the house of the Kádee, and were seized by a Turkish officer there residing, named Jaafar Káshif, who, having brought them into his house, gave the sheykh some food, and drove out the spectators, retaining the woman and the mejzoobs, whom he placed in confinement: he then liberated the sheykh 'Alee, brought out the woman and the mejzoobs and beat them, sent the woman to the Máristán, and there confined her, and set at large the rest, after they had prayed for mercy, and clothed themselves, and recovered from their intoxication. The woman remained a while confined in the Máristán, and, when liberated, lived alone as a sheykhah, believed in by men and women, and honoured as a saint with visits and festivals.

The seyyid 'Alee, after he had thus been deprived of his companions and imitators, was constrained to lead a different kind of life. He had a cunning brother, who, to turn the folly of this saint to a good account, and fill his own purse (seeing how great faith the people placed in him, as the Egyptians are prone to do in such a case), confined him in his house, and clothed him, asserting that he had his permission to do so, and that he had been invested with the dignity of Kutb. Thus he contrived to attract crowds of persons, men and women, to visit him. He forbade him to shave his beard, which consequently grew to its full size; and his body became fat and stout from abundance of food and rest; for, while he went about naked, he was, as before mentioned, of a lean figure. During that period he used generally to pass the night wandering, without food, through the streets, in winter and summer. Having now servants to wait upon him, whether sleeping or waking, he passed his time in idleness, uttering confused and incoherent words, and sometimes laughing and sometimes scolding; and in the course of his idle loquacity he could not but let fall some words applicable to the affairs of some of his listening visitors, who attributed such expressions to his supernatural knowledge of the thoughts of their hearts, and interpreted them as warnings or prophecies. Men and women, and particularly the wives of the grantees, flocked to him with presents and votive offerings, which enriched the coffers of his brother; and the honours which he received ceased not with his death. His funeral was attended by multitudes from every quarter. His brother buried him in the mosque of Esh-Sharā'bee, in the quarter of the Ezbekeyeh, made for him a maksoorah (or railed enclosure) and an oblong monument over the grave, and frequently repaired thither with readers of the Kur-án, munshids to sing odes in his honour, flag-bearers, and other persons, who wailed and screamed, rubbed their faces against the bars of the window before his grave, and caught the air of the place in their hands to thrust it into their bosoms and pockets. Men and women came crowding together to visit his tomb, bringing votive offerings and wax candles, and eatables of various kinds to distribute for his sake to the poor.—The oblong monument over his grave, resembling a large chest, was covered, when I was in Cairo, with a black stuff ornamented by a line of words from the Kur-án, in white characters, surrounding it. A servant who accompanied me during my rides and walks used often to stop as we passed this tomb, and touch the wooden bars of the window above mentioned with his right hand, which he then kissed to obtain a blessing.

In most cases greater honour is paid to a reputed saint after his death than he receives in his life. A small, square, white-washed building, crowned with a dome, is generally erected as his tomb, surrounding an oblong monument of stone, brick, or wood, which is immediately over the sepulchral vault. At least one such building forms a conspicuous object close by, or within, almost every Arab village; for the different villages, and different quarters of every town and city, have their respective patron saints, whose tombs are frequently visited, and are the scenes of periodical festivals, generally celebrated once in every year. The tombs of many very eminent saints are mosques; and some of these are large and handsome edifices, the monument being under a large and lofty dome, and surrounded by an enclosure of wooden railings, or of elegantly-worked bronze. In these buildings also, and in some others, the monument is covered with silk or cotton stuff ornamented with words from the Kur-án, which form a band around it. Many buildings of the more simple kind erected in honour of saints, and some of the larger description, are mere cenotaphs, or cover only some relic of the person to whom they are dedicated. The tombs and cenotaphs or shrines of saints are visited by numerous persons, and on frequent occasions; most commonly on a particular day of the week. The object of the visitor, in general, is to perform some meritorious act, such as taking bread, or other food, or money, for the poor, or distributing water to the thirsty, on account of the saint, to increase his rewards in heaven, and at the same time to draw down a blessing on himself; or to perform a sacrifice of a sheep, goat, calf, or other animal, which he has vowed to offer, if blessed with some specific object of desire, or to obtain general blessings; or to implore the saint's intercession in some case of need. The flesh of the devoted animal is given to the poor. The visitors also often take with them palm-branches, or sprigs of myrtle, or roses or other flowers, to lay upon the monument, as they do when they visit the tombs of their relations. The visitor walks round the monument, or its enclosure, from left to right, or with his left side towards it (as the pilgrims do round the Kaabeh), sometimes pausing to touch its four angles or corners with his right hand, which he then kisses; and recites the opening chapter of the Kur-án (the Fát'hah) standing before one or each of its four sides. Some visitors repeat also the chapter of Yá-Seen (the 36th), or employ a person to recite this, or even the whole of the Kur-án, for hire. The reciter afterwards declares that he transfers the merit of this work to the soul of the deceased saint. Any private petition the visitor offers up on his own account, imploring a favourable answer for the sake of the saint, or through his intercession; holding his hands before his face like an open book, and then drawing them down his face. Many a visitor, on entering the tomb, kisses the threshold, or touches it with his right hand, which he then kisses; and, on passing by it, persons often touch the window, and kiss the hand thus honoured.

The great periodical or annual festivals are observed with additional ceremonies, and by crowds of visitors. These are called Moolids (more properly Mólids); and are held on the anniversary of the birth of the saint, or in commemoration of that event. Persons are then hired to recite the Kur-án in and near the tomb, during the day; and others, chiefly darweeshes, employ themselves during the night in performing zikrs, which consist in repeating the name of God, or the profession of his unity, &c., in chorus, accompanying the words by certain motions of the head, hands, or whole body; munshids, at intervals, singing religious odes or love songs during these performances, to the accompaniment of a náy, which is a kind of flute, or the arghool, which is a double reed-pipe. These moolids are scenes of rejoicing and of traffic, which men and boys and girls attend, to eat sweatmeats, and drink coffee and sherbets, or to amuse themselves with swinging, or turning on a whirligig, or witnessing the feats of conjurers, or the performances of dancers; and to which tradesmen repair to sell or barter their goods. The visitors to the great moolids of the seyyid Ahmad El-Bedawee, at Tantà, in the Delta of Egypt, which are great fairs as well as religious festivals, are almost as numerous as the pilgrims at Mekkeh. During a moolid, the inhabitants of the houses in the neighbourhood of the tomb hang lamps before their houses, and spend a great part of the night listening to the story-tellers at the coffee-shops, or attending the zikrs.

These latter performances, though so common among the Arabs, are inconsistent with the spirit of the Mohammadan religion, and especially with respect to music, which was not employed in religious ceremonies until after the second century of the Flight. The Imám Aboo-Bekr Et-Toosee, being asked whether it were lawful or not to be present with people who assembled in a certain place, and read a portion of the Kur-án; and, after a munshid had recited some poetry, would dance, and become excited, and play upon tambourines and pipes,—answered, that such practices were vain, ignorant, and erroneous; not ordained by the Kur-án or the Traditions of the Prophet, but invented by those Israelites who worshipped the Golden Calf; that the Prophet and his companions used to sit so quietly that a bird might alight upon the head of any one of them and not be disturbed; that it was incumbent on the Sultán and his vicegerents to prevent such persons from entering the mosques and other places for these purposes; and that no one who believed in God and the Last Day should be present with them, or assist them in their vain performances: such, he asserted, was the opinion of the Imáms of the Muslims. Some eminent doctors, however, have contended for the lawfulness of these practices.

Of the various orders of darweeshes, to which so many of the reputed saints belong, it is unnecessary here to say more than that they differ chiefly in unimportant regulations and rites, such as particular forms of prayer, and modes of zikr; that some distinguish themselves by peculiar dresses; and that a few pursue a wandering life, and subsist on alms.

NOTE 64. The reason of this strange proceeding is not stated in the Cairo edition, but it is in the two other editions which I have before me.

NOTE 65. Arab etiquette requires that a person should sit upon his knees and feet in the presence of one of much higher rank, or of one to whom he would pay especial honour. He should also, in these cases, cover his hands with his sleeves.

NOTE 66. Kunáfeh is a kind of pastry resembling vermicelli, made of wheat-flour.

It is moistened with clarified butter—then baked, and sweetened with honey or sugar.

NOTE 67. Chess is played somewhat differently in different parts of the East. The pieces are generally of very simple forms, as the Muslim is forbidden by his religion to make an image of anything that has life.

NOTE 68. In my original, and in the Breslau edition, the ape is said to have been the son of the King of the Ebony Islands; but this is a mistake; for the latter, as before stated, was the father of the lady who was carried off by Jarjarees.

NOTE 69. The term "leewán" has been explained in No. 12 of the notes to this chapter.

NOTE 70. This was, and I believe still is, a common battle-cry of the Arabs, and more commonly used on the occasion of a victory.

NOTE 71. "Dár es-Selám," "the Abode of Peace," or "of Safety," is a name often given to Baghdád, as it is also to one of the seven stories or stages of Paradise.

NOTE 72.—The Mountain of Loadstone. Several Arab writers describe this mountain of loadstone. El Kazweenee, in his account of minerals, says that the mine of loadstone is on the shore of the Indian Ocean, and that if the ships which navigate this sea approach the said mine, and contain anything of iron, it flies from them like a bird, and adheres to the mountain; for which reason, it is the general custom to make use of no iron in the construction of the vessels employed in this navigation. I think that I have met with a similar story in some Latin author.

NOTE 73. For an explanation of this term, see what I have said on the subject of prayer in the first of the notes to the Introduction.

NOTE 74. "Khaseeb" signifies "endowed with plenty."

NOTE 75. The remainder of the story of the Third Royal Mendicant is almost wholly omitted in the Cairo edition. I translate it chiefly from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights.

NOTE 76.—On Dreams. That dreams are regarded by the Muslims as being often true warnings or indications of future events I have mentioned in a former note. This belief, sanctioned by the Prophet, will be well illustrated by the following anecdote, which was related to me in Cairo, shortly after the terrible plague of the year 1835, by the sheykh Mohammad Et-Tantáwee, who had taken the trouble of investigating the fact, and had ascertained its truth.

A tradesman, living in the quarter of El-Hanafee, in Cairo, dreamt, during the plague above mentioned, that eleven persons were carried out from his house to be buried, victims of this disease. He awoke in a state of the greatest distress and alarm, reflecting that eleven was the total number of the inhabitants of his house, including himself, and that it would be vain in him to attempt, by adding one or more members to his household, to elude the decree of God, and give himself a chance of escape: so, calling together his neighbours, he informed them of his dream, and was counselled to submit with resignation to a fate so plainly foreshewn, and to be thankful to God for the timely notice with which he had been mercifully favoured. On the following day, one of his children died; a day or two after, a wife; and the pestilence continued its ravages among his family until he remained in his house alone. It was impossible for him now to entertain the slightest doubt of the entire accomplishment of the warning: immediately, therefore, after the last death that had taken place among his household, he repaired to a friend at a neighbouring shop, and, calling to him several other persons from the adjoining and opposite shops, he reminded them of his dream, acquainted them with its almost complete fulfilment, and expressed his conviction that he, the eleventh, should very soon die. "Perhaps," said he, "I shall die this next night: I beg of you, therefore, for the sake of God, to come to my house early to-morrow morning, and the next morning and the next if necessary, and to see if I be dead, and, when dead, that I be properly buried; for I have no one with me to wash and shroud me. Fail not to do me this service, which will procure you a recompense in heaven. I have bought my grave-linen: you will find it in a corner of the room in which I sleep. If you find the door of the house latched, and I do not answer to your knocking, break it open."

Soon after sunset he laid himself in his lonely bed, though without any expectation of closing his eyes in sleep; for his mind was absorbed in reflections upon the awful entry into another world, and a review of his past life. As the shades of night gathered around him, he could almost fancy that he beheld, in one faint object or another in his gloomy chamber, the dreadful person of the Angel of Death: and at length he actually perceived a figure gliding in at the door, and approaching his bed. Starting up in horror, he exclaimed, "Who art thou?"—and a stern and solemn voice answered, "Be silent! I am 'Azraeel, the Angel of Death!"—"Alas!" cried the terrified man; "I testify that there is no deity but God, and I testify that Mohammad is God's Apostle! There is no strength nor power but in God, the High! the Great! To God we belong, and to Him we must return!"—He then covered himself over with his quilt, as if for protection, and lay with throbbing heart, expecting every moment to have his soul torn from him by the inexorable messenger. But moments passed away, and minutes, and hours; yet without his experiencing any hope of escape; for he imagined that the Angel was waiting for him to resign himself, or had left him for a while, and was occupied in receiving first the souls of the many hundred human beings who had attained their predestined term in that same night and in the same city, and the souls of the thousands who were doomed to employ him elsewhere. Daybreak arrived before his sufferings terminated; and his neighbours, coming according to their promise, entered his chamber, and found him still in bed; but observing that he was covered up, and motionless as a corpse, they doubted whether he were still alive, and called to him. He answered, with a faint voice, "I am not yet dead: but the Angel of Death came to me in the dusk of the evening, and I expect every moment his return, to take my soul: therefore trouble me not; but see me washed and buried."—"But why," said his friends, "was the street-door left unlatched?"—"I latched it," he answered, "but the Angel of Death may have opened it."—"And who," they asked, "is the man in the court?"—He answered, "I know of no man in the court: perhaps the Angel who is waiting for my soul has made himself visible to you, and been mistaken, in the twilight, for a man."—"He is a thief," they said, "who has gathered together everything in the house that he could carry away, and has been struck by the plague while doing so, and now lies dead in the court, at the foot of the stairs, grasping in his hand a silver candlestick."—The master of the house, after hearing this, paused for a moment, and then, throwing off his quilt, exclaimed, "Praise be to God, the Lord of all creatures! That is the eleventh, and I am safe! No doubt it was that rascal who came to me and said that he was the Angel of Death. Praise be to God! Praise be to God!"

This man survived the plague, and took pleasure in relating the above story. The thief had overheard his conversation with his neighbours, and, coming to his house in the dusk, had put his shoulder to the wooden lock, and so raised the door and displaced the latch within.—There is nothing wonderful in the dream, nor in its accomplishment; the plague of 1835 entirely desolated many houses, and was mostly fatal to the young; and all the inhabitants of the house in question were young excepting the master.

NOTE 77. "Ajeeb" signifies "a wonder," or "anything strange or admirable."

NOTE 78. Blue is the colour of mourning, as before mentioned, in No. 52 of the notes to the second chapter.

NOTE 79. Smearing the face and slapping the cheeks are common practices of Arab women, especially of the lower orders, on following to the grave the corpse of a near relation or a husband.

NOTE 80.—On the Rukh'. This fabulous bird is described by many Arab writers, some of whom assert that it can carry a rhinoceros, while others ascribe to it powers still more extraordinary. I shall have occasion to speak of it again in my notes to this work.

NOTE 81. This is explained by No. 30 of the notes to the Introduction.

NOTE 82. I here return to the Cairo edition.

NOTE 83. Some of the incidents described in this story, as the shipwrecks caused by the image, and the opening of the forbidden closet, &c., appear to be taken from the romance of Seyf Zu-l-Yezan, of which I possess a copy, purchased during my second visit to Egypt. This romance, which has become extremely scarce, is filled with stories of genii and enchantments of the most extravagant kind. Some of the public storytellers in Cairo used, a few years since, to amuse their audiences by recitations from

it. I was not able to discover the period at which it was composed; but it is said to have been written long before the Tales of a Thousand and One Nights. I saw once a portion of a copy of it which appeared, from the handwriting and the paper, to be three or four centuries old.

NOTE 84. So in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and in the edition of Breslau.

NOTE 85. Those decrees which are written with "the Pen" on the "Preserved Tablet" are believed to be unchangeable. "The Pen" is also the title of one of the chapters of the Kur-án, the 68th.

NOTE 86. In all the copies of the original which I have by me, El-Basrah is said to have been the place to which the lady designed to voyage; but this is inconsistent with the sequel of the story.

NOTE 87. In the old version, two strange errors occur in the passage corresponding with this: two words in the original, "nár" and "doon," having been mistaken for a proper name; and the word "jebbár," which, applied to God, signifies "almighty," or rather the "Compeller of his creatures to do whatsoever He willeth," being taken in the sense of "giant," which it bears in many other cases.

NOTE 88.—On Martyrs. The Mohamadan law distinguishes several different descriptions of martyrs. This honourable title is given to the soldier who dies in fighting for the faith, or on his way to do so, or who dies almost immediately after his having been wounded when so engaged; to a person who innocently meets with his death from the hand of another; to a victim of the plague, who does not flee from the disease, or of dysentery; to a person who is drowned; and to one who is killed by the falling of a wall or any building. It is said that the souls of martyrs, after quitting their bodies, reside, until the day of resurrection, in the crops of green birds, which eat of the fruits, and drink of the waters, of Paradise. Such we are to consider as the first and lowest state of felicity to which the young prince in this tale was introduced as the reward of his virtue.

NOTE 89. The share inherited, according to the law, by the wife, or by the wives conjointly when there are more than one, is one-eighth of what remains of the property of the deceased after the discharge of his debts and legacies, if he have left issue; and one-fourth, if he have left no issue.

NOTE 90. The Arabs, fond of hyperbole, often thus describe a lofty building.

NOTE 91.—On the Magnificence of Arab Palaces, &c. After remarking upon the preceding sentence as presenting an instance of Oriental hyperbole, it may be necessary to inform the reader that he need not regard this in the same light. The magnificence of the palaces of Baghdád in the times of the Khaleefehs almost exceeds belief.

In the beginning of the year of the Flight 305 (June, A. D. 917), two ambassadors from the Greek Emperor (Constantine IX., Porphyrogenitus) arrived in Baghdád on a mission to the Khaleefeh El-Muktedir, bringing an abundance of costly presents; and the scenes which they witnessed are thus described; apparently, however, not without some exaggeration. They were first received by the Wezeer, who, at the audience which he granted to them in his garden-palace, displayed on this occasion a degree of magnificence that had never before been manifested by any of his rank; pages, memlooks, and soldiers, crowded the avenues and courts of his mansion, the apartments of which were hung with tapestry of the value of thirty thousand deenárs; and the Wezeer himself was surrounded by generals and other officers on his right and left and behind his seat, when the two ambassadors approached him, dazzled by the splendour that surrounded them, to beg for an interview with the Khaleefeh. El-Muktedir, having appointed a day on which he would receive them, ordered that the courts and passages and avenues of his palace should be filled with armed men, and that all the apartments should be furnished with the utmost magnificence. A hundred and sixty thousand armed soldiers were arranged in ranks in the approach to the palace; next to these were the pages of the closets, and chief eunuchs, clad in silk and with belts set with jewels, in number seven thousand; four thousand white, and three thousand black: there were also seven hundred chamberlains; and beautifully ornamented boats of various kinds were seen floating upon the Tigris, hard by. The two ambassadors passed first by the palace of the chief chamberlain, and, astonished at the splendid ornaments and pages and arms which they there beheld, imagined that this was the palace of the Khaleefeh; but what they had seen here was eclipsed by what they beheld in the latter, where they were amazed by the sight of thirty-eight thousand pieces of tapestry of gold-embroidered silk brocade, and twenty-two thousand magnificent carpets. Here also were two menageries of beasts by nature wild, but tamed by art, and eating from the hands of men: among them were a hundred lions; each lion with its keeper. They then entered the Palace of the Tree, enclosing a pond from which rose the Tree: this had eighteen branches, with leaves of various colours (being artificial), and with birds of gold and silver (or gilt and silvered) of every variety of kind and size, perched upon its branches, so constructed that each of them sang. Thence they passed into the garden, in which were furniture and utensils not to be enumerated: in the passages leading to it were suspended ten thousand gilt coats of mail. Being at length conducted before El-Muktedir, they found him seated on a couch of ebony inlaid with gold and silver, to the right of which were hung nine necklaces of jewels, and the like to the left, the jewels of which outshone the light of day. The two ambassadors paused at the distance of about a hundred cubits from the Khaleefeh, with the interpreter. Having left the presence, they were conducted through the palace, and were shewn splendidly-caparisoned elephants, a giraffe, lynxes, and other beasts. They were then clad with robes of honour, and to each of them was brought fifty thousand dirhems, together with dresses and other presents. It is added, that the ambassadors approached the palace through a street called "the Street of the Menârehs," in which were a thousand menârehs, or menarets. It was at the hour of noon; and as they passed, the muëddins from all these menârehs chanted the call to prayer at the same time, so that the earth almost quaked at the sound, and the ambassadors were struck with fear.

The Orientals well understand how to give the most striking effect to the jewels which they display on their dress, &c., on occasions of state. Sir John Malcolm, describing his reception by the late King of Persia, says, "His dress baffled all description. The ground of his robes was white; but he was so covered with jewels of an extraordinary size, and their splendour, from his being seated where the rays of the sun played upon them, was so dazzling, that it was impossible to distinguish the minute parts which combined to give such amazing brilliancy to his whole figure."

NOTE 92. As this marriage is described as conducted in an irregular manner, I need say nothing at present of the ceremonies usually practised on such an occasion.

NOTE 93. Every person who has visited Eastern cities will bear testimony to the plausibility of this excuse. I have several times been thrown down by the wide load of a camel in the streets of Cairo, and seen loads of firewood scraping the houses on both sides of a street at the same time.

NOTE 94. Women suspected of infidelity to their husbands have not unfrequently been thus punished in Egypt in modern times, in violation of the law.

NOTE 95. "Saad" signifies "happiness," or "prosperity," and also "happy," or "prosperous."

NOTE 96. Pity is of more important service to the Muslim after death than during life; for the prayers which it inspires increase his happiness in futurity, or diminish his misery.

NOTE 97. This allusion to religious faith is peculiarly apt in the mouth of a Muslim; for the chief dogma of his creed is the denial of any partnership in the Divine essence. He calls persons of all other religions "mushriks," or those who attribute partners to God.

NOTE 98. In the original, she is here called an 'Efreeteh, which is an improper term.

NOTE 99. This salutation and its reply are only to be given by and to Muslims.

NOTE 100. It is implied by this ejaculation that the two ladies were admirable beauties, evidences of the perfection of their Creator.

NOTES TO CHAPTER FOURTH

NOTE 1. From the close of Chapter iii., the order of the tales in this translation (agreeably with the Cairo edition) differs from that which is followed in the old version.

NOTE 2. This alludes to the poor man's want of sufficient clothing; for, in the climate of Baghdád, a person who is not very scantily clad is in little need of a fire to warm himself.

NOTE 3. My sheykh has remarked, in a marginal note, that these verses would be appropriate only from the mouth of a learned man complaining of the unprofitableness of his science with respect to procuring him money; but perhaps, in writing this, he was actuated by a somewhat overzealous regard for the honour of his own profession; for, when a poor man has acquired a little knowledge, his neighbours are apt to flatter him.

NOTE 4. The "izár" has been described in the second note to Chapter iii.

NOTE 5. Literally, "the sons of thine uncle;" but the meaning is, "thy kinsmen."

NOTE 6. — On Bastinadoing. In Arabian, and some other Eastern, countries, it is a common custom, when a person is accused of a crime before a magistrate, and denies his guilt, to bastinate him, in order to induce him to confess; and even witnesses, sometimes, are treated in the same manner. The beating is usually inflicted with a kurbáj (a thong or whip of hippopotamus' hide hammered into a round form) or with a stick, and generally on the soles of the feet. For this purpose the feet are confined by a chain or rope attached at each end to a staff, which is turned round to tighten it. This is called a "falakah." Two persons (one on each side) strike alternately; and the punishment is often continued until the sufferer becomes insensible, and even longer.

NOTE 7. — Of Sales by Auction. In many of the sooks (market-streets, or bázárs) in Arabian cities, auctions are held on stated days, once or more frequently in every week. They are conducted by brokers (delláls), hired either by private persons or by shopkeepers. These brokers carry the goods up and down the street, announcing the sums bidden, with cries of "haráj," &c.; and the shopkeepers, as well as others, purchase of them.

NOTE 8. I have before mentioned, that this horrid mode of punishing a woman suspected of incontinence is not unfrequently practised among the Arabs. Many similar cases have been mentioned to me in Egypt as having occurred in that country in the present age; and often the murder is committed by the father or a brother of the woman, as her relations are considered as more disgraced than the husband by her crime. The present tale is probably founded on some particular occurrence of this kind. One is related as having happened in the reign of the Khaleefeh El-Moatadid. In this case, some limbs of the murdered woman, in two leathern bags, were brought up from the bed of the Tigris in the net of a fisherman.

NOTE 9. — Of the Retaliation of Injuries on the Day of Resurrection. The "examination being past, and every one's works weighed in a just balance, that mutual retaliation will follow according to which every creature will take vengeance one of another, or have satisfaction made to him for the injuries which he hath suffered. And since there will then be no other way of returning like for like, the manner of giving this satisfaction will be, by taking away a proportionate part of the good works of him who offered the injury, and adding it to those of him who suffered it. Which being done, if the angels (by whose ministry this is to be performed) say, 'Lord, we have given to every one his due, and there remaineth of this person's good works so much as equalleth the weight of an ant,' God will of his mercy cause it to be doubled unto him, that he may be admitted into Paradise; but if, on the contrary, his good works be exhausted, and there remain evil works only, and there be any who have not yet received satisfaction from him, God will order that an equal weight of their sins be added unto his, that he may be punished for them in their stead, and he will be sent to Hell laden with both."

NOTE 10. "Reyhán" is a common proper name of men, now commonly given to slaves; and the name of the sweet basil in particular (also called "ree-lán") and of sweet-smelling plants in general. It also signifies "any favour of God," "the supplies necessary for subsistence," "a son," &c.

NOTE 11. This ejaculation is addressed to God.

NOTE 12. In the original, "Misr," vulg., "Masr." This is the name which the Arabs give to Egypt, and which they have also given to its successive capitals, or seats of government, Memphis, Egyptian Babylon, El-Fustât, and El-Kâhireh, or Cairo. It is here applied to Cairo, as will be shewn by the following note, and by the sequel of the tale, though this city was not founded until long after the reign of Hâroon Er-Rasheed. I may here remark, that I have not found the name of "Misr" applied to Cairo in any Arabic work anterior to the conquest of Egypt by the 'Osmânlee Turks, which happened in the year of the Flight 923 (A. D. 1517). El-Fustât retained this appellation in the time of Es-Suyootee, who died in the year of the Flight 911, but it ceased to do so before the time of El-Is-hâkee, who brought down his history to the month of Ramadân, 1032 (A. D. 1623). It is probable, therefore, that the name of "Misr" was transferred to Cairo on the occasion of the conquest by the Turks. I must not assert, that this observation alone enables us to form a decided judgment as to the period when this work was composed, as it may be objected that copyists have perhaps substituted "Misr" for "El-Kâhireh;" but I pursue the inquiry in the next note.

NOTE 13. — On several Evidences of the Period when this Work, in the states in which it is known to us, was composed or compiled or remodelled. The tale here presents another anachronism. The title of "Sultân," as a prefix, was first borne by Mahmood Ibn-Sabuktekeen, in the year of the Flight 393, just two hundred years after the death of Hâroon Er-Rasheed; and there was no Sultân of Egypt until the year of the Flight 567 of a little later; the first being the famous Salâh-ed-Deen, or Saladin.

I have now given several data upon which to found a reasonable opinion as to the age when these tales, in the states in which they are known to us, were composed or compiled or remodelled. First, in Note 55 to Chapter ii., I have shewn that a fiction in one of the tales is framed in accordance with the distinction of Muslims, Christians, and Jews, by the colours of their turbans, which mode of distinction originated in the beginning of the eighth century of the Flight. Secondly, in the present note, I have mentioned a fact which affords some reason for inferring that there had been a long series of Sultâns in Egypt before the age of the writer or writers. In the third place, I must remark, that all the events described in this work are said to have happened in ages which, with respect to that of the writer or writers, were ancient, being related to an ancient king; from which I think we may infer its age to have been at least two centuries posterior to the period mentioned in the first of these data. Fourthly, in Note 22 to Chapter iii., I have shewn that the state of manners and morals described in many of these tales agrees, in a most important point of view, with the manners and morals of the Arabs at the commencement of the tenth century of the Flight. This I regard as an argument of great weight, and especially satisfactory as agreeing with the inference just before drawn. Fifthly, from what I have stated in the note immediately preceding, I incline to the opinion that few of the copies of this work now known to us, if any, were written until after the conquest of Egypt by the Turks, in the year 1517 of our era. This opinion, it should be remarked, respects especially the early portion of the work, which is the least likely to have been interpolated, as later parts evidently have been. At the last-mentioned period, a native of Cairo (in which city I believe the principal portion of the work to have been written) might, if about forty years of age, retain a sufficient recollection of the later Memlook Sultâns and of their ministers to describe his kings and courts without the necessity of consulting the writings of historians; deriving his knowledge of early times not from the perusal of any regular record, but only from traditions or from works like the present. — I should have delayed the insertion of the foregoing remarks, had I not considered it a point of some importance to suggest to the reader, as early as possible, that the manners and customs, and in general even the dresses and dwellings, described in most of the present tales, are those of a very late period. The lax state of morals which appears to have prevailed among the Arabs in the time of the writer or writers probably continued at least until the period when coffee became a common beverage, about the middle of the tenth century of the Flight (or near the middle of the sixteenth century of our era), and perhaps considerably later, until some years after the introduction of tobacco into the East.

The researches of Von Hammer have satisfactorily shewn that the Thousand and One Nights, in the states in which it is known to us, is based upon a very old work, in Persian; an Arabic translation of which bore a similar, or perhaps the same, title as that which we are considering; but I believe the last to be, in its best features, a very late production.

NOTE 14. "Shems-ed-Deen" signifies "the Sun of the Religion;" and "Noor-ed-Deen," "the Light of the Religion."

NOTE 15.—Customs observed after a Death. Though the men, in Arabian countries, make no change in their dress in indication of mourning, they observe other customs after the death of a relation. By the term here used in the original for "mourning" ("azá," the primary signification of which is "consolation" or "condolence"), an allusion is made to receiving the visits of condoling friends. On the night immediately following the burial, several persons are employed to perform recitations of portions of the Kur-án, &c. The most remarkable of these ceremonies consists in repeating thrice one thousand times, "There is no deity but God:" one of the performers having a string of a thousand large beads by means of which to count these repetitions. Some persons are also hired to perform a recitation of the whole of the Kur-án in the afternoon or evening of the first Thursday after the funeral, and often on other days; and the merit of these and the former religious acts is transferred to the soul of the deceased.—These customs I have fully described in my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. ii. ch. xv.

NOTE 16. The island here alluded to is that called "Er-Ródah," or "The Garden."

NOTE 17. The prayer-carpet, which resembles a wide hearth-rug, is seldom used as a covering for the saddle except when the rider is a person of the learned profession. It is probably mentioned here to shew that Noor-ed-Deen was an officer of the pen, which was generally the case with the Wezeers of the Sultáns of Egypt.

NOTE 18. Jerusalem is called in the original, and by the modern Arabs, "El-Kuds" which signifies "Holiness."

NOTE 19. The Arabic name of Aleppo is "Halab."

NOTE 20. An Arab of rank is seldom seen on foot outside the threshold of his own house, unless it be merely to cross the street.

NOTE 21. The decoration here alluded to consists in furnishing the apartment with costly carpets, handsome cushions, rich coverings for the deewáns, and coloured lamps, &c.

NOTE 22. This, to some readers, may appear odd: it should therefore be explained that most articles of Arab clothing are equally suitable to young and old, thin and stout.

NOTE 23. "Hasan" signifies "Beautiful" or "Handsome."

NOTE 24.—On Infancy and Education. I may avoid an unnecessary multiplication of notes on the same, or nearly the same, subject, by availing myself of this occasion to insert here the following illustrations of numerous passages, in the preceding and subsequent tales, relating to infancy and education.

In few cases are the Mohammadans so much fettered by the directions of their Prophet and other religious institutors as in the rearing and educating of their children. In matters of the most trivial nature, religious precedents direct their management of the young. One of the first duties is, to wrap the new-born child in clean white linen, or in linen of some other colour; but not yellow. After this, some person [not a female] should pronounce the adán in the ear of the infant, because the Prophet did so in the ear of El-Hasan when Fátiméh gave birth to him; or he should pronounce the adán in the right ear, and the ikámeh (which is nearly the same) in the left.

The adán referred to above is the call to prayer, which is chanted from the mād'nehs (or menarets) of the mosques. It is as follows:—"God is most great!" (four times). "I testify that there is no deity but God!" (twice). "I testify that Mohammad is God's Apostle!" (twice). "Come to prayer!" (twice). "Come to security!" (twice). "God is most great!" (twice). "There is no deity but God!"

It was formerly a custom of many of the Arabs, and perhaps is still among some, for the father to give a feast to his friends on seven successive days after the birth of a son; but that of a daughter was observed with less rejoicing. The general modern custom is, to give an entertainment only on the seventh day, which is called "Yóm es-Subooa." On this occasion, the mother, having left her bed, receives her guests; the child is exhibited to them; and they give presents of gold or silver coins, which are generally used to decorate the infant's head-dress. The father entertains his friends in the evening.

On this day, or on the fourteenth, twenty-first, twenty-eighth, or thirty-fifth day after the birth, several religious ceremonies are required to be performed; but they are most approved if observed on the seventh day. One of these is the naming. I believe, however, that it is a more common custom to give the name almost immediately after the birth, or about three hours after. Astrologers were often consulted on this occasion; but the following directions are given on higher authority, and are generally observed.—"The father should give his son a good name, . . . not a name of self-praise, as Rasheed [Orthodox], Emeen [Faithful], &c. . . . The prophet said, 'The names most approved by God are 'Abd-Allah [Servant of God] and 'Abd-Er-Rahmân [Servant of the Compassionate], and such like.' He also said, 'Give my name, but do not distinguish by my surname of relationship;' but this precept, they say, respects his own life-time, . . . because he was addressed, 'O Abu-l-Kâsim!' and now it is not disapproved; but some disapprove of uniting the name and surname, so as to call a person Mohammad and Abu-l-Kâsim. And if a son be called by the name of a prophet it is not allowable to abuse or vilify him, unless the person so named be facing his reproacher, who should say, 'Thou [without mentioning his name]: and a child named Mohammad or Ahmad should be [especially] honoured. . . . The Prophet said, 'There is no people holding a consultation at which there is present one whose name is Mohammad or Ahmad, but God blesseth all that assembly;' and again he said, 'Whoever nameth his child by my name, or by that of any of my children or my companions, from affection to me or to them, God (whose name be exalted!) will give him in Paradise what eye hath not seen nor ear heard.' And a son should not be named King of kings, or Lord of lords; nor should a man take a surname of relationship from the name of the eldest of his children; nor take any such surname before a child is born to him."—The custom of naming children after prophets, or after relations or companions of Mohammad, is very common. No ceremony is observed on account of the naming.

On the same day, however, two practices which I am about to mention are prescribed to be observed; though, as far as my observations and inquiries allow me to judge, they are generally neglected by the modern Muslims. The first of these is a sacrifice. The victim is called 'akeekah. It should be a ram or goat; or two such animals should be sacrificed for a son, and one for a daughter. This rite is regarded by Ibn-Hambal as absolutely obligatory: he said, "If a father sacrifice not for his son, and he [the son] die, son will not intercede for him on the day of judgment." The founders of the three other principal sects regard it in different and less important lights, though Mohammad slew an 'akeekah for himself after his prophetic mission. The person should say, on slaying the victim, "O God, verily this 'akeekah is a ransom for my son such a one; its blood for his blood, and its flesh for his flesh, and its bone for his bone, and its skin for his skin, and its hair for his hair. O God, make it a ransom for my son from Hell-fire." A bone of the victim should not be broken. The midwife should receive a leg of it. It should be cooked without previously cutting off any portion of it; and part of it should be given in alms.—After this should be performed the other ceremony above alluded to, which is this. It is a sunneh ordinance, incumbent on the father, to shave, or cause to be shaved, the head of his child, and to give, in alms to the poor, the weight of the hair in gold or silver. This should also be done for a proselyte. On the subsequent occasions of shaving the head of a male child (for the head of the male is frequently shaven), a tuft of hair is generally left on the crown, and commonly, for several years, another also over the forehead.

Circumcision is most approved if performed on the same day: but the observance of this rite is generally delayed until the child has attained the age of five or six years, and sometimes several years later. I shall therefore delay mentioning the ceremonies with which it is celebrated.

The Muslims rightly regard a child as a trust committed by God to its parents, who, they hold, are responsible for the manner in which they bring it up, and will be examined on this subject on the day of judgment. But they further venture to say, that "the first who will lay hold of a man on the day of judgment will be his wife and children, who [if he have been deficient in his duty to them] will present themselves before God, and say, 'O our Lord, take for us our due from him; for he taught us not that of which we were ignorant, and he fed us with forbidden food, and we knew not:’ and their due will be taken from him.” By this is meant, that a certain proportion of the good works which the man may have done, and his children and wife neglected, will be set down to their account; or that a similar proportion of their evil works will be transferred to his account.

The mother is enjoined by the law to give suck to her child two full years, unless she have her husband’s consent to shorten the period, or to employ another nurse. “For suckling the child, a virtuous woman, who eateth only what is lawful, should be chosen; for the unlawful [food] will manifest its evil in the child: as the Prophet . . . said, ‘Giving suck altereth the temper.’ But it is recommended by the sunneh that the mother herself suckle the child for it is said in a tradition, ‘There is nothing better for a child than its mother’s milk.’ ‘If thou wouldst try,’ it is added, ‘whether a child be of an ingenuous disposition in its infancy, or not, order a woman who is not its mother to suckle it after its mother has done so; and if it drink of the milk of the woman who is not its mother, it is not of an ingenuous disposition.’”

Children, being regarded by Muslim parents as enviable blessings, are, to them, objects of the most anxious solicitude. To guard them from the supposed influence of the envious or evil eye, they have recourse to various expedients. When they are taken abroad, they are usually clad in the most slovenly manner, and left unwashed, or even purposely smeared with dirt; and as a further precaution, a fantastic cap is often put upon the child’s head, or its head-dress is decorated with one or more coins, a feather, a gay tassel, or a written charm or two sewed up in leather or encased in gold or silver, or some other appendage to attract the eye, that so the infant itself may pass unnoticed. If a person expresses his admiration of another’s child otherwise than by some pious ejaculation, as, for instance, by praising its Creator (with the exclamation of “Subhāna-llāh!” or, “Mā shāa-llāh!” &c.) or invoking a blessing on the Prophet, he fills the mind of the parent with apprehension; and recourse is had to some superstitious ceremony to counteract the dreaded influence of his envious glance. The children of the poor are less exposed to this imaginary danger from their unattractive appearance: they generally have little clothing, or none whatever, and are extremely dirty. It is partly with the view of protecting them from the evil eye, that those of the rich are so long confined to the hareem: there they are petted and pampered for several years; at least until they are of age to go to school; but most of them are instructed at home.

The children of the Muslims are taught to shew to their fathers a degree of respect which might be deemed incompatible with the existence of a tender mutual affection; but I believe that this is not the case. The child greets the father in the morning by kissing his hand, and then usually stands before him in a respectful attitude, with the left hand covered by the right, to receive any order or to await his permission to depart; but after the respectful kiss, is often taken on the lap. After the period of infancy, the well-bred son seldom sits in the presence of his father; but during that period he is generally allowed much familiarity. A Syrian merchant, who was one of my near neighbours in Cairo, had a child of exquisite beauty, commonly supposed to be his daughter, whom, though he was a most bigoted Muslim, he daily took with him from his private house to his shop. The child followed him, seated upon an ass, before a black slave; and, until about six years old, was dressed like most young ladies, but without a face-veil. The father then thinking that the appearance of taking about with him a daughter of that age was scandalous, dressed his pet as a boy, and told his friends that the female attire had been employed as a protection against the evil eye; girls being less coveted than boys. This indeed is sometimes done; and it is possible that such might have been the case in this instance; but I was led to believe that it was not so. A year after, I left Cairo: while I remained there, I continued to see the child pass my house as before; but always in boy’s clothing.

It is not surprising that the natives of Arabian countries, where a very trifling expense is required to rear the young, should be generally desirous of a numerous offspring. A motive of self-interest conduces forcibly to cherish this feeling in a wife, for she is commonly esteemed by her husband in proportion to her fruitfulness; and a man is seldom willing to divorce a wife, or to sell a slave, who has borne him a child. A similar feeling also induces in both parents a desire to obtain offspring, and renders them at the same time resigned to the loss of such of their children as die in tender age. This feeling arises from their belief of certain services, of greater moment than the richest blessings this world can bestow, which children who die in infancy are to render to their parents. The Prophet is related to have said, "The infant children [of the Muslims] shall assemble at the scene of judgment on the day of the general resurrection, when all creatures shall appear for the reckoning, and it will be said to the angels, 'Go ye with these into Paradise;' and they will halt at the gate of Paradise, and it will be said to them, 'Welcome to the offspring of the Muslims! enter ye Paradise: there is no reckoning to be made with you:' and they will reply, 'Yea, and our fathers and our mothers:' but the guardians of Paradise will say, 'Verily your fathers and your mothers are not with you because they have committed faults and sins for which they must be reckoned with and required of.' Then they will shriek and cry at the gate of Paradise with a great cry; and God (whose name be exalted! and who is all-knowing respecting them) will say, 'What is this cry?' He will be answered, 'O our Lord, the children of the Muslims say, We will not enter Paradise but with our fathers and our mothers.' Whereupon God (whose name be exalted!) will say 'Pass among them all, and take the hands of your parents, and introduce them into Paradise.'" The children who are to have this power are such as are born of believers, and die without having attained to the knowledge of sin; and according to one tradition, one such child will introduce his parents into Paradise. [Such infants only are to enter Paradise; for, of the children who die in infancy, those of believers alone are they who would believe if they grew to years of discretion.] On the same authority it is said, "When a child of the servant [of God] dies, God (whose name be exalted!) saith to the angels, 'Have ye taken the child of my servant?' They answer, 'Yea.' He saith, 'Have ye taken the child of his heart?' They reply, 'Yea.' He asketh them, 'What did my servant say?' They answer, 'He praised thee, and said, Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return!' Then God will say, 'Build for my servant a house in Paradise, and name it the House of Praise.'" To these traditions, which I find related as proofs of the advantages of marriage, the following anecdote, which is of a similar nature, is added. A certain man, who would not take a wife, awoke one day from his sleep, and demanded to be married, saying, as his reason, "I dreamt that the resurrection had taken place, and that I was among the beings collected at the scene of judgment, but was suffering a thirst that stopped up the passage of my stomach; and lo, there were youths passing through the assembly, having in their hands ewers of silver, and cups of gold, and giving drink to one person after another; so I stretched forth my hand to one of them, and said, 'Give me to drink; for thirst overpowereth me:' but they answered, 'Thou hast no child among us: we give drink only to our fathers.' I asked them, 'Who are ye?' They replied, 'We are the deceased infant children of the Muslims.'" Especial rewards in heaven are promised to mothers. "When a woman conceives by her husband," said the Prophet, "she is called in heaven a martyr [i. e. she is ranked as a martyr in dignity]; and her labour in child-bed, and her care for her children, protect her from Hell-fire."

"When the child begins to speak, the father should teach him first the kelimeh [or profession of faith], 'There is no deity but God: [Mohammad is God's apostle:]' — he should dictate this to him seven times. Then he should instruct him to say, 'Wherefore, exalted be God, the King, the Truth! There is no deity but He, the Lord of the honourable throne.' He should teach him also the Throne-verse, and the closing words of the Hashr, 'He is God, beside whom there is no deity, the King, the Holy,'" &c.

As soon as a son is old enough, his father should teach him the most important rules of decent behaviour: placing some food before him, he should order him to take it with the right hand (the left being employed for unclean purposes), and to say, on commencing, "In the name of God;" to eat what is next to him, and not to hurry, nor spill any of the food upon his person or dress. He should teach him that it is disgusting to eat much. He should particularly condemn to him the love of gold and silver, and caution him against covetousness as he would against serpents and scorpions; and forbid his spitting in an assembly, and committing any similar breach of good manners, talking much, turning his back upon another, standing in an indolent attitude, and speaking ill of any person to another. He should keep him from bad companions, teach him the Kur-ân and all requisite divine and prophetic ordinances, and instruct him in the arts of swimming and archery, and in some virtuous trade; for trade is a security from poverty. He should also command him to endure patiently the chastisements of his teacher. In one tradition it is said, "When a boy attains the age of six years he should be disciplined; and when he attains to nine years he should be put in a separate bed; and when he attains to ten years he should be beaten for [neglecting] prayer: " in another tradition, " Order your children to pray at seven [years], and beat them for [neglecting] it at ten, and put them in separate beds."

Circumcision, which has before been mentioned, is generally performed before the boy is submitted to the instruction of the schoolmaster. Previously to the performance of this rite, he is, if belonging to the higher or middle rank of society, usually paraded about the neighbourhood of his parents' dwelling, gaily attired, chiefly with female habits and ornaments, but with a boy's turban on his head, mounted on a horse, preceded by musicians, and followed by a group of his female relations and friends. This ceremony is observed by the great with much pomp and with sumptuous feasts. El-Jabartee mentions a fête celebrated on the occasion of the circumcision of a son of the Kádée of Cairo, in the year of the Flight 1179 (A. D. 1766), when the grandees and chief merchants and 'Ulamà of the city sent him such abundance of presents that the magazines of his mansion were filled with rice and butter and honey and sugar; the great hall, with coffee; and the middle of the court, with firewood: the public were amused for many days by players and performers of various kinds; and when the youth was paraded through the streets he was attended by numerous memlooks with their richly-caparisoned horses and splendid arms and armour and military band, and by a number of other youths who, from compliment to him, were circumcised afterwards with him. This latter custom is usual on such occasions; and so also is the sending of presents, such as those above mentioned, by friends, acquaintances, and tradespeople. At a fête of this kind, when the Khalefeh El-Muktedir circumcised five of his sons, the money that was scattered in presents amounted to six hundred thousand pieces of gold, or about £300,000. Many orphans were also circumcised on the same day, and were presented with clothes and pieces of gold. The Khalefeh above mentioned was famous for his magnificence, a proof of which I have given in a former note. At the more approved entertainments which are given in celebration of a circumcision, a recital of the whole of the Kur-án, or a zikr, is performed: at some others, male or female public dancers perform in the court of the house, or in the street before the door.

Few of the children of the Arabs receive much instruction in literature, and still fewer are taught even the rudiments of any of the higher sciences; but there are numerous schools in their towns, and one at least in almost every moderately large village. The former are mostly attached to mosques and other public buildings, and, together with those buildings, endowed by princes or other men of rank, or wealthy tradesmen. In these, the children are instructed either gratis or for a very trifling weekly payment, which all parents, except those in indigent circumstances, can easily afford. The schoolmaster generally teaches nothing more than to read, and to recite by heart the whole of the Kur-án. After committing to memory the first chapter of the sacred volume, the boy learns the rest in the inverse order of their arrangement, as they generally decrease in length. Writing and arithmetic are usually taught by another master; and grammar, rhetoric, versification, logic, the interpretation of the Kur-án, and the whole system of religion and law, with all other knowledge deemed useful, which seldom includes the mere elements of mathematics, are attained by studying at a collegiate mosque, and at no expense; for the professors receive no pay either from the students, who are mostly of the poor classes, or from the funds of the mosque.

The wealthy often employ for their sons a private tutor; and, when he has taught them to read, and to recite the Kur-án, engage for them a writing-master, and then send them to the college. But among this class, polite literature is more considered than any other branch of knowledge, after religion. Such an acquaintance with the works of some of their favourite poets as enables a man to quote them occasionally in society, is regarded by the Arabs as essential to a son who is to mix in genteel company; and to this acquirement is often added some skill in the art of versification, which is rendered peculiarly easy by the copiousness of the Arabic language, and by its system of inflection. These characteristics of their noble tongue (which are remarkably exhibited by the custom, common among the Arabs, of preserving the same rhyme throughout a whole poem), while on the one hand they have given an admirable freedom to the compositions of men of true poetic genius, have on the other hand mainly contributed to the degradation of Arabic poetry. To an Arab of some little learning it is almost as easy to speak in verse as in prose; and hence he often intersperses his prose writings, and not unfrequently his conversation, with indifferent verses, of which the chief merit often consists in puns, or in an ingenious use of several words nearly the same in sound, but differing in sense. To a reader unacquainted with the Arabic language it is necessary to explain this custom; otherwise he would imagine that the author of the present work is merely indulging in a dramatic license inconsistent with a true delineation of manners, when he makes a person suddenly change the style of his speech from prose to verse, and then revert to the former.

One more duty of a father to a son I should here mention: it is, to procure for him a wife as soon as he has arrived at the proper age. This age is decided by some to be twenty years; though many young men marry at an earlier period. It is said, "When a son has attained the age of twenty years, his father, if able, should marry him, and then take his hand, and say, 'I have disciplined thee, and taught thee, and married thee: I now seek refuge with God from thy mischief in the present world and the next.'" To enforce this duty, the following tradition is urged: "When a son attains to the age of puberty, and his father does not marry him, and yet is able to do so, if the youth commit an improper act in consequence, the sin of it is between the two,"—or, as in another report,—"on the father." The same is held to be the case with respect to a daughter who has attained the age of twelve years.

The female children of the Arabs are seldom taught even to read. Though they are admissible at the daily schools in which the boys are instructed, very few parents allow them the benefit of this privilege; preferring, if they give them any instruction of a literary kind, to employ a sheykhah (or learned woman) to teach them at home. She instructs them in the forms of prayer, and teaches them to repeat by heart a few chapters of the Kur-án; very rarely the whole book. Parents are indeed recommended to withhold from their daughters some portions of the Kur-án; to "teach them the Soorat en-Noor [or 24th chapter], and keep from them the Soorat-Yoosuf [12th chapter]; on account of the story of Zeleekhá and Yoosuf in the latter and the prohibitions and threats and mention of punishments contained in the former."

Needlework is not so rarely, but yet not generally, taught to Arab girls: the spindle frequently employs those of the poorer classes; and some of them learn to weave. The daughters of persons of the middle and higher ranks are often instructed in the art of embroidery, and in other ornamental work, which are taught in schools and in private houses. Singing, and playing upon the lute, which were formerly not uncommon female accomplishments among the wealthy Arabs, are now almost exclusively confined, like dancing, to professional performers and a few of the slaves in the hareems of the great: it is very seldom now that any musical instrument is seen in the hand of an Arab lady, except a kind of drum called darabukkeh, and a tár (or tambourine), which are found in many hareems, and are beaten with the fingers. Some care, however, is bestowed by the ladies in teaching their daughters what they consider an elegant gait and carriage, as well as various alluring and voluptuous arts with which to increase the attachment of their future husbands.

NOTE 25.—Water-wheels. The water-wheels here mentioned are machines commonly used for the purpose of irrigating fields and gardens. They are generally turned by a pair of cows or bulls. They raise the water from a river or well in a series of earthen pots attached to cords which pass over a vertical wheel, and pour it into a trough, from which it flows in narrow channels through the space of ground to be irrigated. A cogged vertical wheel is attached to the same axis as the former; and this, and consequently the other also, are turned by means of a larger, horizontal, cogged wheel. The ground is divided into hollow squares, or furrows, into each of which in succession the water is admitted.

NOTE 26. "Bedr-ed-Deen" signifies "the Full Moon of the Religion."

NOTE 27. I have here omitted the name of Shems-ed-Deen, and his office; as Hasan's knowledge of them would render the sequel of the story too improbable even to an Arab.

NOTE 28. In the original, this paper is here said to have been written by Hasan in accordance with the dictation of his father; but afterwards it is said to have been written by the latter; and this is more consistent with the rest of the tale.

NOTE 29. Papers of importance are often wrapped in waxed cloth to preserve them from wet, which would efface the writing, as the Arab ink is chiefly composed of smoke-black and gum and water.

NOTE 30. In the original, the cap is not here mentioned; but it is afterwards.

NOTE 31. This paragraph and the verses interspersed in it are translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights.

NOTE 32. The poet here alluded to is El-Mutanebbeh.

NOTE 33. It is a common custom of Eastern kings and governors to avail themselves of any pretext for seizing upon the property of a deceased officer who has accumulated much wealth.

NOTE 34. It is implied that he was sitting at the door, or in the court, of his house.

NOTE 35. His taking a copy is mentioned afterwards in the original; but not in this place.

NOTE 36. I have designated by the appellation of "dye-woman" (from want of a better) those females who are employed to apply the hennâ, which imparts a deep orange-red dye, to the nails or tips of the fingers, the palms of the hands, the soles of the feet, &c. Some Arab ladies, especially on such an occasion as that here described, are ornamented with this dye in a more fanciful manner. The woman who applies it is called in Arabic "munak-kisheh."

NOTE 37. The chief office of the tire-woman (in Arabic, "mâshitâh") is to comb and plait the hair. She attends the ladies in the bath; and hence is also called "bellâneh."

NOTE 38. A "mastabah" is a bench of stone or brick, generally between two and three feet in height, and about the same in width, built against the front of a shop, and sometimes along the front of a private house.

NOTE 39.—On Marriage. Previously to the perusal of the first description of a nuptial fête that occurs in this work, the reader may perhaps desire some introductory information, which I shall here endeavour to convey in such a manner as to make the present note serve to illustrate many future allusions in these pages, and not merely the foregoing tale.

Marriage is regarded by the Muslims in general as a positive duty; and to neglect it, without a sufficient excuse, subjects a man to severe reproach. "When a servant [of God]," said the Prophet, "marries, verily he perfects half his religion." He once asked a man, "Art thou married?" The man answered, "No." "And art thou," said he, "sound and healthy?" The answer was, "Yes." "Then," said Mohammad, "thou art one of the brothers of the devils; the most wicked among you are the unmarried; and the most vile among your dead are the unmarried; moreover the married are those who are acquitted of filthy conversation; and by Him in whose hands is my soul, the devil hath not a weapon more effective against the virtuous, both men and women, than the neglect of marriage." Some remarks on this subject, and on the advantages of marriage, have been made in a preceding note on infancy and education.

The number of wives whom a Muslim may have at the same time is four. He may marry free women, or take concubine slaves, or have both of these classes. It is the opinion of most persons, I believe, among the more strictly religious, that a man may not have more than four women, whether they be wives alone, or concubine slaves alone, or of both classes together; but the practice of some of the Companions of the Prophet, who cannot be accused of violating his precepts, affords a strong argument to the contrary. 'Alee, it is said, "was the most devout of the Companions; but he had four wives and seventeen concubines besides, and married, after Fâtimeh (may God be well pleased with her!), among all that he married and divorced, more than two hundred women; and sometimes he included four wives in one contract, and sometimes divorced four at one time, taking other four in their stead." This may perhaps be an exaggerated statement; but it is certain that the custom of keeping an unlimited number of concubines was common among wealthy Muslims in the first century of the Mohammedan era, and has so continued. The famous author of the work above quoted urges the example of Solomon to prove that the possession of numerous concubines is not inconsistent with piety and good morals; not considering that God made but one wife for Adam.

It has been mentioned in the first of the notes to this work, that a Muslim may divorce his wife twice, and each time take her back. This he may do, even against her wish, during a fixed period, which cannot extend beyond three months, unless she be enceinte, in which latter case she must wait until the birth of her child before she will be at liberty to contract a new marriage. During this period the husband is obliged to maintain her. If he divorce her a third time, or by a triple sentence, he cannot take her again unless with her own consent, and by a new contract, and after another marriage has been consummated between her and another husband, and this husband also has divorced her.

It is not a common custom, especially among the middle ranks, for an Arab to have more than one wife at the same time; but there are few of middle age who have not had several different wives at different periods, tempted to change by the facility of divorce. The case of 'Alee has been mentioned above. Mugheyreh Ibn-Sheah married eighty women in the course of his life; and several more remarkable instances of the love of change are recorded by Arab writers: the most extraordinary case of this kind that I have met with was that of Mohammad Ibn-Et-Teiyib, the Dyer, of Baghdád, who died in the year of the Flight, 423, aged eighty-five years; of whom it is related, on most respectable authority, that he married more than nine hundred women!—Supposing, therefore, that he married his first wife when he was fifteen years of age, he must have had, on the average, nearly thirteen wives per annum. The women, in general, cannot of course marry so many successive husbands, not only because a woman cannot have more than one husband at a time, but also because she cannot divorce her husband. There have been, however, many instances of Arab women who have married a surprising number of men in rapid succession. Among these may be mentioned Umm-Khárieh, who gave occasion to a proverb on this subject. This woman, who was of the tribe of Bejeeleh, in El-Yemen, married upwards of forty husbands; and her son Khárieh knew not who was his father. She used to contract a marriage in the quickest possible manner: a man saying to her, "Khitbun" (betrothal), she replied, "Nik-hun" (marriage), and thus became his lawful wife. She had a very numerous progeny; several tribes originating from her.

For the choice of a wife, a man generally relies on his mother, or some other near female relation, or a professional female betrother (who is called "khátibeh"); for there are many women who perform this office for hire. The law allows him to see the face of the female whom he proposes to marry, previously to his making the contract; but in the present day this liberty is seldom obtained, except among the lower orders. Unless in this case, a man is not allowed to see unveiled any woman but his own wife or slave, and those women to whom the law prohibits his uniting himself in marriage: nay, according to some, he is not allowed to "see" his own niece unveiled, though he may not marry her. It should be added, that a slave may lawfully see the face of his own mistress; but this privilege is seldom granted in the present day to any slave but a eunuch. An infringement of the law above mentioned is held to be extremely sinful in both parties: "The curse of God," said the Prophet, "is on the seer and the seen:" yet it is very often disregarded in the case of women of the lower orders.

A man is forbidden, by the Kur-án and the Sunneh, to marry his mother, or other ascendant; daughter, or other descendant; his sister, or half-sister; the sister of his father or mother or other ascendant; his niece, or any of her descendants; his foster-mother who has suckled him five times in the course of the first two years, or a woman related to him by milk in any of the degrees which would preclude his marriage with her if she were similarly related to him by consanguinity; the mother of his wife, even if he has not consummated his marriage with his wife; the daughter of his wife, if he has consummated his marriage with the latter (but if he has not done so, and this wife is divorced from him, or dead, he may marry her daughter); his father's wife, and his son's wife; and to have, at the same time two wives who are sisters, or aunt and niece: he is forbidden also to marry his unemancipated slave, or another man's slave if he has already a free wife; and to marry any woman but one of his own faith, or a Christian, or a Jewess. A Mohammadan woman, however, may only marry a man of her own faith. An unlawful intercourse with any woman prevents a man from marrying any of her relations who would be forbidden to him if she were his wife.

The reader has already seen that a cousin (the daughter of a paternal uncle) is often chosen as a wife, on account of the tie of blood, which is likely to attach her more strongly to her husband, or on account of an affection conceived in early years. Parity of rank is generally much regarded; and a man is often unable to obtain as his wife the daughter of one of a different profession or trade, unless an inferior; or a younger daughter when an elder remains unmarried. A girl is often married at the age of twelve years, and sometimes at ten, or even nine: the usual period is between twelve and sixteen years. At the age of thirteen or fourteen she may be a mother.

The young men marry a few years later.

The most important requisite in a wife is religion. The Prophet said, "A virtuous wife is better than the world and all that it contains." "A virtuous wife," said Lukmán, "is like a crown on the head of a king; and a wicked wife is like a heavy burden on the back of an old man." Among the other chief requisites are agreeableness of temper, and beauty of form (undiminished by any defect or irregularity of features or members), moderation in the amount of dowry required, and good birth. It is said, "if thou marry not a virgin, [which is most desirable,] marry a divorced woman, and not a widow; for the divorced woman will respect thy words when thou sayest, 'If there were any good in thee thou hadst not been divorced;' whereas the widow will say, 'May God have mercy on such a one! he hath left me to one unsuited to me.'" But according to another selfish maxim, the woman most to be avoided is she who is divorced from a man by whom she has had a child; for her heart is with him, and she is an enemy to the man who marries her after.—Modesty is a requisite upon which too much stress cannot be laid; but this, to an English reader, requires some explanation. 'Allee asked his wife Fátiméh, "Who is the best of women?" She answered, "She who sees not men, and whom they see not." Modesty, therefore, in the opinion of the Muslims, is most eminently shown by a woman's concealing her person, and restraining her eyes, from men. "The best rank of men [in a mosque], said the Prophet, "is the front; and the best rank of women is the rear:" that is, those most distant from the men: but better than even these are the women who pray at home.—Fruitfulness is also a desirable qualification to be considered in the choice of a wife: "it may be known in maidens," says the Prophet, "from their relations; because, generally speaking, kindred are similar in disposition, &c." Lastly, contentment is to be enumerated among the requisites. It is said, on the same authority, "Verily the best of women are those that are most content with little." To obtain a contented and submissive wife, many men make their selection from among the classes inferior to them in rank. Others, with a similar view, prefer a concubine slave in the place of a wife.

The consent of a girl not arrived at the age of puberty is not required: her father, or, if he is dead, her nearest adult male relation, or a guardian appointed by will or by the Kádee, acts as her wekeel, or deputy, to effect the marriage-contract for her. If of age, she appoints her own deputy. A dowry is required to legalize the marriage; and the least dowry allowed by the law is ten dirhems, or drachms of silver; about five shillings in our money. Mohammad married certain of his wives for a dowry of ten dirhems and the household necessities, which were a handmill to grind the corn, a water-jar, and a pillow of skin or leather stuffed with the fibres of the palm-tree, which are called "leef:" but some he married for a dowry of five hundred dirhems. With the increase of wealth and luxury, dowries have increased in amount; but, to our ideas, they are still trifling; a sum equivalent to about twenty pounds sterling being a common dowry among Arabs of the middle classes for a virgin, and half or a third or quarter of that sum for a divorced woman or a widow. Two-thirds of the sum is usually paid before making the contract, and the remaining portion held in reserve to be paid to the woman in case of her divorce or in case of the husband's death. The father or guardian of a girl under age receives the former portion of her dowry; but it is considered as her property, and he generally expends it, with an additional sum from his own purse, in the purchase of necessary furniture, dress, &c., for her, which the husband can never take from her against her own wish.

The marriage-contract is generally, in the present day, merely verbal; but sometimes a certificate is written, and sealed by the Kádee. The most approved or propitious period for this act is the month of Showwál: the most unpropitious, Moharram. The only persons whose presence is required to perform it are the bridegroom (or his deputy), the bride's deputy (who is the betrother), two male witnesses, if such can be easily procured, and the Kádee or a schoolmaster or some other person to recite a khutbeh, which consists of a few words in praise of God, a form of blessing on the Prophet, and some passages of the Kur-án, respecting marriage. They all recite the Fát'hah (or opening chapter of the Kur-án), after which the bridegroom pays the money. The latter and the bride's deputy then seat themselves on the ground, face to face, and grasp each other's right hand, raising the thumbs, and pressing them against each other. Previously to the khutbeh, the person who recites this formula places a handkerchief over the two joined hands; and after the khutbeh he dictates to the two contracting parties what they are to say. The betrother generally uses the following or a similar form of words: "I betroth to thee my daughter [or her for whom I act as deputy] such a one [naming the bride], the virgin, [or the adult virgin, &c.,] for a dowry of such an amount." The bridegroom answers, "I accept from thee her betrothal to myself." This is all that is absolutely necessary; but the address and reply are usually repeated a second and third time, and are often expressed in fuller forms of words. The contract is concluded with the recital of the Fât'hah by all persons present.

This betrothal, or marriage-contract, is often performed several years before the consummation, when the two parties are yet children; or during the infancy of the girl; but generally not more than about eight or ten days before the former event. The household furniture and dress prepared for the bride are sent by her family to the bridegroom's house, usually conveyed by a train of camels, two or three or more days before she is conducted thither.

The feasts and processions which are now to be mentioned are only observed in the case of a virgin bride; a widow or divorced woman being remarried in a private manner. I describe them chiefly in accordance with the usages of Cairo, which appear to me most agreeable, in general, with the descriptions and allusions in the present work.—The period most commonly approved for the consummation of marriage is the eve of Friday, or that of Monday. Previously to this event, the bridegroom once or twice or more frequently gives a feast to his friends; and for several nights, his house and the houses of his near neighbours are usually illuminated by numerous clusters of lamps, or by lanterns, suspended in front of them; some, to cords drawn across the street. To these or other cords are also suspended small flags, or square pieces of silk, each of two different colours, generally red and green. Some say that the feast or feasts should be given on the occasion of the contract; others, on the consummation; others, again, on both these occasions. The usual custom of the people of Cairo is to give a feast on the night immediately preceding that of the consummation, and another on the latter night; but some commence their feasts earlier. Respecting marriage-feasts, the Prophet said, "The first day's feast is an incumbent duty; and the second day's, a sunneh ordinance; and the third's day's, for ostentation and notoriety:" and he forbade eating at the feast of the ostentatious. It is a positive duty to accept an invitation to a marriage-feast or other lawful entertainment; but the guest is not obliged to eat. The persons invited, and all intimate friends, generally send presents of provisions of some kind a day or two before. The Prophet taught that marriage-feasts should be frugal: the best that he gave was with one goat. He approved of demonstrations of joy at the celebration of a marriage with songs, and, according to one tradition, by the beating of deffs (or tambourines); but in another tradition the latter practice is condemned. The preferable mode of entertaining the guests is by the performance of a zikr.

The bride is conducted to the bridegroom's house in the afternoon immediately preceding the night of consummation. On the day next preceding that on which she is conducted thither, she goes to the public bath, accompanied by a number of her female relations and friends. The procession generally pursues a circuitous route, for the sake of greater display; and on leaving the house, turns to the right. In Cairo, the bride walks under a canopy of silk borne by four men, with one of her near female relations on each side of her. Young unmarried girls walk before her; these are preceded by the married ladies; and the procession is headed and closed by a few musicians with drums and hautboys. The bride wears a kind of pasteboard crown, or cap; and is completely veiled from the view of spectators by a Kashmeer shawl placed over her crown and whole person; but some handsome ornaments of the head are attached externally. The other women are dressed in the best of their walking-attire. In the case, however, of a bride of high rank, or of wealth, and often in the case of one belonging to a family of the middle class, the ladies ride upon high-saddled asses, without music or canopy; and the bride is only distinguished by a Kashmeer shawl instead of the usual black silk covering; one or more eunuchs sometimes riding at the head. In the bath, after the ordinary operations of washing, &c., a feast is made, and the party are often entertained by female singers. Having returned in the same manner to her home, the bride's friends there partake of a similar entertainment with her. Her hands and feet are then stained with hennâ, and her eyes ornamented with kohl; and her friends give her small presents of money, and take their leave. "It is a sunneh ordinance that the bride wash her feet in a clean vessel, and sprinkle the water in the corners of the chamber, that a blessing may result from this. She should also brighten her face, and put on the best of her apparel, and adorn her eyes with kohl, and stain [her hands and feet] with hennâ [as above mentioned]; and she should abstain, during the first week, from eating anything that contains mustard, and from vinegar, and sour apples."

The bride is conducted to the house of the bridegroom (on the following day) in the same manner as to the bath, or with more pomp. In Cairo, the bridal processions of persons of very high rank are conducted with singular display. The train is usually headed by buffoons and musicians, and a water-carrier loaded with a goat's-skin filled with sand and water, of very great weight, which is often borne for many hours before, as well as during, the procession, merely to amuse the spectators by this feat of strength. Then follow (interrupted by groups of male or female dancers, jugglers, &c.) numerous decorated open waggons, or cars, each of which contains several members of some particular trade or art engaged in their ordinary occupations, or one such person with attendants: in one, for instance, a kahwejee (or kahvejee), with his assistants and pots and cups and fire, making coffee for the spectators: in a second, makers of sweetmeats: in a third, makers of pancakes (fateerehs): in a fourth, silk-lace manufacturers: in a fifth, a silk-weaver, with his loom: in a sixth, tinnern of copper vessels, at their work: in a seventh, white-washers, whitening over and over again a wall: in short, almost every manufacture, &c., has its representatives in a different waggon. El-Ja-bartee describes a procession of this kind in which there were upwards of seventy parties of different trades and arts, each party in a separate waggon, besides buffoons, wrestlers, dancers, and others; followed by various officers, the eunuchs of the bride's family, ladies of the hareem with their attendants, then the bride, in a European carriage, a troop of memlooks clad in armour, and a Turkish band of music. It was a procession of which the like had not before been seen.

The bride and her party, having arrived at the house, sit down to a repast. The bridegroom does not yet see her. He has already been to the bath, and at nightfall he goes in procession with a number of his friends to a mosque, to perform the night-prayers; he is accompanied by musicians and singers, or by chanters of lyric odes in praise of the Prophet; and by men bearing cressets (poles with cylindrical frames of iron at the top filled with flaming wood); and on his return, most of his other attendants bear lighted wax candles, and bunches of flowers.

Returned to his house, he leaves his friends in a lower apartment, and goes up to the bride whom he finds seated, with a shawl thrown over her head, so as to conceal her face completely, and attended by one or two females. The latter he induces to retire, by means of a small present. He then gives a present of money to the bride, as "the price of uncovering the face," and having removed the covering (saying, as he does so, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful"), he beholds her, generally, for the first time. On the occasion of this first visit, which is called the "dukhoor," or "dukheh," he is recommended "to perfume himself, and to sprinkle some sugar and almonds on the head of the bride and on that of each woman with her; this practice being established by existing usage and by traditions: also, when he approaches her, he should perform the prayers of two rek'ahs; and she should do the same if able: then he should take hold of the hair over her forehead, and say, 'O God, bless me in my wife, and bless my wife in me! O God, bestow upon me [offspring] by her, and bestow upon her [offspring] by me! O God, unite us, as Thou hast united, happily; and separate us, when Thou separatest, happily!'"

NOTE 40. The tarboosh is a woollen skull-cap, of a deep blood-red colour, having a tassel of dark blue silk attached to the crown. It is now worn by most Arabs of the higher and middle classes, and by many others, except in Arabia, where it is not so common. Round it is wound the muslin or shawl which forms the turban. Within it is worn a cotton cap. The Turks call it "fes," and "fés."

NOTE 41. The farajeeh is a loose robe or coat, now generally made of cloth, with full and long sleeves extending a little beyond the extremities of the fingers and without any slit. It is worn chiefly by persons of the learned professions.

NOTE 42. This is the usual mode in which money is collected for the singing-women in the present day.

NOTE 43. "Hooreeyeh" is the appellation commonly given by the Arabs to a virgin of Paradise, by French and English writers, termed "Houri;" which term, in Arabic, converts a female into a male, but is agreeable with the Persian equivalent of the Arabic "Hooreeyeh."

NOTE 44.—On the Evil Eye. Some remarks on the "evil eye" have been made in a former note (No. 24 in the present series), with respect to children, and the means of counteracting its supposed influence; but I mention this subject again partly with the view of suggesting to the reader the necessity of bearing it in mind, as it explains many usages described, or alluded to, in this work, which would otherwise appear unaccountable. He may remember a well-known line of Virgil—which, like many other allusions in works of ancient authors, shews how long and how extensively this superstition has been entertained. How deeply it is rooted in the minds of Arabs, even the most religious and learned, may be inferred from this saying of their Prophet: "The eye has a complete influence; because verily, if there were a thing to overcome fate, it most certainly would be a malignant eye." Hence he permitted charms (which he disallowed in almost every other case) to be employed for the purpose of counteracting its influence. The following observation, selected from several of a similar nature in my work on the Modern Egyptians, aptly illustrates the passage to which this note immediately refers. "It is a custom among the higher and middle classes in Cairo, on the occasion of a marriage, to hang chandeliers in the street before the bridegroom's house; and it often happens that a crowd is collected to see a very large and handsome chandelier suspended: in this case, it is a common practice to divert the attention of the spectators by throwing down and breaking a large jar, or by some other artifice, lest an envious eye should cause the chandelier to fall."

"Nescio quis teneros oculus mihi fascinat agnos,"

NOTE 45. The closet here alluded to, being one in which ablution is performed, always contains a small trough of water, or a ewer.

NOTE 46. This epithet, "unlucky," is often applied to an 'Efreet. I have frequently heard it thus used by Arabs.

NOTE 47. "Aboo-Shiháb" (literally, Father of a Shooting Star) is a nickname often given to a devil, and is so employed because devils, or evil jinnees, are sometimes destroyed by shooting stars hurled at them by angels; an instance of which occurs in the tale under consideration.

NOTE 48. "Sitt-el-Hosn" signifies "the Lady of Beauty."

NOTE 49. "Hasheesh" is the intoxicating hemp, which has been mentioned in former notes.

NOTE 50. Thus in the Breslau edition, and in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights; but in the edition of Cairo, the cook is merely termed a prodigal.

NOTE 51.—On Adoption. The Mohamadan law allows the adoption of sons, provided that the person to be adopted consents to the act, if of age to judge for himself; also, that he has been deprived of his parents by death or other means; and that there be such a difference of age between the two parties as might subsist between a natural father and his son. The adopted son enjoys the same right of inheritance as the natural son; but the adoptive father is not prevented by this act from marrying any relation of his adopted son.

NOTE 52. In the houses of Arabs of the more wealthy classes, there is usually a chair upon which the turban is placed at night. It is of a large size, but slight make; the bottom and back being generally of cane-work; and sometimes it has a kind of canopy constructed over it. The turban, when placed upon it, is covered with a kerchief of thick silk stuff, often embroidered or interwoven with gold thread.

NOTE 53. "Mósilee" may be understood as meaning either "of the fashion of El-Mósil," or "of muslin;" but the former, according to my sheykh, is the signification here intended. I think there is nothing peculiar in the common modern turban of El-Mósil.

NOTE 54. This is done under the idea that it strengthens the infant's eyes.

NOTE 55. "'Ajeeb" signifies "Wonderful."

NOTE 56. The meaning of this is, that he grew in a day as other children in a month; and in a month, as others in a year.

NOTE 57. The death of the cook is mentioned in the edition of Breslau; but not in that of Cairo.

NOTE 58. This ejaculation is generally uttered at the mention of a deceased Muslim.

NOTE 59. "Sáheb" is a title given to Wezeers, as mentioned in Note 8 to the Introduction.

NOTE 60. In the original, fifteen. The age of 'Ajeeb has been shewn to have been little more than eleven at this period; therefore I have substituted twelve for fifteen.

NOTE 61. This alludes to a custom common in the East,—that of giving a present of a dress, or some article of clothing, to a person who has brought good news.

NOTE 62. The term "boy" is not used here to imply that the eunuch was a youth; but in the sense in which it is often employed by us; as synonymous with "servant."

NOTE 63. "Er-Reydaneeeyeh" is the name of a tract on the north of Cairo, where travellers arriving from Syria generally halted. In the original, by errors in the diacritical points, this name is converted into "Ez-Zebedaneeeyeh."

NOTE 64. The word which I translate "a cross," literally signifies "an effigy;" but I suppose this term to be employed merely because a cross bears a rude resemblance to a man with extended arms.

NOTE 65. "The name of Allah encompass thee!" (or, literally, "—be around thee!") is an ejaculation often used, especially by women, agreeing exactly with the expression in the first verse of the twentieth Psalm,—"The name of the God of Jacob defend thee!"—the "name" of God here signifying his power. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower: the righteous runneth into it, and is safe." (Proverbs xvi. 10.)

NOTE 66. Here, for a reason given above, I have substituted "twelve" for "ten."

NOTE 67. In the original, the last of these verses is here omitted, but my sheykh has supplied it in the margin of my copy, and it occurs afterwards, in the 75th night, in which the preceding verses, with some slight variations, are repeated.

NOTE 68.—On the Expiation of Oaths. The law clearly allows expiation for an inconsiderate oath, and, according to vulgar opinion, for the violation of a deliberate oath. The expiation consists in once feeding or clothing ten poor men, liberating a Muslim slave or captive, or fasting three days. An unintentional oath requires no expiation; but the swearing to a falsehood can only be expiated by deep repentance.

NOTE 69. Hole observes (page 222), that "the discovery of Bedreddin in the Arabian Nights, by the tarts he had made, bears internal evidence of having been copied from Nella Raja's detection by the same means:" and he refers to Kindersley's "Specimens of Indian Literature."

NOTES TO CHAPTER FIFTH

NOTE 1. As the story of the Humpback is one of the best in this collection, and purely Arab, I have been glad to find, in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, authority for deviating here from my usual standard copy, by substituting "El-Basrah" for a city of China. The Breslau edition, in the opening of the story, lays the scene at "Ei-Basrah and Kajkâr." By the latter, I suppose Káshghar to be meant.

NOTE 2. In my original, they are said to have gone out early in the morning; but this is contradicted by the sequel.

NOTE 3. The appeal to Ezra's ass, which alludes to a tradition believed by the Muslims, as it is mentioned in the Kur-án, is omitted in the Cairo edition. The story is this:—'Ozeyr, or Ezra, "riding on an ass by the ruins of Jerusalem, after it had been destroyed by the Chaldeans, doubted in his mind by what means God could raise the city and its inhabitants again; whereupon God caused him to die, and he remained in that condition a hundred years; at the end of which, God restored him to life, and he found a basket of figs and a cruse of wine that he had with him, not in the least spoiled or corrupted; but his ass was dead, the bones only remaining; and these, while the Prophet looked on, were raised and clothed with flesh, becoming an ass again, which, being inspired with life, began immediately to bray."

NOTE 4. Most Arab cities abound with cats, which are much favoured by the inhabitants. These animals are often seen leaping across from the terrace of one house to that of another on the opposite side of a narrow street; and often has my kitchen in Cairo been robbed by them. They are said to contribute greatly to the spreading of the plague.

NOTE 5. Occurrences of this kind are said to have often happened in Arab towns, where dogs, though esteemed unclean by the Muslims, are, like cats, generally very numerous. Few of them have masters; but they compose distinct tribes; those of each tribe confining themselves to a particular quarter or district of the town, and suffering no strange dog to intrude among them and share with them in the offal thrown out from the butchers' shops and from private houses; or prowling about the mounds of rubbish in the environs, and, like the vultures, feeding upon the carcases of camels, asses, and other beasts, thrown out by the inhabitants. I was once told that the master of an English merchant-vessel, having fallen asleep in a state of intoxication on the shore of the harbour of Alexandria, at night, was devoured by dogs.

NOTE 6. The snatching of turbans by night is still a frequent practice of Arab rogues, and one which is often very lucrative; many a turban being composed of a costly Kashmeer shawl wound round a tarboosh, which latter alone is worth eight or nine shillings, or more, and some also having money or other valuables secreted in them.

NOTE 7. Watchmen are generally employed to guard by night the sooks, or market-streets, and other districts, in Arab towns. Those in Cairo carry a nebboot, or long staff, but no lantern. Their usual cries are of a religious nature; as, "I extol the perfection of the Living King, who sleepeth not nor dieth!" When they see a passenger approaching, they call out to him, "Attest the unity of God!" or merely, "Attest the unity!" and the reply is, "There is no deity but God!" It is supposed that a person bound on any unlawful undertaking would not dare to utter these words.

NOTE 8. At the period when this work was composed, the Christians were distinguished from the Muslims by a black or blue turban, and this was wound in a peculiar manner.

NOTE 9.—On the Title and Office of Wálee. "Wálee" is the title given to the chief magistrate of the police, and was so employed in the time of El-Makreezee, instead of the older appellation of "Sáheb esh-Shurtah." The same officer was also called "Mutawellee." It was the duty of this magistrate to perambulate the streets at night, attended by a body of his officers, including an executioner; for he often inflicted capital punishment on criminals immediately after their detection. He was invested with a degree of despotic power, and often put to death persons accused of capital crimes without the formalities required by the law. It was also his duty to superintend the infliction of the punishments of criminals legally condemned. An officer was employed to perform the nightly rounds in El-Medeeneh in the reign of Abou-Bekr; but it appears that the first regular guard for this purpose was appointed in the reign of 'Othmán.

NOTE 10. The ardebb, thus commonly pronounced, but properly written irdebb, varies in different places. In Cairo it is very nearly equivalent to five English bushels.

NOTE 11. In the original; this building is called the Khán of El-Jawálee; but it evidently should be — of El-Jáwalee; and the error is to be attributed to a copyist. The Khán of El-Jáwalee is mentioned by El-Makreezee, as being situate at a short distance within the present gate called Báb en-Nasr, and by the site of the older gate so called; and as existing in his time, in the former half of the ninth century of the Flight.

NOTE 12. Báb en-Nasr (the Gate of Victory, or — of Aid) is the name of the easternmost of the northern gates of Cairo. It was built in the reign of the Khaleefeh El-Mustansir, in the year of the Flight 480 (A. D. 1087-8).

NOTE 13. The words "besides my brokerage," I have inserted as necessary to make the account correct.

NOTE 14. It has been shewn in a former note that the Arabs consider it indecorous to eat with the left hand.

NOTE 15. As it is held unpolite to shew the hands, unless unavoidably, in the presence of a person of rank, the sleeve of the cloth coat, or that of the silk vest which is worn beneath it, is made sufficiently long to extend a little beyond the ends of the fingers; and so also, in general, is the sleeve of the shirt worn by persons of the lower orders.

NOTE 16. This building is first called, in the Cairo edition, the Khán of Suróor; and afterwards, — of Mesroor: the latter is the appellation given to it in the edition of Breslau; and is the correct name. The Khán of Mesroor is mentioned by El-Makreezee, as situate at the southern extremity of Beyn el-Kasreyn (respecting which see the next note), adjacent to the site of the Great Palace of the Khaleefehs. There were two Kháns of this name near each other. El-Makreezee says, that, in his earlier days, the greater of these, which appears to be that here alluded to, was one of the finest and largest Kháns in Cairo, in a most flourishing state, the resort of the chief Syrian merchants, and the dépot of their goods; but that latterly it had declined, and some portions of it were ruined.

NOTE 17. Beyn el-Kasreyn (which signifies "Between the Two Palaces") is the name still applied to that part of the principal street of Cairo which intervenes between the sites of the two famous palaces of the Khaleefehs.

NOTE 18. A Keysáreeyeh is a superior kind of sook, consisting of ranges of shops facing each other. That which is here mentioned (called in the Cairo edition. the Keysareeyeh of Jirjis; in the edition of Breslau, the Keysáreeyeh of Jarkash; and in the old English version, erroneously, the Circassian bezestein) is the Keysáreeyeh of Jahárkas, which, as I learn from El-Makreezee, was situate near the centre of what constituted the old city, on the east of the principal street. It existed in his time, and was built by the Emeer Fakhr-ed-Deen Jahárkas, in the year of the Flight 502 (A. D. 1108-9). Ibn-Khallikán, as quoted by El-Makreezee, says of it, "I have seen a number of merchants who have traversed various countries, and who say, 'We have not seen in any country its equal in beauty and greatness, and compactness of construction.'" He explains also the orthography of the name of "Jahárkas," and states that it is Persian (Chahár-kas), and signifies "four persons."

NOTE 19. The Egyptian fowls are much smaller than those of our country, and one is not too much for one man's breakfast. The eggs are usually hatched in ovens.

NOTE 20. The appellation of "the Gardener" is here to be understood as a mere surname derived from the occupation of some ancestor of the merchant; it being a common custom of the Arabs to retain an appellation of this kind, however humble.

NOTE 21. El-Makreezee mentions a "sook of the money-changers" as near to the Khán of Mesroor; and it seems to be the place here alluded to: the word "sook" being often omitted.

NOTE 22. The lady having offered up a prayer that the young merchant might be her husband, I have taken the liberty of inserting here a slight interpolation, which does not detract from the probability or consistency of the story; but rather the contrary.

NOTE 23. — On one of the Passages in this Work indicating a very late Date. The Habbáneeyeh is the name now applied to a portion of a main street, a little to the west of the lake called Birket el-Feel, in the southern part of Cairo. It is evidently thus applied in the passage to which this note relates; but El-Makreezee, writing in the former half of the ninth century of the Flight, says, "In this our time, bordering upon it [the Birket el-Feel] is a garden called by the name of the Habbáneeyeh, who were a family of Darmà the son of 'Amr the son of 'Owf the son of Thaalebeh the son of Baal the son of 'Amr the son of El-Ghóth the son of Teiyi: so Darmà was a minor family of [the tribe of] Teiyi, and the Habbáneeyoon [or Habbáneeyeh — for the terms are synonymous] were a family of Darmà: and the people have made a road between the garden of the Habbáneeyeh and the lake." He proceeds to say, that on the east of the Birket el-Feel, there were gardens; but that houses and streets had been built there. — Now, in the work before us, the tract which was a garden in the time of El-Makreezee is mentioned as occupied by houses and streets. Many years must have elapsed since that period before such could have been the case; and surely at least a century before the houses could have presented such an appearance as would lead a writer to imagine them of "ancient times." It may be objected against an argument drawn from this passage, that it is perhaps an interpolation of a copyist; but it agrees with many evidences of a late date, and occurs in at least one other copy (that from which the Breslau edition is printed), with only this slight difference—that “Habbáneeyeh,” by the erroneous addition of a point beneath the first letter, is converted into “Jebbáneeyeh:” and it should be remarked that the latter copy varies considerably in other points from that of Cairo. It would imply that Cairo was almost as extensive a city at the time when this work was composed or modernized as it is at present; and would account for its being here called Misr, or Masr; a name which was retained by El-Fustât at least as late as the commencement of the tenth century of the Flight, and probably until the year 1517 of our era or a little later, as I have remarked in a former note.

NOTE 24. “Ká’ah” is a term generally signifying “a lofty saloon;” but also often applied to an elegant house.

NOTE 25. “Nakeeb” signifies “a chief,” “a leader,” &c., and has various applications. In the present instance, the office which it designates is doubtful, but is evidently of high dignity, as Nakeeb of the Shereefs, the Chief, or Syndic, of the Descendants of the Prophet.

NOTE 26. Báb Zuweyleh (the Gate of Zuweyleh, or, more properly, of Zaweeleh, which is the name of a tribe) is a gate that was built at the same period as Báb en-Nasr, before mentioned. It marked the southern limit of Cairo; but is now in the heart of the metropolis. With two round-fronted towers, each surmounted by a lofty and elegant mád’neh, or menaret, pertaining to the adjoining great mosque of El-Mueiyad, it presents a very noble appearance.

NOTE 27. “Imperial gypsum” is a name given to the best kind of plaster used in Cairo. I have often admired the smoothness of its surface upon the walls of chambers in some of the older houses in that city; but, I need hardly say, never saw any that reflected like a mirror.

NOTE 28. In the Cairo edition, “with pearls and jewels at its corners.” The deficiency I have supplied from the edition of Breslau: but I may here remark, that it would have been more proper to describe the snakes as gilt.

NOTE 29.—On the Crowns worn by Arab Ladies. From Eastern drawings and descriptions, it appears that the kind of crown here mentioned was generally a circle of jewelled gold (the lower edge of which was straight; and the upper, fancifully heightened to four or more points) surrounding the lower part of a dome-shaped cap with a jewel or some other ornament at the summit. This crown was worn by many Arab ladies of high rank or great wealth, probably until about two centuries ago. Another kind of crown is now more generally worn, called a “kurs.” This is a round, convex ornament, generally about five inches in diameter, composed of gold set with a profusion of diamonds, of open work, representing roses, leaves, &c. It is sewed upon the top of the tarboosh; and is worn by most of the ladies of Cairo, at least in full dress. An engraving of a crown of this description, and another of one of a more common kind, may be seen in my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. ii. Appendix A.

NOTE 30. It is a common custom of the Arabs to give a present of money tied up in a corner of an embroidered handkerchief.

NOTE 31. The mace is a weapon still used in the East, but not so commonly as it was in former times. There was a petty governor in Upper Egypt during my first visit to that country, who, in his daily rides, indulged a frequent habit of striking persons with a weapon of this kind, a tolerably-heavy steel mace; but he did it with a happy knack, so as never, I believe, to inflict a dangerous wound, unless intentionally. Maces, like other arms of steel, are often tastefully inlaid with arabesque ornaments and inscriptions in gold.

NOTE 32.—On the Punishment of Theft. The Mohammadan law ordains that a person who is adult and of sound mind, if he steals an article of the value of a quarter of a deenár (or piece of gold) from a place to which he has not ordinary or free access, shall lose his right hand; but this punishment is not to be inflicted for stealing a free child, or anything which, in the eye of the law, is of no pecuniary value; as wine, or a musical instrument; and there are some other cases in which the thief is not to be so punished. For the second offence, the left foot is to be cut off; and for the third and subsequent offences, according to the Hanafee code, the culprit is to be punished by a long imprisonment; or, by the Sháfe’ee law, for the third offence, he is to lose his left hand; for the fourth, his right foot; and for further offences, he is to be flogged or beaten. The punishment is the same for a woman as for a man.—The law induced a freethinking Muslim to ask, "If the hand is worth five hundred deenârs, [this being the fine for depriving a man of that member,] why should it be cut off for a quarter of a deenâr?" He was answered, "An honest hand is of great value; but not so is the hand that hath stolen."—Amputation for theft is now seldom practised: beating, or some other punishment, is usually inflicted in its stead for the first, second, and third offense; and, frequently, death for the fourth.

NOTE 33. Capital punishment in this case would be contrary to the law; but it is often inflicted upon highway-robbers.

NOTE 34. The meaning is, that the doer is God. An allusion is here conveyed to a verse (the 17th) in the Soorat el-Anfâl (the eighth chapter of the Kur-ân)—"Thou didst not cast [the gravel into their eyes] when thou didst [seem to] cast [it]; but God cast [it]."

NOTE 35. The honour that is due to the human body requires that any portion disunited from it be decently deposited in the earth.

NOTE 36. As a hair, for instance, is drawn from paste.

NOTE 37. These verses are founded on a tradition of the Prophet.

NOTE 38.—On Khatmehs, or Recitations of the whole of the Kur-ân at Private Festivities. The most approved and common mode of entertaining guests at modern private festivities among the Arabs is by a Khatmeh, which is the recitation of the whole of the Kur-ân. Three or more persons of the inferior class of the professors of religion and law, who are called fakeehs (vulgarly, fikees), are usually hired for this purpose. Schoolmasters, and students of the collegiate mosques who devote themselves to religion and law, are the persons most commonly thus employed. Their mode of recitation is a peculiar kind of chanting, which, when well executed, I found very agreeable, at least for an hour or so: but the guests seldom have to listen to the chanting of the whole of the Kur-ân: the reciters usually accomplish the greater portion of their task, in a somewhat hurried manner, before the guests have assembled, each of them chanting, in turn, a certain portion, as a thirtieth part of the whole (called a "juz"), or half one of these sections (a "hezv"), or, more commonly, a quarter (ruba). Afterwards they chant more leisurely, and in a more musical manner; but still by turns.—These recitations of the whole of the Kur-ân are performed on various festive occasions, but are most usual after a death; the merit of the performance being transferred to the soul of the deceased.

NOTE 39. The mess termed "zirbâjeh," by some called "zurbâjeh," from the Persian "Zeerbâj," is a kind of spoon-meat. Some of its ingredients are described in the sequel of the present story.

NOTE 40.—On Atonements and other Services for the Dead. As filial piety is a general characteristic of the Arabs, and various services are believed by them to atone for the minor sins of the deceased, and thus to diminish his misery, or to increase his happiness, it is natural, and not uncommon, for a son to act in the manner here related. Recitations of the Kur-ân are performed for the dead, to whom the merit of these works is transferred, and a sacrifice is often offered at the tomb after the burial; the flesh of the victim being distributed to the poor. But a more important service for the deceased is the payment of his debts; for it is affirmed by the Prophet, that even martyrdom will not atone for a debt unpaid.

NOTE 41. A money-changer is very frequently employed to examine the money which a purchaser offers; and if it be old, to weigh it. The money-changers are mostly Jews and Christians.

NOTE 42. Some mosques (as the Azhar, for instance, the principal mosque of Cairo) remain open all night; and many houseless persons sleep in them, upon the matting which covers the paved floor. Men are also often seen, at other times, but not at the hours of prayer, lounging, eating, or working, in the mosques; such practices not being deemed inconsistent with the high respect which the Muslims pay to these buildings.

NOTE 43. The remainder of this paragraph, and the whole of the next two paragraphs, being omitted in the edition of Cairo, I translate from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and the edition of Breslau; but almost entirely from the former.

NOTE 44. The water of the well of Zemzem, in the temple of Mekkeh, is believed to possess miraculous virtues, and is therefore brought away in bottles or flasks by many of the pilgrims, to be used when occasion may require as medicine, or to be sprinkled on grave-linen. A bottle of it is a common and acceptable present from a pilgrim, and a guest is sometimes treated with a sip of this holy water.

NOTE 45. A whip is sometimes used in the hareem of a great man; and its being attached to the waist of the damsel here mentioned marks her authority. It is generally formed of a strip of hippopotamus' hide, hammered into a round shape; and this kind is called a "kurbáj." I believe it is seldom used in the hareem with severity; but usually for intimidation.

NOTE 46. It is a universal custom of the Arabs, on visiting the sick, to say, "May our Lord restore thee!" or, "No evil befall thee!" &c.

NOTE 47. The first hospital built by a Muslim was that of Damascus, founded by El-Weleed the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, in the eighty-eighth year of the Flight (A. D. 706-7). The Arabs would deprive St. Ephrem Syrus of the honour of having been the author of the first institution of this kind; one of their historians ascribing it to an early Pharaoh, named Menákiyoosh; another, to Hippocrates.

NOTE 48. The remainder of the paragraph is translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights.

NOTE 49. "The metropolis of the world," or literally, "the mother of the world" ("umm ed-dunyà"), is a title given to several cities, as well as to Cairo, by their respective inhabitants. This passage, therefore, and others of a similar kind, in which even foreigners are made to rank Egypt and Cairo as superior to every other country and city, strongly favour the opinion that some of its tales were written, or altered, by an Egyptian.

NOTE 50. A more ample eulogium upon Egypt and the Nile, but abounding with such gross errors that I could not confidently offer a translation, is found in the Breslau edition. It agrees better with the old translation; which, however, in this place, presents considerable unauthorized amplifications, and some misconceptions: "Birket el-Habash" (for instance), the name of a lake on the south of Cairo, being mistaken for Ethiopia.

NOTE 51. For this monthly rent (or about a guinea of our money), a large and handsome house may be hired at the present day in Cairo.

NOTE 52. After the amputation of the hand for theft, the stump is usually plunged in boiling pitch or tar, or oil, to stanch the blood.

NOTE 53. — On Retaliation and Fines for Wounds and Mutilations. Retaliation for intentional wounds and mutilations is allowed by the Mohammadan law, like as for murder; "eye for eye," &c.: but a fine may be accepted instead, which the law allows also for unintentional injuries. The fine for a member that is single (as the nose) is the whole price of blood, as for homicide; namely a thousand deenárs (about 500*£) from him who possesses gold; or, from him who possesses silver, twelve thousand dirhems (about 300£*); for a member of which there are two, and not more (as a hand), half the price of blood; for one of which there are ten (a finger or toe), a tenth of the price of blood: but the fine of a man for maiming or wounding a woman is half of that for the same injury to a man; and that of a free person for injuring a slave varies according to the value of the slave. The fine for depriving a man of any of his five senses, or dangerously wounding him, or grievously disfiguring him for life, is the whole price of blood.

NOTE 54. See No. 20 of the notes to Chapter ii. — "The women of Egypt have the character of being the most licentious in their feelings of all females who lay any claim to be considered as members of a civilized nation; and this character is freely bestowed upon them by their countrymen, even in conversation with foreigners." — In the work from which the above passage is quoted, I have expatiated upon this subject more than I need do in the present case.

NOTE 55. The Arabs are generally of opinion that the innate dispositions of a child are inherited more from the mother than from the father. They believe that a daughter commonly resembles, in good or evil qualities, her mother; and a son, his maternal uncle. Hence they often address a man, "Yá teiyib el-khá!" — "O thou who hast a good maternal uncle!"

NOTE 56. 'Abd-Allah Ibn-'Abbás was one of the most learned of the companions of his cousin Mohammad, and one of the most celebrated of the relaters of his sayings and actions. He has received the titles of "Interpreter of the Kur-án" and "Sultán of Commentators." He died in the year of the Flight 68. His father, 'Abbás, the son of 'Abd-El-Muttalib, was paternal uncle of Mohammad, and ancestor of the 'Abbásee Khaleefehs.

NOTE 57. — On the Astrolabe. The astrolabe is more commonly used by the Arabs than any other instrument for astronomical observations. It is generally between four and six inches in diameter. It consists of a circular plate with a graduated rim, within which fit several thinner plates, and of a limb, moving on a pivot in the centre, with two sights. The plates are engraved with complicated diagrams, &c., for various calculations. The instrument is held by a ring, or by a loop of cord attached to the ring, during an observation; and thus its own weight answers the same purpose as the plumb-line of the quadrant (which the Arabs sometimes used in its stead); the position of the moveable limb with the sights marking the required altitude.

NOTE 58. Safar is the second month of the Mohammadan year.

NOTE 59. As different copies vary here as to the date, I have taken the liberty of putting 263 instead of 763 or 653, in order to avoid a glaring anachronism. It is probable, however, that the last of these is the author's date, as it is found both in the old translation, and in the Breslau edition. The date in the Cairo edition is 763.

NOTE 60. A degree is four minutes; it would have been more proper, therefore, to have said, eight degrees and two minutes, than seven degrees and six minutes.

NOTE 61. "Es-Sámit" signifies "the Silent."

NOTE 62. This and the two following names, or rather, surnames, convey the same meaning. Bakbook, Heddár, and Bakbak (here, in my original, erroneously written Yakyak), signify "Chatterer." "El-Kooz el-Aswánee" (not to be mistaken for ———— Aswánee," with a soft s) seems to imply that the person thus named was always like a mug, with open mouth, and insensible as flint to rebuke. The two remaining names are different in different copies: "Shakálík" is perhaps put erroneously for some other word, as "Shikák," "Discord."

NOTE 63. Kur-án, ch. iii. v. 128.

NOTE 64. The Arabs generally carry their young children in this manner, seated astride upon the shoulder.

NOTE 65. This expression is borrowed from the Kur-án, ch. xlviii. v. 10. The meaning is, "there is no power of man, but God's power is superior to it."

NOTE 66. The Prophet (Mohammad) is always alluded to when this form of benediction is used and the name of the person to whom it is applied is not mentioned.

NOTE 67. "Nedd" is a perfume composed of ambergris, musk, and aloe wood; or simply ambergris.

NOTE 68. Two khutbehs are recited on the occasion of the congregational Friday-prayers. It is the first of these which is here alluded to. See the next note.

NOTE 69. — On the Congregational Friday-prayers. The Selám (or Salutation) of Friday is a form of blessing on the Prophet and his family and companions, which is chanted by the muëddins from the mádnahs (or towers) of the congregational mosques half an hour before noon. The worshippers begin to assemble in the mosque as soon as they hear it, and, ranging themselves in rows parallel to, and facing, that side in which is the niche, that marks the direction of Mekkeh, each performs, by himself, the prayers of two rek'ahs, which are supererogatory, and then sits in his place while a reader recites part or the whole of the 18th chapter of the Kur-án. At the call of noon, they all stand up, and each again performs, separately, the prayers of two rek'ahs, ordained by the Prophet. A minister, standing at the foot of the pulpit-stairs, then proposes to bless the Prophet: and accordingly, a second Selám is chanted by one or more other ministers stationed on an elevated platform. After this, the former minister, and the latter after him, repeat the call of noon (which the muëddins have before chanted from the mádnahs); and the former enjoins silence. The chief minister (Khateeb, or Imám,) has already seated himself on the top step or platform of the pulpit. He now rises, and recites a khutbeh of praise to God and exhortation to the congregation; and if in a country or town acquired by arms from unbelievers, he holds a wooden sword, resting its point on the ground. Each of the congregation next offers up some private supplication; after which, the Khateeb recites a second khutbeh, which is always the same, or nearly so; part, of a similar nature to the first, but chiefly, prayer for the Prophet and his family, &c., and for the general welfare of the Muslims. This finished, the Khateeb or Imám descends from the pulpit, and, stationed before the niche, after a form of words differing slightly from the call to prayer has been chanted by the ministers on the elevated platform before mentioned, recites the divinely-ordained prayers of Friday (two rek'ahs), while the people do the same silently, keeping time with him exactly in the various postures. Thus are completed the Friday prayers; but some of the congregation remain, and perform the ordinary divinely-ordained prayers of noon.

NOTE 70. So in the Cairo edition. El-Muntasir bi-lláh was the great-grandson of Hároon Er-Rasheed, and acceded to the throne in the year of the Flight 247 (A. D. 861). A slight anachronism, therefore, is here presented, unless we suppose that the hero of the story told by the Sultán's steward was an old man at the period of the misfortune of the humpback. The reign of El-Muntasir was somewhat less than six months. The copy from which the old translation was made, and the edition of Breslau, date the adventure of the barber, here related, more than three centuries and a half later, in the reign of El-Mustansir bi-lláh.

NOTE 71. The practice of spunging, or the intrusion of strangers at entertainments, has long been very prevalent in Arab towns. An instance has been given towards the close of Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 72. I have altered the order in which the brothers are described, and omitted two particulars, to agree with the sequel.

NOTE 73. The next paragraph is translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights; being omitted in the Cairo edition. An equal portion, later, is wanting in the old translation.

NOTE 74. — On Augurations with respect to Marriage. This passage alludes to an astrological calculation made with the view of determining by what sign of the zodiac the two persons are influenced who contemplate becoming man and wife, and thence ascertaining whether they will agree. This is often done in the present day by adding together the numerical values of the letters composing his or her name and that of the mother, and, if I remember right, subtracting from 12 the whole sum if this is less than 12, or what remains after subtracting, or dividing by, 12. Thus is obtained the number of the sign. The twelve signs, commencing with Aries, correspond respectively with the elements of fire, earth, air, water, fire, earth, and so on; and if the signs of the two parties indicate the same element, it is inferred that they will agree; but if they indicate different elements, the inference is, that the one will be affected by the other in the same manner as the element of the one is by that of the other: thus, if the element of the man is fire, and that of the woman, water, he will be subject to her rule.

Among other calculations of the same kind is the following, which my sheykh has mentioned in a marginal note on this passage, in the copy from which I translate. — The numerical values of the letters composing the name of each of the two parties are added together, and one of these two sums is subtracted from the other: if the remainder is an uneven number, the inference is unfavourable; but if even, the reverse.

In the present instance, the dupe, knowing that there are various modes of divining whether he will be happy with his wife, is made to believe that his fortune depends upon the mode, instead of the result, of the calculation.

NOTE 75. Here, in my original, "Bak-bak;" but this, as before mentioned, was the name of the third brother.

NOTE 76. "Kuffeh," signifying "a basket of palm-leaves," and "a dry gourd," seems to be here equivalent to "empty-head."

NOTE 77. The blind in Egypt are notorious for their impudence. — It is related that Moses, while bathing one day in the Nile, saw a blind man pass by, and, being moved with pity, prayed that God would restore his sight. His prayer was answered; but as soon as the eyes of the blind man were opened, he seized the clothes of his benefactor, which were lying on the bank, and protested that they were his own. Moses, therefore, now prayed that the thief might be struck blind again; and God, answering his prayer, said, O Moses, know that I am wiser than thou with respect to my creatures.—This tradition was related to me in Cairo.

NOTE 78. It is generally thus that an injured Muslim calls others to his aid.

NOTE 79. Like the natives of Egypt in the period of the Roman domination, its modern inhabitants, and the Arabs of other countries (though, I believe, in a less degree), are notorious for their obstinacy in refusing to pay their taxes until they have been severely beaten. They well know that, the more readily they pay, the more will be exacted from them; and are often heard to boast of the number of stripes which they have received before yielding their money. The same obstinacy is generally displayed by an Arab accused of any offence; and often, even by a witness: in either case the man fears that, should he tell at once all he can, the judge will try whether the stick or the kurbáj will elicit a further confession.

NOTE 80.—On the general Corruptness of Muslim Judges. Khidr Bey (whether he was a judge I do not know), conversing one day with his friends on the difficulties experienced in the exercise of judicature, one of the company remarked, "In my opinion, the greatest difficulty that is met with is, when one of the parties is rich, and the other, poor."—"In that case," replied Khidr Bey, "I find none; for it is clear that the rich will gain his cause, and the poor will lose: but the great difficulty is, when the two parties are equally rich and powerful. If thou, "he continued," being a poor man, have a suit against one who is rich and powerful, beware of applying to the Kádee; for he will not fail to condemn thee: my advice is, that thou desist altogether from thy suit, and rather throw thyself at the feet of thine adversary; for thou wilt obtain more justice from him than from the Kádee."—For a justification of the opinion here expressed, see my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. iv.

NOTE 81.—On good and evil Omens. Of omens I have already treated, in Note 15 to Chapter i.: but a few words on this subject must be here added.—It is common to draw a lucky or unlucky omen from the first object seen on going out in the morning; and according as that object is pleasant or the contrary, the person says, "my morning is good," or "—bad." A one-eyed man is regarded as of evil omen; and especially one who is blind of the left eye. Many a person is related to have suffered for having an unlucky countenance.

NOTE 82. The portion of this story comprised in the first paragraph having been the subject of a specimen of the present publication, translated from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, and printed and distributed when I had not in my possession the copy of the original which I have taken as my general standard, it is here given nearly in the same words: I have only made a few slight additions and alterations derived from a comparison of the two editions. Some of the notes inserted in the specimen I omit in this place, as they relate to matters already explained.—Hole remarks (in page 223), that this part of the Barber's story of his Fifth Brother is derived "from an Indian fable of the remotest antiquity . . . found in the Heeto-pades of Veeshnoo-Sarma," in which a Brahman "inadvertently breaks his pottery ware . . . with a walking-stick . . . in the act of suppressing the outrageous jealousy of four beautiful but turbulent wives."

NOTE 83. "El-Feshshár" signifies "the Foolish Talker," or "Vain Boaster." I have substituted this name for "El-'Ashshár" the reading in my original. In the Arabic characters, the latter differs from the former in little more than the want of a point, and has no appropriate meaning. It appears that, in most copies of the original, the barber's Fifth Brother is surnamed "En-Neshshár," or "the Sawyer," perhaps in allusion to his incessant loquacity: but this, also, in the Arabic characters, very nearly resembles "El-Feshshár," which I doubt not to be the right name.

NOTE 84. There is nothing very extravagant in this hope of the barber's brother; for in the East, persons frequently rise from very low to very high stations; and it is remarkable that, notwithstanding their usual pride, they generally retain the appellation of the trade or craft which they or their fathers pursued, however ignoble, before their elevation. It is common for a great man to distinguish himself by adding to his name the appellation of "the drug-gist or perfumer," or "the grocer," &c.; and he is not a whit the less respected on this account.

NOTE 85. The Eastern grandee rides not at the head or rear of his attendants, but in the midst of them.

NOTE 86. Persons distinguished by rank or wealth or learning are saluted by many of the shopkeepers and passengers as they pass through the streets of Eastern cities, and often greeted with a short ejaculatory prayer for the continuance of their life and happiness. When a very great man rides through the streets, most of the shopkeepers rise to him, and pay their respect to him by inclining the head, and touching the lips and forehead or turban with the fingers of the right hand.

NOTE 87. See Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 88. He could scarcely shew his pride more strongly; for it is an affront to reject a present.

NOTE 89. An Arab lady of high rank seldom makes use of her feet but to move from one chamber to another; when she goes abroad, she always rides: to stand for many minutes together is, therefore, fatiguing to her.

NOTE 90. See the close of Note 39 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 91. This is said either to shew his vulgarity or that the weather was sultry.

NOTE 92. "El-Meleehah" signifies "the Beautiful:" it is derived from "mil" (salt, &c.).

NOTE 93. An occurrence of a similar nature, which happened a few years ago in Cairo, was related to me by one of my friends there.—An old woman frequented the tomb of a saint in that city, near the eastern gate called the Báb el-Mahrook, to which many women afflicted with disease or barrenness often resorted to offer up prayers, believing their petitions would be effectual through the saint's intercession; and she was in the habit of enticing ladies from this tomb to the house of her husband, which was near by, under pretence of his serving them with medicines or with charms. The unsuspecting victim, being desired to go thither alone, was conducted by the old woman to an upper room, at the end of which the man was seated; and in walking over the matted floor to approach him, suddenly fell through a trapdoor into a place so deep that the fall rendered her senseless. In this state, she was put to death; and as ladies in Cairo always wear valuable ornaments and costly clothes, the murderers were sure of obtaining considerable spoil.

NOTE 94. This money, we are to understand, was prepared for the purpose of giving those presents which are customary from a guest at a marriage-festivity; but the mention of a smaller sum would have been more proper. It is given to the singing-women and tire-women who, in great houses, parade the bride through the different apartments, and display her in different rich suits of attire before the bridegroom.

NOTE 95.—On the Handkerchief, and Signet, of Indemnity. Sometimes, the handkerchief, and sometimes, the signet, or seal-ring, is given as a pledge of indemnity.—It was a frequent custom of many a chief of the Memlooks of Egypt (there commonly called "the Ghuzz"), to bastinado men in the court of his mansion (when he desired to make a show of strict justice), in order that one of the women of the family, hearing the cries, might drop a handkerchief from a window, and so the punishment might soon cease, in respect for the harem, whose protection is often appealed to by offenders.

NOTE 96. The title of "Sultán" is here, and afterwards, given to the Khaleefeh; and it has been so employed by a celebrated historian, El-Makreezee.

NOTE 97. So, apparently, in most copies; but in the Cairo edition, "of the sons of the Kings." It is said to have been a custom of some of the Barnekees (the family so renowned for their generosity) to keep open house during the hours of meals, and to allow no one who applied at such times for admission to be repulsed.

NOTE 98. "Sikbáj" is a dish composed of meat, wheat-flour, and vinegar.

NOTE 99. "Katáif" is a name applied to various kinds of sweet pastry: particularly to a kind of small pancakes, made of a thin paste of fine flour and water, about three inches broad, and a sixth of an inch or less in thickness, baked upon a copper tray over a fire, like kunáfeh (the composition of which is the same), and eaten with honey or sugar: also to cakes composed of fine flour, treacle or honey, and sesame-oil. The sirup mentioned in the same sentence is (as my sheykh states in a marginal note) treacle thickened over the fire.—The proper singular of katáif, namely, "katee-feh," is seldom used; one of these cakes being generally called "fard katáif."

Sometimes, it appears, they were perfumed with musk.

NOTE 100. The "mithkál" is the weight of a deenár, or a dirhem and a half,—in Cairo, about 71½ or 72 English grains.

NOTE 101. See above, Note 96.

NOTE 102. By "Arabs," we are here to understand Bedawees, or Arabs of the Desert, who are termed, by the older writers, "Aaráb," or "Aarábees;" but in my original, as in other late works, "'Arab," which was the old appellation of the townspeople and villagers.

NOTES TO CHAPTER SIXTH

NOTE 1. In the old version, the person here named Enees-el-Jelees is called "The Fair Persian;" but I do not find her so described in any copy of the original. The name here given to her may be rendered "the Companion's Cheerer;" "Enees" being a term applied to any person or thing serving as an agreeable, cheering companion; and "Jelees" signifying "a companion," or "one in the habit of sitting with another."

NOTE 2. "Khatteeyeh" is derived from "khatt," which signifies "writing," but which is also the name of a place (Khatt Hejer) in the province of El-Bahreyn, a famous mart for spears. Of the figure of speech employed in the couplet in which this word occurs (considered by the Arabs an elegant mode of ætiology, and called by them "hosn et-taaleel") my sheykh gives the following example in a marginal note:—

"And the rain fell not but for the purpose of kissing the ground before thee."

NOTE 3. "El-Mo'een" signifies "the Aider," or "the Assistant."

NOTE 4. "El-Fadl," signifying "the Excellence," is here, as a proper name, an abbreviation of "Fadl-ed-Deen," "the Excellence of the Religion."

NOTE 5. This phrase (a person of auspicious aspect) is often used by the modern Arabs and the Turks, and signifies "a virtuous or beneficent man."

NOTE 6. This answer is not to be understood in its literal sense; it has become a common form of speech which an Arab often uses for the purpose of obtaining something more than he would venture to demand.

NOTE 7. "May it be favourable," or "—— beneficial," is a compliment usually addressed to a person who has just been to the bath, and to a man who has just had his head shaved. The reply is, "May God bestow favours upon thee."

NOTE 8.—On the Law respecting Murder and unintentional Homicide. The Kur-án ordains that murder shall be punished with death; or, rather, that the free shall die for the free, the slave for the slave, and a woman for a woman; or that the perpetrator of the crime shall pay, to the heirs of the person whom he has killed, if they allow it, a fine, which is to be divided according to the laws of inheritance. It also ordains, that unintentional homicide shall be expiated by freeing a believer from slavery, and paying, to the family of the person killed, a fine, unless they remit it. But these laws are amplified and explained by the same book and by the Imáms.—A fine is not to be accepted for murder unless the crime has been attended by some palliating circumstance. This fine, the price of blood, is a hundred camels; or a thousand deenárs (about 500*£) from him who possesses gold; or, from him who possesses silver, twelve thousand dirhems (about 300£*). This is for killing a free man; for a woman, half that sum; for a slave, his or her value, but that must fall short of the price of blood for the free. A person unable to free a believer must fast two months as in Ramadán. The accomplices of a murderer are liable to the punishment of death. By the Sunneh also, a man is obnoxious to capital punishment for the murder of a woman; and by the Hanafee law, for the murder of another man's slave. But he is exempted from this punishment who kills his own child or other descendant, or his own slave, or his son's slave, or a slave of whom he is part-owner: so also are his accomplices: and according to Esh-Sháfe'ee, a Muslim, though a slave, is not to be put to death for killing an infidel, though the latter be free. A man who kills another in self-defence, or to defend his property from a robber, is exempt from all punishment. The price of blood is a debt incumbent on the family, tribe, or association, of which the homicide is a member. It is also incumbent on the inhabitants of an enclosed quarter, or the proprietor or proprietors of a field, in which the body of a person killed by an unknown hand is found; unless the person has been found killed in his own house.

Hence it appears, that the punishment with which the Wezeer El-Fadl threatened his son is not to be regarded as a grave criminal act; especially when we consider the nature of the son's offence: for the slave was the property of the king, and it was not allowable to any other man even to see her without his permission. Many of the characters depicted in the present work would seem incongruous in the extreme, if judged according to European notions of justice and other moral qualities.

NOTE 9. "The two professions of the faith," "There is no deity but God," and "Mohammad is God's Apostle," are generally repeated by a dying Muslim.

NOTE 10. This is said to imply (as my sheykh has remarked in a marginal note) that El-Fadl was a charitable person who bestowed pensions upon the professors of the Kur-án and of science. There are many among the modern Muslims who do so, and numbers also who found and endow public schools.

NOTE 11. — On the Washing, Shrouding, and Burial of the Dead. The ceremonies attendant upon death and burial are nearly the same in the cases of men and women. The face or the head of the dying person is turned towards the direction of Mekkeh. When the spirit is departing, the eyes are closed; and then, or immediately after, the women of the house commence a loud lamentation, in which many of the females of the neighbourhood generally come to join. Hired female mourners are also usually employed; each of whom accompanies her exclamations of "Alas for him!" &c., by beating a tambourine. If possible, the corpse is buried on the day of the death; but when this cannot be done, the lamentation of the women is continued during the ensuing night; and a recitation of several chapters, or of the whole, of the Kur-án is performed by one or more men hired for the purpose.

The washing consists, first, in the performance of the ordinary ablution which is preparatory to prayer, with the exception of the cleansing of the mouth and nose; and secondly in an ablution of the whole body with warm water and soap, or with water in which some leaves of the lote-tree have been boiled. The jaw is bound up, the eyes are closed, and the nostrils, &c., are stuffed with cotton; and the corpse is sprinkled with a mixture of water, pounded camphor, dried and pounded leaves of the lote-tree, and sometimes other dried and pulverized leaves, &c., and with rose-water. The ankles are bound together; and the hands placed upon the breast.

The grave-clothing of a poor man consists of a piece or two of cotton, or a kind of bag: but the corpse of a man of wealth is generally wrapped first in muslin; then, in cotton cloth of a thicker texture; next, in a piece of striped stuff of silk and cotton intermixed, or in a kaftán (a long vest) of similar stuff, merely stitched together; and over these is wrapped a Kashmeer shawl. The colours most approved for the grave-clothes are white and green. The body thus shrouded is placed in a bier, which is usually covered with a Kashmeer shawl, and borne on the shoulders of three or four men, generally friends of the deceased.

There are some slight differences in the funeral-ceremonies observed in different Arab countries; but a sufficient notion of them will be conveyed by briefly describing those which prevail in Cairo. The procession to the tomb is generally headed by a number of poor men, mostly blind, who, walking two and two, or three and three, together, chant, in a melancholy tone, the profession (or two professions) of the faith, mentioned above (in Note 9), or sometimes other words. They are usually followed by some male relations and friends of the deceased; and these, by a group of school-boys, chanting in a higher tone, and one of them bearing a copy of the Kur-án, or of one of its thirty sections, placed upon a kind of desk formed of palmsticks, and covered with an embroidered kerchief. Then follows the bier, borne head-foremost. Friends of the deceased relieve one another in the office of carrying it; and casual passengers often take part in this service, which is esteemed highly meritorious. Behind the bier walk the female mourners, composing a numerous group, often more than a dozen; or, if of a wealthy family, they ride. Each of those who belong to the family of the deceased has a strip of cotton stuff or muslin, generally blue, bound round her head, over the head-veil, and carries a handkerchief, usually dyed blue (the colour of mourning), which she sometimes holds over her shoulders, and at other times twirls with both hands over her head or before her face, while she cries and shrieks almost incessantly; and the hired female mourners, accompanying the group, often celebrate the praises of the deceased in the manner described in the preceding tale, though this was forbidden by the Prophet.—The funeral-procession of a man of wealth is sometimes preceded by several camels, bearing bread and water to give to the poor at the tomb; and closed by the led horses of some of the attendants, and by a buffalo or other animal to be sacrificed at the tomb, where its flesh is distributed to the poor, to atone for some of the minor sins of the deceased.

The bier used for conveying the corpse of a boy or a female has a cover of wood, over which a shawl is spread; and at the head is an upright piece of wood: upon the upper part of this, in the case of a boy, is fixed a turban, with several ornaments of female head-dress; and in the case of a female, it is similarly decked, but without the turban.

A short prayer is recited over the dead, either in a mosque or in a place particularly dedicated to this service in, or adjacent to, the burial-ground. The body is then conveyed, in the same manner as before, to the tomb. This is a hollow, oblong vault, one side of which faces the direction of Mekkeh, generally large enough to contain four or more bodies, and having an oblong monument of stone or brick constructed over it, with a stela at the head and foot. Upon the former of these two stelæ (which is often inscribed with a text from the Kur-án, and the name of the deceased, with the date of his death), a turban, cap, or other head-dress, is sometimes carved, showing the rank or class of the person or persons buried beneath; and in many cases, a cupola supported by four walls, or by columns, &c., is constructed over the smaller monument. The body is laid on its right side, or inclined by means of a few crude bricks, so that the face is turned towards Mekkeh; and a person is generally employed to dictate to the deceased the answers which he should give when he is examined by the two angels Munkar and Nekeer, whom I have mentioned in No. 21 of the Notes to the Introduction. If the funeral be that of a person of rank or wealth, the bread and water, &c., before mentioned are then distributed to the poor.

The principal ceremonies observed after the funeral have been described in Note 15 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 12. "The lord (or chief) of the first and the last among mankind" is one of the many appellations of honour given by the Muslims to their Prophet.

NOTE 13. My sheykh remarks, that this is said merely to excite men to generosity; for literally it is not true, as is shown by the memorable example of Kaab the son of Mámeh, who preferred giving the water with which he was provided to another, and in consequence himself died of thirst.

NOTE 14. We are not to understand that such a slave as Enees-el-Jelees was exposed to the public gaze in a market to which all persons indiscriminately were admitted (for this would be at variance with Eastern usages); but in a special mart to which none were allowed access but persons of wealth who expressed a desire to purchase.

NOTE 15.—On Kissing the Ground, as a Mode of Obeisance. This and several other passages in the present work shew that we are often to understand the expression "kissing the ground before a person" as signifying "touching the ground, and then the lips and forehead, or turban, with the right hand;" and I believe this expression should generally be so understood. When I wrote the fourteenth note to the Introduction, I inclined to a contrary opinion, chiefly from recollecting to have read the following translation of a passage of El-Makreezee, by the learned De Sacy:—"Ce khalife [El-Hákím] ordonna qu'à l'avenir on ne baiseroit plus la terre devant lui; que personne, en le saluant dans les marches publiques, ne baiseroit sa main ou son etrier, parce que cette coutume de se prosterner devant une créature étoit une invention des Grecs." But on referring to the original, I find that the words which he renders "cette coutume de se prosterner" signify literally "the bending towards the ground." I suppose, therefore, that his deviating from the literal sense in one case was owing to his adhering to it in another; and not meeting with the proof which I had fancied to exist of his being right, I venture to differ from him in this instance, without fear of being suspected of arrogance, as the kind of obeisance above described is often called "kissing the ground" both by the Arabs and the Persians. I should add that, except in the house, I do not remember to have ever seen the ground actually touched, but nearly so, in making this obeisance, which is still called "kissing the ground" when thus imperfectly performed.

NOTE 16. By this is meant, a place where mud was kneaded to be employed in building. The mortar generally used in the construction of Arab houses is composed of mud in the proportion of one-half, with a fourth part of lime, and the remaining part of the ashes of straw and rubbish.

NOTE 17. See the note immediately preceding.

NOTE 18. In Arabic, "bursh." This kind of mat, composed of palm-leaves (and sometimes, I believe, of the coarse grass mentioned in the next note), is used by the poor to sit upon.

NOTE 19. This kind of grass, called in Arabic "halfeh," and more properly "halfâ" (by botanists, poa multiflora, and poa cynosyroides), and the "âkool" (or hedysarum alhagi), overspread spontaneously most of the alluvial tracts in Egypt which are above the reach of the inundation, and in consequence left uncultivated. The former is used in the manufacture of coarse mats, and the latter serves as pasture for camels. The Wezeer, by taking the round mat and the two bundles of halfâ, seems to indicate that he is degraded to a condition as low as that of a maker of coarse mats.

NOTE 20. The boats used by the Arabs in the navigation of rivers are generally moored by means of a rope attached to a stake which is driven into the bank.

NOTE 21. By "children of the road" are meant "travellers."

NOTE 22. See Note 55 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 23. The word which I render elevated (mo'allakah) is applied to a structure raised upon columns or pillars, &c.

NOTE 24. The "ghadâ" is a tree of a very inflammable nature, which, in burning, gives out a fierce heat. It grows chiefly in sandy tracts, and is described as resembling the "athl" (or tamarisk), but as being smaller than this tree.

NOTE 25.—On Shaving the Head. I do not know when the custom of shaving the head became general among the Arabs of the towns; but from a remark of Es-Suyootee, I think it was not so common about the commencement of the tenth century of the Flight (that is, about the period which this work best illustrates) as it is at present, when it is almost universal among all classes; for in his time, its legality was doubted. He writes thus:—"The Imâm El-Ghazâlee hath said, 'There is no harm in it in the case of him whose object is cleanliness:' and the apparent sense of his words is, that it is improper in him who desireth to beautify himself for any worldly purpose, as is done by people of bad disposition." It is added in a marginal note in the copy from which I translate this, "Persons differ respecting the shaving of the head. The opinion generally prevailing is, that it is improper to him who wears not a turban, and allowable to him who does wear one, since he has a substitute:"—"that it is also lawful, unquestionably, in the case of any disease of the head:"—and "that the hanging of the rosary to the neck, and the shaving of the head without a legal necessity, are innovations."—Hâroon Er-Rasheed generally wore the hair of his head sufficiently long to reach below his ears; but shaved it when he performed the pilgrimage; and many other Muslims in early times did the same. Those who shave the head generally leave a small tuft upon the crown; but most persons of the literary and religious professions, and many others, disapprove of this tuft.

NOTE 26. By the term "sheykhs" we are here to understand "persons of sanctity and of learning." See Note 9 to Chapter i.

NOTE 27. By "the shining moon" is meant "the beautiful cup-bearer, whose face is like the shining moon."

NOTE 28. The Muslims believe that a blessing is derived from witnessing and hearing the devout exercises, recitations, &c., of holy men.

NOTE 29. The "jubbeh" worn in Eastern countries, is a long outer vest, with sleeves which reach nearly to the wrist. It is now generally made of cloth, and is worn by most tradesmen and other persons of the middle and higher classes. It differs somewhat in form in different countries.

NOTE 30. The "melwatah" is a garment of which I was unable to obtain a description until I inquired of my friend Mr. Salamé, who informed me that it was the name of a large outer garment which used to be worn over the farajeeyeh. But I afterwards found it stated in one of the marginal notes to a later tale, that the term above mentioned is now pronounced "mel-lootah," and is applied in the present day to an article of dress of cloth or other costly material; particularly to a jubbeh; but that it is also employed, in allusion to a jubbeh, &c., in a contemptuous sense, or, as I infer, ironically.

NOTE 31. See Note 41 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 32. The "lithám" is a piece of drapery with which a Bedawee often covers the lower part of his face. It frequently prevents his being recognised by another Arab who might make him a victim of blood-revenge; and is a means of disguise seldom employed but by Arabs of the desert.

NOTE 33. The meaning is, that the act would speak for itself, and be long remembered; that the grave of the fisherman would be pointed out as that of one to whom the Khaleefeh had shown signal favours.

NOTE 34. It is a common custom of Arabs of the lower orders to put the money which they receive, especially when it is the first of the day's gains, to the lips and forehead before depositing it in the pocket; and the same is sometimes done by persons of the middle class.

NOTE 35. Literally, "twenty nufs." See Note 17 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 36. These are the Kádees of the four great sects, or persuasions, of the Sunnee Muslims. See Note 1 to the Introduction.

NOTE 37. The words "and the Wezeer took him away" are omitted in the Cairo edition.

NOTE 38. "Kuteyt" is the diminutive of "kitt," vulgo "kutt," a "cat," and properly a "he-cat."

NOTE 39. The words which I translate "the place of blood" literally signify "the place of the stagnation of blood;" and are applied to the usual place of decapitation, because the blood is left there to soak into the ground.

NOTE 40. The recompense here alluded to is one to be received at the final retribution; not in the present life.

NOTE 41. This kind of "kulleh" is a small, porous, earthen bottle, with a wide mouth.

NOTES TO CHAPTER SEVENTH

NOTE 1. Damascus is afterwards mentioned in the original as the abode of this merchant's family; but not here.

NOTE 2. "Ghánim" signifies "a taker of spoil," "a fortunate acquirer of anything" and "Eiyoob" is the name which we call "Job."

NOTE 3. "Fitneh" signifies "temptation," "seduction," "disturbance," &c.

NOTE 4. By the term "loads" we are always to understand "camel-loads," unless it is otherwise expressed. A camel-load is generally about three hundredweights.

NOTE 5. Or vesicles of musk. In the original, "nawáfch" is put for "nawáfij."

NOTE 6. A great recompense in the world to come is to be the lot of him who takes part in a funeral-procession.

NOTE 7. The ablution was necessary to qualify Ghánim for joining in the prayer over the dead.

NOTE 8. "Sawáb" signifies "rectitude."

NOTE 9. "Káfoor" is the Arabic for "camphor." Instances of antiphrasis in the names given to black slaves are very common.

NOTE 10. "Bakheet" signifies "fortunate," from "bakht" ("fortune"), a word borrowed from the Persian.

NOTE 11. I am not sure that this is to be understood as a jest; for I have been assured, by a slave-dealer and other persons in Cairo, that sometimes slaves brought to that city are found to be cannibals; and that a proof lately occurred there; an infant having been eaten by its black-nurse. I was also told that these cannibals are generally distinguished by an elongation of the os coccygis; or in other words, that they have tails!

NOTE 12. The story here alluded to is inserted in the original; but, being extremely objectionable, and too short and simple to be abridged, I have been compelled to omit it altogether.

NOTE 13. This story is not in the old version; but I think the reader will consider it worthy of insertion in the present series, as an amusing illustration of the customs which are often observed by the Arabs on the occasion of the death of the master of a family. I can bear testimony to the general correctness of the picture which it presents; or rather state, that the greatest of the extravagances which it describes are not unfrequently practised in the present day.

NOTE 14. As the Arab women are much more reluctant to uncover the upper and back part of the head than they are to shew the face, before strange men, such a scene as that which is here described is very seldom witnessed; but I have seen not so unfrequently a woman with her face uncovered, and besmeared with mud, on her receiving the news of the sudden death of a near relation.

NOTE 15. This, to some readers, may require explanation. To free a slave who has no means of providing for himself, and not to grant him any means to do so, is almost the heaviest punishment that can be inflicted upon him; and to do this, unless for a heinous crime, is considered disgraceful.

NOTE 16. This is not just; for as soon as the slave is emancipated he is legally free, without doubt: but it is inserted in the tale as a jest.

NOTE 17. See Note 46 to Chapter ii.—This mode of disposing of a rival in the harem is said to have been not very unfrequently adopted.

NOTE 18. I suspect that the original presents here an error, which I have endeavoured to correct.—The names which the lady ejaculates are to be understood as those of female slaves, her attendants. "Zahr-el-Bustân" signifies "Flower of the Garden;" "Sabeehah," "Beautiful;" "Shejeret-ed-Durr," "Tree of Pearls" (this is the vulgar mode of pronouncing "Shejer-ed-Durr," which was the name of the wife of the Sultân Es-Sâleh Nejmed-Deen, afterwards Queen of Egypt); "Noor-el-Hudâ," "Light of Day," or "Light of Guidance;" "Nejmet-es-Subh," "Star of the Morning;" "Nuzheh," "Delight;" "Hulweh," "Sweet;" and "Zareefeh," "Elegant."

NOTE 19. From this point, to the relation of the stratagem employed by Zubeydeh, I omit much that is unsuitable for insertion in the translation, as approaching to licentiousness.

NOTE 20. Perhaps it is unnecessary to mention, that "the Prophet's Uncle" here alluded to was El-'Abbâs; and that the "descendant" was Hâroon Er-Rasheed.

NOTE 21. "Koot-el-Kuloob" signifies "Food (or Sustenance) of Hearts."

NOTE 22. As black, which was the distinguishing colour of the banners and dress of the 'Abbâsee Khaleefehs, was originally assumed in token of mourning for such of their relations as were victims of the Umawees, it may have continued for a long time to be used for a similar purpose: but the modern colour of mourning among the Arabs is blue; and it is remarkable that the term which properly signifies "black" is commonly applied by them to dark blue.—On the subject of mourning, see Note 52 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 23. "Kheyzurân" and "Kadeeb" signify respectively, "a Cane" (particularly "Indian Cane"), and "a Rod," or "a long and slender Branch."

NOTE 24. See Note 85 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 25. By "the Sultân" is meant the Viceroy of Damascus, though the title is improperly used in this sense.

NOTE 26. The account of the disgusting treatment of Ghânim's mother and sister, which follows in this place in the old version, is not in either of the copies of the original which I possess, containing this tale. Hence, and as it is extremely inconsistent with Arab customs and feelings, I have little doubt of its being an interpolation by some ignorant copyist.

NOTE 27. See Note 18 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 28. By Ghánim's hareem, we are here to understand his mother and sister; the term "hareem" being often used to signify a man's female relations residing in his house.

NOTE 29. It is implied that she visited the sheykhs (by which are here meant the devotees) to request the aid of their prayers; and gave alms for the sake (or in the name) of Ghánim in order to propitiate Providence in his favour.

NOTE 30. — On the Charitable Disposition of the Arabs. Some remarks which I have made on this subject with reference to the Egyptians, in a former work, are equally applicable to the Arabs in general. "Benevolence and charity to the poor are virtues which the Egyptians possess in an eminent degree, and which are instilled into their hearts by religion; but from their own profession it appears that they are as much excited to the giving of alms by the expectation of enjoying corresponding rewards in heaven, as by pity for the distresses of their fellow-creatures, or a disinterested wish to do the will of God. It may be attributed, in some measure, to the charitable disposition of the inhabitants, that beggars, are so numerous in Cairo. The many handsome Sebeels, or public fountains (buildings erected and endowed for the gratuitous supply of water to passengers), which are seen in this city, and the more humble structures of the same kind in the villages and fields, are monuments of the same virtue." So also the numerous Khâns for the reception of travellers, in countries occupied by the Arabs, bear testimony to the charity of this people.

NOTE 31. This is often said by an Arab to a person against whom he knows or fears himself to have committed an offence. The most urgent reason for doing so may be seen by reverting to No. 9 of the notes to Chapter iv.

NOTE 32. This compliment has occasioned, in the old version, an error of the most serious kind, by its having been understood in its literal sense. Ghánim is made to propose that the Khaleefeh should take his sister as one of his favourites (i. e. concubines); which, as she was a free woman, would be a crime of the foulest nature.

NOTE 33. We are to understand this sum of money as being Fitneh's dowry. — Here it may be mentioned, that the Khaleefeh, by marrying Fitneh, severely punished Zubeydeh: for he thus gave her a wife, instead of a concubine, as a rival.

NOTE 34. — On the Passion of Love among the Arabs. A few remarks on this subject may be inserted to justify the picture of love presented in the foregoing tale. That sensual passion is most prevalent among the Arabs cannot be doubted; but I think it unjust to suppose them generally incapable of a purer feeling, worthy, if constancy be a sufficient test, of being termed true love. That they are not so, appears evident to almost every person who mixes with them in familiar society; for such a person must have opportunities of being acquainted with many Arabs sincerely attached to wives whose personal charms have long vanished, and who have neither wealth nor influence of their own, nor wealthy nor influential relations, to induce their husbands to refrain from divorcing them. It very often happens, too, that an Arab is sincerely attached to a wife possessed, even in the best portion of her age, of few charms; and that the lasting favourite among two or more wives is not the most handsome. This opinion, I am sorry to observe, is at variance, as far as the Arabs of the towns are concerned, with that entertained by one of the most intelligent and experienced of modern travellers, who long resided among this people, — the justly-celebrated Burckhardt: but it is confirmed by numerous facts related by respectable Arab authors (and therefore not regarded by them as of an incredible nature), as well as by cases which have fallen under my own observation. The tale of Leylà and Mejnoon, "the Juliet and Romeo of Arabia," is too well known to be here repeated; but among many other anecdotes of strong and constant love, the following may be insterted: —

The Khaleefeh Yezzed the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, it is said, had two female slaves; one of whom was named Habbábeh, and the other, Selámeh; to the former of whom he was most ardently attached: he had purchased her for a hundred thousand dirhems; and the other, for ten thousand. In the company of these two females he sometimes shut himself up for three months together, utterly neglecting the affairs of his people. At length, being reproved for this conduct by his brother Meslemeh, he promised to return to his duty: but the two slaves diverted him from his purpose; and on the following morning, excited by their songs and caresses, and by wine, he became frantic with pleasure, and danced and sang like a madman, till a fatal accident put a stop to his joy; Habbábeh, eating a pomegranate, was choked by one of the grains, and immediately died. The grief of Zezeed was so poignant that he would not quit the corpse, but continued to kiss and fondle it until it became putrid. Being then admonished by his attendants that proper respect required its burial, he consented to commit it to the earth: after five days, however, his desire again to behold the object of his love induced him to open the grave, and though the corpse had become hideous, he declared that it was lovely as ever in his eyes. At the earnest request of Meslemeh, he ordered the grave to be closed again; but he was unable to exist when deprived of the sight of the remains of her who was at the same time his slave and his mistress: he threw himself upon his bed, speechless; and after lingering seventeen nights, expired, and was buried by the side of Habbábeh. "May God," says the narrator, "have mercy on them both!"

In the same work from which the above is taken, it is related that Hároon Er-Rasheed, visiting Suleymán the son of Abou-Jaafar, one of his chief officers, saw with him a female slave, named Da'eefeh, of excessive beauty, and being smitten by her charms, demanded her as a present. His request was granted; but Suleymán, from grief at the loss of his mistress, fell sick; and during his illness was heard to exclaim,—

"I appeal unto God against the affliction which He hath sent upon me through the Khaleefeh.

The world heareth of his justice; but he is a tyrant in the affair of Da'eefeh.

Love of her is fixed in my heart as ink upon the surface of paper."

Er-Rasheed, being informed of his complaint, restored to him his mistress, and, with her, his peace of mind.—This anecdote is given as a proof of strong love; but perhaps may not be thought much to the purpose. The following from the same work, is more apt.

During the hottest hour of an excessively sultry day, the Khaleefeh Mo'áwiyyeh the son of Abou-Sufyán was sitting in a chamber which was open on each side to allow free passage to the air, when he beheld a barefooted Bedawee approaching him. Wondering what could induce this man to brave the scorching heat, he declared to his attendants that, if he were come to demand of him any favour or aid or act of justice, his request should be granted. The Bedawee addressed him, in verse, with a pathetic appeal for justice against the tyranny of Marwán the son of El-Hakam (afterwards Khaleefeh, Mo'áwiyyeh's fourth successor), by whom he had been forcibly deprived of his beloved wife, named Soadà. The Khaleefeh requiring a more particular account of his case, he related the following facts. He had a wife, the daughter of his paternal uncle, excessively beloved by him, and he possessed a number of camels, which enabled him to live in comfort; but a year of terrible drought deprived him of his property, and reduced him to utter want: his friends deserted him, and his wife was taken away from him by her father. To seek redress, he repaired to Marwán, the Governor of his district, at El-Medeeneh, who, having summoned the father of his wife, and herself, was so smitten by the beauty of the woman that he determined to obtain her for himself in marriage; to accomplish which, he threw the husband into prison, and offered the father of the woman a thousand deenárs and ten thousand dirhems for his consent to his marriage with her, promising to compel her actual husband to divorce her; and this latter object, having obtained the father's approval, he gained by severely torturing the unfortunate Bedawee. It would have been vain for the woman to attempt resistance; and so she became the wife of Marwán.—The oppressed Bedawee, having related these circumstances, fell down in a swoon, and lay on the floor senseless, coiled up like a dead snake. As soon as he recovered, the Khaleefeh wrote a poetical epistle to Marwán, severely reproaching him for his baseness, and commanding him, on pain of death, to divorce the woman and send her with his messenger. She was accordingly divorced and sent, with an answer composed in the same measure and rhyme, assuring the Khaleefeh that the sight of Soadà would convince him that her charms were irresistible; and this proved too true. Mo'áwiyyeh himself no sooner saw her than he coveted the possession of her, and offered to give the Bedawee, if he would resign her to him, three virgins from among his female slaves, together with a thousand deenárs, and an ample annual pension. The Bedawee shrieked with dismay, as though he had received his death-blow; and indignantly rejected the offer. The Khaleefeh then said to him, "Thou confessest that thou hast divorced her, and Marwán has married her and acknowledged that he has divorced her: we will therefore give her her choice: if she desire any other than thee as her husband we will marry her to him, and if she prefer thee we will restore her to thee." She however preferred the destitute Bedawee, and the Khaleefeh gave her up to him, with a present of ten thousand dirhems.

Numerous instances of unreasonable love are recorded in the writings of Arabs. It is related that a man fell in love with a female from seeing the impression of her hand upon a wall; and being unable to obtain possession of her, died. Many men are said to have conceived a violent passion for females seen in dreams: others, again, to have been thus affected merely by the ear. An author relates his having been acquainted with an accomplished schoolmaster who lost his heart from hearing a man sing the praises of a woman named Umm-'Amr, and two days after, shut himself up in his house to mourn for her death, in consequence of his hearing the same man sing,—

"The ass went away with Umm-'Amr; and she returned not, nor did the ass return."

But a few anecdotes may be considered as rare exceptions to a general rule. I think, however, that strong evidences of the existence of true love among all classes of the Arabs are afforded by their very numerous tales of fiction descriptive of this passion.

NOTES TO CHAPTER EIGHTH

NOTE 1. The next story to that of Ghánim, in my original, is one of very great length, comprising the greater part of the forty-fourth night and extending to the end of the hundred and forty-fifth; but interrupted by the contents of my eighth chapter, which consists of two stories of a very different kind, that appear to have been introduced to relieve its tediousness. With these, it occupies nearly 162 pages, or not much less than an eighth part of the whole work. It is the story of the King 'Omar En Noamán, and his two sons Sharr-kán and Dó-el-Mekán ("Light of the Place"), and his daughter, Nuzhet-ez-Zemán ("Delight of the Age"), &c. It is entirely a fiction, professedly relating to the first century of the Mohammadan era, "before the reign of the Khaleefeh 'Abd-El-Melik the son of Marwán;" and its main subject is a war with two Greek Kings. Taken altogether, I deem it unworthy of a place in the present series of tales; and so much of it depends upon incidents of a most objectionable nature, that I cannot attempt to abridge it; but a pleasant tale might be composed from it by considerable alterations.

One of the two stories which I have extracted from it, that of Táj-el-Mulook and the Lady Dunyá, bears apparent indications of a Persian origin; but in their present state, the manners and customs, &c., which both exhibit are Arab. The scenes of the events narrated in the story of Táj-el-Mulook are in Persia and, probably, in India; but imaginary names appear to be given to the several kingdoms mentioned in it: the kingdom of El-Ard el-Khadrà ("the Green Country") and El-'Amoodeyn (which signifies "the Two Columns") is said to include the mountains of Ispahán, and its locality is thereby sufficiently indicated: that of El-Ard el-Beydà ("the White Country") I suppose to be in Persia or India: and as to the Islands of Camphor, I fancy we must be content to consider them vaguely as appertaining to India: the country in which 'Azeez and 'Azezeh resided is said to have been near to the Islands of Camphor; but their story is perfectly Arab.—The Island of Camphor is also mentioned in the Story of Hasan of El-Basrah.

NOTE 2. "El-Medeeneh el-Khadrà" signifies "the Green City." See the above note.

NOTE 3. "The Compassionate" is an epithet here applied to God.

NOTE 4. See the first note in this series.—"Zahr," in Arabic, signifies "a Flower."

NOTE 5.—On Coats of Mail, and other Armour worn by the Arabs. The Prophet David is said to have been the first person who manufactured coats of mail; and the cause of his applying himself to the art was this.—"He used to go forth in disguise; and when he found any people who knew him not, he approached them and asked them respecting the conduct of Dáood (or David), and they praised him and prayed for him; but one day as he was asking questions respecting himself as usual, God sent to him an angel in the form of a human being, who said, 'An excellent man were Dáood if he did not take from the public treasury: '—whereupon the heart of Dáood was contracted, and he begged God to render him independent: so He made iron soft to him, and it became in his hands as thread; and he used to sell a coat of mail for four thousand [pieces of money—whether gold or silver is not said], and with part of this he obtained food for himself, and part he gave in alms, and with part he fed his family."—Hence an excellent coat of mail is often called by the Arabs "Dáoodée," i. e. "Davidean." This kind of armour is worn by some Arabs of the Desert in the present day; but the best specimens, I believe, are mostly found in India. Burckhardt mentions one tribe of Arabs who have about twenty-five; another, two hundred; and two others, between thirty and forty. "The dora [properly díra] is," he remarks, "of two sorts, one covering the whole body like a long gown from the elbow, over the shoulders, down to the knees: this is the sirgh: the other, called kembáz, covers the body only to the waist; the arms from the elbows downwards being covered with two pieces of steel, fitting into each other, with iron fingers. Thus clad, the Arab completes his armour by putting on his head an iron cap (tás), which is but rarely adorned with feathers. The price of a coat of mail fluctuates from two hundred to fifteen hundred piastres. . . . Those of the best quality are capable of resisting a ball." The coat of mail is sometimes worn within the ordinary outer tunic.

NOTE 6. This implies that his parents were dead.

NOTE 7.—On Public Royal Feasts. On certain periodical festivals, and on other occasions (as those of the kind here described), it has long been, and still is, a custom of Muslim princes to give public feasts to all classes of their subjects, in the palace. El-Makreezee quotes a curious account of the feasts which were given on the festival following Ramadán to the inhabitants of Cairo, by the Fátimée Khaleefehs. At the upper end of a large saloon was placed the serer (or couch) of the monarch, upon which he sat with the Wezeer on his right. Upon this seat was placed a round silver table, with various delicacies, of which they alone ate. Before it, and extending nearly from the seat to the other extremity of the saloon, was set up a kind of table or platform (simát) of painted wood, resembling a number of benches placed together, ten cubits (or about eighteen or nineteen feet) in width. Along the middle of this were arranged twenty-one enormous dishes, each containing twenty-one baked sheep, three years old, and fat; together with fowls, chickens, and young pigeons, in number three hundred and fifty of each kind; all of which were piled together in an oblong form, to the height of the stature of a man, and enclosed with dry sweetmeat. The spaces between these dishes were occupied by nearly five hundred other dishes of earthenware; each of which contained seven fowls, and was filled up with sweetmeats of various kinds. The table was strewn with flowers; and cakes of bread made of the finest flour were arranged along each side. There were also two great edifices of sweetmeats, each weighing seventeen hundred-weights, which were carried thither by porters with shoulder-poles; and one of these was placed at the commencement, and the other at the close, of this sumptuous banquet. When the Khaleefeh and Wezeer had taken their seats upon the couch, the officers of state who were distinguished by neck-rings or collars, and the inferior members of the court, seated themselves in the order of their respective ranks; and when they had eaten, they gave place to others. Two such feasts, given on the festival after Ramadán and on the "great festival," cost four thousand deenárs, or about two thousand pounds sterling.—Two military officers, named Ibn-Fáiz and Ed-Deylemee, distinguished themselves at these feasts in a very remarkable manner. Each of them used to eat a baked sheep, and ten fowls dressed with sweetmeats, and ten pounds of sweetmeats besides, and was presented with a quantity of food carried away from the feast to his house, together with a large sum of money. One of them had been a prisoner at Askalán; and after he had remained there some time, the person into whose power he had fallen jestingly told him that if he would eat a calf belonging to him, the flesh of which weighed several hundredweights, he would emancipate him. This feat he accomplished, and thus he obtained his liberation.

Several cases of a similar kind to those just mentioned are instanced in a late work. One of a man who, as related by Vopiscus, was brought before the Emperor Maximilian [sic], and who devoured a whole calf, and was proceeding to eat up a sheep, but was prevented. Another, of a man who commenced his repast (in the presence of Dr. Boehmen, of Wittenberg,) by eating a raw sheep and a sucking pig, and, by way of dessert, swallowed sixty pounds of prunes, stones and all. A third, of an attendant of the menagerie of the Botanical Garden in Paris, who used to devour all the offals of the Theatre of Comparative Anatomy, and ate a dead lion in one day.

NOTE 8.—On Litters for Travelling. The kind of litter borne by mules is generally one resembling the pālkee (or palanquin): it is borne by four of these animals, two before and two behind, or by two only, or more commonly by two camels, and sometimes by two horses. When borne by camels, the head of the hindmost of these animals is painfully bent down, under the vehicle. It is the most comfortable kind of litter; and two light persons may travel in it. The name generally given to it is "takhtarawán," or "takht-rawán;" but the term employed in the passage to which this note refers is "miháfieh," which is often used as general name for a camel-litter, and particularly applied to one with a flat top.—A very common kind of camel-litter, called "musattah," or "heml musattah," resembles a small square tent, and is chiefly composed of two long chests, each of which has a high back: these are placed on the camel in the same manner as a pair of panniers, one on each side; and the high backs, which are placed outwards, together with a small pole resting on the camel's pack-saddle, support the covering which forms what may be called the tent. This vehicle accommodates two persons. It is generally open at the front; and may also be opened at the back. Though it appears comfortable, the motion is uneasy; especially when it is placed upon a camel that has been accustomed to carry heavy burdens: but camels of easy pace are generally chosen for bearing litters.—Another kind of litter, called "shibreeyeh," is composed of a small square platform with an arched covering. This accommodates but one person; and is placed on the back of the camel: two sahhárahs (or square camel-chests), one on each side of the animal, generally form a foundation for it.—The musattah and shibreeyeh (but particularly the latter) are also called "hódaj."

NOTE 9. See Note 43 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 10. See Note 54 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 11. "Táj-el-Mulook" signifies "the Crown of the Kings."

NOTE 12. Lynxes were often employed in the chase in Arabian and other Eastern countries in former times; but I do not know if they are at present. See Note 24 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 13. By this word are meant "oblong, cylindrical, hollow beads:" "kasabeh" signifying originally "a reed," "cane," &c.

NOTE 14. The words "who hath taught men," &c., are from the Kur-án, ch. xcvi. v. 5.

NOTE 15. "Azeez" and "Azeezeh" (masculine and feminine) signify "Dear," "Excellent," &c.

NOTE 16. The handkerchief is generally oblong, and each of its two ends is embroidered with a border of coloured silks and gold; the other two edges being plain.

NOTE 17. My sheykh has remarked in a marginal note, that this sign may allude to her heart, or to her sighing because she enjoys not the union she desires (as expressed immediately after); and that the latter is more probable, as the action is one common with persons in grief.

NOTE 18.—On Conversing and Corresponding by means of Signs, Emblems, Metaphors, &c. Many persons of the instructed classes, and some others, among the Arabs, often take delight, and shew much ingenuity and quickness of apprehension, in conversing and corresponding by means of signs, emblems, &c., or in a conventional, metaphorical, language, not understood by the vulgar in general, and sometimes not by any except the parties engaged in the intercourse. In some cases, when the main metaphor employed is understood, the rest of the conversation becomes easily intelligible without any previous explanation; and I have occasionally succeeded in carrying on a conversation of this kind (though not in cases such as that described in the tale referred to by this note); but I have more frequently been unsuccessful in attempting to divine the nature of a topic in which other persons were engaged. One simple mode of secret conversation or correspondence is by substituting certain letters for other letters.

Many of the women are said to be adepts in this art, or science, and to convey messages, declarations of love, &c., by means of fruits, flowers, and other emblems. The inability of numbers of females in families of the middle classes to write or read, as well as the difficulty or impossibility frequently existing of conveying written letters, may have given rise to such modes of communication. Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, in one of her charming letters from the East, has gratified our curiosity by a Turkish love-letter of this kind. A specimen of one from an Arab, with its answer, may be here added.—An Arab lover sent to his mistress a fan, a bunch of flowers, a silk tassel, some sugar-candy, and a piece of a chord of a musical instrument; and she returned for answer a piece of an aloe-plant, three black cummin-seeds, and a piece of a plant used in washing. His communication is thus interpreted:—The fan, being called “mirwahah,” a word derived from a root which has among its meanings that of “going to any place in the evening,” signified his wish to pay her an evening visit: the flowers, that the interview would be in her garden: the tassel, being called “shurrábeh,” that they should have sharáb (or wine): the sugar-candy, being termed “sukkar nebát,” and “nebát” also signifying “we will pass the night,” denoted his desire to remain in her company until the morning: and the piece of a cord, that they should be entertained by music. The interpretation of her answer is as follows:—The piece of an aloe-plant, which is called “sabbárah” (from “sabr,” which signifies “patience”—because it will live for many months together without water), implied that he must wait: the three black cummin-seeds explained to him that the period of delay should be three nights: and the plant used in washing informed him that she should then have gone to the bath, and would meet him.—I have omitted one symbol in the lady’s answer, as it conveys an allusion not so consistent with European as with Arab notions of female delicacy.

The language of flowers employed by the Turks does not exactly agree with the system illustrated in the story of ‘Azeez and ‘Azezeh; for the former consists of a collection of words and phrases or sentences which rhyme with the names of the objects used as the signs. This system is also employed by the Arabs; but I believe not so commonly as the other.

A remarkable faculty is displayed by some Arabs in catching the meaning of secret signs employed in written communications to them; such signs being often used in political and other intrigues. The following is a curious instance.—The celebrated poet El-Mutanebbi, having written some verses in dispraise of Káfoor El-Ikhsheede the independent Governor of Egypt, was obliged to flee, and hide himself in a distant town. Káfoor was informed of his retreat, and desired his secretary to write to him a letter promising him pardon, and commanding him to return; but told the writer at the same time, that when the poet came he would punish him. The secretary was a friend of the poet, and, being obliged to read the letter to the Prince when he had written it, was perplexed how to convey to El-Mutanebbi some indication of the danger that awaited him: he could only venture to do so in the exterior address; and having written this in the usual form, commencing “In sháa-lláh” (If it be the will of God) “this shall arrive,” &c., he put a small mark of reduplication over the “n” in the first word, which he thus converted into “Inna,” the final vowel being understood. The poet read the letter, and was rejoiced to see a promise of pardon; but on looking a second time at the address, was surprised to observe the mark of reduplication over the “n.” Knowing the writer to be his friend, he immediately suspected a secret meaning, and rightly conceived that the sign conveyed an allusion to a passage in the Kur-án commencing with the word “Inna,” and this he divined to be the following:—“Verily the magistrates are deliberating concerning thee, to put thee to death.” Accordingly, he fled to another town.—Some authors add, that he wrote a reply, conveying, by a similar sign, to his friend, an allusion to another passage in the Kur-án:—“We will never enter the country while they remain therein.”—It is probable that signs thus employed were used by many persons to convey allusions to certain words; and such may have been the case in the above-mentioned instance: if not, the poet was indeed a wonderful guesser.

NOTE 19. Perhaps it is unnecessary to explain that the actions here described are those of a dyer, dipping a piece of linen into a red dye, and then wringing it. The shop of the dyer is generally, like most other shops, a small chamber or recess open towards the street. Pans containing the different dyes are imbedded in its floor.

NOTE 20. “Mak’ad” is a name generally given to a chamber in which male guests or visitors are received, having an open front with two or more arches, and looking into the court or garden of the house. Its floor is elevated about ten or more feet above the ground, and the front is usually towards the north, or nearly so.

NOTE 21. I suppose it to be meant, that these designs were executed in a kind of mosaic work; for the pool of the fountain is generally ornamented with black and white marble, and pieces of fine red tile, inlaid in complicated and tasteful patterns. A view and plan of a fountain of this kind are inserted in the Introduction to my work on the Modern Egyptians.

NOTE 22. "Baklāweh," from the Turkish "baklavá," is a name given to a kind of pastry, which is generally thus prepared:—A paste made of fine flour with clarified butter is rolled thin, and laid upon a tray: upon this paste is then spread a composition of clarified butter and blanched almonds (and sometimes walnuts and currants) beaten small; and over this is put another layer of paste. Eight of these double layers of paste with the composition above mentioned between them are placed one upon another, making the whole about an inch thick. It is baked in an oven; cut into lozenge-shaped pieces, about three inches long, and two inches wide; and after it is thus cut, some honey or treacle is poured over.

NOTE 23. See Note 99 to Chapter v.

NOTE 24. It is a general belief of the Muslims that the wicked will rise to judgment with their faces black; and hence the origin of the imprecation, "May God blacken thy face!" But it is often used to signify "May God disgrace thee!" for a person's face is said to be black when he is in any disgrace; and in the reverse case, it is said to be white.

NOTE 25. "Zardeh" (which is a Persian word) is a name given to rice dressed with honey and saffron; but here it appears to be applied to a sweet drink infused with saffron.

NOTE 26. By the play-bone and the táb-stick an allusion is conveyed to two games common among the Arabs. The play-bones are used in the same manner as dice, of which they are probably the origin; and both bear the same name in the Arabic, in the singular "kaab" or "kaabeh," that is, "a cube." Of the game of táb I have given a full account in my work on the Modern Egyptians (vol. ii.

ch. iv.). I need only mention here, that the táb-stick is of a flat form, about a span (or eight inches) in length, and two-thirds of an inch in breadth, generally formed of a piece of a palm-branch; one side of which, being cut flat and smooth, is white; the other, green, or, if not fresh, of a dull yellow colour. Four such sticks are used in playing the game.

NOTE 27. The more simple interpretation is this:—Idle games are more suited to thee than affairs of love.

NOTE 28. El-Kazweenee makes a remark somewhat similar to this at the close of his account of the date; but the interpretation of the meaning conveyed by the date stone in our text is very far-fetched: my sheykh in a marginal note, gives one perfectly opposite: the date-stone is called "nawáyeih," and more properly "nawáh" and "nawá;" and the last of these words signifies also "distance," "absence," &c., and is often used to express the state of one who is far from loving or being a lover: it implies also, in this case, that, if he slept again, she would cast him off.

NOTE 29. The locust-fruit, by its dark colour, and the length of time it remains in a state of preservation after it has been plucked, is rendered a fit emblem of a heart long enduring separation from the object of its love.

NOTE 30. "Dirhem," I have before mentioned, is the name of a silver coin: it is also the name of a weight, very nearly equivalent to forty-eight English grains; and being here described as of iron, we must understand it in the latter sense.

NOTE 31. I suppose the iron dirhem to be symbolic of the eye because it is round, and perhaps likewise because the Arabic term for "iron" (namely "hadeed") has also the significance of "sharp" or "piercing;" in which sense it is often applied to the sight (as in the Kur-án, ch. l. v. 21). See the next note.

NOTE 32. From this double oath, it seems to me probable, that, by the circular form of the dirhem, an allusion was meant to God (as being without beginning or end), and that the matter of which it was composed (from what I have said in the note immediately preceding), as well as its form, conveyed the allusion to the eye.

NOTE 33. This gentle kneading or pressing of the limbs, which is one of the operations performed in the bath, is often practised by the Arabs for the purpose of inducing sleep.

NOTE 34. This is a kind of nebeedh. (See Note 22 to Chapter iii.) The same fruit is also stewed with meat. It is called in Arabic "onnáb."

NOTE 35. See Note 18 to Chapter vii.

NOTE 36. It is seen that 'Azezeh speaks of herself in the masculine gender in the verses here inserted; but this is in accordance with a common Arab custom.

NOTE 37. — On the Ceremony called Zikr. Zikrs are very often performed after a death; the merit of the performance being transferred to the soul of the deceased.

I have before mentioned these ceremonies (in Note 63 to Chapter iii.); but in a vague manner; and as it is my object in the present work to give such illustrations as will satisfy the general reader, without obliging him to refer to other books, I shall here insert an abridged extract, descriptive of a zikr, from my Account of the Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians.

The Zikkeers (or performers of the zikr), who were about thirty in number, sat, cross-legged, upon matting extended close to the houses on one side of the street, in the form of an oblong ring. Within this ring, along the middle of the matting, were placed three very large wax candles; each about four feet high, and stuck in a low candlestick. Most of the zikkeers were Ahmedee darweeshes, persons of the lower orders, and meanly dressed: many of them wore green turbans. At one end of the ring were four munshids (or singers of religious odes), and with them was a player on the kind of flute called "náy." I procured a small seat of palm-sticks from a coffee-shop close by, and, by means of a little pushing, and the assistance of my servant, obtained a place with the munshids, and sat there to hear a complete act, or "meglis," of the zikr; which act commenced at about three o'clock (or three hours after sunset), and continued two hours.

The performers began by reciting the Fát'hah (or opening chapter of the Kur-án) all together; their sheykh, or chief, first exclaiming, "El-Fát'hah!" They then chanted the following words:—"O God, bless our lord Mohammad among the former generations; and bless our lord Mohammad among the latter generations; and bless our lord Mohammad in every time and period; and bless our lord Mohammad in the highest degree, unto the day of judgment; and bless all the prophets and apostles among the inhabitants of the heavens and of the earth; and may God (whose name be blessed and exalted!) be well pleased with our lords and our masters, those persons of illustrious estimation, Aboo-Bekr and 'Omar and 'Osmán and 'Alee, and with all the favourites of God. God is our sufficiency; and excellent is the Guardian! There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! O God! O our Lord! O Thou liberal of pardon! O Thou most bountiful of the most bountiful! O God! Amen!"—They were then silent for three or four minutes; and again recited the Fát'hah; but silently. This form of prefacing the zikr is commonly used, by almost all orders of darweeshes in Egypt.

The performers now commenced the zikr. Sitting in the manner above described, they chanted, in slow measure, "Lá iláha illalláh" ("There is no deity but God") to the following air:—

bowing the head and body twice in each repetition of "Lá iláha illalláh." Thus they continued about a quarter of an hour; and then, for about the same space of time, they repeated the same words to the same air, but in a quicker measure, and with correspondingly quicker motions. In the meantime, the munshids frequently sang, to the same, or a variation of the same, air, portions of a kaseedeh, or of a muwesh-shah; an ode of a similar nature to the Song of Solomon, generally alluding to the Prophet as the object of love and praise; and at frequent intervals, one of them sang out the word "meded," implying an invocation for spiritual or supernatural aid.

The zikkeers, after having performed as above described, next repeated the same words to a different air for about the same length of time; first, very slowly; then, quickly. The air was as follows:—

Then they repeated these words again, to the following air, in the same manner:—

They next rose, and, standing in the same order in which they had been sitting, repeated the same words to another air. After which, still standing, they repeated these words in a very deep and hoarse tone; laying the principal emphasis upon the word "Lá" and the first syllable of the last word "Allah;" and uttering it, apparently, with a considerable effort: the sound much resembled that which is produced by beating the rim of a tambourine. Each zikkeer turned his head alternately to the right and left at each repetition of "Lá iláha illa-lláh." One of them, a eunuch, at this part of the zikr, was seized with an epileptic fit, evidently the result of a high state of religious excitement; but nobody seemed surprised at it; for occurrences of this kind at zikrs are not uncommon. All the performers now seemed much excited; repeating their ejaculations with greater rapidity, violently turning their heads, and sinking the whole body at the same time: some of them jumping. The eunuch above mentioned again was seized with fits several times; and I generally remarked that this happened after one of the munshids had sung a line or two and exerted himself more than usually to excite his hearers: the singing was, indeed, to my taste, very pleasing. The contrast presented by the vehement and distressing exertions of the performers at the close of the zikr, and their calm gravity and solemnity of manner at the commencement, was particularly striking. Money was collected during the performance for the munshids. The zikkeers receive no pay.

NOTE 38. From the last of these verses it appears that the flowers are described as laid upon the tomb (in accordance with the custom mentioned in the last paragraph of Note 16 to Chapter i.), and not as planted upon it; though this is frequently done in some countries of the East; the monument being filled with mould, and the whole of its top open.

NOTE 39. See Note 25 to Chapter v.

NOTE 40. See Note 35 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 41. The "rod" (in Arabic "kasa-beh") was, according to the Egyptian measurement, until lately reduced, about twelve English feet and a half.

NOTE 42. See Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 43. It is common (as my sheykh has remarked) to say, of a very spacious chamber, that a horseman might gallop in it. The playing at goff by horsemen has been mentioned in a former tale. It was a common exercise in Egypt as well as Persia and other Eastern countries.

NOTE 44. "Deleeleh" is an epithet used in modern Arabic as indicative of artifice, machination, or fraud. It is often employed as a female nickname.

NOTE 45. From this point to the end of the story of 'Azeez and 'Azezeh I omit some portions which are tedious, and others which are more objectionable.

NOTE 46. Any one may enter the public bath, but none can go out of it, without paying.

NOTE 47. The "kaak," commonly called "kakh," has been described in Note 16 to Chapter i. De Sacy has remarked that our English word "cake" seems to be from the same origin.

NOTE 48.—On Oaths. To explain this passage, I must repeat, with a few slight additions, some remarks which I have made in a former publication.—Among a people by whom falsehood, in certain cases, is not only allowed but commended, oaths of different kinds are more or less binding. In considering this subject, we should also remember that oaths may sometimes be expiated. There are some oaths which, I believe, few Muslims would falsely take; such as saying, three times, "By God the Great!" (Wa-llâhi-l-Azeem), and the oath upon the mus-haf (or copy of the Kur-ân), saying, "By what this contains of the word of God!" This latter is rendered more binding by placing a sword with the sacred volume; and still more so, by the addition of a cake, or piece, of bread, and a handful of salt. But a form of oath which is generally yet more to be depended upon is that of saying, "I impose upon myself divorcement!" (that is, "the divorce of my wife, if what I say be false"); or, "I impose upon myself interdiction!" which has a similar meaning ("My wife be unlawful to me!"); or, "I impose upon myself a triple divorcement!" which binds a man by the irrevocable divorce of his wife. If a man use any of these three forms of oath falsely, his wife, if he have but one, is divorced by the oath itself, if proved to be false, without the absolute necessity of any further ceremony; and if he have two or more wives, he must, under such circumstances, choose one of them to put away.

In the case which this note is principally intended to illustrate, the wife of 'Azeez makes him swear by the sword and the Kur-ân in the hope of inducing him to return to her; and by the oath of divorce, to make the inducement more strong, and that she might be enabled, in case he did not fulfil his vow, legally to contract another marriage as soon as she should have waited the period which the law requires.

NOTE 49. The verses I have omitted as they are the same (with the exception of some slight variations) as the first, second, third, and fifth, of those commencing at page 85 in this volume; and the contents of the accompanying paper as being tiresome and in some parts unmeaning.

NOTE 50. See the first note in the present series.

NOTE 51. I have substituted "Sháh-Zemán" (signifying "King of the Age") for Shahramán; the latter being evidently a mistake of a copyist.

NOTE 52. "Dunyà" signifies the "world."

NOTE 53. "Ridwán," which signifies "approbation," "complacency," &c., is the name of the Guardian of Paradise.—The meaning of this passage is, "Surely this handsome young person is one of the Wildán, or Weleeds, those beautiful youths prepared to wait upon the faithful in Paradise; and he hath escaped thence through the inadvertence of Ridwán." The very meanest in Paradise is promised eighty thousand of these servants, besides seventy-two Hooreeyehs, &c.

NOTE 54. A compliment of this kind is generally uttered on letting a shop or house, and on selling an article of dress, &c.; and "God bless thee!" is usually said in reply. In like manner, a merchant selling goods to be re-sold says, "May God grant thee a profit upon them!"

NOTE 55. The word thus translated signifies taking a morning-draught of wine, milk, sherbet, or any other beverage.

NOTE 56. When Zeleekhà invited her female friends that they might behold Yousuf (or Joseph) and excuse her for inclining to him, at the sight of him they cut their own hands, and praised God, ejaculating these words, "This is not a mortal," &c. (Kur-ân, ch. xii, v. 31).

NOTE 57. To persons more or less above him in rank, the shopkeeper rises and stands, or merely makes a slight motion as if he were about to rise.

NOTE 58. This is a common invocation, for the protection of a person from envy, or the evil eye, founded upon the last chapter but one of the Kur-ân, in which the believer is desired to "seek refuge with the Lord of the Daybreak" from various evils, and among these "from the mischief of the envious." It is very often said to imply admiration of a child, that the mother may not fear.

NOTE 59. This ejaculation is addressed to God.

NOTE 60. This alludes to one of the stages of the creation of man explained in the Kur-án, ch. xxii. v. 5.

NOTE 61. The old woman is described as being "full of joy" because, having induced her mistress to answer the letter, she saw a prospect of continuing the correspondence, and so obtaining additional presents.

NOTE 62. "Es-Suhà" is an obscure star in the Greater Bear, at which people look to try their powers of sight. It is the star 80, by ζ.

NOTE 63. My sheykh has remarked in a marginal note on the "Five Elders" (or Sheykhs) here mentioned, "the known number is the four; namely the [first four] Khaleefehs; or the Four Welees (eminent saints), the seyyid El-Bedawee and the seyyid Ed-Dasooke and Er-Rifá'ee and El-Geelánee." The latter four are often mentioned together as being the saints generally most esteemed in the present day and the founders of the four principal orders of Darweeshes. — Who, then, can be meant by "the Five Elders" I do not know; but I have retained this number as it occurs again in a variation of the same verses in a subsequent tale, which is almost exactly the same as that of Táj-el-Mulook.

NOTE 64. "Ibn-Seenà" ("Son of Seenà") is the true name of the great physician called by us "Avicenna."

NOTE 65. The gait of Arab ladies is very remarkable: they incline the lower part of the body from side to side as they step, and with the hands raised to the level of the bosom they hold the edges of their outer covering. Their pace is slow, and they look not about them, but keep their eyes towards the ground in the direction to which they are going.

NOTE 66. It should be remarked here, that the private room of an Eastern princess is not to be regarded as a Western bed-room. In the East, a guest may lay himself down upon a deewán in the presence of another, to pass the night, without any infringement of decorum.

NOTE 67. See the latter paragraph of the first note in the present series.

NOTE 68. See Note 9 to Chapter vii.

NOTE 69. The doors in Eastern houses generally turn on two wooden pins; one fitting into a hole in the lintel; the other, into a hole immediately behind the threshold; and the latter is very short. It is therefore often easy to displace a door by raising it a little, which may be done by means of a projecting wooden lock; and in many cases, when the door cannot be displaced from its sockets, it may be raised sufficiently to remove the inner latch from its catch. The doors of the ancient temples and tombs in Egypt were formed as above described, with pins, which were often made of bronze.

NOTE 70. I here read "nimsheh" (also written "nimjeh" and "nimjáh" — from the Persian "neemjah") instead of "kamshéh." The latter is described by my sheykh, in a marginal note, as "a strip of leather divided into two, and tied together and nailed at the upper end to a piece of wood;" but the use of such an instrument in this case would be ridiculous. The name of "nimsheh" is often given to a royal dagger.

NOTE 71. As persons are often decapitated in an Eastern palace, a skin is made use of to receive the head and the blood. I believe it to be similar to the round skin used by travellers to eat upon; which is converted into a bag by means of a running string round the edge.

In concluding the present series of notes, I may state my opinion, that the two stories to which they relate are fully worthy of insertion in this collection, as extending the picture of Arab life and manners, whatever may be thought of their origin.

NOTES TO CHAPTER NINTH

NOTE 1. In the first of the Notes to Chapter viii., I have mentioned that the long story from which the contents of that chapter are extracted terminates with the hundred and forty-fifth Night. It is followed by several more fables, extending to the end of the hundred and fifty-second Night. Two of these I have translated, and here insert, as I think them at least worthy of a second-rate place in the present collection. The rest are short, and very inferior.

The Fable of the Peacock, the Peahen, etc.

"There was, in ancient times, a peacock who resorted to the sea-side with his mate. This place abounded with savage beasts, and all other wild animals were there, but it also abounded with trees and rivers; and the peacock with his mate roosted by night in one of those trees, through their fear of the wild beasts, in the morning betaking themselves to seek their sustenance. Thus they continued until, their fear increasing, they sought another place in which to reside; and while they were searching for it, an island appeared before them, with many trees and rivers. So they took up their abode in this island, and ate of its fruits, and drank of its rivers. And as they were thus living, lo, a duck approached them, in a state of great terror, and advanced without stopping until she came to the tree upon which was the peacock with his mate; whereupon she felt secure. The peacock, therefore, doubted not but that this duck had a wonderful story to tell; and he asked her respecting her state, and the reason of her fear. She answered, I am sick with grief, and my fear is of the son of Adam. Beware then, beware of the sons of Adam. —So the peacock said to her, Fear not, now that thou hast come unto us. And the duck replied, Praise be to God who hath dispelled my anxiety and grief by your vicinity! I have come in the desire of gaining your affection. —And when she had uttered these words, the peacock's mate descended to her, and said to her, Welcome to friendship and ease and amplitude! No evil waiteth thee. And how can the son of Adam obtain access to us when we are in this island in the midst of the sea? From the land he cannot reach us, and from the sea he cannot come up against us. Rejoice, therefore, at this announcement, and tell us what hath befallen thee from the son of Adam.

"So the duck said, Know, O peahen, that I have passed all my life in this island in safety, and seen nothing disagreeable, till I slept one night, and beheld in my sleep the figure of a son of Adam, who conversed with me, and I conversed with him. But I heard a speaker say to me, O duck, beware of the son of Adam, and be not deceived by his words, nor by his suggestions to thee; for he aboundeth with stratagems and guile. Beware then, be fully aware, of his craftiness; for he is guileful and crafty as the poet hath said of him, —

With his tongue he will offer thee sweet expressions; but he will elude thee like the fox.

And know that the son of Adam circumventeth the fish, and draweth them out from the waters, and shooteth the birds with an earthen bullet, and entrappeth the elephant by his craftiness. No one is secure from the mischief of the son of Adam, and neither bird nor wild beast can escape from him. Thus I have acquainted thee with that which I have heard respecting the son of Adam. —So I awoke from my sleep fearful and terrified; and to the present time my heart hath not become dilated, through my fear for myself from the son of Adam, lest he surprise me by his artifice, and catch me in his snares. When the close of day overtook me, my strength was impaired and my energy failed.

"I then felt a desire to eat and drink. I therefore went walking forth, with a troubled mind and a contracted heart, and, arriving at yonder mountain, I found, at the entrance of a cave, a young lion, of yellow colour. When this young lion beheld me, he rejoiced exceedingly at my arrival; my colour and my elegant form pleased him, and he called out to me, saying, Draw near to me: and on my approaching him he said to me, What is thy name, and what is thy genus? I therefore answered, My name is duck, and I am of the genus of birds. And I then said to him, What is the reason of thy sojourning until the present time in this place? The young lion answered, The reason of it is, that my father the lion hath been for days cautioning me against the son of Adam; and it happened that I beheld last night in my sleep the figure of a son of Adam. Then the young lion related to me the like of that which I have related unto thee; and when I heard his words I said to him, O lion, I have had recourse unto thee that thou mayest slay the son of Adam, and be resolved upon his slaughter; for I fear for myself extremely from him, and my fear is increased from seeing that thou also fearest the son of Adam although thou art Sultán of the wild beasts.—I ceased not, O my sister, to caution the young lion against the son of Adam, and to urge him to slay him, until he rose suddenly from the place where he was, and walked forth, I walking behind him; and he lashed his back with his tail.

“He proceeded, and I behind him, down the road; and we found a dust raised, which subsided, and there appeared in the midst of it a run-away, naked ass, now galloping and running, and now rolling on the ground. When the lion beheld him he called out to him: so the ass came to him submissively: and the lion said to him, O thou animal of infatuated mind, what is thy genus, and what is the reason of thy coming unto this place?—O son of the Sultán, answered the ass, as to my genus, I am an ass; and the reason of my coming to this place is my flight from the son of Adam. So the young lion said, And art thou also afraid of the son of Adam that he should kill thee? The ass answered, No, O son of the Sultán; but my fear is lest he employ a stratagem against me, and ride me; for he hath a thing called the pad, which he placeth on my back, and a thing called the girth, which he draweth round my belly, and a thing called the crupper, which he inserteth beneath my tail, and a thing called the bit, which he putteth in my mouth; and he maketh for me a goad, and goadeth me with it, and he requirith me to exert myself beyond my ability in running. When I stumble, he curseth me; and when I bray, he revileth me. Afterwards, when I have grown old, and can no longer run, he putteth upon me a pack-saddle of wood, and committeth me to the water-sellers (sakkàs), who load me with water upon my back from the river, in goat-skins, and in similar things, such as jars; and I cease not to suffer abasement and contempt and fatigue until I die, when they throw me upon the mounds of rubbish to the dogs. What then can be greater than this anxiety that I suffer, and what calamity is greater than these calamities that I endure?—Now when I heard, O peahen, the words of the ass, my flesh quaked with horror of the son of Adam, and I said to the young lion, O my master, the ass is excused, and his words have added to my terror. The young lion then said to the ass, Whither art thou going? The ass answered, I saw the son of Adam before sunrise at a distance, and I fled from him, and now I desire to depart, and to run without stopping, from the violence of my fear of him: perhaps I may find a place that will afford me an asylum from the perfidious son of Adam.

“Now while the ass was conversing with the young lion on this subject, and was desirous of bidding us farewell, and departing, there appeared unto us a cloud of dust; whereupon the ass brayed and cried out, looking in the direction of the dust. And after a while, the dust dispersed, and discovered a black horse, with a white spot on his forehead like a dirhem. This horse, beautiful with the white spot on his forehead, handsomely marked with white next the hoof, with becoming legs, and mane, stopped not in his course, until he came before the young lion. And when the young lion beheld him, he admired him, and said to him, What is thy genus, O majestic wild beast, and what is the reason of thy fleeing away into this wide and extensive desert?—O my lord of the wild beasts, answered the horse, I am one of the genus of horses, and the reason of my running away is my flight from the son of Adam. And the young lion wondered at the words of the horse, and replied, Say not thus, for it is disgraceful to thee. Thou art tall and stout; and how then fearest thou the son of Adam, notwithstanding the bulk of thy body, and the swiftness of thy running, when I, with the smallness of my body, have determined to encounter the son of Adam, to attack him, and eat his flesh, and to appease the terror of this poor duck, and establish her securely in her home. Now, on thy coming here, thou hast broken my heart by thy words, and deterred me from that which I desired to do; seeing that the son of Adam hath overcome thee, in spite of thy greatness, and feared not thy height and thy breadth, though, if thou kickedst him with thy hoof, thou wouldst kill him, and he could not prevail against thee; but thou wouldst make him to drink the cup of perdition.—But the horse laughed when he heard the words of the young lion, and said, Far, far is it from my power to overcome him, O son of the King! Let not my height nor breadth nor my bulk deceive thee with respect to the son of Adam, for, in the excess of his artifice and his craftiness he maketh for me a thing called a tethering-rope, and putteth to my four feet two tethering-ropes of cords made of the fibres of the palm-tree, wound round with felt, and attacheth me by my head to a high stake. I remain standing, thus attached, unable to lie down or to sleep.

And when he desireth to ride me, he maketh for me a thing of iron into which to put his feet, called the stirrup, and placeth upon my back a thing called the bridle, binding it with two girths under the hollow of my forelegs; and he putteth in my mouth a thing of iron called the bit, affixing to it a strip of leather termed the bridle. Then when he rideth on my back, upon the saddle, he taketh hold of the bridle and guideth me with it, and striketh me on my flanks with the stirrups until he maketh them bleed. Ask not, O son of the Sultán, what I suffer from the son of Adam; for when I have grown old and lean, and am unable to run fleetly, he selleth me to the miller, to employ me in turning the mill, and I cease not to do so night and day, until I become infirm from age, when he selleth me to the butcher, who slaughtereth me: he strippeth off my skin and plucketh my tail and selleth them to the sieve-makers, and he melteth down my fat.—And when the young lion heard these words of the horse, he became more enraged and vexed, and said to him, When didst thou part from the son of Adam? He answered, I parted from him at midday, and he is following my tracks.

“And while the young lion was thus talking with the horse, lo, a dust rose, and afterwards dispersed, and there appeared in the midst of it a furious camel, uttering a gurgling noise, and striking the ground with his feet. Thus he continued to do until he came up to us; and when the young lion beheld him, great and stout, he thought that he was the son of Adam, and was about to spring upon him; but I said to him, O son of the Sultán, this is not the son of Adam, but he is a camel; and it seemeth that he is fleeing from the son of Adam. And as I was thus engaged, O my sister, in speaking to the young lion, the camel came before the young lion, and saluted him; and he returned his salutation, and said to him, What is the reason of thy coming unto this place? He answered, I have come fleeing from the son of Adam.—And thou, said the young lion, with thy huge make and height and breadth, how fearest thou the son of Adam, when, if thou kickedst him with thy foot, thou wouldst kill him.—O son of the Sultán, answered the camel, know that the son of Adam hath subtleties not to be supported, and nothing overcometh him but death; for he putteth in my nose a string called a nose-ring, and upon my head he putteth a halter: then he committeth me to the least of his children, and the little child draweth me along by the string, notwithstanding my great bulk. They load me also with the heaviest burdens, and take me with them on long journeys. They employ me in difficult labours during the hours of the night and the day; and when I have grown old, and have become disabled, my master no longer endureth my society; but selleth me to the butcher, who slaughtereth me, and selleth my skin to the tanners, and my flesh to the cooks. Ask not, therefore, what I suffer from the son of Adam.—The young lion then said to him, At what hour didst thou part from the son of Adam? He answered, I parted from him at the hour of sunset; and I imagine that, coming to my place after my departure, and finding me not, he is on the way to seek me; therefore suffer me, O son of the Sultán, to flee into the deserts and wastes. But the young lion replied, Wait a little, O camel, that thou mayest see how I will tear him, and feed thee with his flesh, and break his bones, and drink his blood.—O son of the Sultán, rejoined the camel, I fear for thee from the son of Adam; for he is guileful and crafty. And he recited the saying of the poet,—

When the severe alighteth in the land for a people, there is nothing for its inhabitants but to depart.

“But as the camel was conversing thus with the young lion, lo, a dust rose, and after a while dispersed from around a short and thin old man. On his shoulder was a basket containing a set of carpenter's tools, upon his head was a branch of a tree, with eight planks, and he was leading by the hand young children, and walking at a brisk pace. He advanced without stopping until he drew near to the young lion; and when I beheld him, O my sister, I fell down from the violence of my fear. But as to the young lion, he arose and walked forward to him and met him; and when he came up to him, the carpenter laughed in his face, and said to him with an eloquent tongue, O glorious King, endowed with liberality, may Allah make thine evening and thine intention prosperous, and increase thy courage and thy power! Protect me from him who hath afflicted me, and by his wickedness smitten me; for I have found none to aid me but thee.—Then the carpenter stood before the lion, and wept and sighed and lamented. And when the young lion heard his weeping and lamenting, he said to him, I will protect thee from the object of thy dread. Who then is he who hath oppressed thee, and what art thou, O thou wild beast, the like of whom I have never in my life beheld, and than whom I have never seen any of more handsome form nor any of more eloquent tongue; and what is thy condition?—So the carpenter answered, O lord of the wild beasts, as to myself, I am a carpenter; and as to him who hath oppressed me, he is a son of Adam, and on the morning after this night he will be with thee in this place. And when the young lion heard these words from the carpenter, the light became converted into darkness before his face: he growled and snorted; his eyes cast forth sparks; and he cried out, saying, By Allah, I will remain awake this night until the morning, and will not return to my father until I accomplish my desire! Then looking towards the carpenter, he said to him, I see thy steps to be short, and I cannot hurt thy feelings; for I am endowed with generosity; and I imagine that thou canst not keep pace in thy walk with the wild beasts: acquaint me, then, whither thou art going. The carpenter replied, Know that I am going to the Wezeer of thy father, to the lynx; for, when it was told him that the son of Adam had trodden this region, he feared for himself greatly, and sent to me a messenger from among the wild beasts, and I might make for him a house in which he might reside, and find an asylum, and that should debar from him his enemy, so that no one of the sons of Adam might obtain access to him. Therefore, when the messenger came to me, I took these planks and set forth to him.

“On hearing these words of the carpenter, the young lion became envious of the lynx, and said to him, By my life, thou must make for me a house with these planks before thou make for the lynx his house; and when thou hast finished my work, go to the lynx, and make for him what he desireth. But when the carpenter heard what the young lion said, he replied, O lord of the wild beasts, I cannot make for thee anything until I have made for the lynx what he desireth: then I will come to serve thee, and make for thee a house that shall protect thee from thine enemy. The young lion, however, said, By Allah, I will not let thee go from this place until thou make for me a house with these planks. He then crept, and sprang upon the carpenter, desiring to jest with him, and struck him with his paw, throwing down the basket from his shoulder. The carpenter fell down in a swoon, and the young lion laughed at him, and said, Wo to thee, O carpenter! Verily thou art weak, and without strength: so thou art excused for thy fearing the son of Adam.—But when the carpenter had fallen down upon his back, he became violently enraged. He however concealed this from the young lion, through his fear of him; and afterwards, he sat and laughed in the face of the young lion, saying to him, Well, I will make for thee the house. So he took the planks that he had with him, and nailed together the house, making it to suit the measure of the young lion, and left its door open; for he made it in the form of a chest. He made for it a large aperture with a cover pierced with numerous holes, and, taking forth some new nails, said to the young lion, Enter this house by this aperture, that I may arch it over thee. The young lion therefore rejoiced at this, and advanced to the aperture; but he saw that it was narrow. The carpenter said to him, Enter, and crouch down upon thy four legs. And the lion accordingly did so, and entered the chest, but his tail remained outside. He then desired to draw back and come forth; but the carpenter said to him, Wait, that I may see if it will admit thy tail with thee. So the young lion complied with his directions; and the carpenter, having folded the young lion's tail, and stuffed it into the chest, placed the cover upon the aperture quickly, and nailed it. The young lion cried out, saying, O carpenter, what is this narrow house that thou hast made for me? Let me come forth from it.—But the carpenter replied, Far, far be it from thee! Repentance for what hath passed will not avail; for thou wilt not come forth from this place.—Then the carpenter laughed, and said to the young lion, Thou hast fallen into the cage, and become the basest of wild beasts.—O my brother, said the young lion, what is this discourse that thou addressst to me?—Know O dog of the desert, replied the carpenter, that thou hast fallen into the snare that thou fearest: destiny hath overthrown thee, and caution will not avail thee.—So when the young lion heard his words, O my sister, he knew that he was the son of Adam, against whom his father had cautioned him when he was awake, and the invisible speaker in his sleep; and I was convinced that this was he without doubt or uncertainty. I therefore feared him greatly for myself, and, retiring to a little distance from him, waited to see what he would do with the young lion. And I saw, O my sister, the son of Adam dig a trench in that place, near the chest in which was the young lion; and he threw him into the trench, and threw wood upon him, and burnt him with fire. So my fear, O my sister, increased; and for two days

I have been fleeing from the son of Adam, in my fear of him.

"The peahen, when she heard these words from the duck, wondered at them extremely, and said, O my sister, thou art now secure from the son of Adam; for we are in one of the islands of the sea, to which the son of Adam hath no way of access; therefore choose a residence with us until God make easy thy affair and ours. The duck replied, I fear that some nocturnal calamity may befall me; and no fugitive slave can detach himself from fate. But the peahen rejoined, Reside with us, and be like us. And she continued to urge her until she did so; and she said to the peahen, O my sister, thou knowest how little is my patience; and if I had not seen thee here, I had not remained. The peahen replied, If anything be [written] on our forehead, we must experience its accomplishment; and when our predestined end approacheth, who will deliver us? A soul departeth not until it hath enjoyed the whole of its sustenance and its decreed period.—And while they were thus conversing, a cloud of dust approached them; whereupon the duck cried out, and descended into the sea, saying, Beware, beware, though there be no refuge from destiny! The dust was great; but as it subsided, there appeared in the midst of it an antelope. So the duck and the peahen felt secure; and the latter said to the duck, O my sister, that which thou fearest is an antelope, and see, he hath approached us: no harm will befall us from him; for the antelope eateth the herbs which spring from the earth; and as thou art of the genus of birds, he is of the genus of wild beasts: therefore feel secure, and be not anxious; since anxiety wasteth the body. And the peahen had not finished her words when the antelope came up to them to shade himself beneath the tree; and on beholding the peahen and the duck, he saluted them, and said to them, I have entered this island to-day, and have seen no place more fruitful than it, nor any more pleasant as an abode. He then invited them to keep him company and to treat him with sincere friendship; and when the duck and the peahen saw his affection for them, they addressed him kindly, and became desirous of his society. They swore to be faithful friends, one to another, and they passed the night together, and ate together. Thus they continued in safety, eating and drinking, until there passed by them a vessel that was wandering from its course in the sea. It anchored near them, and the people came forth, and dispersed themselves in the island, and, seeing the antelope and the peahen and the duck together, they approached them. So the antelope fled into the desert, and the peahen soared into the sky; but the duck remained infatuated, and they continued to run after her until they captured her, when she cried out, saying, Caution is of no avail to me against fate and destiny! And they departed with her to their vessel."

The antelope and the peahen mourned incessantly for the loss of the duck, and concluded that her unhappy end was occasioned by her neglecting to repeat the praises of God; for it is the general practice of everything that God hath created to celebrate his praises, and the neglect of doing so causeth its destruction.

The Fable of the Fox and the Wolf.

"A fox and a wolf inhabited the same den, resorting thither together, and thus they remained a long time. But the wolf oppressed the fox; and it so happened that the fox counselled the wolf to assume benignity, and to abandon wickedness, saying to him, If thou persevere in thine arrogance, probably God will give power over thee to a son of Adam; for he is possessed of stratagems, and artifice, and guile: he captureth the birds from the sky, and the fish from the sea, and cutteth the mountains and transporteth them; and all this he accomplisheth through his stratagems. Betake thyself, therefore, to the practice of equity, and relinquish evil and oppression; for it will be more pleasant to thy taste.—The wolf, however, received not his advice; on the contrary, he returned him a rough reply, saying to him, Thou hast no right to speak on matters of magnitude and importance. He then gave the fox such a blow that he fell down senseless; and when he recovered, he smiled in the wolf's face, apologizing for his shameful words, and recited these two verses:—

If I have been faulty in my affection for you, and committed a deed of a shameful nature,
I repent of my offence, and your clemency will extend to the evil-doer who craveth forgiveness.

So the wolf accepted his apology, and ceased from ill-treating him, but said to him, Speak not of that which concerneth thee not, lest thou hear that which will not please thee. The fox replied, I hear and obey. I will abstain from that which pleaseth thee not; for the sage hath said, Offer not information on a subject respecting which thou art not questioned; and reply not to words when thou art not invited; leave what concerneth thee not, to attend to that which doth concern thee; and lavish not advice upon the evil, for they will recompense thee for it with evil.

—And when the wolf heard these words of the fox, he smiled in his face; but he meditated upon employing some artifice against him, and said, I must strive to effect the destruction of this fox. As to the fox, however, he bore patiently the injurious conduct of the wolf, saying within himself, Verily, insolence and calumny occasion destruction, and betray one into perplexity; for it hath been said, He who is insolent suffereth injury, and he who is ignorant repenteth, and he who feareth is safe: moderation is one of the qualities of the noble, and good manners are the noblest gain. It is advisable to behave with dissimulation towards this tyrant, and he will inevitably be overthrown.—He then said to the wolf, Verily the Lord pardoneth and becometh propitious unto his servant when he hath sinned; and I am a weak slave, and have committed a transgression in offering thee advice. Had I foreknown the pain that I have suffered from thy blow, I had known that the elephant could not withstand nor endure it; but I will not complain of the pain of that blow, on account of the happiness that hath resulted unto me from it; for, if it had a severe effect upon me, its result was happiness; and the sage hath said, The beating inflicted by the preceptor is at first extremely grievous; but in the end it is sweeter than clarified honey.—So the wolf said, I forgive thine offence, and cancel thy fault; but beware of my power, and confess thyself my slave; for thou hast experienced my severity unto him who sheweth me hostility. The fox, therefore, prostrated himself before him, saying to him, May God prolong thy life, and mayest thou not cease to subdue him who opposeth thee! And he continued to fear the wolf, and to dissemble towards him.

“After this, the fox went one day to a vineyard, and saw in its wall a breach; but he suspected it, saying within himself, There must be some cause for this breach; and it hath been said, Whoso seeth a hole in the ground, and doth not shun it, and be cautious of advancing to it boldly, exposeth himself to danger and destruction. It is well known that some men make a figure of the fox in the vineyard, and even put before it grapes in plates, in order that a fox may see it, and advance to it, and fall into destruction. Verily I regard this breach as a snare; and it hath been said,

Caution is the half of cleverness. Caution requireth me to examine this breach, and to see if I can find there anything that may lead to perdition. Covetousness doth not induce me to throw myself into destruction.—He then approached it, and, going round about examining it warily, beheld it! and lo, there was a deep pit, which the owner of the vineyard had dug to catch in it the wild beasts that despoiled the vines; and he observed over it a slight covering. So he drew back from it, and said, Praise be to God that I regarded it with caution! I hope that my enemy, the wolf, who hath made my life miserable, may fall into it; so that I alone may enjoy absolute power over the vineyard, and live in it securely! Then, shaking his head, and uttering a loud laugh, he merrily sang these verses:—

Would that I beheld at the present moment, in this well a wolf
Who hath long afflicted my heart, and made me drink bitterness perforce!
Would that my life may be spared, and that the wolf may meet his death!
Then the vineyard will be free from his presence, and I shall find in it my spoil.

Having finished his song, he hurried away until he came to the wolf, when he said to him, Verily God hath smoothed for thee the way to the vineyard without fatigue. This hath happened through thy good fortune. Mayest thou enjoy, therefore, that to which God hath granted thee access, in smoothing thy way to that plunder and that abundant sustenance without any difficulty!—So the wolf said to the fox, What is the proof of that which thou hast declared? The fox answered, I went to the vineyard, and found that its owner had died; and I entered the garden, and beheld the fruits shining upon the trees.

“So the wolf doubted not the words of the fox, and in his eagerness he arose, and went to the breach. His cupidity had deceived him with vain hopes, and the fox stopped and fell down behind him as one dead, applying this verse as a proverb suited to the case:—

Doth thou covet an interview with Leylà? It is covetousness that causeth the loss of men's heads.

And when the wolf came to the breach, the fox said to him, Enter the vineyard; for thou art spared the trouble of breaking down the wall of the garden, and it remaineth for God to complete the benefit. So the wolf walked forward, desiring to enter the vineyard, and when he came to the middle of the covering of the hole, he fell into it; whereupon the fox was violently excited by happiness and joy; his anxiety and grief ceased, and, in merry tones, he sang these verses:—

Fortune hath compassionated my case, and felt pity for the length of my torment.
And granted me what I desired, and removed that which I dreaded.
I will therefore forgive its offences committed in former times;
Even the injustice it hath shewn in the turning of my hair grey.
There is no escape for the wolf from utter annihilation;
And the vineyard is for me alone, and I have no stupid partner.

He then looked into the pit, and beheld the wolf weeping in his repentance and sorrow for himself, and the fox wept with him. So the wolf raised his head towards him, and said, Is it from thy compassion for me that thou hast wept, O Abu-l-Hoseyn?—No, answered the fox; by Him who cast thee into this pit; but I wept for the length of thy past life, and in my regret at thy not having fallen into this pit before the present day. Hadst thou fallen into it before I met with thee, I had experienced refreshment and ease. But thou hast been spared to the expiration of thy decreed term and known period.—The wolf, however, said to him, Go, O evil-doer, to my mother, and acquaint her with that which hath happened to me: perhaps she will contrive some means for my deliverance. But the fox replied, The excess of thy covetousness and eager desire have entrapped thee into destruction, since thou hast fallen into a pit from which thou wilt never be saved. Knowest thou not, O ignorant wolf, that the author of the proverb saith, He who thinketh not of results will not be secure from perils?—O Abu-l-Hoseyn, rejoined the wolf, thou wast wont to manifest an affection for me, and to desire my friendship, and fear the greatness of my power. Be not, then, rancorous towards me for that which I have done unto thee; for he who hath one in his power and yet forgiveth will receive a recompense from God; and the poet hath said,—

Sow good, even on an unworthy soil; for it will not be fruitless wherever it is sown.
Verily, good, though it remain long buried, none will reap but he who sowed it.

—O most ignorant of the beasts of prey, said the fox, and most stupid of the wild beasts of the regions of the earth, hast thou forgotten thy haughtiness and insolence and pride, and thy disregarding the rights of companionship, and thy refusing to be advised by the saying of the poet?—

Tyrannize not, if thou hast the power to do so; for the tyrannical is in danger of revenges.

Thine eye will sleep while the oppressed, wakeful, will call down curses on thee, and God's eye sleepeth not.

—O Abu-l-Hoseyn, exclaimed the wolf, be not angry with me for my former offences; for forgiveness is required of the generous, and kind conduct is among the best means of enriching oneself. How excellent is the saying of the poet!—

Haste to do good when thou art able; for at every season thou hast not the power.

“He continued to abase himself to the fox, and said to him, Perhaps thou canst find some means of delivering me from destruction. But the fox replied, O artful, guileful, treacherous wolf, hope not for deliverance; for this is the recompense of thy base conduct, and a just retaliation. Then shaking his jaws with laughing, he recited these two verses:—

No longer attempt to beguile me; for thou wilt not attain thine object.
What thou seekest from me is impossible. Thou hast sown, and reap then, vexation.

—O gentle one among the beasts of prey, resumed the wolf, thou art in my estimation more faithful than to leave me in this pit! He then shed tears, and repeated this couplet:—

O thou whose favours to me have been many, and whose gifts have been more than can be numbered!
No misfortune hath ever yet befallen me but I have found thee ready to aid me in it.

The fox replied, O stupid enemy, how art thou reduced to humility and submissiveness, and abjection and obsequiousness, after thy disdain and pride, and tyranny and haughtiness! I kept company with thee through fear of thine oppression, and flattered thee without a hope of conciliating thy kindness; but now, terror hath affected thee, and punishment hath overtaken thee. —And he recited these two verses:—

O thou who seekest to beguile, thou hast fallen in thy base intention.
Taste, then, the pain of shameful calamity, and be with other wolves cut off.

—The wolf still entreated him, saying, O gentle one, speak not with the tongue of enmity, nor look with its eye; but fulfil the covenant of fellowship with me before the time for discovering a remedy shall have passed. Arise and procure for me a rope, and tie one end of it to a tree, and let down to me its other end, that I may lay hold of it. Perhaps I may so escape from my present predicament, and I will give thee all the treasures that I possess.

—The fox, however, replied, Thou hast prolonged a conversation that will not procure thy liberation. Hope not, therefore, for thine escape through my means; but reflect upon thy former wicked conduct, and the perfidy and artifice which thou thoughtest to employ against me, and how near thou art to being stoned. Know that thy soul is about to quit the world, and to perish and depart from it: then wilt thou be reduced to destruction; and an evil abode is it to which thou goest!—O Abul-Hoseyn, rejoined the wolf, be ready in returning to friendship, and be not so rancorous. Know that he who delivereth a soul from destruction hath saved it alive, and he who saveth a soul alive is as if he had saved the lives of all mankind. Follow not a course of evil; for the wise abhor it; and there is no evil more manifest than my being in this pit, drinking the suffocating pains of death, and looking upon destruction, when thou art able to deliver me from the misery into which I have fallen. —But the fox exclaimed, O thou barbarous, hard-hearted wretch! I compare thee, with respect to the fairness of thy professions and the baseness of thine intention, to the falcon with the partridge.—And what, asked the wolf, is the story of the falcon and the partridge?

“The fox answered, I entered a vineyard one day to eat of its grapes, and while I was there, I beheld a falcon pounce upon a partridge; but when he had captured him, the partridge escaped from him and entered his nest, and concealed himself in it; whereupon the falcon followed him, calling out to him, O idiot, I saw thee in the desert hungry, and, feeling compassion for thee, I gathered for thee some grain, and took hold of thee that thou mightest eat; but thou fleddest from me, and I see no reason for thy flight unless it be to mortify. Shew thyself, then, and take the grain that I have brought thee, and eat it, and may it be light and wholesome to thee. —So when the partridge heard these words of the falcon, he believed him and came forth to him; and the falcon stuck his talons into him, and got possession of him. The partridge, therefore, said to him, Is this that of which thou saidst that thou hadst brought it for me from the desert, and of which thou saidst to me, Eat it, and may it be light and wholesome to thee? Thou hast lied unto me; and may God make that which thou eatest of my flesh to be a mortal poison in thy stomach.—And when he had eaten it, his feathers fell off, and his strength failed, and he forthwith died.

“The fox then continued, Know, O wolf, that he who diggeth a pit for his brother soon falleth into it himself; and thou behavedst with perfidy to me first.—Cease, replied the wolf, from addressing me with this discourse, and propounding fables, and mention not unto me my former base actions. It is enough for me to be in this miserable state since I have fallen into a calamity for which the enemy would pity me; much more the true friend. Consider some stratagem by means of which I may save myself, and so assist me. If the doing this occasion thee trouble, thou knowest that the true friend endureth for his own true friend the severest labour, and will suffer destruction in obtaining the means of his deliverance; and it hath been said, An affectionate friend is better than an own brother. If thou procure means for my escape, I will collect for thee such things as shall be a store for thee against the time of want, and then I will teach thee extraordinary stratagems by which thou shalt make the plenteous vineyards accessible, and shalt strip the fruitful trees; so be happy and cheerful.—But the fox said, laughing as he spoke, How excellent is that which the learned have said of him who is excessively ignorant like thee.—And what have the learned said? asked the wolf. The fox answered, The learned have observed, that the rude in body and in disposition is far from intelligence, and nigh unto ignorance for thine assertion, O perfidious idiot, that the true friend undergoeth trouble for the deliverance of his own true friend, is just, as thou hast said; but acquaint me with thine ignorance, and thy paucity of sense, how I should bear sincere friendship towards thee with thy treachery. Hast thou considered me a true friend unto thee, when I am an enemy who rejoiceth in thy misfortune? These words are more severe than the piercing of arrows, if thou understand. And as to thy saying that thou wilt give me such things as will be a store for me against the time of want, and wilt teach me stratagems by which I shall obtain access to the plenteous vineyards, and strip the fruitful trees—how is it, O guileful traitor, that thou knowest not a stratagem by means of which to save thyself from destruction? How far, then, art thou from profiting thyself, and how far am I from receiving thine advice! If thou know of stratagems, employ them to save thyself from this predicament, from which I pray God to make thine escape far distant. See then, O idiot, if thou know any stratagem, and save thyself by its means from slaughter, before thou lavish instruction upon another. But thou art like a man whom a disease attacked, and to whom there came a man suffering from the same disease to cure him, saying to him, Shall I cure thee of thy disease? The first man therefore said to the other, Why hast thou not begun by curing thyself? So he left him and went his way. — And thou, O wolf, art in the same case. Remain then in thy place, and endure that which hath befallen thee.

“Now when the wolf heard these words of the fox, he knew that he had no kindly feeling for him; so he wept for himself, and said, I have been careless of myself; but if God deliver me from this affliction, I will assuredly repent of my overbearing conduct unto him who is weaker than I; and I will certainly wear wool, and ascend the mountains, commemorating the praises of God (whose name be exalted!), and fearing his punishment; and I will separate myself from all the other wild beasts; and verily I will feed the warriors in defence of the religion, and the poor. — Then he wept and lamented. And thereupon the heart of the fox was moved with tenderness for him. On hearing his humble expressions, and the words which indicated his repenting of arrogance and pride, he was affected with compassion for him, and, leaping with joy, placed himself at the brink of the pit, and sat upon his hind legs, and hung down his tail into the cavity. And upon this, the wolf arose, and stretched forth his paw towards the fox's tail, and pulled him down to him: so the fox was with him in the pit. The wolf then said to him, O fox of little compassion, wherefore didst thou rejoice in my misfortune? Now thou hast become my companion, and in my power. Thou hast fallen into the pit with me, and punishment hath quickly overtaken thee. The sages have said, If any one of you reproach his brother for deriving his nourishment from miserable means, he shall experience the same necessity: — and how excellent is the saying of the poet! —

When Fortune throweth itself heavily upon some, and encampeth by the side of others. Say to those who rejoice over us, Awake: the rejoicers over us shall suffer as we have done.

I must now, he continued, hasten thy slaughter, before thou behold mine. — So the fox said within himself, I have fallen into the snare with this tyrant, and my present case requireth the employment of artifice and frauds. It hath been said, that the woman maketh her ornaments for the day of festivity; and, in a proverb, I have not reserved thee, O my tear, but for the time of my difficulty: — and if I employ not some stratagem in the affair of this tyrannical wild beast, I perish inevitably. How good is the saying of the poet: —

Support thyself by guile; for thou livest in an age whose sons are like the lions of a forest;

And brandish around the spear of artifice, that the mill of subsistence may revolve;
And pluck the fruits; or if they be beyond thy reach, then content thyself with herbage.

“He then said to the wolf, Hasten not to kill me, lest thou repent, O courageous wild beast, endowed with might and excessive fortitude. If thou delay, and consider what I am about to tell thee, thou wilt know the desire that I formed; and if thou hasten to kill me, there will be no profit to thee in thy doing so; but we shall die here together. — So the wolf said, O thou wily deceiver, how is it that thou hopest to effect my safety and thine own, that thou askest me to give thee a delay? Acquaint me with the desire that thou formedst. — The fox replied, As to the desire that I formed, it was such as requireth thee to recompense me for it well; since, when I heard thy promises, and thy confession of thy past conduct, and thy regret at not having before repented, and done good, and when I heard thy vows to abstain from injurious conduct to thy companions and others, and to relinquish the eating of the grapes and all other fruits, and to impose upon thyself the obligation of humility, and clipping thy claws, and breaking thy dog-teeth, and to wear wool, and offer sacrifice to God (whose name be exalted!), if He delivered thee from thy present state, I was affected with compassion for thee, though I was before longing for thy destruction. So when I heard thy profession of repentance, and what thou vowedst to do if God delivered thee, I felt constrained to save thee from thy present predicament. I therefore hung down my tail that thou mightest catch hold of it and make thine escape. But thou wouldst not relinquish thy habit of severity and violence, nor desire escape and safety for thyself by gentleness. On the contrary, thou puldest me in such a manner that I thought my soul had departed: so I became a companion with thee in the abode of destruction and death; and nothing will effect the escape of myself and thee but one plan. If thou approve of this plan that I have to propose, we shall both save ourselves; and after that, it will be incumbent on thee to fulfil that which thou hast vowed to do, and I will be thy companion. — So the wolf said, And what is thy proposal that I am to accept? The fox answered, That thou raise thyself upright; then I will place myself upon thy head, that I may approach the surface of the earth, and when I am upon its surface I will go forth and bring thee something of which to take hold, and after that thou wilt deliver thyself. But the wolf replied, I put no confidence in thy words; for the sages have said, He who confideth when he should hate, is in error: — and it hath been said, He who confideth in the faithless is deceived, and he who maketh trial of the trier will repent, and he who distinguisheth not between circumstances, and attributeth to each its proper success, but regardeth all circumstances alike, his fortune will be small, and his calamities will be many. How excellent also is the saying of the poet! —

Let not your opinion be otherwise than evil; for thy opinion is among the strongest of intellectual qualities.
Nothing casteth a man into a place of danger like the practice of good, and a fair opinion.

And the saying of another: —

Always hold an evil opinion, and so be safe.
Whoso liveth vigilantly, his calamities will be few.
Meet the enemy with a smiling and an open face; but raise for him an army in the heart to combat him.

And that of another: —

The most bitter of thine enemies is the nearest whom thou trustest in; beware then of men, and associate with them wilily.
Thy favourable opinion of fortune is a weakness; think evil of it, therefore, and regard it with apprehension.

— Verily, rejoined the fox, an evil opinion is not commendable in every case; but a fair opinion is among the characteristics of excellence, and its result is escape from terrors. It is befitting, O wolf, that thou employ some stratagem for thine escape from thy present predicament; and it will be better for us both to escape than to die. Relinquish, therefore thine evil opinion and thy malevolence; and if thou think favourably of me, I shall not fail to do one of two things: either I shall bring thee something of which to lay hold, and thou wilt escape from thy present situation, or I shall act perfidiously towards thee, and save myself and leave thee; but this is a thing that cannot be; for I am not secure from meeting with some such affliction as that which thou hast met with, and that would be the punishment of perfidy. It hath been said in a proverb, Fidelity is good, and perfidy is base. It is fit, then, that thou trust in me; for I have not been ignorant of misfortunes. Delay not, therefore, to contrive our escape for the affair is too strait for thee to prolong thy discourse upon it.

“The wolf then said, Verily, notwithstanding my little confidence in thy fidelity, I knew what was in thy heart, that thou desiredst my deliverance when thou wast convinced of my repentance; and I said within myself, If he be voracious in that which he asserteth, he hath made amends for his wickedness; and if he be false, he will be recompensed by his Lord. So now I accept thy proposal to me; and if thou act perfidiously towards me, thy perfidy will be the means of thy destruction. — Then the wolf raised himself upright in the pit, and took the fox upon his shoulders, so that his head reached the surface of the ground. The fox thereupon sprang from the wolf's shoulders, and found himself upon the face of the earth, when he fell down senseless. The wolf now said to him, O my friend, forget not my case, nor delay my deliverance.

“The fox, however, uttered a loud laugh, and replied, O thou deceived; it was nothing but my jesting with thee and deriding thee that entrapped me into thy power; for when I heard thy profession of repentance, joy excited me, and I was moved with delight, and danced, and my tail hung down into the pit; so thou pulledst me, and I fell down to thee. Then God (whose name be exalted!) delivered me from thy hand. Wherefore, then, should I not aid in thy destruction, when thou art of the associates of the Devil? Know that I dreamt yesterday that I was dancing at thy wedding, and I related the dream to an interpreter, who said to me, Thou wilt fall into a frightful danger, and escape from it. So I knew that my falling into thy power and my escape was the interpretation of my dream. Thou too knowest, O deceived idiot, that I am thine enemy. How then dost thou hope, with thy little sense and thine ignorance, that I will deliver thee, when thou hast heard what rude language I used? And how shall I endeavour to deliver thee, when the learned have said, that by the death of the sinner are produced ease to mankind and purgation of the earth. Did I not fear that I should suffer, by fidelity to thee, such affliction as would be greater than that which may result from perfidy, I would consider upon means for thy deliverance.—So when the wolf heard the words of the fox, he bit his paw in repentance. He then spoke softly to him; but obtained nothing thereby. With a low voice he said to him, Verily, you tribe of foxes are the sweetest of people in tongue, and the most pleasant in jesting; and this is jesting in thee; but every time is not convenient for sport and joking.—O idiot, replied the fox, jesting hath a limit which its employer transgresseth not. Think not that God will give thee possession of me after He hath delivered me from thy power.—The wolf then said to him, Thou art one in whom it is proper to desire my liberation, on account of the former brotherhood and friendship that subsisted between us; and if thou deliver me, I will certainly recompense thee well. But the fox replied, The sages have said, Take not as thy brother the ignorant and wicked; for he will disgrace thee, and not honour thee; and take not as thy brother the liar; for if good proceed from thee he will hide it, and if evil proceed from thee he will publish it. And the sages have said, For everything there is a stratagem, except death; and everything may be rectified, except the corruption of the very essence; and everything may be repelled, except destiny. And as to the recompense that thou assertest I deserve of thee, I compare thee, in thy recompensing, to the serpent fleeing from the Háwee, when a man saw her in a state of terror, and said to her, What is the matter with thee, O serpent? She answered, I have fled from the Háwee; for he seeketh me; and if thou deliver me from him, and conceal me with thee, I will recompense thee well and do thee every kindness. So the man took her, to obtain the reward, and eager for the recompense, and put her into his pocket; and when the Háwee had passed and gone his way, and what she feared had quitted her, the man said to her, Where is the recompense? for I have saved thee from that which thou fearedst and dreadedst. But the serpent answered him, Tell me in what member I shall bite thee; for thou knowest that we exceed not this recompense. She then inflicted upon him a bite from which he died.—And thee, O idiot, continued the fox, I compare to that serpent with that man. Hast thou not heard the saying of the poet?—

Trust not a person in whose heart thou hast made anger to dwell; nor think his anger hath ceased.

Verily, the vipers, which are smooth to the touch, and shew graceful motions, hide mortal poison.

—O eloquent and comely-faced animal, rejoined the wolf, be not ignorant of my condition, and of the fear with which mankind regard me. Thou knowest that I assault the strong places, and strip the vines. Do, therefore, what I have commanded thee, and attend to me as the slave attendeth to his master.—O ignorant idiot, who seekest what is vain, exclaimed the fox, verily I wonder at thy stupidity, and at the roughness of thy manner, in thine ordering me to serve thee and to stand before thee as though I were thy slave. But thou shalt soon see what will befall thee, by the splitting of thy head with stones, and the breaking of thy treacherous dog-teeth.

“The fox then stationed himself upon a mound overlooking the vineyard, and cried out incessantly to the people of the vineyard until they perceived him and came quickly to him. He remained steady before them until they drew near unto him and unto the pit in which was the wolf, and then he fled. So the owners of the vineyard looked into the pit, and when they beheld the wolf in it, they instantly pelted him with heavy stones, and continued throwing stones and pieces of wood upon him, and piercing him with the points of spears, until they killed him, when they departed. Then the fox returned to the pit, and, standing over the place of the wolf's slaughter, saw him dead; whereupon he shook his head in the excess of his joy, and recited these verses:—

Fate removed the wolf's soul, and it was snatched away. Far distant [from happiness] be his soul that hath perished!

How long hast thou striven, Aboo-Sirhán, to destroy me! But now have burning calamities befallen thee.

Thou hast fallen into a pit into which none shall descend without finding in it the blasts of death.

—After this, the fox remained in the vineyard, alone and in security, fearing no mischief.”

NOTE 2. In several copies, and perhaps in most, this person is called an “Attár,” which appellation is generally given not merely to a seller of essences, but to a druggist and perfumer.

NOTE 3. The word which I here render “Persians” (namely “‘Ajám”) is applied to any and all people who are not Arabs; but often to the Persians in particular; and this seems to be here required by the subsequent expression of the King of the ‘Ajám. Here I may also remark, that the phrase “of the sons of the Kings,”

&c., is often used to signify "of the descendants of the Kings," &c.; and that it would have been more consistent to have employed this phrase, as applied to 'Alee the son of Bekkâr, in a later passage, instead of "son of the King;" for he is not distinguished in the story as a Prince.

NOTE 4.—On the Custom of frequenting Shops for the sake of Amusement. It is perfectly consistent with Arab manners and customs, as existing in the present day and as exhibited in histories, to describe Abu-l-Hasan as keeping company with the Khaleefeh, and 'Alee the son of Bekkâr as being in the habit of sitting at Abu-l-Hasan's shop. Among the Muslims in general, trade is far more honourable than it is in the estimation of a large proportion of the independent classes in this country; so much so, that it is regarded by the former as disgraceful in a man, however high his rank, or great his wealth, not to be able, by some occupation, as the profession of arms or of literature or science, or by some trade or art, to procure his subsistence in case of necessity: therefore the pursuit of trade excludes no man of good breeding among them from the society of his superiors in rank. But the free intercourse of different ranks of Muslims is further and very greatly promoted by the law of the separation of the sexes; persons being thus enabled to associate with each other, regardless of difference of wealth or station, without the risk of occasioning unequal matrimonial connections: so this law, being felt by neither sex as oppressive, is regarded by them as productive of results which constitute the Muslim's chief enjoyments,—the highest degree of domestic comfort, and the most free and extensive society with his fellow-men. Thus it is with both sexes; and neither would give up the pleasure that they hence derive for a different system of society, somewhat extending their domestic intercourse, but often destroying the pleasures of home, and contracting into a compass comparatively narrow the fellowship which they enjoy abroad.

The Arabs in general seldom give entertainments except on particular occasions, such as that of a marriage, or a circumcision; and hence, as well as for the reasons above stated, a shop is often frequented for the purpose of passing time in agreeable conversation. For women to do this, in the present day, is not considered decent; but they have their places of resort as well as the other sex: with them, a visit to the bath is a much longer and more social affair than it is with the men: and there they indulge in free conversation with strangers of their own sex. In their visits to their friends and relations, also, they have an advantage over the men; for not only are these visits frequent, but all the female inmates of a house generally accompany the mistress, the stay is often prolonged from an early hour until near sunset, and the guests are liberally and merrily entertained.—But I must return to the shop.—Much of the pleasure and much of the profit that I derived while living in Cairo was obtained at the shops of persons with whom I was acquainted, and at those of strangers. The reader of the present work has a sufficient notion of the general construction of Arab shops to see that a person seated on the mastabah may enjoy at the same time conversation with the owner, and perhaps with other visitors, and a close and unobstructed view of whatever is passing in the street. I regret that I did not often adopt the proper means of preserving a complete recollection of what I heard and witnessed at places of this kind: had I done so, I might here offer to the reader something more entertaining than the following extract from a journal in which I sometimes, when in an idle mood, wrote the occurrences of the day, during my second visit to Egypt.

Oct. 27th (1834).—I generally pay a visit to the shop of the Bâshâ's booksellers (two persons employed to sell the books which are printed at the government-press) on the mornings of Monday and Thursday, when auction-markets are held in the street where the shop is situate, and in the neighbouring mart called Khân El-Khaleelee (the chief Turkish bázâr), occasioning the street to be much crowded, and to present an amusing scene; but I am often more amused with the persons who frequent the shop where I take my seat. I found there, to-day, an old man, a celebrated character, whose name I must not mention: he had been possessed of large property; but the greater part of it had been confiscated; he, however, had contrived to hide much of his wealth, and has since employed friends to trade with it privately; so that he has still a large income; one-third of which he always gives to the poor!—The elder of the two booksellers was relating his having just purchased a house. There lived next door to him, he said, a fikee, a member of the Azhar, and of some repute, to whom belonged fourteen keerâts (or twenty-fourth parts) of the house in which he (the fikee) lodged: the other ten keeráts of this house were the property of a tailor. The bookseller's house was entered, from the roof, and plundered, three times, of wheat, butter, &c.; and the fikee was accused by him of having committed these thefts, and confessed that he had; urging in palliation, that he had only taken his food. The bookseller caused him to be imprisoned in the citadel; and, after he had been confined there many days, offered to procure his liberation if he would sell to him his share of the house. This was done: it was sold for six purses and a half. (A purse is the sum of five hundred piasters: it was then equivalent exactly to five pounds sterling.) * The bookseller then desired to possess himself of the tailor's share, and proposed to him to repair or separate or sell; for the house was in a very dilapidated state; but he refused to comply with any one of these requisitions: he was therefore summoned to the court of the Kádee, and compelled to sell his share; for which he demanded five purses. Having received this sum of money, he met, on his way home, a friend, whom he told what he had done. "O fool!" said the friend: "thou mightest have asked ten purses, and it would have been given." And the tailor no sooner heard these words than he threw down the bag in the middle of the street, kicked off his shoes, and for several minutes continued slapping his face, and crying out like a woman, "O my sorrow!" He then snatched up the bag, and ran away with it, crying in the same manner all the way, and leaving his friend to follow him with his shoes. — Soon after the bookseller had told this story, there joined us a Persian darweesh, whom I had often met there before, and a fat, merry-looking, red-faced man, loaded with ragged clothing, shewing the edge of a curly head of hair below his turban, and carrying a long staff. Everybody at the shop, except myself, kissed his hand: he offered his hand to me, and, after taking it, I kissed my own; and he did the like. I was informed that he was a celebrated welee, or saint. He took snuff, smoked from my pipe, and had a constant smile upon his countenance; though he seldom spoke: almost the only words that he uttered were a warm commendation of an answer which I gave to the Persian: on his (the Persian's) asking me why I had not already departed from Cairo, as I had intended, I said that the servant of God was passive, and not elective; and this sentiment, though common, seemed much to please the welee: he repeated it with emphasis. — There next joined us a man of a very respectable and intelligent appearance, applying for a copy of the sheykh Rifá'ah's account of his visit to France, lately printed at Boolák. Asking what were the general contents of this book, a person present answered him, that the author relates his voyage from Alexandria to Marseilles; how he got drunk on board the ship, and was tied to the mast and flogged; that he ate pork in the land of infidelity and obstinacy, and that it is a most excellent meat; how he was delighted with the French girls, and how superior they are in charms to the women of Egypt; and, having qualified himself, by every accomplishment, for an eminent place in Hell, returned to his native country. This was an ironical quizz on the sheykh Rifá'ah, for his strict, conscientious adherence to the precepts of El-Islám during his voyage, and his residence in France. The applicant for this book had a cataract in each of his eyes; and I advised him to seek relief from the French surgeon Clot Bey; but he said that he was afraid to go to the hospital; for he had heard that many patients there were killed and boiled, to make skeletons: he afterwards, however, on my assuring him that his fears were groundless, promised to go. — While I was talking with him, there began to pass by the shop a long funeral-train, consisting of numerous fikees, and many of the eminent 'Ulamá. On my asking whose funeral it was, I was answered, "The Sheykh El-Menzeláwee," Sheykh of the Saadeeyeh darweeshes. I was surprised, having seen him a few days before in apparently good health. Presently I saw him walking in the funeral-procession: so I asked again; but was answered as before. "Why," said I, "praise be to God, the Sheykh is walking with you, in good health." I was then told that the deceased was his wife. Some Saadeeyeh in the procession were performing a zikr as they passed along; repeating the word "Alláh!" When the bier came in view, I heard the women who followed uttering their zagháreet, or cries of joy, instead of lamenting; for the deceased was a famous saint. She was the sister of the late Sheykh of the Saadeeyeh; and it is believed that her husband, the present Sheykh, derives his miraculous powers from her. It is said that she prophesied, yesterday, the exact hour of her death this day. The women began to lament when the corpse left the house; and, as is usually the case when this is done at the funeral of a saint, the bearers declared that they could not move it: as soon as the lamentations were changed to the cries of joy, the bearers pretended to find their work quite easy.

NOTE 5. "Shems-en-Nahár" signifies "the Sun of Day."

NOTE 6. The masculine seems to be here used for the feminine gender. See Note 36 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 7. See Note 25 to Chapter vi., on the modern custom of shaving the head.

NOTE 8. In this verse, the wine-cup is compared to the sun, the teeth of the cup-bearer are likened to the Pleiades, and his face is compared to the full moon.

NOTE 9. "'Afeef" signifies "'Chaste," and "Abstinent."

NOTE 10. This order was given to make the messengers suppose that she had been sleeping. See Note 55 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 11. "Waseef," here used as a proper name, signifies "a young man-servant."

NOTE 12. A procession similar to that here described is seen in the streets of Cairo, when a bridegroom returns to his house, from the mosque, where he has performed the prayers of nightfall previously to his first visit to the bride. He and his friends and other attendants proceed in the form of an oblong ring, all facing the interior of the ring (so that the foremost walk backwards), and each bearing in his hand one or more wax candles, and sometimes a sprig of hennà or some other flower except the bridegroom and the friend on either side of him. These three form the latter part of the ring which generally consists of twenty or more persons. The procession is headed by musicians, by persons carrying mesh'als (or cresset-lights), and by others bearing lamps.

NOTE 13. "Gharâm" signifies "Desire," "Vehemence of Desire," or "Passion," &c.

NOTE 14. I use the modern term "Bedaweeh" (signifying an Arab female of the Desert) for the old appellation "Aarâbee-yeh."

NOTE 15. The word which I render "laurel," namely "rend," is also applied to the myrtle, and to aloes-wood. The willow (which is of the kind called Oriental) and the rend are here to be understood as emblems of the object of the Bedaweeh's love.

NOTE 16. Clapping the hands (striking the palm of the left hand with the fingers of the right) is the usual mode of summoning a servant.

NOTE 17. This, I suppose, is meant to imply that the disorder of her mind incapacitated her from using the pen. — The substitution of the masculine gender for the feminine (as in the verses preceding) is not uncommon.

NOTE 18. There is an omission here in the Cairo edition, and it appears, from the edition of Breslau, that what is given in the former as the contents of Shems-en-Nahâr's letter consists partly of her letter and partly of 'Alee's answer. I supply the omission (ending with the words, "and by thy head, O my mistress,") from the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred nights, to avoid the necessity of using my own judgment in correcting the blunders which here, as usual, occur in the Breslau edition, though the latter differs less in its context, than the former, from my standard copy.

NOTE 19. The meaning of this is, "Thou hast dealings with the women of the palace." — "How is thy house?" is a phrase often used as a delicate mode of inquiring respecting the health of a man's wife or harem.

NOTE 20. My sheykh remarks, that this relates to the departure of Abu-l-Hasan; but, from what follows, I think it rather applies to the slave-girl.

NOTE 21. By his praying for her, is merely meant his uttering some such words as "God keep thee!" or "God bless thee!"

NOTE 22. The word which I render "wine" is "kahweh," which is the term now applied to "coffee." I believe coffee to be here meant by it; but probably it is an error or interpolation of a copyist.

NOTE 23. El-Moatasim, the son, and third successor, of Hâroon Er-Rasheed, is said to have been the first Khaleefeh who formed a military corps of foreigners (in this case, Turkish slaves); and from his time, the natives of the greater part of the Arabian Empire gradually became subject to the military despotism of Turkish and other foreign guards and governors. Thus it was in Egypt and Syria under the Memlook Sultáns, who originated in the corps formed by Es-Sálih Eiyoob, the last of the dynasty of Saláh-ed Deen; and thus it continued after the conquest of those countries by the 'Osmánlee Turks under the Sultán Selem, until Mohammad 'Alee, after he had exterminated or expelled the Memlook forces, organized his Egyptian troops, and almost entirely displaced the Turkish soldiery.

NOTE 24. I have substituted "other men" for "another man."

NOTE 25. I have remarked in my work on the Modern Egyptians, that it is almost impossible for a woman to have a private interview with a man who has a hareem in his own house; or to enter the house of a man who is neither married nor has a concubine-slave, without attracting the notice of the neighbours, and causing their immediate interference. This remark applies to those cases in which the two parties are not very nearly related.

During my second residence in Egypt, the wives of my servants often came to my house in Cairo, yet they never ventured to enter it. A maid-servant, about nine years of age, frequently brought messages to me from her master, and came up into my sitting-room when I was alone; but this caused no scandal. On one occasion, however, my character was called in question: I was accused of admitting a woman into my room, and had some difficulty to satisfy my neighbours and others. I had purchased some female ornaments and attire of the head, and, having a friend with me, a man between forty and fifty years of age, I induced him to put them on in the place of his turban, that I might the better judge of them; then seating him in a projecting window next the street, for the sake of a foolish joke I suddenly opened a small casement at his side, and thrust forth his head. But little did I expect the result. A bean-seller, sitting at his shop in the street, nearly opposite, saw the apparition, and pointed it out to two or three other persons, and soon there collected before the house a little crowd, whom the bean-seller began to harangue, expressing his astonishment that an Efendee like myself, one who had always appeared to him to have conducted himself most respectably, should have been guilty of so foul an action as that of introducing a woman into his house, having no hareem; that a person devoted to study, and one whom sheyhs of the Azhar frequented, and who delighted in attending the religious festivals, should act in so shameless a manner! I began to be uneasy at witnessing and hearing what passed; and the people were consulting as to the course they should pursue, when I compelled my friend, who had quickly withdrawn his head, to shew it again, and exhibit his beard; whereupon the bean-seller was still more amazed, at recognising the well-known countenance of a respected sheykh, one connected with the Azhar too, who had a hundred times saluted him in approaching my door. But this did not satisfy his audience nor himself: it was suspected that the sheykh was a party to my offence; and it was only by constraining the latter to go down into the street and explain the whole affair, that tranquillity was restored. My character, eventually, did not suffer even from the imputation of a culpable deviation from general custom; as practical jokes are not uncommon among the Arabs in the best society.

NOTE 26. The kánoon is a kind of dulcimer, of which I have given engravings and a description in my work on the Modern Egyptians (vol. ii. ch. v.). Its name is from the Greek κάνων, or from the same origin; and has the same signification; that is, "rule," "law," "custom." It is laid upon the knees of the performer, and played with two plectra, attached to the fore fingers; each plectrum being placed between the finger and a ring, or thimble. There are three chords (of lamb's gut) to each note, and generally, altogether, twenty-four treble chords.

NOTE 27.—On the State of the Soul between Death and the Judgment. It is believed that the soul remains with the body until the expiration of the first night after the burial, when it departs to the place appointed for the abode of good souls until the last day, or to the appointed prison in which wicked souls await their final doom; but with respect to the state of souls in the interval between death and judgment, there are various opinions, which Sale thus states. As to the souls of the good, he says, "1st. Some say that they stay near the sepulchres; with liberty, however, of going wherever they please; which they confirm from Mohammad's manner of saluting them at their graves, and his affirming that the dead heard those salutations as well as the living, though they could not answer. Whence perhaps proceeded the custom of visiting the tombs of relations, so common among the Mohammadans. 2ndly. Others imagine they are with Adam, in the lowest heaven; and also support their opinion by the authority of their prophet, who gave out that in his return from the upper heavens in his pretended night-journey, he saw there the souls of those who were destined to paradise on the right hand of Adam, and those who were condemned to hell on his left.

3rdly. Others fancy the souls of believers remain in the well Zemzem, and those of infidels in a certain well in the province of Hadramót, called Baranoot; but this opinion is branded as heretical. [On this subject, however, see the next paragraph.]

4thly. Others say they stay near the graves for seven days; but that whither they go afterwards is uncertain. 5thly. Others, that they are all in the trumpet, whose sound is to raise the dead. And 6thly. Others, that the souls of the good dwell in the forms of white birds, under the throne of God. As to the condition of the souls of the wicked, besides the opinions that have been already mentioned, the more orthodox hold that they are offered by the angels to heaven, from whence being repulsed as stinking and filthy, they are offered to the earth, and being also refused a place there, are carried down to the seventh earth, and thrown into a dungeon, which they call Sijjeen, under a green rock, or according to a tradition of Mohammed, under the devil's jaw, to be there tormented till they are called up to be joined again to their bodies."—But the souls of prophets are believed to be admitted immediately into paradise, and those of martyrs are said to rest in the crops of green birds which eat of the fruits of paradise and drink of its rivers.

Of the opinions above mentioned, with respect to the souls of the faithful, I believe the first to be that which is most prevalent. It is generally said, that these souls visit their respective graves every Friday; and according to some, they return to their bodies on that day, after the period of the afternoon prayers, and on Saturday and Monday; or on Thursday, Friday, and Saturday; and remain until sunrise.—I believe also, from having heard frequent allusions made to it, as a thing not to be doubted, that the opinion respecting the Well of Barahoot commonly prevails in the present day. El-Kazweenee says of it, "It is a well near Hadramót; and the Prophet (God bless and save him!) said, 'In it are the souls of the infidels and hypocrites.' It is an 'Adite well, [i. e. ancient, as though made by the ancient tribe of 'Ad,] in a dry desert, and a gloomy valley; and it is related of 'Alee (may God be well pleased with him!), that he said, 'The most hateful of districts unto God (whose name be exalted!) is the Valley of Barahoot, in which is a well whose water is black and fetid, where the souls of the infidels make their abode.' El-Asma'ee hath related of a man of Hadramót, that he said, 'We find near Barahoot an extremely-disgusting and fetid smell, and then news is brought to us of the death of a great man of the chiefs of the infidels.' It is related also, that a man who passed a night in the Valley of Barahoot said, 'I heard all the night [exclamations of] O Roomeh! O Roomeh!—and I mentioned this to a learned man, and he told me that it was the name of the angel commissioned to keep guard over the souls of the infidels.'"

NOTE 28. The emancipation of slaves on the occasion of a death is a custom often observed. Sometimes this is done in accordance with the will of the deceased; at other times, by the free will of the heirs; but in the latter cases, the merit of the act is transferred to the soul of the deceased; its object being, to increase his happiness in the future world.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TENTH

NOTE 1. The scenes in which the principal events described in this tale are laid, though I cannot recognise them in the works of any geographer, have led me to search for traces of a Persian origin; but no indication of such an origin have I been able to discover; and as the character of the tale is altogether Arab, I regard it as an Arab composition. Every one who is moderately acquainted with the Arabs and their literature will see that the tale exhibits throughout, in its present state, the life and manners, and the notions, of that people. One of its chief merits, however, consists in its construction; and this, again, is mainly compatible only with the notions of the same people. I think that this tale offers some of the strongest reasons for considering the Thousand and One Nights, in the state in which it is known to us, as almost entirely an Arab work, though framed after the model of one much older; and I have much satisfaction in remarking that my opinion of this tale is the same as that of the greatest Arabic scholar of Christendom, whose remarks upon it I here translate.

"The history of the loves of Kamar-ez-Zemán, prince of the island of the children of Khálidán, an island which is situate at the distance of twenty days' sail from the coasts of Persia, in the Ocean, and of Budoor, princess of China, is no more Indian or Persian than the others. The King, the father of Kamar-ez-Zemán, has Muslims for subjects; the mother of the young prince is named Fátimé; and Kamar-ez-Zemán in his prison, occupies himself in reading [or rather reciting] the Kur-án. The genii who interpose in these adventures are, again, of those who had concerns with Solomon. In fine, all that is said, in this tale, of the city of the Magians, as well as of the worshippers of fire, would suffice to shew that one should not suspect to find in it anything but the production of a Muslim writer." (De Sacy).

NOTE 2. So in the edition of Breslau. In the Cairo edition, by a mistake of a copyist, "Shahramán."

NOTE 3. This sentence is from the Breslau edition; but I have put "Islands" for "Island," to agree with the sequel.—It must be observed here, that the scenes of the events described in this tale are in the regions of fiction. I am at a loss to assign a position to the Islands of Khálidán, otherwise than in the vague manner in which they are mentioned in the old version, as being situate at the distance of about twenty days' sail from the coasts of Persia, in the Ocean; for Galland, in this case, appears to have followed his original. De Sacy, who seems from his own words to have founded his observations respecting the Thousand and One Nights chiefly upon an examination of Galland's original, mentions these Islands (calling them, as in Galland's version, the Islands of the children of Khálidán) in the same manner, as already shewn in the first note of the present series. "Khálidán" may be a corruption of "El-Khálidát" or "El-Khálidetán," which names are given by the Arabs to the Fortunate Islands, or Canaries. Our author might have heard of these Islands, and, ignorant of their situation, supposed them to be in the sea which washes the coasts of Persia and India; of which sea, as well as of the sea of China, he evidently entertained most erroneous ideas. It should also be here observed, that the Arabic word ("jezeerah") which generally signifies "an island" is often applied to a peninsula, and may frequently, with propriety, be translated "country;" Arabia, Persia, India, &c., being, by many Arab writers, termed Islands. It is implied in the tale under consideration, that there was a route by land from the "Islands of Khálidán" to the "Ebony Islands" and the "Interior Islands of the region of China." The inhabitants of all these "Islands" are described as Muslims; and in manners, dress, &c., as Arabs. But this, in a tale of fiction, will not surprise those who are acquainted with the words of Arab geographers, and their accounts of places visited by their own countrymen. Ibn-El-Wardee, in describing "the Sea of Ez-Zulmeh, which is the western [portion of the] Circumambient Ocean" (that is, the Atlantic), says, "Among its islands are the Khálidetán [above mentioned]. These are two islands whereon are two images [or idols] constructed of hard stone: each of them is a hundred cubits high, and upon the top of each is a figure of copper, pointing with its hand backwards, as though it would say, 'Return; for there is nothing behind me.' Zu-l-Menár the Hemyeree, one of the Tubbas [or ancient Kings of the Yemen], constructed them. He was [the son of] Zu-l-Karneyn; but not of the one mentioned in the Kur-án."—But the Canary Islands were only known to Europeans, at the time when Ibn-El-Wardee wrote, from the accounts of the Ancients. They were rediscovered by some Genoese and Spanish seamen in 1345, three or four years before the death of that geographer.

NOTE 4. In the original, "el-'Ajam;" the sense of which appears to be here restricted to signify the Persians. Otherwise the text would mean, that the Islands of Khálidán were at the limits of the extra-Arabian world. It would be quite consistent with Arabian notions to speak thus of the Fortunate Islands, El-Khálidetán; but the former sense of the passage is more agreeable with the whole character of the tale.

NOTE 5. It is a common custom of the Arabs in the present day to perform the prayers of two rek'ahs with the view of obtaining offspring; and more specially on the occasion of a man's first visit to his bride, as mentioned in the last paragraph of Note 39 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 6. This sentence, again, is from the Breslau edition. It describes a custom which, like that mentioned in the note immediately preceding, is often observed by Arabs in the present day to propitiate Providence, and obtain offspring. For the same purpose, alms are frequently given to the poor, to obtain their prayers; and visits are performed to the tombs of saints to request their intercession.

NOTE 7. "Kamar-ez-Zemán" signifies "the Moon of the Age."

NOTE 8. — On the manner in which the Arab Ladies dress their Hair. Two of the customs here mentioned, the dyeing of the fingers with hennà, and the blackening of the edges of the eyelids with kohl, have been noticed before. The manner in which the Arab ladies usually dress their hair may now be described.

They are extremely fond of full and long hair; and however amply endowed with this natural ornament, to add to its effect they have recourse to art. But the Prophet, abhorring all false attractions that might at first deceive a husband and then disappoint him, "cursed the woman who joined her own hair to that of another, or other hair to her own without her husband's permission: if she do it, therefore, with his permission, it is not prohibited, unless she so make use of human hair; for this is absolutely forbidden." Hence the Arab women prefer strings of silk to add to their hair. — Over the forehead, the hair is cut rather short; but two full locks hang down on each side of the face: these are often curled in ringlets, and sometimes plaited. The rest of the hair is arranged in plaits or braids, which hang down the back. They are generally from eleven to twenty-five in number; but always of an uneven number: eleven is considered a scanty number: thirteen and fifteen are more common. Three times the number of black silk strings (three to each plait of hair, and each three united at the top), from sixteen to eighteen inches in length, are braided with the hair for about a quarter of their length; or they are attached to a lace or band of black silk which is bound round the head, and in this case hang entirely separate from the plaits of hair. These strings, together with certain ornaments of gold, &c., compose what is termed the "safà." Along each string, except from the upper extremity to about a quarter or (at most) a third of its length, are generally attached nine or more little flat ornaments of gold, which are usually all of the same form. The most common form is oblong, round at the lower extremity and pointed at the upper, or the reverse. They are affixed (each by a little ring at its upper extremity) about an inch, or a little more, apart; but those of each string are purposely placed so as not exactly to correspond with those of the others. At the end of each string is a small gold tube, or a small polygonal gold bead, beneath which is most commonly suspended (by a little ring) a gold coin, a little more than half an inch in diameter. Such is the most general kind of safà; but some ladies substitute, for the gold coin, a fanciful ornament of the same metal, either simple, or with a pearl in the centre; or they suspend, in the place of this, a little tassel of pearls; or attach alternately pearls and emeralds to the bottom of the triple strings, and a pearl with each of the little ornaments of gold first mentioned. Coral beads are also sometimes attached in the same manner as these pearls. — The safà I think the prettiest, as well as the most singular, of all the ornaments worn by the Arab ladies. The glittering of the little ornaments of gold, and their chinking together as the wearer walks, have a peculiarly lively effect.

The ornamented strings, though not alluded to in the verses to which this note immediately refers, are afterwards mentioned in the tale. The passages relating to them, with many others in the present collection of stories, shew that the costumes described in this work were nearly the same as those which still prevail in Arabian countries.

NOTE 9. Here follows, in the old version, a discussion on the subject of marriage, between Kamar-ez-Zemán and his mother Fátimèh, who had been desired by Sháh-Zemán to try if her powers of persuasion would induce him to comply with the King's request. But not a word of all this occurs in the edition of Cairo or in that of Breslau. I do not, however, ascribe it to Galland's invention; for De Sacy, who examined the original, mentions it, and partly founds an argument upon it, as I have already shewn.

NOTE 10. In illustration of this expression, see Note 14 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 11. "Et-Tághhoot" is a name given to the Devil, or any seducer, and to any idol. It is therefore to be understood here in the first of these senses.

NOTE 12. His eyelashes are said to have scorned the sharp sword, because they were themselves more piercing.

NOTE 13. This is said to shew his excessive submission. In the usual posture of a subject before his prince, or a servant before his master, a posture maintained also in some other cases, especially by the son or daughter before the parent, the hands are placed together, the left within the right, before the girdle.

NOTE 14. Perhaps it is needless to comment upon this reply of Kamar-ez-Zemán and to remind the reader of the extreme respect which is generally shewn by the Arab son to his father. But though no reader will regard it as a light offence, some might not imagine the degree of indignation which such expressions would excite in the mind of an Eastern parent.

NOTE 15. These words, addressed by a King to his son, gross as they are, and reflecting upon the honour of the former and his wife, convey a correct idea of the extravagancies into which an Arab, however high his rank, is sometimes betrayed by anger.

NOTE 16. The farrásh is a servant who spreads the carpets, mattresses, &c., takes care of these and other articles of the furniture of the house, and, on a journey, pitches the tents.

NOTE 17. By Muslims of education, the Kur-án is usually recited by heart, and to do so is, with many, a daily exercise; with others it is also very common. — The same Arabic word is employed to signify both reading a book and reciting by heart.

NOTE 18. The chapter of "The Cow" is the second; "The Family of 'Emrán," the third; "Yá-Seen," the thirty-sixth; "The Compassionate," the fifty-fifth; "Blessed be He in whose hand is the Kingdom," the sixty-seventh; and the "Two Preventives" are the last two. These two, are so named because they serve as preventives of, or antidotes against, the effects of the evil eye, or enchantment. They are said to have been revealed to the Prophet in order that he might liberate himself from an enchantment by repeating them; and they are often employed as preservative charms. —

Kamar-ez-Zemán's recitation of these chapters of the Kur-án is to be understood as supererogatory; but it is often that a Muslim, in solitude, terminates his prayers in this manner. By his "supplication," is meant a short petition in words of his own choice. In repeating this, the worshipper looks at the palms of his two hands, which he holds like an open book before him; and when he has finished, he draws them over his face, from the forehead downwards. By the "seeking refuge with God," is meant repeating the words, "I seek refuge with God from Satan the accursed." — See Note 44 below.

NOTE 19. "Maadinee" signifies "mineral" and "metallic," and may perhaps here denote the colour of the satin; but it may, more probably, signify "of the fabric of a place called Maadin;" for silks, &c., are often called after the names of the places where they are made. I cannot offer any other conjecture as to its meaning in this case; and as my sheykh has not explained it, I infer that he, also, was in doubt respecting it; which is not to be wondered at, as many similar terms are no longer understood. In the Breslau edition it is not mentioned. A large and populous town called Maadin-en-Nakrah, or — en-Nakireh, is mentioned by Arab geographers as situate at the point where the pilgrim-routes from El-Basrah and El-Koofeh unite.

NOTE 20. The word which I render "kerchief" (namely "mikna'") is a kind of veil, similar to the kináa, but narrower, and seldom worn but by women. It is probably meant that Kamar-ez-Zemán used it to keep off mosquitoes.

NOTE 21. I have substituted "tower" for "saloon;" the sequel requiring this alteration.

NOTE 22. In the original, "Roománee." This term, and the collective "Roomán," are used in modern Arabic to signify, respectfully, a "Roman" and "Romans." The terms "Roomán" and "Roománeeyoon" (plural of "Roománee") are applied to the inhabitants of Italy, and the Greeks of late ages ("el Arwám), and other people, who became subject to the Roman Empire. Hence my interpretation of "Roomán" in Note 13 to Chapter ii. But "Room" is the more proper appellation of the subjects of the Eastern Roman, or later Greek, Empire, and of the modern Greeks.

NOTE 23. "Meymooneh" (feminine of "Meymoon") signifies "Fortunate."

NOTE 24. "Jánn" is here synonymous with "Jinn."—See Note 21 to the Introduction.

NOTE 25. She ascended towards the confines of the lowest of the seven heavens to listen by stealth to the conversation of the Angels.—See the note just before referred to, and Note 36 in the present series.

NOTE 26. We may suppose that she entered the saloon either by a window or by passing through the solid wall.

NOTE 27.—On Talismans. "Talisman" is a corruption of the Arabic word "talsam." I write this latter word in accordance with the manner in which it is generally pronounced by the Arabs, and the manner in which my sheykh has written it here and in other parts of the work: by some it is written "tilsem," and "tilism." It is a term applied to mystical characters; and also to seals, images, &c., upon which such characters are engraved or inscribed. These characters are astrological, or of some other magical kind. The purposes for which talsams are contrived are various; one has the property of preserving from enchantment, or from a particular accident, or a variety of evils; another protects a treasure with which it is deposited; a third, by being rubbed, procures the presence and services of a Jinn.

NOTE 28. The upper order of Jinn are those who inhabit the higher regions, and do good acts; the lower are those who inhabit low places, such as the latrinæ, and do evil acts; and the third class are those who dive in the seas.

NOTE 29. My sheykh remarks that this name is commonly written "Shemhoorish;" but correctly, "Shemharoosh."

NOTE 30. I have already remarked that the scenes of the events related in this tale are in the regions of fiction. When China, and the Islands of its Sea, are mentioned in the present work, we must dismiss from our minds all correct notions of those parts and their inhabitants, who are generally here described as similar to the Arabs in religion, manners, dress, &c.

NOTE 31. "El-Ghayoor" signifies "the Jealous" (with respect to love or honour), or "the Zealous;" and in some cases, "the Changeable."

NOTE 32. The foregoing description is somewhat abridged. Its extravagance in the original may partly be attributed to the excitement of Dahnash.

NOTE 33. The number of these palaces, and the costly materials of which they are said to have been constructed, are probably designed to convey a comparison to the seven heavens, or to the seven stages of paradise.—See Note 2 to the Introduction.

NOTE 34. "Budoor" is the plural of "bedr," and signifies "Full Moons." She was thus named to imply that, "by the excess of her beauty she was [to be compared to nothing less than] a number of full moons; not one only." In the old version she is improperly called "Badoura."

NOTE 35. I give the Arabic appellation of "kahramāneh" for want of an English synonym. It sometimes signifies "a female confidant" (as I have before rendered it); in other cases, "an intriguing waiting-woman," "a duenna," and "a woman of gallantry." But it is generally applied as in the present instance, to an experienced, confidential female slave, who is set over others, or intrusted with some office of importance. It is from the Persian "kahramān," signifying "a valiant warrior," the name of a celebrated fabulous hero of Persia.

NOTE 36. The reader may perhaps say, "How did Meymooneh become acquainted with the youth's history?"—Probably, before she met Dahnash, she had reached the confines of the lowest heaven, and there heard the Angels conversing upon the subject; such being the usual way by which the Jinn arrive at the knowledge of things which would otherwise remain hidden from them.

NOTE 37. The fire here mentioned is that of which the Jinn are created.—See Note 21 to the Introduction.

NOTE 38. The clinking of the ornaments of the head has been mentioned in the eighth note of the present series. The anklets, also, knocking together, produce a tinkling. The odour alluded to in the last of these characteristic verses is that arising from perspiration. A beautiful Arab damsel is often described as diffusing a natural perfume of this kind, like the blessed in Paradise, whose perspiration will be odorous as musk. Thus, in the Mo'allakah of Imra-el-Keys, in allusion to two former objects of the poet's love, it is said, —

"When they rise, the odour of musk is diffused from them, as the breathing of the zephyr bringing the fragrance of the clove."

Many similar examples might be added: but they are often misunderstood: one of them is quoted with the view of proving the fondness of the Oriental ladies for perfumes, while it only implies such fondness in the men. It is true, however, that both sexes take great delight in perfumes, and few of the women comply with the injunction in the latter part of the following saying of the Prophet; that, "the perfume for a man should have smell, but not colour; and the things which women rub on must have colour, but not smell."

NOTE 39. My sheykh explains the word "kutrub" as signifying here, "an animal with long fore-legs; one of those which early in the morning puts itself in motion." In the Kámoos it is described as "a small beast that ceases not from moving about all the day;" and the same term (kutrub) is also there rendered, "a bald wolf," and "the male of the Ghool," &c.

NOTE 40. So in the edition of Breslau. In the Cairo edition, "äwi-l-kubbeti-l-mebneeyeh," which may be rendered "or [like] the dome-crowned structure."

NOTE 41. See Note 15 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 42. The word here rendered "quinary," which is its literal sense, is generally used to signify "of five spans." We may perhaps here understand it as meaning "of five feet." The Arabs especially admire damsels who have not attained their full growth; and at witnessing a bridal procession, disapprobation is often expressed, or indicated by looks, if the bride is of the average stature of women.

NOTE 43. This is here interpreted by my sheykh as meaning "marrow." — The former part of Note 11 to Chapter iii. will explain this interpretation.

NOTE 44. When the Muslim has finished the prayers ordained by the Kur-án and the Sunneh, if he would acquit himself of supererogatory acts, he remains sitting (but may then sit more at his ease), and recites the "Throne-Verse," which is the 256th of the second chapter of the Kur-án (beginning with the words, "God! There is no deity but He;" and ending with,

"He is the High, the Great"); and generally adds, "O High! O Great! Thy perfection [I extol]." He then repeats "The perfection of God!" (thirty-three times). "The perfection of God, the Great, with his praise for ever!" (once). "Praise be to God;" (thirty-three times). "Exalted be his dignity! There is no deity but He!" (once). "God is most great!" (thirty-three times). "God is most great in greatness, and praise be to God in abundance!" (once). He counts these repetitions with a string of beads, which are ninety-nine in number, and have a mark between each thirty-three: they are of aloes or other odoriferous or precious wood, or of coral, or of certain fruitstones, or seeds, &c.

NOTE 45. This exclamation ("Allah preserve thy youth!"), being only used by women, is, as my sheykh remarks, improper from the mouth of the Wezeer.

NOTE 46. This, again, is an ejaculation of women. — See Note 65 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 47. The word here rendered "news" generally signifies "happy news." My sheykh observes that it is used to excite laughter.

NOTE 48. Of the various significations of "kubbeh," the most appropriate here seems to be either "a dome" or "a building or chamber, &c., surmounted by a dome."

NOTE 49. These are the names of the twelve lunar months which compose the Mohammadan year. They are mentioned in the order of their succession; but Moharram is that with which the year commences. — The questions here put are those which are generally addressed by the Arabs to a person to try if he be sane.

NOTE 50. "Kisrà," or "Kesrà," from the Persian "Khusrow," which signifies "a great king," and which the Romans converted into "Cosroes" (a surname that they gave to almost every King of the Sásanian dynasty), is an appellation applied by the Arabs (like Cæsar among the Romans) to many ancient Kings of Persia. According to the Persian and Arab historians, the Kings of Persia prior to El-Islám composed four dynasties; namely, the Pêshdádians, the chronology of which is unknown; the Kayánians, which ended in the year 331 B. C., when Persia was conquered by Alexander the Great; the Ashkánians, which terminated A. D. 202; and the Sásánians, the last of whom was overcome by the Arabs, A. D. 636.

NOTE 51. From the commencement of this sentence to the end of the paragraph is from the Breslau edition.

NOTE 52. In the Cairo edition, the lady Budoor is said to have killed the old woman; but in the edition of Breslau, and the old version, she is described as having only beaten her.

NOTE 53. Maniacs, in the madhouse in Cairo, are thus chained by the neck, each in a separate cell. They are treated there, I fear, with unnecessary vigour; but travellers are often deceived on this point; for it is a custom of visitors to take with them bread to distribute to the lunatics, many of whom consequently cry out for it, when any stranger enters the court, as if they were starving. Sometimes, when a lunatic has received his cake of bread, he throws it back in the face of the giver.

NOTE 54. So in the edition of Breslau, and apparently in the MS. from which Galland translated, being written in his version "Torí." In the Cairo edition, "Et-Teyreb."

NOTE 55. These are female proper names, used as fictitious names. "Suleymâ" is the diminutive of "Selmâ;" and, like the latter, is often employed to designate a beautiful woman. "Er-Rabâb" signifies "the white cloud," and "the viol;" and "Rabâb" is also applied to "a cloud which is now white, and presently black;" and hence it is a term applied to "a woman," denoting changeableness. "Ten'om" is the third person singular feminine of the aorist of a verb signifying "to be soft, gentle, &c."

NOTE 56. "'Andam" is an Arabic name of "Brazil-wood" (also called "bak-kam"), and of the resinous substance termed by us "dragon's blood."

NOTE 57. The meaning is, "My fingers are not dyed with hennâ."—See Note 36 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 58. This and the next preceding verse, on the superior merit of the precedent, are often repeated by the learned.

NOTE 59. She hath Lukmán's wisdom (which is proverbial among the Muslims), Joseph's beauty (which is alike celebrated), David's sweet voice (on the effects of which see Note 18 to Chapter i.), and the chastity of the Virgin Mary; while I have grief like that which Jacob felt (for the loss of Joseph), regret such as Jonas suffered (when swallowed by the fish), affliction like that endured by Job (when God tried him, on his marrying the wife of the man whom He sent, and not being content with the wives whom he had before), and am in a state like that of Adam expelled from Paradise.

NOTE 60. This is equivalent to saying, she is in a state of affliction that cannot be described.

NOTE 61. This, I suppose, is said from politeness; for, as my sheykh remarks, it is not consistent with the story; since Kamar-ez-Zemân acquainted his father and others with the adventure, and the lady Budoor did not acquaint her father.

NOTE 62. See the fiftieth note of the present series.

NOTE 63.—On Geomancy. On the science and practice of Geomancy, called "'Ilm er-Raml" and "Darb er-Raml," there are several treatises by Eastern writers; but I have not met with any of these; nor have I seen a Geomantic tablet; which, probably, I should be unable to describe satisfactorily if I had. Geomancy is a mode of divination from the combinations of certain marks or dots made, apparently at random, upon sand (whence its appellation) or on paper; but I have been informed that it is chiefly founded upon astrology; so I suppose the Geomantic tablet to be an instrument engraved with astrological diagrams, &c. I have only seen the mode of performing geomantic experiments upon paper. The invention of the science is ascribed by some to Idrees, or Enoch; by some, to Daniel; by some, to Ham the son of Noah; and by others, to Hermes Trismegistus.

NOTE 64. Literally. "I write the book," or "—— the writ." This phrase is employed to signify writing, or, more commonly, merely repeating, a form of words constituting a contract of marriage. It is evident that this is its meaning here, and that it alludes to astrological calculations which are often made previously to marriage, and which I have described in Note 74 to Chapter v. — See that note, and Note 147 in the present series.

NOTE 65. See the fifty-sixth note of the present series.

NOTE 66. Amulets thus engraved with talismanic characters are worn by many Muslims in the present day; but a more common kind of amulet is a piece of paper partly inscribed with such characters and enclosed in a case of gold or silver or leather, &c.

NOTE 67. In the times of the early 'Ab-bāsee Khaleefehs, in the eighth and ninth centuries of our era, popular European tales may have found their way among the Arabs, as well as Persian and Indian tales of the same nature; and the establishment of an Arab empire in Spain, the Crusades, and the extensive commerce of the Venetians with Egypt and Syria, doubtless occasioned the transmission of similar tales from the Arabs to Europe, and vice versâ. On the subject of such transmissions, and the resemblance of popular tales and fictions of different countries, much information and entertainment may be derived from a work by Mr. Keightley, from which I must here insert an extract.

"In that pleasing old French romance of Peter of Provence and the fair Maguelone, . . . there is a circumstance so like one in the Arabian Nights, that it may have come from the East. I know not the age of the romance, but it is certainly posterior to the establishment of the Angevin dynasty at Naples. As it does not appear to have ever existed in verse, I would refer it to the fifteenth century.

"Peter, son to the Count of Provence, hearing of the beauty of Maguelone, daughter of the King of Naples, determined to go thither in person, and view the peerless maiden. He accordingly went in disguise to the Neapolitan court, and there, as an unknown knight, so distinguished himself in the tournaments, that he won the favour of the King, and the heart of the lovely Maguelone. After some time, being desirous to return to Provence, he persuaded the princess to fly with him. She yielded her assent, and they secretly left the palace and departed on horseback, taking a third horse laden with provisions. On the second day they came to a dense wood on a mountain near the sea, and being fatigued and overcome with the heat, they alighted from their horses to rest them; and the princess, laying her head on the lap of Peter, fell fast asleep and —

"While Magalona, as has been said, was sleeping on the lap of her dear friend Peter, the said Peter delighted his whole heart by gazing on the sovereign beauty of his lady; and when he had to his pleasure contemplated her beautiful countenance, and had well admired and kissed that sweet and agreeable, small and beautiful mouth, he could not satiate himself with looking at it more and more: then he could not refrain from uncovering her a little, and gazing on her most beautiful and white bosom, that was whiter than the crystal; and he touched her sweet bosom, and when he did so he was so penetrated with love that it seemed to him that he was in paradise, and that nothing could ever cause him any affliction. But that pleasure did not last long; for he suffered the most inestimable pain and ill-fortune, as you shall hear, that man could ever think of. And the noble Magalona suffered not less, for she afterwards passed through many great afflictions.

"For while Peter thus admired and touched the sweet Magalona, he found in her bosom a coloured piece of silk, which was folded up, and he had a very great desire to know what was in it. And he began to unfold it, and he found in it three of his mother's rings, which he had given to Magalona, and she had kept them out of good love. And when Peter had seen them, he folded them up again, and placed them near him on a stone; and he turned his eyes to the noble Magalona, and regarded her with good love, and he almost fainted away with love and with pleasure. But our Lord shewed that in this world there is not pleasure without pain, nor perfect happiness. For a bird of prey, thinking that that coloured silk was a piece of flesh, came flying, and took that silk, and went away with it, and flew to the mountain, and seated itself on a very lofty tree.

"When Peter saw this he was greatly grieved, and he thought that Magalona would be grieved at it, whom he wished to please more than any person in the world. He put his cloak under the head of Magalona, and then got up very quietly, without her perceiving anything. And he began to follow that bird, and to pelt it with stones, to make it drop the silk it was carrying. And there was there a little rock near the land. Yet between the rock and the land there was a great quantity of water, and no one could pass to that rock without swimming. And this bird went flying from tree to tree to settle on that perilous rock, and Peter flung a stone at it, so that that bird went from thence and let that silk fall into the sea; and the said Peter could not pass thither, because he knew not how to swim. Nevertheless, as the distance was not great, he began to search on one side and the other if he could find anything in which he could pass to the rock to go to look for it. Then said Peter, Would to God that I had not taken the rings or the silk from where I took them, and that I had not meddled with them, for they will cost me dear, and Magalona still more; for if I delay much longer Magalona will go look for me. And as Peter was thus searching along the shore of the sea, he found an old boat, which the fishers had abandoned because it was worth nothing; and Peter went into it, and was greatly joyed, but his joy lasted not long. And he took some sticks that he had picked up to row with, and went off for the rock. But God, who does all things at his pleasure, caused to rise a great wind, cold and strong, from the land side, which carried Peter and his bark, against his will, very far out to sea, and all his rowing availed him nought; for the sea was very high and very deep, and he could not get to land, and the wind carried him along in spite of himself.

"I need not tell how Peter was taken up by a ship and brought to Egypt, where he became a great favourite with the Sultán, and how Maguelone went to Provence, and was made directress of an hospital, whither Peter was brought as a pauper, and how she recognised him, and made herself known to him, and how they were united, and passed their days in uninterrupted felicity."

Mr. Keightley proceeds to remark upon the similar incident in the tale of Kamar-ez-Zemán, "the main story of which (for the episodic ones certainly are not) is possibly," he says, "of Persian origin;" but, like De Sacy, as I have already said, I see no foundation for such an opinion; and there is certainly much that is utterly inconsistent with it. Mr. Keightley afterwards mentions another point of resemblance between the story of Kamar-ez-Zemán and that of Peter of Provence, which I shall notice in its proper place; and he adds, "It is therefore, I think, by no means unlikely that some part at least of the oriental tale travelled westwards." To me it seems more probable that the writers of these two stories were alike indebted to some tale much older than that of Kamar-ez-Zemán—to one which offered little that was worthy of imitation. The resemblances, being only in two points, I regard as tending to confirm my opinion, that the tales of the Thousand and One Nights, in general, differ extremely from any others upon which they may have been founded. For the incomparable superiority of the tale of Kamar-ez-Zemán over that of Peter of Provence renders it, I think, highly improbable that the latter could have been founded upon the former; or that the former could have been indebted, otherwise than in the points here noticed, to any tale of which the latter may be an imitation. The chief merit of the former tale I most confidently ascribe to an Arab writer.

NOTE 68. It is perhaps unnecessary to observe to the reader, that the danger which Kamar-ez-Zemán is said to have incurred in the city of the Magians is inconsistent with the idea that his story may be one borrowed from the "Hezár Afsáneh;" that is, of an ancient Persian origin. So, too, is the treatment experienced by El-As'ad, later in the tale.

NOTE 69. "El-Islám" is a term often used to signify "the Muslims."

NOTE 70. In a former tale, "the king of the further parts of India" is called "lord of the Ebony Island."

NOTE 71. The same principle which induced Mohammad to forbid all games of chance was strictly regarded by him in his laws relating to commerce and industry, as in the cases of "musákáh" and "muzára'ah." "Musákáh signifies a man's giving over his trees in charge to another, to attend upon them and improve them, by watering them for a fixed proportion of their produce; such as half, a third, or a fourth. Muzára'ah is the giving of land in charge, to be cultivated on similar conditions." It appears that Mohammad forbade the latter practice, and consequently the former also, under certain circumstances. "My two uncles," says Ráfe' the son of Khadeej, "informed me, that the companions of the Prophet used to let land by this agreement, that the sower should sow his own seed, and that whatever grew upon the sides of small ponds should be for them; or they fixed on a part of the ground, and said, 'Whatever grows on this is for us, and the rest for you.'

Then the Prophet forbade it, because per-adventure nothing might grow on it: "that is, on one part of it. But it is also said, by one of the companions of Mohammad, "Verily the Prophet of God has forbidden muzára'ah in this sense, by saying, 'Whatever may be produced in this part is for me, and in the other part for you;' and ordered fixed rent, and said, 'In this there is no fear.'" It is evident, therefore, that he prohibited certain modes of muzára'ah, which were unfair; but I think it is also clear that he did not forbid the practice in cases in which the proprietor of the land and the labourer incurred a similar risk. 'Omar, the second Khaleefeh, "settled with the people, that if he found the seed, he should have half its produce; and if the labourers brought the seed, then two-thirds [should be] for them, and the remainder for him." Mohammad himself, also, "delivered over, to a Jew of Kheyber, the trees and grounds of Kheyber, by this stipulation, that he should work on them at his own expense, and give him half their produce."—I should be extremely glad to see a similar plan adopted in Egypt: the revenue of the government would be greatly increased by it; and the chief evil of which the peasants complain, remedied.

In the tale which this note is designed to illustrate, Kamar-ez-Zemán was merely an assistant: therefore a fourth of the produce of the garden was a fair remuneration for him.

NOTE 72. See Note 25 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 73. See Note 32 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 74. "Hayát-en-Nufoos" signifies "the Life of Souls."

NOTE 75. This he did to obtain a blessing.

NOTE 76. Thamood and 'Ád were two tribes of ancient Arabs, said to have been of enormous stature, who, with few exceptions, were destroyed for their obstinate idolatry. The tribe of 'Ád was the more ancient; but both lived before the time of Abraham.

NOTE 77. In the original, "amtár," plural of "matr." The terms "matr" and "matrah" are applied to a large jar or bottle of wood or leather, used for water, &c.

NOTE 78. I do not know of any kind of olives called "asáfeere;" nor do I find this appellation in any dictionary.

NOTE 79. "Just so Peter of Provence, when leaving Egypt, put his valuables into barrels, which he filled with salt; and, having fallen asleep in the isle of Sagona, the ship sailed away, leaving him behind. On arriving at the place where Maguelone dwelt, the captain gave her the barrels of salt for the use of the hospital, and in them she found the treasure."

NOTE 80. This is a common expression of humility. An Arab, writing to a superior, often terms himself the latter's slave.

NOTE 81. From this we must understand that the gardener had left no natural heir.

NOTE 82. Tamarind, in Arabian countries, is generally formed into round, flat-tish cakes, which have a hole in the middle. When dry, they are strung together.

NOTE 83. The Muslims are forbidden not only to swear frequently and vainly by God, but especially to swear by any created thing. There are few of them, however, who are not in the constant habit of acting contrary to both these prohibitions. Their most common forms of oath are "By God!" and "By the existence of the Prophet!" but they also often swear by the life of any respected person; and by the life, head, or beard, of a man whom they are addressing.

NOTE 84. — On Polygamy, &c. In a former Note I have mentioned certain beneficial results of the law of the separation of the sexes; its promoting a more free and extensive intercourse among persons of the same sex and of different ranks, and its tendency, with Muslims, to increase what they consider domestic happiness. I must now remark upon some other effects of the same law.

First, the restriction of intercourse between the sexes before marriage renders indispensable, to some, the facility of divorce; for it would be unjust for a man who finds himself disappointed in his expectations of a wife whom he has never before seen, not to be enabled to put her away. Secondly, it sometimes renders indispensable the license of polygamy; for a man who finds his first wife unsuited to him may not be able to divorce her without reducing her to want; and the license of polygamy becomes as necessary in this case as that of divorce in another. Thirdly, the liberty of polygamy renders the facility of divorce more desirable for the happiness of women; since, when a man has two or more wives, and one of them is dissatisfied with her situation, he is enabled to liberate her. Fourthly, the license of divorce often acts as a check upon that of polygamy; for the fear of being obliged, by the influence of his first wife, or by that of her relations, to divorce her if he take a second, often prevents a man from doing this. Thus both these licenses are required by the most important principle of the constitution of Muslim society, and each is productive of some moral benefit. In considering the question of their expediency, we should also remember, that barrenness is much more common in hot climates than in those which are temperate.

Christianity is plainly opposed to polygamy; but as to divorce, some have contended that it only forbids putting away a wife against her will, unless for one cause. Christians are often most unjust in their condemnation of Muslim laws and tenets, and especially condemn those which agree with the Mosaic code and the practices of holy men; such as polygamy (which Mohammad limited), divorce, war for the defence of religion, purifications, and even minor matters. Mohammad endeavoured to remove one of the chief causes of polygamy and divorce, by recommending that a man should see a woman whom he proposed to take as his wife. We might imagine that he could have made these practices less common than they now are, and always have been, among his followers, had he given more license, allowing the man to enjoy a limited intercourse with the object of his choice in the presence of her female or male relations (the former of whom might be veiled), without infringing further the general law of the separation of the sexes. But he saw that such liberty would very seldom, if ever, be allowed: scarcely any parents, among the Arabs, except those of the lower classes, permit the little license which he recommended. Instead of condemning him for allowing a plurality of wives, I think we should be more reasonable if we commended him for diminishing and restricting the number. I think too, that, as Moses allowed his people, for the hardness of their hearts, to put away their wives, and God denounced not polygamy when the patriarchs practised it, we should be more consistent as believers in the Scriptures if we admitted the permission of these practices to be more conducive to morality than their prohibition, among a people similar to the ancient Jews to whom Moses allowed such liberty. As to the privilege which Mohammad assumed to himself, of having a greater number of wives than he allowed to others, I have elsewhere remarked, that, in doing so, he may have been actuated by the want of male offspring rather than impelled by voluptuousness; he seems, however, to have been influenced by both these motives.

"On the subject of polygamy," says a recent writer who has deeply studied Muslim institutions and their effects, "a European has all the advantage in discussion with a Turkish woman, because her feelings are decidedly on the side of her antagonists; but then she has a tremendous power of reply, in the comparison of the practical effects of the two systems, and in the widely-spread rumours of the heartlessness and the profligacy of Europe.—All the convictions of our habits and laws stand in hostile array against the country where the principle of polygamy is admitted into the laws of the state; but yet, while we reproach Islamism with polygamy, Islamism may reproach us with practical polygamy, which, unsanctioned by law and reprobated by custom, adds degradation of the mind to dissoluteness of morals."—It should further be remarked, that, by sanctioning polygamy, Mohammad did not make the practice general: nay, he could not. It is a license for the hard-hearted, which restrains them from worse conduct, and in some cases, as already shewn, a resource for the tender-hearted. "The permission," observes the author just cited, "does not alter the proportions of men and women. While, therefore, the law of nature renders this practice an impossibility as regards the community, it is here still further restrained among the few who have the means of indulging in it, both by the domestic uneasiness that results from it, and by the public censure and reprobation of which it is the object."—I have remarked in a former work, that polygamy "is more rare among the higher and middle classes [in Egypt, and I believe in other Arab countries,] than it is among the lower orders; and it is not very common among the latter. A poor man may indulge himself with two or more wives, each of whom may be able, by some art or occupation, nearly to provide her own subsistence; but most persons of the higher and middle orders are deterred from doing so by the consideration of the expense and discomfort which they would incur. A man having a wife who has the misfortune to be barren, and being too much attached to her to divorce her, is sometimes induced to take a second wife, merely in the hope of obtaining offspring; and from the same motive, he may take a third, and a fourth; but fickle passion is the most evident and common motive both to polygamy and to repeated divorces. They are comparatively few who gratify this passion by the former practice. I believe that not more than one husband among twenty has two wives."

I hope I have shewn, that, though I consider polygamy as necessary in the constitution of Muslim society, to prevent a profligacy that would be worse than that which prevails to so great a degree in European countries, where parties are united in marriage after an intimate mutual acquaintance, I consider it as a necessary evil.—When two or more wives of the same man live together, or when they visit each other, feelings of jealousy are generally felt, and often manifested, and especially on the part of the wife or wives who cannot claim precedence by having been married before the other or others, or by reason of being more favoured by the husband. The wife first married usually enjoys the highest rank: therefore parents often object to giving a daughter in marriage to a man who has already another wife; and it frequently happens that the female who is sought in marriage objects to such a union. The law provides in some measure against the discomforts arising from polygamy, by giving to each wife a claim to a distinct lodging, affording conveniences for sleeping, cooking, &c.; and further enjoins the husband to be strictly impartial to his wives in every respect. But fruitfulness and superior beauty are qualifications that often enable a second, third, or fourth wife to usurp the place of the first; though in many cases, as I have remarked in another note, the lasting favourite is not the most handsome.

There are, however, many instances of sincere affection existing in the hearts of fellow-wives. The following story of two wives of the father of El-Jabartee, the modern Egyptian historian, related by himself, and of undoubted truth, is a pleasing example.—Speaking of the first of these two wives, the historian says,—

"Among her acts of conjugal piety and submission was this, that she used to buy for her husband beautiful concubine slaves, with her own wealth, and deck them with ornaments and apparel, and so present them to him, confidently looking to the reward and recompense which she should receive [in Paradise] for such conduct. He took, in addition to her, many other wives from among free women, and bought female slaves; but she did not in consequence conceive any of that jealousy which commonly affects women. Among other strange events which happened, was the following. When the subject of this memoir [the author's father] performed the pilgrimage, in the year 1156 (A. D. 1743-4), he became acquainted at Mekkeh, with the sheykh 'Omar El-Halabee, who commissioned him to purchase for him a white female slave, who should be a virgin, not arrived at womanhood, and having such and such other qualifications. So when he returned from the pilgrimage, he searched for female slaves among the slave-dealers, to choose from them such a one as was wanted, and ceased not until he found the object of his desire, and bought her. He brought her to his wife, above mentioned, to remain with her until he should send her with a person to whom he was commissioned to entrust her for the journey; and when the period at which she was to depart arrived, he informed his wife of it, that she might prepare the provisions for the way, and other necessities. But she said to him, 'I have conceived a great love for this maid, and I cannot endure separation from her: I have no children, and I have taken her as a daughter.' The girl also wept, and said, 'I will not part from my mistress, nor ever leave her.' 'Then what is to be done' he asked. She answered, 'I will pay her price from my own property, and do thou buy another.' He did so. She then emancipated the girl, gave her to him by a marriage-contract, prepared her paraphernalia, and furnished for her a separate apartment; and he took her as his wife in the year 65. The former wife could not bear to be separated from her even for an hour, although she had become her fellow-wife, and borne him children. In the year 82 before mentioned, the [emancipated] slave fell sick, and she [the first wife] fell sick on account of her [friend's] sickness. The illness increased upon both of them; and in the morning the slave arose, and looked at her mistress when she seemed about to die, and wept, and said, 'O my God and my Lord, if Thou hast decreed the death of my mistress, make my day to be before her day.' Then she lay down, and her disease increased, and she died the next night; and they wrapped her up by the side of her mistress. And her mistress awoke at the close of the night, and felt her with her hand, and began to say, 'Zeleeekhà! Zeleeekhà!' They said to her, 'She is asleep.' But she replied, 'My heart telleth me that she is dead: and I saw in my sleep what indicated this event.' They then said to her, 'May thy life be prolonged!' And when she had thus ascertained the event, she raised herself, and sat up, and said, 'No life remaineth to me after her.' And she wept and wailed until the day appeared, when they began to prepare for the speedy burial of the slave; and they washed the corpse before her, and carried it to the grave. Then she returned to her bed, and fell into the agonies of death, and died at the close of the day; and on the following day they carried her corpse to the grave in like manner.—This was one of the strangest of the things that I have witnessed and seen and remembered. My age at that time was fourteen years."

NOTE 85. "El-Amjad" signifies "the More, or the Most, Glorious."

NOTE 86. "El-As'ad" signifies "the More, or the Most, Fortunate, Prosperous, or Happy."

NOTE 87. I here omit an explanation which is of a nature to disgust every person of good taste. In this case, and in several others of a similar kind, the old version agrees with the original, being faithful to the latter when, to say the least, it is utterly unnecessary to be so, and unfaithful when fidelity is most desirable. He who is unacquainted with the original should be informed, that it contains many passages which seem as if they were introduced for the gratification of the lowest class of the auditors of a public reciter at a coffee-shop. These passages exhibit to us persons of high rank, both men and women, as characterized by a grossness which is certainly not uncommon among Arabs of the inferior orders; but this is all that I can venture to assert; for although there are numerous anecdotes which might be adduced with the view of justifying our original in the cases here alluded to, they are obviously of suspicious authority. It is highly probable that Háróon Er-Rasheed often exercised the wit of Abóo-Nuwás by relating to him exaggerated or even fictitious accounts of occurrences in his own harem; and, still more so, that the latter person, in reciting his anecdotes to his friends, disregarded truth in a much greater degree.

NOTE 88. See Note 8 in the present series.—By sending, with the letter, the silk strings of her hair, we are to understand that the lady designed to testify the most abject submission. The same meaning is conveyed in a more forcible manner by sending the hair itself. Thus, when Cairo was besieged by the Franks in the year of the Flight 564 (A. D. 1168), El-'Adid, the last Khaleefeh of the house of Fátiméh, sent letters to Noor-ed-Deen Mahmood, Sultán of Syria, imploring succour, and with them sent his women's hair, to shew their subjection and his own.

NOTE 89. This is one of the passages alluded to at the close of Note 8 in the present series.

NOTE 90. By "drinking of the anguish of another" is meant "partaking of his anguish by witnessing it." The same and a similar expression occur shortly afterwards, where the meaning is more obvious.

NOTE 91. The person here designated the "Treasurer" ("Kházindár," as generally pronounced,) is called in the Breslau edition "the Emeer Jendár," and in the old version, "an emeer called Giondar." Dr. Scott has converted "Giondar" into "Jehaun-dar." But "Jendár" is not a proper name. This term, more properly written "Jándár," was a title common to a class of officers under the Sultáns of Egypt, whose duty was to guard the door of the Sultán, to convey or enforce his orders with respect to emeers, and to guard the prison called the Zardakhánáh, in which persons of rank were confined. The Emeer Jándár was the chief of these officers.

It is important to remark, that the present work exhibits but a very imperfect acquaintance with the offices held under the Sultáns whose dominion was subverted by the Turkish conqueror Seleem. Such we should expect to be the case in a work either composed or remodelled after the Turkish conquest of Syria and Egypt, A. D. 1517.

NOTE 92. This prayer is addressed to God.

NOTE 93. When God desireth anything, He saith unto it, "Be," and it is.

NOTE 94. In the original, three pieces of poetry are here put into the mouth of El-As'ad. That which I have given is the second of them.

NOTE 95. The saráb (generally called by Europeans "mirage") is that remarkable vapour which is so often seen in the desert, tormenting the thirsty traveller by presenting the appearance of a lake. So complete is the illusion, that I have seen the images of objects situate within or beyond it distinctly reflected by its surface. — In the verse in which this vapour is mentioned, the word “kahal,” which I have rendered “the black-edged eyelid,” literally signifies “the natural blackness round the eye, resembling the artificial blackness which is produced by the powder called kohl.”

NOTE 96. This sentence I have inserted from the Breslau edition.

NOTE 97. A small oratory, with a niche indicating the direction of Mekkeh, is often seen in Muslim countries, by the side of a spring, a well, a reservoir, or a large water-jar which is daily replenished for the use of travellers. Sometimes it is designed also as a place of repose, being a small, roofed chamber, open towards the north.

NOTE 98. In the story of the Young King of the Black Islands, the Muslims, Christians, Jews, and Magians, who composed his subjects, are said to have been transformed, respectively, into white, blue, yellow, and red fish; and here a Magian is described with a red turban. When the Christians and Jews were compelled to distinguish themselves by wearing, respectively, blue and yellow turbans (as mentioned in Note 55 to Chapter ii.), and the white turban was made peculiar to the Muslims, the Samaritans were also compelled to wear red turbans; and our author appears to have made red the distinguishing colour of the Magians from this circumstance; for an Arab writer quoted by El-Makreezee, in his account of the Samaritans, says that the tenets of this latter people were a mixture of Judaism and Magism. — This explanation I think more probable than one which might be deduced from the Turkish term “Kizilbâsh,” or “Red-head,” a nickname applied by the Turks to a Persian, and so applied by the Persians themselves. It is said to have been derived from a red cap first worn by the Persian soldiers under the Shâh Ismâ’eel, about the commencement of the sixteenth century. I prefer the explanation first proposed because it would account for the distinctive colours of all the fish above mentioned.

NOTE 99. “Ghadbân” signifies “enraged,” or “angry.”

NOTE 100. The remainder of this paragraph is from the Breslau edition. — Here

I may mention that, in the old version, the old man orders his “daughters, Bostama and Cavama,” to undertake the office of torturing El-As’ad: in the Breslau edition, he is said to have so commissioned his “daughter Bustân and slave-girl Kâwâm.” This shews that he is the same person who is afterwards mentioned by the name of Bahrâm; which, in the Cairo edition, is not so clearly shewn. Agreeably with this edition, I have not here mentioned Bahrâm’s daughter; as I think that an incident at the close of the story is rendered needlessly improbable by describing her as the torturer of El-As’ad.

NOTE 101. — On the Magian Festivals of Fire. As the present tale exhibits scarcely any acquaintance with the religion of the Magians, I consider it most unnecessary to attempt any illustration of its allusions to the rites of that people. The “Blue Sea and the Mountain of Fire” I suppose to be purely imaginary. But the idea of the human sacrifice at a particular period of the year, on the occasion of “the Festival of the Fire” (as afterwards said), may have been derived from a vague notion of the rites of two Magian festivals. The first of these was celebrated in the month of Âdur, or Âzur, which (except in the middle ages of Persia, when the calendar was altered,) corresponded with November. The angel after whom this month was named “presided over fire; in consequence of which on the ninth, his name-day, the country blazed all around with flaming piles; whilst the Magi, by the injunction of Zoroaster, visited, with great solemnity, all the temples of that element throughout the empire, which, upon this occasion, were adorned and illuminated in a splendid manner. On this day it was reckoned a point of religion to pare the nails and to shave the hair, under the idea that, with these excrescences, they threw away, at the same time, all their sins and defects.” — In the following month (Dei), “on the 11th, or the angel’s day,” the other “great festival of fire was celebrated all over the kingdom; for the origin of which solemnity, a variety of traditional reasons have been handed down; one of them is curious: Winter, they say, having once, on the anniversary of that day, taken a fancy to come from hell, which was, it seems, too hot for him, their ancestors had lighted up immediately those piles of fire, to convince him that he had got into a still more infernal place, and force him again from earth to the shades of darkness. In order to improve the general scene of nocturnal splendour, on this occasion, it was usual for the King and his courtiers to set fire to large bunches of dry herbs, fastened to wild beasts and birds, who being then let loose, the fields, mountains, and the air itself were immediately in one universal temporary blaze, heightened often by the accidental firing of the neighbouring woods, to which those terrified animals naturally fled for shelter. . . . A custom similar to this prevailed even in England within this century; it having been customary, on Twelfth-night, in Shropshire and other places, to kindle bonfires on the mountaintops and other high grounds, as a farewell to winter, and a welcome to the spring. The 15th of this month was remarkable for another singular ceremony: they formed a number of images of paste or clay, representing those deceased personages whom they meant to honour, which they placed in the most public places, especially where many roads or streets met, and, after paying them great homage, burnt them with much formality."— Might not this last practice have given rise to a vulgar belief among the Arabs, that the Magians offered human sacrifices?

NOTE 102.— On the Soofees. On this characteristic passage, my sheykh remarks, in a marginal note, that it is usual with the Soofees thus to beg for an increase of the afflictions that they suffer.— The Soofees are so called either from the Arabic word "soof," signifying "wool," on account of their wearing woollen garments, or from the Greek word σοφός, because of their philosophical tenets. There is an order of Muslim darweeshes called Soofees, "who make profession of a more regular and more contemplative life than darweeshes in general; and many of this class have written books of spirituality, of devotion, and of contemplation, which mostly bear the title of 'Tasowwuf,' that is, of spiritual life." The first convent of this order in Egypt was founded by Saláh-ed-Deen, who is commonly called by European writers Saladin. But the title of Soofee is adopted by many who do not belong to this order of darweeshes; by those who lead a life of contemplation, and of philosophical religion; and of this class are many excellent men, who regard with especial veneration the moral and most other doctrines of the Gospel. Their grand principle seems to be love of God.— The Sunnee Soofees are in a great degree mystical and latitudinarian; but not so much so as the Soofees of the Persian sect.

NOTE 103. So in the Breslau edition and in the old version. In the Cairo edition, the distance by sea is said to be six months. The preferable reading is "four months," because this city is evidently the same as that in the neighbourhood of which Kamar-ez-Zemán resided with the gardener. The two princes are said to have performed in three months a journey which usually occupied a year; and we must therefore suppose that they did it in that comparatively short space of time by taking a route too arduous to be generally followed, and impracticable for caravans. This is implied by El-Amjad's remark on the first discovery of the city.

NOTE 104. The Muslims hold (and I believe adduce a saying of their Prophet in confirmation of their opinion) that it is improper to eat in a street or other place where many people are passing; because a person who does so cannot give to all who pass by and desire to partake; and when he has given all that he can spare, the remainder may be looked upon by an envious eye, which renders it injurious, or at least unprofitable.

NOTE 105. In the present day, in many parts of the East, the Frank Christian may dress as a Muslim: but formerly, Muslims were distinguished from all other persons, especially by the colour and form of the turban. The Eastern Christians and Jews, with few exceptions, are still distinguished by the turban, which is generally black or blue, or of a greyish, or light-brown, colour.— See Note 55 to Chapter ii., and Note 98 in the present series.

NOTE 106. The meaning of this is, "Thy beauty is continually increasing."

NOTE 107. See Note 59 in the present series.

NOTE 108. By "the thorns of lances," it is perhaps needless to state, that piercing eyes or eyelashes are meant.

NOTE 109. This sentence commences the thirty-eighth verse of the fourth chapter of the Kur-án. By "He whose name be exalted" we are always to understand God. The Muslim never quotes the Kur-án but as the word of God, and generally in doing so says, "He whose name be exalted hath said, in the Excellent Book,"— never mentioning the Prophet in this case unless he use some such phrase as this,

"God hath said by the tongue of his Prophet."

NOTE 110. The word which I render "flowers" (namely "sohbeh") also signifies "a branched candlestick, or candelabrum, with many candles." Either sense would be appropriate here; but in speaking of wine, it generally signifies "a bunch of flowers," which are often placed in a candlestick in the midst of the wine-serv-ice.

NOTE 111. The wooden lock which is in general use in Arabian countries for the doors of houses and chambers is described and figured in the Introduction to my work on the Modern Egyptians.

NOTE 112. See Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 113. In a MS. Arabic dictionary of my own composition I see that the meaning that I have given to "sidilleh" (a word that I do not find in any other dictionary) is that of "a long seat, or couch;" and accordingly, in a former instance I have rendered the plural of this word, with that of "mastabah" preceding it, by "benches of different kinds." In the present case, my sheykh has explained the plural of "sidilleh" by words signifying "places elevated a little, like the sufreh;" which last term is applied to "a kind of shelf or sill of stone," and "a bench or sofa." The term "sidilleh" is applied in Cairo to a slightly elevated recess, without a window; and to a platform of stone, for a deewán, generally about half a foot high.

NOTE 114. The clothes here mentioned are those which were usually worn at wine-parties.—See Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 115. The most appropriate meaning of "sufreh" here appears to be "a round cloth." A stool with a round tray upon it is also called a sufreh; and this term is applied to a round piece of leather, which serves as a table for meals, and which is usually spread on the ground; chiefly used by travellers, whence its name.

NOTE 116. This word is Persian and Turkish, and signifies "courageous," "bold," "a hero." It is pronounced by the Arabs as I have written it; by the Persians, "Bahádar;" and by the Turks, "Behádir." Turkish and Persian names became familiar to the Arabs in the times of the 'Abbásee Khaleefehs, and were still more so in later times.

NOTE 117. This is said to shew more strongly the disturbed state of his mind; for it is usual to put the feet into the shoes or slippers on stepping off the carpeted portion of the floor.

NOTE 118. "Bahrá'm" is a common Persian name. It is also a name of the planet Mars; and signifies "a king," "a sword," &c.

NOTE 119. See Note 100 in the present series.

NOTE 120. "Marjáneh" (vulg., "mur-jáneh"), in modern Arabic, signifies "a piece of coral." It also signifies "a small pearl," and "a kind of spring pot-herb."

NOTE 121. This sentence I insert from the Breslau edition.

NOTE 122. Here, again, I insert a few words from the Breslau edition, ending with "El-Moatarr."

NOTE 123. "El-Moatarr" signifies "the Poor," "the Indigent," "He who dares not ask for what he needs." It is a name assumed as the opposite of "El-As'ad," or "the Most Fortunate." In the old version, it is written "Motar," and rendered "Devoted to be sacrificed."

NOTE 124. "These two verses are by one of the sect of the Murjiáh, or Murjis, and one of the Sunnees (or orthodox Muslims) answered them, and said,—

'If God protect him, no moisture will touch him, and he need not care for being hand-bound, and thrown;
But if the Lord have decreed that he shall be drowned, he will be drowned though he be cast upon a desert.'

Thus my sheykh comments upon the two verses to which this note relates. The tale itself also shews their fallacy, by a subsequent incident (of no very improbable nature) in the history of El-As'ad. In their place are inserted, in the Breslau edition, with some slight variations and errors, the verses of which a translation has been given in a former tale, and the same appears to be the case in the manuscript from which Galland translated.

NOTE 125. The drum and pipe are the instruments most commonly used in Arabian countries on occasions of festivity; as in the procession of a bride or bridegroom, that of a boy about to be circumcised, and that of a pilgrim approaching his home on his return from the holy places.

NOTE 126. The burial grounds adjacent to Arab towns generally contain a number of dome-crowned structures erected over graves, which often afford shelter to benighted travellers.

NOTE 127. "Bustán" signifies "a garden."

NOTE 128. This is said in allusion to his name, which signifies "more, or most, fortunate."

NOTE 129. See Note 9 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 130. In the edition of Breslau, this story occupies a different place, commencing the seventh volume.

NOTE 131. "El-Koofeh" is the city commonly called by European writers "Kufah" and "Cufa," situate on the west bank of the Euphrates. It was founded in the reign of the Khaleefeh 'Omar, and was a famous seat of Arabian learning.—The inhabitants of El-Koofeh were a people difficult to please, always ready to revolt, and continually complaining of their Governors. A party of them one day urging a complaint, to the Khaleefeh El-Ma-moon, against one of his officers, one of them abused this person in such gross terms that the Khaleefeh took his officer's part, and highly praised him for the strict justice which he rendered to every one. Upon this, one of the complainants replied that all which the Khaleefeh said was very true, and that all the accusations which his townsmen had advanced against the officer were pure calumnies; yet, as it was necessary that justice should be rendered everywhere, it was not right that the people of El-Koofeh alone should enjoy the advantage of possessing such a man, while all the other provinces of the Empire were deprived of him. "Cause thy people, then, O our lord," he continued, "to praise and bless thee equally, by sending him else where."

NOTE 132. "Neamet-Allah" signifies "the Boon of God."

NOTE 133. The meaning of "Towfeek" is "a causing to be prosperous, or agreeable," &c.

NOTE 134. "Saad" signifies "prosperity," "happiness," "good fortune."

NOTE 135. "Noam" is synonymous with "Saad." The name was changed that it might agree with that of Neamet-Allah.

NOTE 136. In "Neamet-Allah" and similar names, the latter word is often dropped. In this case, the final t in the former is changed into h.

NOTE 137. That is, each of them was in some respects more beautiful than the other.

NOTE 138. I here put "four" instead of "nine," as the sequel requires it.

NOTE 139. "Zeyd" and "'Amr" are here used as fictitious names, in the same manner as they are by the Arab grammarians.

NOTE 140. — Of El-Hajjáj and his Character. El-Hajjáj the son of Yoosuf Eth-Thakafee was Governor of the Hejáz and of the Arabian 'Erák under 'Abd-El-Melik and his son El-Weleed, the fifth and sixth Khaleefehs of the house of Umeiyeh, for a space of about twenty years, until the period of his death, which happened in the year of the Flight 95 (A. D. 713-14). He was highly celebrated for his eloquence and courage, but execrated for his tyranny. His cruelty, however, has perhaps been exaggerated by the Shiya'ees, or Shee'ees, to whom he rendered himself especially odious; and I do not place entire reliance on the correctness of the following illustrations of his character, which I insert on account of their singular nature.

In his last illness, "he ventured to consult an astrologer whether the position of the stars, that year, prognosticated the demise of any person in power. To which the astrologer replied, that a prince would shortly die, who either bore or had borne the appellation of Kuleyb; and El-Hajjáj confessing that his mother had in his infancy been accustomed to address him by that name (puppy, perhaps), the astrologer rashly declared that the person whose death was indicated could be no other than himself. 'At least thou shalt precede me,' said El-Hajjáj, and the unfortunate wizard was ordered to be immediately despatched by the attendants.—This ferocious tyrant, whose memory has been indeed loaded with sufficient obloquy by the Shiya'ees, and whom he on his part never ceased to persecute with unsparing vengeance, expired, at the age of fifty-four, about the twenty-fifth day of the month of Ramadán, in the ninety-fifth year of the Hijrah. Some time previous to his death he complained that his bowels were lacerated by dogs; and a roll of flexible silk being passed down his throat, by the physicians who attended, it was drawn up, covered with vermin. And though it does not appear to have rendered his government at all more palatable, it is recorded, probably as a proof of his boundless prodigality in the public expenditure, that among the disciples of the Kur-án, he was the first who, on one occasion, displayed a thousand tables for the entertainment of the people; or in a single donation disbursed a million of dirhems. — Exclusive of those who perished in battle, the amount of whom could be estimated by Him alone who knows all things, there fell by the arbitrary mandates of El-Hajjá, not less than one hundred and twenty thousand persons. Nevertheless, in a dream, in which he is said to have appeared to some one a short time after his death, he is made to declare, that, though for each of this numerous list of the victims of his fury, divine justice was satisfied with inflicting on him the punishment of a single death, yet that for the execution of Sa'eed alone, he was condemned to suffer seventy times the agony of dissolution. There were, after all, found in the different prisons of his government, when Providence thought fit to relieve mankind from his oppressions, no less than thirty thousand men, and twenty thousand women; many of these confined in that species of prison invented by himself, without roof; in which, alternately exposed to the scorching rays of the sun, and the vicissitudes of cold, heat, and rain, the unhappy victims were left to suffer under every variety of pain and wretchedness."

NOTE 141. It is a common custom of the religious devotees among the Muslims to wear woollen garments.

NOTE 142. It is a custom of many Muslim devotees to hang to the neck, in several circumvolutions, a string of many hundreds of beads. The object is either to employ these beads in repeating certain ejaculations in praise of God, or to make others believe that the wearer is accustomed so to employ them. — See the forty-fourth note of the present series. — A string of a thousand beads, and the use to which it is applied, have been mentioned in Note 15 to Chapter iv.

The whole description of the costume, manners, and expressions, of the hypocritical-old woman in this tale is admirably just. It is perfectly applicable to persons who may be seen occasionally in the streets of Cairo in the present day, though probably the character of many of these may be sincere. The female devotees who thus distinguish themselves are very few in comparison with the male. — I should also add that the conduct of Noam towards the old woman described in this story is consistent with that of the generality of Arab women in similar cases. Indeed the story altogether is as true a picture of Arab manners as any of the present collection.

NOTE 143. In some Arab houses, in one or more of the apartments, a niche is formed or painted, in or upon one of the walls, indicating the direction of Mekkeh. But more commonly a prayer-carpet answers the same purpose, its pattern presenting the form of a niche, the point of which is turned towards Mekkeh, so that a visitor need not ask of his host in what direction he is to turn his face in prayer.

NOTE 144. These words are the commencement of the seventieth verse of the twenty-fifth chapter of the Kur-án. They follow a denunciation against the wicked, and Noam is supposed to know what precedes them, as well as the remainder of the verse, which is this: — "for unto them God will change their evil works into good; and God is ready to forgive, and merciful."

NOTE 145. By "the sheykh" we are here to understand the saints, or persons who devote themselves to religious exercises. And "the holy places" mentioned in the same passage are those mosques and other buildings containing the tombs or cenotaphs of saints; such buildings being frequently visited by men and women, in the belief that the prayers there offered up are especially efficacious. — See Note 63 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 146. By this is meant that she was a descendant of the Kings of El-Koofeh; but the author was probably ignorant that there were no such Kings. If by "Kings" are meant merely "Governors," he is still in error; for the Governors of El-Koofeh were, from its foundation, Muslims; and their daughters could not be sold as slaves.

NOTE 147. — On Astrological Calculations. My sheykh remarks, in a marginal note, that the calculation here spoken of is founded upon the numerical values of the letters composing the name. Thus, Noam (in Arabic) consists of three letters, Noon, 'Eyn, and Meem: Noon is 50; 'Eyn, 70; and Meem, 40: the sum of the three is therefore 160; subtract from this 9 and 9, or 12 and 12, and so on until there remains either 12 or less than 12: the remainder is the number of the sign of the Zodiac that influences the person to whom the name belongs: 1, being Aries; 2, Taurus; 3, Gemini; and so on.

I have mentioned two other modes of making calculations of the same kind; but from the above it appears, that I should have stated, in explaining the former of those two modes, that the calculation is sometimes (and perhaps generally) founded upon the numerical values of the letters composing only the name of the person whose sign is sought, and that then the number of the sign is obtained in the manner above described. The reader has seen that two different results may be obtained according to my sheykh's directions. He does not state whether it is the general practice to subtract 9 or 12 from the number of the name.

NOTE 148. "O brother of the Persians" (yâ akhâ-l-Furs) is synonymous with "O Persian." "O brother of the Arabs" is a common expression used in addressing an Arab.

NOTE 149. Arab shopkeepers very often make their calculations by writing on the palm of the hand.

NOTE 150. "Soadâ" and "Juml" are fictitious names of women. They are chosen for the sake of a play upon words, which I could not preserve in the translation.

NOTE 151.—On the Koofee Character. The Koofee character (generally called by European writers "Cufic") was so termed from the city of El-Koofeh, in which without doubt, it originated, and which was founded in the seventeenth year of the Flight. Some papyri lately discovered in Egypt shew that the character employed by the Arabs of the Hejâz before this differed little from that which superseded the Koofee, and which has generally been employed by the Arabs to the present day. But the character, as well as the language (called Hemyeree, or Himyaritic,) used in El-Yemen, and probably in several other parts of Arabia, before the time of the Prophet, is unknown. My learned friend M. Fulgence Fresnel has discovered a language still spoken in some parts of El-Yemen, a dialect of the ancient Hemyeree; and it may be hoped that his discovery will be productive of important results, and be of value in biblical literature.

A flexuous Koofee character, an ornamental style which came into use in the fourth century of the Flight, has been erroneously called, by many European writers, the Carmatic character, and supposed to have been invented by the nation or people called the Karmatees. This mistake seems to have originated in a misinterpretation of the word "karmatah," which is defined in the Kâmoos as signifying "a diminutive style of writing and a close [or short] step [in walking]."

NOTE 152. It is related in the Soorat Yoosuf (the twelfth chapter of the Kur-ân), that Jacob's eyes became white with mourning for Joseph; but that the latter, when he had discovered himself to his brethren in Egypt, gave to them his inner garment, desiring them to throw it on his father's face; and when this was done, Jacob recovered his eyesight.—This garment, we are told in the Commentary of the Jelâleyn, "was the shirt of Ibrâheem, which he wore when he was thrown into the fire. It was on his [Yoosuf's] neck in the well; and it was from Paradise. Jibreel or [Gabriel] ordered him to send it, and said that in it was its odour, [i. e. the odour of Paradise,] and it should not be thrown on any one afflicted [with a disease] but he should be restored to health."

NOTE 153. For the insertion of the words enclosed between crotchets in this sentence, I have the authority of my sheykh.

NOTE 154. See Note 65 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 155. In my original it is here added, "and her name was Noam," which would explain what the Khaleefeh's sister wished as yet to conceal.

NOTE 156. Marjâneh, we may suppose, came thither with him.

NOTE 157. The words "And God is all-knowing" are added by the narrator to imply that the story may perhaps be not entirely true!

NOTES TO CHAPTER ELEVENTH

NOTE 1. This story is in the edition of Breslau, as well as in that of Cairo, from which I translate it. In the former, it occupies the next place to the story of Neameh and Noam. It appears to be comprised also in the MS. of Von Hammer; but with a title not exactly the same; for in a list of the contents of his MS., prefixed to Trébutien's "Contes Inédits des Mille et une Nuits," I find, in the place corresponding with that in which the story of 'Alá-ed-Deen Abu-sh-Shámát occurs in the Cairo edition, a tale entitled "Aladdin le père des Envieux," with the words "Traduit par Caussin" added. Caussin's translation of this story, I believe, forms part of an edition of which I have in vain endeavoured to procure a copy, published in Paris, by Lenormant, in 1806.

In presenting the story of 'Alá-ed-Deen Abu-sh-Shámát to the English reader, I may give my opinion that it is a purely Arab tale, of Egyptian character, either wholly composed, or in some parts altered, since the conquest of Egypt by the Turkish Sultán Selem; faithfully describing Arab manners and customs, as existing during the last three or four centuries.

NOTE 2. That Cairo is here meant, as usual, by "Misr" (vulg. "Masr"), is proved afterwards, towards the close of the story, by the mention of a street.

NOTE 3. "Sháh-Bandar" is a title given to the chief or general syndic, of the merchants of Cairo; but in some parts of the East it is applied to the receiver-general of duties or tribute.

NOTE 4. It is a duty of the Muslim to perform a lustration of the whole person before the congregational prayers of Friday.

NOTE 5. To utter an ejaculation of this kind on looking at his face in a glass is a usual custom of a Muslim; but I believe it is more common to say in this case, "O God, bless our lord Mohammad!"—a person being often fearful even of the influence of his own admiring glance; for these words are generally used to counteract the influence of the evil eye, which is always dreaded when a look of admiration is cast.—When a person is about to leave the bath, the barber's glass is presented to him, and upon it he places the money that he has to pay.

NOTE 6. The allusion here is to Death, or the Angel of Death.

NOTE 7. This custom prevails in the present day among the women. They say to the infant, "In the name of the Prophet and of his cousin (the son of his paternal uncle) 'Alee!" The object is, to preserve the child from the influence of the Jinn.

NOTE 8. This, also, is done with the view of preventing any mischief from the Jinn.—The "tekbeer" is the exclamation of "God is most great!" and the "adán," or "adhán," the call to prayer. See Note 24 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 9.—On the Customs observed on the Seventh Day after the Birth of a Child. The messes which are distributed after the birth of a child I have described in my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. ii. ch. xiv. They are generally prepared on the fourth or fifth day after the birth. In the work above mentioned, in the same chapter, I have described the customs observed on the seventh day, and I must here repeat, nearly in the same words, what I have there said on this subject.—In the families of the higher classes, professional female singers are hired to entertain a party of ladies, friends of the infant's mother, who visit her on this occasion, in the hareem; or a concert of instrumental music, or a recitation of the whole of the Kur-án, is performed below by men. The mother, attended by the midwife, being seated on a chair which is the property of the latter, the child is brought, wrapped in a handsome shawl, or something costly; and, to accustom it to noise, that it may not be frightened afterwards by the music, and other sounds of mirth, one of the women takes a brass mortar, and strikes it repeatedly with the pestle, as if pounding. After this, the child is put into a sieve, and shaken; it being supposed that this operation is beneficial to its stomach. Next, it is carried through all the apartments of the hareem, accompanied by several women or girls; each of whom bears a number of wax candles, sometimes of various colours, cut in two, lighted, and stuck into small lumps of paste of henná, upon a small round tray. At the same time, the midwife, or another female, sprinkles, upon the floor of each room, a mixture of salt with seed of the fennel-flower, or salt alone, which has been placed during the preceding night at the infant's head: saying, as she does this, "The salt be in the eye of the person who doth not bless the Prophet!" or "The foul salt be in the eye of the envier!" This ceremony of the sprinkling of salt is considered a preservative, for the child and mother, from the evil eye; and each person present should say, "O God, bless our lord Mohammad!" The child, wrapped up, and placed on a fine mattress, which is sometimes laid on a silver tray, is shewn to each of the women present, who looks at his face, says, "O God, bless our lord Mohammad! God give thee long life!" &c., and usually puts an embroidered handkerchief, with a gold coin (if pretty or old the more esteemed) tied up in one of the corners, on the child's head, or by its side. This giving of handkerchiefs and gold is considered as imposing a debt, to be repaid by the mother, if the donor should give her the same occasion; or as the discharge of a debt for a similar offering. The coins are generally used, for some years, to decorate the head-dress of the child. After these presents for the child, others are given for the midwife. During the night before the seventh-day's festivity, a water-bottle full of water (a dórak in the case of a boy, and a kulleh in that of a girl), with an embroidered handkerchief tied round the neck, is placed at the child's head while it sleeps. This, with the water it contains, the midwife takes, and puts upon a tray and presents it to each of the women, who put presents of money for her into the tray.—In the evening, the husband generally entertains a party of his friends.

NOTE 10. That is, Where is the new-born child, which is God's deposit? For he belongeth to God, who hath intrusted him to us; and when He desireth to take him, He taketh him by death. The poet saith,—

Wealth and families are nought but deposits, and a day must come when deposits shall be restored.

NOTE 11. The daughter is named by her mother; and the son, by his father.

NOTE 12. "Alá-ed-Deen" signifies "the Nobility of the Religion;" and "Abu-sh-Shámát," "Having Moles" (literally, "Father of the Moles"). The former is changed by the vulgar into "Aláy-ed-Deen," and is generally written by us "Aladdin."—The custom of deriving a name from an omen is still general among the Bedaweese.

NOTE 13. Many a house in Cairo has a trap-door in some apartment (often in a cupboard), opening into a secret chamber, or into a passage by which the tenant may make his escape in any case of danger.

NOTE 14. When a youth has attained to years of discretion, and begun to say his prayers and to acquit himself of other religious duties, he is believed to be less obnoxious to the influence of the eye: still more so, when his beard is grown; for then he is less likely to be admired, or envied, or coveted. Many Arabs preserve their children from the public gaze with a care almost as ridiculous as that of which 'Alá-ed-Deen Abu-sh-Shámát is said to have been the object. On this subject I have made some remarks in Note 24 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 15. When a person admires a child or any other object, he should say, "In the name of Allah!" or utter some similar words, as "Má sháa-lláh!" (explained in Note 81 in this series). Such expressions are believed to prevent and to counteract the influence of the eye.

NOTE 16. These are metaphorical expressions, alluding to the careful manner in which the boy had been reared, and to his gentility.

NOTE 17. See Note 20 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 18. Since Egypt has been under the dominion of foreign princes, the great officers of the state have generally been, almost exclusively, foreigners. On this account, the Sháh-Bandar of the merchants is here called "Sultán of the Sons of the Arabs," being the chief man of substance among them. The term "'Arab" is now given only to the Bedaweese, or Arabs of the desert: the townspeople and villagers call themselves "Owlad el-'Arab," or "Sons of the Arabs."

NOTE 19. This is a saying of the Prophet.

NOTE 20. The "Nakeeb" of a sook, or market, is an officer under its Sheykh, or syndic. The Sháh-Bandar, being chief of all the merchants, was of course chief of the market in which he had his shop.

NOTE 21. It is customary to recite the Fátchah (or opening chapter of the Kur-án) on making for the first time, and on renewing, a profession of submission to the authority of another, as well as in concluding a bargain, and on various other occasions.

NOTE 22. "Simsim," here used as a surname, is the name of the grain which we call sesame.

NOTE 23. "Aseede" is a kind of custard, made with boiling water, flour, clarified butter, and honey.

NOTE 24. See Note 16 to Chapter x.

NOTE 25. The word which I render "pavilion" is "kasr." This word is used to signify a palace; a mansion; and a pavilion (or a piece of building, or set of apartments, isolated, or only connected with another piece of building on one side; or an upper room, generally isolated, or nearly so): the same as the Turkish "kyúshk," generally called by us "kiosk" and "kiosque." The term "pavilion," when used in this work, except when it signifies "a large tent," may be understood in either of the senses in which it is explained above.

NOTE 26. Among the Arabs, it is very seldom that a beardless youth, in genteel society, can be persuaded to eat with men, unless with those who are much inferior to him in rank. That this is a result of an education which inculcates an affectionate respect for elders, and superiors in station, is evident to every person familiar with Muslim society; for he will often hear a servant address his master by the appellation of father. In the tale upon which I am commenting, a servant of 'Alá-ed-Deen becomes his adopted father. 'Alá-ed-Deen disobeys him on one occasion; but his doing so is an exception to a general rule. The kind of respect shewn by Muslims to parents and other elders, and to masters, excited my high admiration during my residence among the Arabs. This respect of servants for masters is attributable in a great measure to the occasional presents which the former receive from the latter. Mr. Urquhart has well observed, "The habit of irregular remuneration, in lieu of fixed, invariable, and actionable wages, produces a difference of mental habits, as regards servants and masters, that I am sure is not to be understood through description; and yet every day you see Europeans, those men who affect such comprehensive views and such powers of logic, reviling the habit of giving presents, not perceiving that this practice leads to the preservation of those interesting domestic relations which I conceive to be the greatest lesson, political and moral, that is presented to us by the Eastern world." The Muslim servant generally feels far greater respect for his master, though he often shews less, than the European.

NOTE 27. Here, in the original, is introduced a character of a disgusting description, and unnecessary to the carrying on of the story.

NOTE 28. The appellation of "Akkám" is here applied to a person who ties and loads camels and other beasts of burden. It is also often applied to one who has the charge of the tents and baggage.

NOTE 29. The meaning is, This is not my time; for I am grown old.

NOTE 30. "Mukaddam" signifies "one placed before, or over, others; a superior, chief, or overseer."

NOTE 31. The kind of "covering" here mentioned is placed over the oblong monument that is erected over the grave of a saint; and is like the covering of the Kaabeh, at Mekkeh. 'Abd-El-Kádir El-Geelánee was a very famous saint, and founder of a celebrated order of Dervishes called the Kádireeyeh, who died at Baghdád, in the year of the Flight 561 (A. D. 1165-6). The Sháh-Bandar is said to have bought a covering for him because his son was going to Baghdád, where this saint is buried; and by carrying with him this offering, he might hope to obtain the saint's favour and intercession.—A new covering for the Kaabeh is sent from Cairo every year with the great caravan of pilgrims: it is carried in procession through that city, and is believed to be one of the chief means of procuring safety to the attendants during their arduous and dangerous journey.—The reader needs not to be informed that camels are the beasts generally employed in Arabian countries to carry the baggage on long journeys: but mules are preferred by the rich, when camels are not necessary.

NOTE 32. The festival here alluded to is similar to those periodical festivals which I have described in Note 63 to Chapter iii., and further illustrated by Note 37 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 33. The "Ráfidees" are the Mohammedan sect of the Shiyá'ees, or Shee'ees; the followers of 'Alee; who are regarded by the Sunnees as heretics. The principal point wherein they differ from the Sunnees is their denying the right of the first three Khaleefehs, Aboo-Bekr, 'Omar, and 'Othmán; asserting the only legitimate successors of the Prophet to be 'Alee and his' descendants, called by them their Imáms; the twelfth and last of whom (El-Mahdee) they believe to be still living, though invisible. The Shiya'ee faith' became the national religion of Persia about the commencement of the sixteenth century of our era, under the Sháh Ismá'eel, the founder of the Safee Dynasty; and since that period (a period with which the character of the story of 'Alá-ed-Deen Abush-Shámát appears best to agree), the adjacent territories of Sunnee princes and governors have always been coveted, and often invaded, by the Ráfiidees. The first war between the 'Osmánlee Sunnees under the Sultán Seelem, and the Persian Shiya'ees under the Sháh above mentioned, occasioned the conquest of Syria and Egypt by the former monarch; for though the inhabitants of these countries were Sunnees, they were in alliance with the Sháh Ismá'eel.

NOTE 34. A Sakkà is a water-carrier, or a person who has the charge of supplying water.

NOTE 35. "O thy blessing!" is an invocation for supernatural aid, which is generally signified by the word "blessing" when it is employed with reference to a saint. The hand afterwards mentioned is to be understood as that of Seyyidee 'Abd-El-Kádir, or as the result of a miracle performed by him.

NOTE 36. This prayer is addressed not to Seyyidee 'Abd-El-Kádir, but to God.

NOTE 37. The Seyyideh Nefeeseh, who was the great-granddaughter of the Imám El-Hasan, was a very celebrated saint, and many miracles are related to have been performed by her. Her tomb, which is greatly venerated, is in a mosque in a southern suburb of Cairo.

NOTE 38. The meaning is, Thou wast always swearing by divorce, as though it were thy mus-haf (or copy of the Kur-án) in which thou wast constantly reading.

NOTE 39. "El-'Oodeeyeh" is derived from "ood," which signifies "wood," and particularly "aloes-wood," and also "a lute," &c. As Zubeydeh was very skilful in playing on the lute, I think that "El-'Oodeeyeh" here signifies "the Lute-player." My sheykh has remarked, in a marginal note, "Probably she was so called because her odour was sweet, like that of aloes-wood;" but I find the term "oodeeyeh" used to signify "a female lute-player" in the Breslau edition of the Thousand and One Nights (for instance, in vol. vii. p. 205,) instead of the more proper term "Owwádeh."

NOTE 40. I have before mentioned that when a Muslim has divorced his wife three times, or by a triple divorce expressed in one sentence, he cannot take her again, unless by her own consent and by a new contract, and after another man has consummated a marriage with her and divorced her. When a man is employed to do this, he is called a "mustahall" or "mustahill," or a "mohallil:" but such a proceeding is regarded by all respectable persons as disgraceful, and is clearly contrary to the spirit of the law, which has ordained this consequence of a third or triple divorce as a check upon the husband, and as an indulgence to the wife. As I am not desirous of expatiating here on this subject, if any reader require further information respecting it, I beg to refer him to my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. vi. I have there mentioned a plan which is sometimes pursued to defeat the mustahall if he refuses to divorce. The wife also may withhold her consent to a reunion with her former husband, unless she is not of age, which we must understand to have been Zubeydeh's case. A girl who is not of age may be married by her father or other lawful guardian to whom he pleases.

NOTE 41. This impudent avowal of the design is contrary to the law; but there are doubtless Kádees who would listen to such a proposition. The ten thousand pieces of gold which 'Alá-ed-Deen was required to pay in case of his not divorcing, we are to understand as constituting that portion of the dowry which is usually paid before concluding the marriage-contract; for the remainder is not paid but on the occasion of a divorce, or from the property which the husband leaves at his death. But if 'Alá-ed-Deen divorced his wife at the time promised, no dowry was to be required of him.

NOTE 42. The Prophet denied the communication of diseases from one person to another; but said, "Run from the person afflicted with elephantiasis as you would from a tiger:" yet he himself took hold of the hand of a person who had that disease, and put it into a dish out of which he was eating, and said, "I depend upon God."—On this subject see Note 5 to Chapter i.

NOTE 43. This is the thirty-sixth Chapter of the Kur-án. It is one which is very frequently recited.

NOTE 44. By "the family of Dáood" is meant Dáood (or David) himself, agreeably with a common form of speech. On David's recitation of the Psalms, see Note 18 to Chapter i.

NOTE 45. This expression, according to my sheykh, alludes to the appearance of the veins in the midst of the wrist, dividing it as the spine does the back.

NOTE 46. The raven is regarded as an omen of separation.

NOTE 47. In the original, "nusf fad-dah." The same coin is also called simply "nusf," and vulgarly "nuss." See Note 17 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 48. The "Sháhids" of a Kádee's court are officers whose business is to hear and write the statements of the cases to be submitted for judgment. The same term is also applied to witnesses.

NOTE 49. "Efendee" is a Turkish title given to judges, ministers of religion, learned men, writers, and others. It is here improperly applied to the Kádee of an Arabian city at a period when that city had not become subject to Turkish dominion.

NOTE 50. In the original, the chords are said to have called out, O Dáood!—See above, Note 44.

NOTE 51. It is a common custom of Arab musicians to commence a piece slowly, and afterwards, as if becoming excited, to perform with a rapid measure. The word which I have rendered "the more rapid part" (agreeably with an explanation given by my sheykh) also signifies "trilling" or "quavering."

NOTE 52. By the term "lyric songs" I render the Arabic word "muweshshahát," plural of "muweshshah." This word is used, it appears, by the Persians, to signify an acrostic; but I have heard, and possess copies of, many Arabic poems so entitled, none of which is of this character; they are poems in stanzas; all the stanzas of the same muweshshah agreeing in the last rhyme, or the last two or more rhymes. In many instances, all the stanzas of the same poem end with two pairs of hemistichs rhyming alternately; the preceding hemistichs of each stanza also rhyming alternately, but the rhymes of these being different in different stanzas. This kind of poem is generally sung.

NOTE 53. Abou-Nuwás was a celebrated poet and wit, who stood high in the favour of Hároon Er-Rasheed. He was surnamed "Abou-Nuwás" from his having two long locks of hair which hung down upon his shoulders. He died (according to Abu-l-Fidá) in the year of the Flight 195, aged fifty-nine years.

NOTE 54. So in the Breslau edition, both here and where the dowry is next mentioned. In the Cairo edition, in both cases, fifty thousand.

NOTE 55. "Seleem" (generally written by European authors "Selim") signifies "sound," "safe," "entire," &c.—The inappropriate style of this letter seems to be intentional.

NOTE 56. Until he had paid that portion of the dowry which he had agreed to give in case of his refusing to divorce, his marriage was not lawful.

NOTE 57. It often happens in Cairo (as my sheykh mentions in a marginal note), that when a person arrives from a journey, his friends say to him, "Make an entertainment for us as a gratuity for thy safety" (haláwet es-seláme): so also when a person recovers from a sickness, and on other occasions. I was often required there to comply with this custom.

NOTE 58. What I have said in the fiftieth note of the present series applies also to this passage.

NOTE 59. "May thy head long strive (or, literally, May thy head [long] 'live with respect to, or in comparison of,) such-a-one!" is a common form of speech used in announcing a person's death; for, in communicating any bad news, it is a general custom among the Arabs to greet the individual addressed with some kind of salutation. It is meant that the person here mentioned was one of the Khaleefeh's appointed boon-companions. I use the term "boon-companion" for the Arabic "nedeem," which properly signifies "a cup-companion," but is employed in a more extended sense, applied to one who is a regular associate on occasions of conviviality or diversion; generally a poet, wit, musician, or any other who is an amusing companion, or a favourite.

NOTE 60. "Raees es-Sitteen" signifies "Chief of the Sixty;" and I believe it is improperly used here as the title of some great officer of the state. In the Breslau edition we find, in its place, a title which appears to me still more improper, namely, "Bâsh es-Sitteen Sultân," or "Chief of the Sixty Sultâns;" and the palaces of the Sixty Sultâns are afterwards mentioned. "Raees es-Sitteen" seems to be of similar import to "Emeer 'Asharah," "Emeer Miâh," &c., which we meet with in the histories of the Memlook Sultâns, signifying "Emeer of Ten Memlooks," "— of a Hundred Memlooks," &c.; the chief of hired soldiers being commonly called "Mukaddam."

NOTE 61. Shaking the handkerchief is a common signal for the dispersion of an assembly.

NOTE 62. The poet calls the bier "curving" (literally "humpbacked") "in allusion to the bier of the Arabs [i. e. of the Bedawees]; for they used to carry the dead upon cords interwoven between two poles, so that the corpse lay depressed within them."

NOTE 63. The Khaleefeh's making this motion to welcome 'Alâ-ed-Deen was a proof of most extraordinary condescension.

NOTE 64. See Note 21 to Chapter vii.

NOTE 65. The kind of litter here mentioned is the takhtrawân, described in Note 8 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 66. From this we must infer, that when 'Alâ-ed-Deen heard Koot-el-Kuloob perform on the lute in the Khaleefeh's palace, she was concealed from him by a curtain, or a screen of lattice-work, in accordance with usual custom.

NOTE 67. "Khâtoon," here used as a proper name, is a Persian and Turkish word, signifying "a lady" and "a matron."

NOTE 68. "Habazlam" and "Bazâzah" are, I believe, words of no meaning; but chosen for the uncouthness of their sound, as composing a suitable name for an uncouth person.

NOTE 69. This is a metaphorical expression, signifying the rushing headlong into peril.

NOTE 70. "Yâsemeen," or "yâsimeen," signifies "jasmine."

NOTE 71. This is explained by the note immediately preceding.

NOTE 72. "He would steal the Kohl from the eye" is a phrase often used to denote wonderful expertness in thieving. — See Note 34 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 73. See Note 39 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 74. On the oath of divorce, see Note 48 to Chapter viii., Note 40 in the present series, and Note 39 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 75. This was done in order to fulfil the Khaleefeh's oath. Arabs often have recourse to shifts of this kind in similar cases.

NOTE 76. Respecting benj, see Note 46 to Chapter ii. — The following remarks by the celebrated Von Hammer, who regards the benj as hyoscyamus (or henbane), should have been there added. "'Bendj,' the plural of which in Coptic is 'nibendj,' is without doubt the same plant as the 'nepenthe,' which has hitherto so much perplexed the commentators of Homer. Helen evidently brought the nepenthe from Egypt, and bendj is there still reputed to possess all the wonderful qualities which Homer attributes to it."

NOTE 77. The "durkâ'ah" is the depressed portion of the paved floor. See Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 78. I do not remember to have found this custom mentioned in any other Arabic work; but Mr. Salamé, whom I have consulted on the subject, has informed me of a similar custom among the Turks. The billets of the tribute exacted from unbelievers have occasionally been of red paper, and the issuing of these has spread consternation among the tributaries; red being the colour significant of anger, as white and black (or blue) are, respectively, the colours appropriated to joy and mourning. But red, among the Arabs, was certainly not always indicative of anger; for Arabs at carousals used to wear dresses of this colour, and of yellow, and green: and red dresses are very commonly worn by them. Their princes, however, may have been accustomed to exhibit the striking and dramatic spectacle described by our author; which, I conceive, may have been more effective than any words could be.

NOTE 79. In the description of this rod or staff in the Cairo edition, there is an error: I therefore follow the edition of Breslau. I suppose this kind of rod to have been employed for the purpose of inducing a belief that it possessed some magical property.

NOTE 80. I have inserted the word "surnamed," as the Khaleefeh is afterwards said to have surnamed 'Alá-ed-Deen "the Trusty and Faithful."

NOTE 81. The words which I render "Wonderful is Allah's will!" (Má sháalláh!) are sometimes used to signify literally "What God hath willed:" in other cases, as in the present instance, "What hath God willed!" i. e. "How wonderful is the event that God hath brought to pass!"

NOTE 82. "Ez-Zeebak" is a surname, or nickname, signifying "quicksilver." Many traditional stories of extraordinary feats said to have been performed by 'Alee Ez-Zeebak are related in Cairo. I believe that there really was a famous thief so named in that city; but have met with no authentic record of him stating the age in which he lived.

NOTE 83. "It is the most received opinion among the Mohammadans that the son whom Abraham offered was Ismael, and not Isaac: Ismael being his only son at that time: for the promise of Isaac's birth is mentioned lower [in the Kur-an], as subsequent in time to this transaction. They also allege the testimony of their prophet, who is reported to have said, 'I am the son of the two who were offered in sacrifice;' meaning his great ancestor, Ismael, and his own father, 'Abd-Allah: for 'Abd-El-Muttalib had made a vow, that if God would permit him to find out and open the well Zemzem, and should give him ten sons, he would sacrifice one of them; accordingly, when he had obtained his desire in both respects, he cast lots on his sons, and the lot falling on

'Abd-Allah, he redeemed him by offering an hundred camels, which was therefore ordered to be the price of a man's blood in the Sunneh."

NOTE 84. This expression is to be understood as metaphorical; for there is no city to which, in the literal sense, it is more inapplicable than Alexandria, which is encompassed by sea and desert.

NOTE 85. It is here proper to mention that Ahmad Ed-Denef, in other stories of the Thousand and One Nights, is said to have been an iniquitous character; and so is Hasan Shoomán.

NOTE 86. A small village, I believe, now occupies the site of the city of Ayás (supposed to be that of the ancient Ægæ), on the shore of the Gulf of Iskenderoon.

NOTE 87. The coin is not specified here, and I cannot attempt to supply the omission, the property being so vaguely described.

NOTE 88. The Arabic term "sukatee" I render "a dealer in second-hand goods." My sheykh remarks, in a marginal note, that this term is here improperly applied; and that it denotes one who sells the pluck and the feet, &c., of animals. So it generally does; but it has another application in Egypt; and it is singular that I should be acquainted with a sense in which it is there employed, and that a learned native of that country should not. In inquiring for a sprinkling-bottle and perfuming-vessel of brass or bronze and of old workmanship, I was told that I should apply for them to a sukatee; and being directed to a person so called, I found that he dealt in a variety of old and damaged articles, chiefly of metal, and mostly purchased at sales of old furniture, &c. Professor Habicht, in the seventh volume of the Breslau edition of the Thousand and One Nights, page 5 of the Glossary, explains this term in a similar manner.

NOTE 89. That a corpse should remain hanging during the period required to go from Baghdád to Alexandria and to return, is too improbable. The remains of a person who has been executed are generally left exposed for three days, and then interred.

NOTE 90. By "the two sheykh" are meant Abou-Bekr and 'Omar, the first two Khaleefehs. Many of the Ráfadees, or Shiya'ees, it is said, write the names of the first two Khaleefehs, or only the name of 'Omar, whom they especially hate, upon the upper surface of the soles of their shoes, and upon their heels, to be habitually trodden upon, by way of shewing contempt. See above, Note 33.

NOTE 91. "Aslân" is a Turkish word, signifying "a lion."

NOTE 92. This might convey, to some readers, a wrong notion; for the Râfidees do call themselves Muslims, though the Sunnees often deny them to be so. The passage reminds me of an anecdote related by Burckhardt. A Bedawee one day presented himself before Mohammad 'Alee, during his war with the Wahhâbees, "kissed his beard, and exclaimed, 'I have abandoned the religion of the Muslims' (or 'True Believers,' as the Wahhâbees style themselves); 'I have adopted the religion of the heretics' (so the Wahhâbees entitle all those Mohammadans who are not of their own creed); 'I have adopted the religion of Mohammad 'Alee.' This unintended blunder caused a general laugh; and the Pâshâ answered through his interpreter (for he but imperfectly understood Arabic), 'I hope you will always be a stanch heretic.'

NOTE 93. He rubbed the bead to try if it were a talisman, and if this process would procure the presence of some obedient Jinnee; for in this manner the virtues of a talisman are generally proved.

NOTE 94. That is, Probably it is a stone naturally variegated or marked.

NOTE 95. "Consul" (pronounced by the Arabs "Kunsul") is a title often given in Egypt, not merely to those to whom it justly belongs, but also to any wealthy Frank.

NOTE 96. The Arabic phrase thus rendered literally signifies "May God open," or "— assist." It is commonly used by Arab shopkeepers in the present day.

NOTE 97. This incident deserves especial remark. What 'Alâ-ed-Deen is here described to have done is an act very common with Arab shopkeepers, and is a proof of their general good faith. When an Arab quits his shop intending to return to it the same day, he usually hangs a net before the front.

NOTE 98. The poles here mentioned are those which are used in shoving off a small vessel from the shore, or from a bank on which it has run, in propelling it in a calm in shallow water, and also in sounding.

NOTE 99. The Arabic words "bâb keytoon," which I render "a door opening upon the sea," my sheykh explains as applied to a door which opens upon a river, as the doors opening upon the canal in Cairo.

NOTE 100. Cannons are mentioned in several places in the Thousand and One Nights; but perhaps by copyists.

NOTE 101. See Note 10 to Chapter v.

NOTE 102. The "mineeneh" is a kind of small biscuit or cracknel made of fine wheat-flour with a little clarified butter.

NOTE 103. The "weybeh" is the sixth part of the ardebb; consequently nearly equivalent to six English gallons and two-thirds.

NOTE 104. "Hosn-Maryam" (literally "the Beauty of Maryam") is here used to signify "Beautiful as Maryam," i. e. "— as the Virgin Mary."

NOTE 105. "Yoohannâ" is the Arabic Christian name corresponding to "John;" the corresponding Muslim name is "Yahyâ."

NOTE 106. "'Ôn" is used as synonymous with "Mârid," an appellation already explained as applied to an evil Jinnee of the most powerful class.

NOTE 107. In the original, "sureatu," which literally signifies "I was prostrated," particularly "by an epileptic fit." My sheykh explains it by the words "iltebestu bi-l-jinneeyi," or "I was possessed by the Jinnee;" the belief that epilepsy is thus occasioned generally prevailing among the Arabs. A person under the influence of this malady they term "melboos," or "possessed."

NOTE 108. See the last paragraph of Note 5 to Chapter i.

NOTE 109. I have remarked before, that we must suppose Zubejdeh to have been under age when 'Alâ-ed-Deen married her; consequently, at the time of her reunion with him, we need not infer that her age was much more than thirty years: for some Arab girls are married at the age of ten years; and we may imagine Zubeydeh to have been eleven or twelve years old at the time of her second marriage; yet in person, notwithstanding, nearly a woman.

NOTE 110. The marriage of a Muslim with a Christian woman is not absolutely forbidden; but it is generally disapproved.

NOTE 111. The sum called "a purse" in Egypt is five hundred Egyptian piasters, now nearly equivalent to five pounds sterling.

NOTE 112. "The Furkán" is an appellation of the Kur-án, and sometimes applied to "other books of scripture," "from the verb 'faraka,' 'to divide' or 'distinguish;' not, as the Mohammedan doctors say, because those books are divided into chapters or sections, or to distinguish between good and evil; but in the same notion that the Jews use the word 'Perek,' or 'Pirka,' from the same root, to denote a section or portion of scripture."—The Muslims believe that the copies of the Pentateuch, Psalms, and Gospels, now existing, have been corrupted, and that the passages in them wherein Mohammad is foretold have been altered or expunged: yet they pretend to trace a prophecy of him in the modern copies of the Gospel of St. John, reading, instead of "Paraclete," "Periclyte," which is similar in signification to "Mohammad" and "Ahmad," both of which are names of the Arabian Prophet; the former of these two names signifying "greatly praised;" the latter, "more or most laudable."—Here it is worthy of remark, that the name of Mohammad, pronounced as Europeans generally write it, with an "e" instead of an "a" in the last syllable, might be understood by an Arab in an active instead of a passive sense, as meaning "greatly praising."

NOTE 113. Shahrazád, in relating this story, says, "the remote will die," instead of "thou wilt die," as the latter expression might seem to be intended as a prophecy of the death of the King Shahriyár, whom she is addressing. See Note 8 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 114. A marriage without witnesses in this case was perfectly lawful.

NOTE 115. Thrones, carpets, &c., of this kind are mentioned in several Eastern tales, the authors of which may have all taken the idea from the tradition of Solomon's mode of travelling through the air. It is said "that he had a carpet of green silk, on which his throne was placed, being of a prodigious length and breadth, and sufficient for all his forces to stand on, the men placing themselves on his right hand, and the spirits [or Jinn] on his left; and that when all were in order, the wind, at his command, took up the carpet, and transported it, with all that were upon it, wherever he pleased; the army of birds at the same time flying over their heads, and forming a kind of canopy, to shade them from the sun."

NOTE 116. The "Darb-el-Asfar" is a street in the Jemáleyeh, in the northern part of Cairo.

NOTE 117. Here it becomes necessary to mention, that many anecdotes are inserted among the longer stories of the Thousand and One Nights. They are chiefly, I believe, extracted from other works, and many are historical; but most of them are very inferior in interest to the longer stories; and, from a hasty perusal of them, I found that it would be advisable to omit, in my translation, the greater number; introducing the rest in their proper places, but appending them to my notes. A few of these anecdotes have been already given from other sources; for at the time of my inserting them, I had not received from Cairo the whole of the copy from which my translation is made, and had no means of knowing that it contained those anecdotes. Their places in the original will be mentioned as they occur in order. As they rest on better authority than that of the Thousand and One Nights, and illustrate the notes in which they are inserted, it has been thought best to retain them in their present form in this edition.

Almost the whole of that portion of the Thousand and One Nights which is wanting in Galland's version was translated into French by the late Baron Von Hammer Purgstall; and from his manuscript French version, a German translation was made by Professor Zinserling; but the latter alone was published; the former being afterwards most unfortunately lost by a person to whose care it was intrusted to bring it to England for the purpose of publication. Again, from the German version, a French translation was made, by M. Trébutien, and published in Paris in 1828; and likewise an English translation of most of the longer stories, and four anecdotes, by the Rev. George Lamb, published in London in 1829. I regret extremely that I am unable to read the German version; for it is natural to infer that the merits of the version of Von Hammer are more imperfectly reflected in the second, than in the first, of two successive translations of which one has been made from the other. With respect to Von Hammer's version, the only remarks that I can venture to make are these; 1st, that he appears to have considerably abridged the stories; 2ndly, that he has omitted very few of them altogether but such as had been previously translated, and not all of these; and, 3rdly, that he has generally preserved the best of the verses with which they are interspersed. Thus, in two respects, his plan differs from that which is pursued by me; for I scarcely ever abridge in the smallest degree, except in the omission of many of the pieces of poetry; but reject entirely those stories which I think the English reader would find tedious, or otherwise displeasing. And here I must remark, that some pieces of appropriate poetry occur in the versions above mentioned in places where none, or some slightly different, are found in mine, because the pieces in my original do not always admit of being rendered as they are in the former versions. Of this, the reader may judge by comparing my translation of the first poetical quotation in the third of the following anecdotes with the corresponding couplet in M. Trébutien's version (vol. iii. pp. 280-1), which runs thus:—

"Le ciel a récompensé ceux qui honorèrent Joseph lorsqu'il était encore dans sa prison;
ainsi le ciel me mettra peut-être un jour en état de reconnaître vos bienfaits envers moi."

In my original, as follows:—

"Wa-'asa-lledbee ahdà li-yoosufa ahlahu: wa-a'azzahu fi-s-sejmi wa-hwa aseeru:
An yestejeeba lanà wa-yejma'a shemlanà; wa-llàhu rabbu-l-'âlameena kadeeru."

The same remark applies also in many cases to the prose. M. Trébutien's version I consider superior to that of Mr. Lamb; but I regret his having endeavoured to imitate the style of Galland.—I have deemed it necessary to make the above observations in justice to Von Hammer and his translators, and to myself; as my reader has now arrived at the point where he is first enabled to compare the versions above mentioned with my own.

The following anecdotes are selected from a series of nine, commencing with part of the two hundred and sixty-ninth Night, and ending with part of the two hundred and eighty-fifth.

Liberality of Hâtim Et-Tâee after his Death

It is related of Hâtim Et-Tâee, that, when he died, he was buried on the summit of a mountain, and they made over his grave two troughs of stone, and stone images of damsels with dishevelled hair. Beneath that mountain ran a river; and when travellers arriving there alighted at that place, they heard a loud crying during the whole night, from nightfall until morn; but when they arose in the morning, they found no one save only the damsels carved of stone. And when Zu-l-Kelâa, the King of Hemyer, alighted in that valley, going forth from his tribe, he passed a night there, and, approaching the place, he heard the crying: so he said, What is this lamentation that is on the summit of this mountain? They answered him, Here is the sepulchre of Hâtim Et-Tâee, over which are two troughs of stone, with stone images of damsels with dishevelled hair, and every night, persons who alight in this place hear this lamentation and crying. Upon this Zu-l-Kelâa said, in mockery of Hâtim Et-Tâee, O Hâtim, we are this night thy guests, and lank with hunger. And after sleep had overcome him, he awoke in alarm, exclaiming, O Arabs, come hither to me and to my beast! And when they came, they found the she-camel convulsed: so they slaughtered her, and roasted her flesh, and ate. They then asked him the cause of this; and he answered, I was sleeping, and saw in a dream Hâtim Et-Tâee, who came to me with a sword, and said, Thou hast visited us when we have nothing in our possession. And he wounded my she-camel with the sword. Had ye not slaughtered her, she had died.

And when the next morning came, Zu-l-Kelâa mounted the beast of one of his companions, taking the man up behind him; and at mid-day they saw a man riding a beast and leading another beast by his hand; and they said to him, Who art thou? He answered, I am 'Adee the son of Hâtim Et-Tâee. And where, he added, is Zu-l-Kelâa, the Prince of Hemyer? So they answered him, This is he. And he said to Zu-l-Kelâa, Mount this she-camel, instead of thine own; for thy she-camel, my father hath slaughtered for thee.—And who, said Zu-l-Kelâa, informed thee? 'Adee answered, My father came to me in sleep this last night, and said to me, O 'Adee, Zu-l-Kelâa, the King of Hemyer, hath demanded my hospitality, and I have slaughtered for him his she-camel: so repair thou to him with a she-camel for him to ride; for I have nothing in my possession.—Zu-l-Kelâa therefore took her, and wondered at the generosity displayed by Hâtim while living and when dead.

Maan and the Three Damsels

As Maan the son of Zâideh was hunting one day, he thirsted, and found not any water with his young men. But while he was in this state, lo, three damsels approached him, carrying three skins of water. He therefore requested drink of them, and they gave it him; and he demanded something of his young men, to give it to the damsels; but found that they had no money. So he presented to each of the damsels ten arrows from his quiver, the heads of which were of gold. Whereupon one of them said to her companions, This generous conduct cannot proceed from any but Maan the son of Zâideh: do ye each, then, recite some poetry in his praise. Accordingly, the first said,—

He headeth his arrows with points of gold, and in smiting his enemies dispenseth his munificence,
Affording the wounded a means of cure, and • grave-clothes for him whose abode is the tomb.

And the second said,—

A warrior of such excessive liberality, that his benefits are bestowed both on friends and foes.
The heads of his arrows are made of gold, that war may not hinder him from acts of munificence.

Then the third recited a couplet, in substance the same as that of the first.

Adventures of Ibrâheem the Rebel

Ibrâheem the son of El-Mahdee, and brother of Hâroon Er-Rasheed, when the office of Khaleefeh devolved to El-Ma-moon the son of his brother Er-Rasheed, refused to vow allegiance to him, and repaired to Er-Rei, where he assumed to himself the title of Khaleefeh, and thus he continued to do for the space of one year and eleven months and twelve days. His brother's son, El-Ma-moon, remained expecting his return to obedience, and his ranging himself among the number of his followers, until at length, despairing of his doing so, he mounted and set forth with his horsemen and foot-soldiers to Er-Rei.

And when the news of his approach was brought to Ibrâheem, he found no resource but that of going to Baghdâd, where he hid himself, fearing for his life; and El-Ma-moon offered to any one who would point out his place of concealment a hundred thousand pieces of gold.

Now when I heard of this reward that was offered, says Ibrâheem, I feared for myself, and was perplexed at my case. So I went forth from my house at the hour of mid-day, not knowing whither to repair, and I entered a great street that was not a thoroughfare, and, seeing at the upper end of it a barber standing at the door of his house, I advanced towards him, and said to him, Hast thou any place in which I may conceal myself for a while? He answered, Yes: and opened the door, and I entered a clean house. Then, after he had brought me in, he closed the door upon me, and went away. I suspected, therefore, that he had heard of the reward that was offered, and said within myself, He hath gone forth to betray me. So I remained in a state of agitation like the pot upon the fire, reflecting upon my case; but while I was in this state, lo, he came, attended by a porter with all that he required; and, looking towards me, he said to me, May I be thy ransom!—I was in want of food, and prepared for myself a saucepan-full, the like of which I do not remember ever to have eaten before; and when I had satisfied myself with it, he said, O my master, it is not consistent with my station to converse with thee; but if thou desire to honour thy slave, thine own surpassing judgment will determine. I therefore said to him, not imagining that he knew me, And whence hast thou learned that I excel in conversation? Whereupon he exclaimed, Extolled be the perfection of Allah! Our lord is too celebrated for me to be ignorant of that. Thou art my master, Ibrâheem the son of El-Mahdee, respecting whom El-Ma-moon hath announced that he will give to him who discovereth thee a hundred thousand pieces of gold.—And when he said this, he became exalted in my eye, and his generosity was established in my opinion: so I complied with his desire, and, the remembrance of my children and my family occurring to my mind, I said,—

Perhaps He who restored to Yoosuf his family, and aggrandized him in the prison when he was a captive,
May answer our prayer, and reunite us; for God, the Lord of all creatures, is able.

And when he heard these words from me, he said, O my master, wilt thou permit me to repeat what hath suggested itself to my mind? I answered, Do so. And he recited two pieces of poetry; on hearing which, I was filled with the utmost wonder at him, and moved with extreme delight. I then took a purse that I had with me, containing a number of pieces of gold, and threw it towards him, saying to him, I commend thee to the care of God; for I am about to depart from thee; I beg thee to employ the contents of this purse in the purchase of some of the things that thou requirest, and thou wilt receive from me an abundant recompense when I am secure from that which I fear. But he gave me back the purse, and said, O my master, paupers like myself are of no estimation with you; yet, consistently with my feelings of generosity, how can I accept payment for the boon which fortune hath granted me in causing thee to shew me such favour and to visit my abode? By Allah, if thou repeat those words, and throw the purse to me a second time, I will kill myself. So I took the purse, putting it into my sleeve, and the weight of it incommoded me; and I turned to leave him but when I came to the door of his house, he said, O my master, this place is more suited for thy concealment than another, and the supplying thee with provisions is no burden to me; therefore remain with me until God dispel thy trouble. So I replied, On the condition that thou expend from this purse. And he deceived me by professing his assent to this condition. Accordingly, I remained with him some days; but he expended nothing from the purse.

I then attired myself in women's apparel, with the khuff and the veil, and went forth from his house. But when I was in the street, excessive fear overcame me; and as I was about to pass over the bridge, I found myself in a place sprinkled with water, and a trooper, one of those who had been in my service, saw me and recognised me; whereupon he called out and said, This is the person of whom El-Ma-moon is in quest! And he laid hold upon me. I however pushed him and his horse, and threw both down in that slippery place, so that the rider became an example to him who would be admonished, and the people hastened towards him.

I therefore hurried on until I had passed the bridge, when I entered a great street, and, seeing the door of a house, and a woman standing in the passage, I said, O my mistress, save my life; for I am a man in fear. She replied, No harm shall befall thee. And she took me up into a supping-room, where she spread furniture for me, and brought to me some food, saying to me, Let thy terror subside. And while she was thus comforting me, the door was knocked with violence. So she went forth and opened it; and, lo, my acquaintance whom I had pushed upon the bridge came forward, with his head bound, and his blood running down upon his clothes, and his horse was not with him. She said to him, What is this? What calamity hath befallen thee? — He answered, I caught the man, and he made his escape from me. And he related to her the whole affair. And she took forth a piece of rag, with which she bound his head; after which, she spread a bed for him, and he lay sick. Then coming up to me, she said to me, I imagine that thou art the person in question. I replied, Yes. And she said, No harm shall befall thee. She then renewed her generous conduct to me, and I remained with her three days; at the expiration of which, she said to me, I am in fear for thee from this man, lest he come up to thee, and thou fall into the misfortune that thou darest: therefore save thyself by flight. But I requested her to delay my departure until the night; and she said, There will be no harm in that.

So when the night came, I put on the women's apparel, and, going forth from her, repaired to the house of an emancipated female slave who had belonged to us; and when she saw me, she wept, and appeared grieved, and praised God (whose name be exalted!) for my safety, and went forth as though she would go to the market to procure what was requisite for my entertainment. But suddenly I beheld Ibrâheem El-Môsile, approaching in the midst of his young men and troopers, with a woman before them; and, looking narrowly at her, I found that she was the emancipated slave, the owner of the house where I was. She walked on before them until she delivered me into their hands, and I was carried, in the women's attire, to El-Ma-moon.

He held a general council, and caused me to be brought in before him; and when I entered, I saluted him as Khaleefeh; but he replied, May God not preserve thee nor bless thee! So I said to him, Act according to thy good pleasure, O Prince of the Faithful; thou hast the command; therefore decide upon punishment or pardon; but pardon is the more agreeable with piety. God hath made thy pardon to excel that of every other person, as He hath made my offence to exceed every other offence, O Prince of the Faithful; and if thou take vengeance it will be in thy justice, and if thou pardon it will be in thy generosity. Then I recited these verses: —

My offence against thee is great; but thou art greater than it:
So exact thy due, or else, in thy clemency remit it.
If I have not been of the generous in conduct, do thou be so.

El-Ma-moon then raised his head, and I quickly recited these other verses: —

I have committed an enormous offence; but thou art disposed to pardon.
If thou pardon, thou wilt be gracious; and if thou punish, thou wilt be just.

And El-Ma-moon hung down his head, and repeated this couplet: —

When a friend desireth to enrage me, and causeth me to be choked in my anger,
I forgive his offences, and pardon him, fearing lest I should live friendless.

So when I heard these words from him, I perceived from them the odour of mercy. He then addressed the son of his uncle, and his brother Is-hák, and all his chief officers who were present, and said to them, What course do ye see to be suitable to his case? Whereupon every one of them advised him to slay me; but they differed as to the mode of slaughter. El-Ma-moon, however, said to Ahmad the son of Khálid, What sayest thou, O Ahmad?—O Prince of the Faithful, he answered, if thou slay him, we find an instance of such a person as thyself who hath slain such as he is; and if thou pardon him, we find not an instance of any like thee who hath pardoned one like him. And when El-Ma-moon heard the words of Ahmad the son of Khálid, he hung down his head, and repeated the saying of the poet: —

My family have slain Umeym, my brother: so if I shoot at them, my arrow will revert to me.
If I pardon, I shall grant an egregious pardon; and if I assault, I shall weaken my own bones.

And he recited also these words of the poet: —

Forgive thy brother when he mingleth what is right with what is wrong;
And continue thy kindness to him, whether he be thankful or ungrateful;
And abstain thou from reproaching him, whether he err or act justly.
Dost thou not see that what thou lovest and what thou hatest are conjoined?
And that the delight of long life is disturbed by the mixture of grey hairs?
And that the thorns appear upon the branches together with the fruit that is gathered?

Who is he that hath never done evil? And who hath done good alone?
If thou triedst the sons of this age, thou wouldst find that most of them had erred.

On hearing these verses from him, I removed the veil from my head, loudly exclaiming, God is most great!—and said, May God pardon thee, O Prince of the Faithful! He replied, No harm shall befall thee, O uncle.—O Prince of the Faithful, I rejoined, my offence is too great for me to utter any thing in excuse of it, and thy pardon is too great for me to express my thanks. Then, with mirth-exciting modulations, I sang these verses: —

Verily the Author of all virtues collected them in the loins of Adam for the Seventh Imám. Thou hast filled men's hearts with reverence for thee, and with an humble heart thou guardest them all.

I rebelled not against thee, overwhelmed by delusion, from any motive but that of covetousness;

And thou hast pardoned one whose like never was pardoned before, though none interceded with thee,

And hast pitied little-ones like those of the katá, and the yearning of a mother with impatient heart.

To this, El-Ma-moon replied, I say, in imitation of the example of our lord Yoo-suf (upon our Prophet and upon him be blessing and peace!), There shall be no reproach cast on you this day: God forgive you; for He is the most merciful of those who shew mercy. And I restore to thee thy wealth and thy lands, O uncle, and no harm shall befall thee.—So I devoutly supplicated blessings upon him, and recited these verses: —

Thou hast restored my wealth, and not been avaricious of it; and before thou didst this, thou sparedst my life.

I would give my blood to obtain thine approval, and my wealth till I drew off the shoe from my foot.

Were I ungrateful for the favours thou hast granted me, I should be more base than thou art generous.

El-Ma-moon then treated me with honour and beneficence, and said to me, O uncle, verily Aboo-Is-hák and El-'Abbás advised me to slay thee. I replied, Verily Aboo-Is-hák and El-'Abbás advised thee faithfully, O Prince of the Faithful; but thou hast acted as became thyself, and averted that which thou fearedst by doing what thou desiredst. And he said, I have extinguished my rancour by sparing thy life, and I have pardoned thee without burdening thee by obligations to intercessors. Then he prostrated himself in adoration for a long time; after which he raised his head, and said, O uncle, knowest thou wherefore I prostrated myself? I answered, Perhaps thou didst so to thank God for his having made thee master of thine enemy. He replied, I desired not that; but to thank God that He had inspired me to pardon thee. — I then explained to him my case, and told him what had happened to me with the cupper [or barber], and with the trooper and his wife, and the emancipated female slave who betrayed me: whereupon El-Ma-moon gave orders to bring that emancipated female slave. She was in her house, expecting the reward to be sent to her; and when she came before El-Ma-moon, he said to her, What induced thee to act as thou didst to thy master? She answered, Desire for the money. And he said, Hast thou a child or a husband? She answered, No. And upon this he gave orders to inflict upon her a hundred lashes, and commanded that she should be imprisoned for life. He then caused the trooper and his wife and the cupper to be brought; and when they had all come, he asked the trooper the cause of his having acted as he had done. He answered, Desire for the money. And El-Ma-moon replied, Thou must be a cupper. And accordingly he commissioned a person to place him in the shop of a cupper that he might teach him his art. But the trooper's wife he treated with honour, and he took her into his palace, and said, This is a sensible woman, fit to be employed in affairs of importance. Then he said to the cupper, There hath been such evidence of thy generosity as requireth that extraordinary honour should be paid to thee. And he commanded that the house of the trooper should be given up to him, and bestowed upon him, in addition to that, fifteen thousand pieces of gold.

Irem, the Terrestrial Paradise

It is related that 'Abd-Allah the son of Aboo-Kilābeh went forth to seek a camel that had run away, and while he was proceeding over the deserts of El-Yemen and the district of Sebà, he chanced to arrive at a vast city encompassed by enormous fortifications, around the circuit of which were pavilions rising high into the sky. So when he approached it, he imagined that there must be inhabitants within it, of whom he might inquire for his camel; and accordingly he advanced to it; but on coming to it, he found that it was desolate, without any one to cheer its solitude.

I alighted, says he, from my she-camel, and tied up her foot; and then, composing my mind, entered the city. On approaching the fortifications, I found that they had two enormous gates, the like of which, for size and height, have never been seen elsewhere in the world, set with a variety of jewels and jacinths, white and red and yellow and green; and when I beheld this, I was struck with the utmost wonder at it, and the sight astonished me. I entered the fortifications in a state of terror, and with a wandering mind, and saw them to be of the same large extent as the city, and to comprise elevated pavilions, every one of these containing lofty chambers, and all of them constructed of gold and silver, and adorned with rubies and chrysolites and pearls and various-coloured jewels. The folding-doors of these pavilions were like those of the fortifications in beauty, and their floors were overlaid with large pearls and with balls like hazelnuts composed of musk and ambergris and saffron. And when I came into the midst of the city, I saw not in it a created being of the sons of Adam; and I almost died of terror. I then looked down from the summits of the lofty chambers and pavilions, and saw rivers running beneath them; and in the great thoroughfare-streets of the city were fruit-bearing trees, and tall palm-trees; and the construction of the city was of alternate bricks of gold and silver: so I said within myself, No doubt this is the Paradise promised in the world to come.

I carried away, of the jewels, which were as its gravel, and the musk that was as its dust, as much as I could bear, and returned to my district, where I acquainted the people with the occurrence. And the news reached Mo'āwiyeh the son of Aboo-Sufyān (who was then Khaleefeh) in the Hejāz: so he wrote to his lieutenant in San'ā of El-Yemen, saying, Summon that man, and inquire of him the truth of the matter. His lieutenant therefore caused me to be brought, and demanded of me an account of my adventure, and of what had befallen me; and I informed him of what I had seen. He then sent me to Mo'āwiyeh, and I acquainted him also with that which I had seen; but he disbelieved it: so I produced to him some of those pearls and the little balls of ambergris and musk and saffron. The latter retained somewhat of their sweet scent: but the pearls had become yellow and discoloured.

At the sight of these, Mo'āwiyeh wondered, and he sent and caused Kaab-el-Ahbār to be brought before him, and said to him, O Kaab-el-Ahbār, I have called thee on account of a matter of which I desire to know the truth, and I hope that thou mayest be able to certify me of it.

—And what is it, O Prince of the Faithful? asked Kaab-el-Ahbár. Mo'áwiye said, Hast thou any knowledge of the existence of a city constructed of gold and silver, the pillars whereof are of chrysolite and ruby, and the gravel of which is of pearls, and of balls like hazel-nuts, composed of musk and ambergris and saffron? He answered, Yes, O Prince of the Faithful. It is Irem Zât el-'Emád, the like of which hath never been constructed in the regions of the earth; and Sheddád the son of 'Ad the Greater built it. —Relate to us, said Mo'áwiye, somewhat of its history. And Kaab-el-Ahbár replied thus:—

'Ad the Greater had two sons, Shedeed and Sheddád; and when their father perished, they reigned conjointly over the countries after him, and there was no one of the Kings of the earth who was not subject to them. And Shedeed the Son of 'Ad died: so his brother Sheddád ruled alone over the earth after him. He was fond of reading the ancient books; and when he met with the description of the world to come, and of Paradise with its pavilions and lofty chambers and its trees and fruits, and of the other things in Paradise, his heart enticed him to construct its like on the earth, after this manner which hath been above mentioned. He had under his authority a hundred thousand Kings, under each of whom were a hundred thousand valiant chieftains, and under each of these were a hundred thousand soldiers. And he summoned them all before him, and said to them, I find in the ancient books and histories the description of the Paradise that is in the other world, and I desire to make its like upon the earth. Depart ye therefore to the most pleasant and most spacious vacant tract in the earth, and build for me in it a city of gold and silver, and spread, as its gravel, chrysolites and rubies and pearls, and as the supports of the vaulted roofs of that city make columns of chrysolite, and fill it with pavilions, and over the pavilions construct lofty chambers, and beneath them plant, in the by-streets and great thoroughfares, streets, varieties of trees bearing different kinds of ripe fruits, and make rivers to run beneath them in channels of gold and silver. —To this they all replied, How can we accomplish that which thou hast described to us, and how can we procure the chrysolites and rubies and pearls that thou hast mentioned? But he said, Know ye not that the Kings of the world are obedient to me, and under my authority, and that no one who is in it disobeyeth my command? They answered, Yes we know that. —Depart then, said he, to the mines of chrysolite and ruby, and to the places where pearls are found, and gold and silver; and take forth and collect their contents from the earth, and spare no exertions. Take also for me from the hands of men such of those things as ye find, and spare none, nor let any escape you; and beware of disobedience.

He then wrote a letter to each of the Kings in the regions of the earth, commanding them to collect all the articles of the kinds above-mentioned that their subjects possessed, and to repair to the mines in which these things were found, and extract the precious stones that they contained, even from the beds of the seas. And they collected the things that he required in the space of twenty years; after which, he sent forth the geometricians and sages, and labourers and artificers, from all the countries and regions, and they dispersed themselves through the deserts and wastes, and tracts and districts, until they came to a desert wherein was a vast open plain, clear from hills and mountains, and in it were springs gushing forth, and rivers running. So they said, This is the kind of place which the King commanded us to seek, and called us to find. They then busied themselves in building the city according to the direction of the King Sheddád, King of the whole earth, in its length and breadth; and they made through it the channels for the rivers, and laid the foundations conformably with the prescribed extent. The Kings of the various districts of the earth sent thither the jewels and stones, and large and small pearls, and carnelion and pure gold, upon camels over the deserts and wastes, and sent great ships with them over the seas; and a quantity of those things, such as cannot be described nor calculated nor defined, was brought to the workmen, who laboured in the construction of this city three hundred years. And when they had finished it, they came to the King and acquainted him with the completion; and he said to them, Depart, and make around it impregnable fortifications, of great height, and construct around the circuit of the fortifications a thousand pavilions, each with a thousand pillars beneath it, in order that there may be in each pavilion a Wezeer. So they went immediately, and did this in twenty years; after which they presented themselves before Sheddád, and informed him of the accomplishment of his desire.

He therefore ordered his Wezeers, who were a thousand in number, and his chief officers, and such of his troops and others as he confided in, to make themselves ready for departure, and to prepare themselves for removal to Irem Zât el-'Emád, in attendance upon the King of the world, Sheddád the son of 'Ad. He ordered also such as he chose of his women and his hareem, as his female slaves and his eunuchs, to fit themselves out. And they passed twenty years in equipping themselves. Then Sheddád proceeded with his troops, rejoiced at the accomplishment of his desire, until there remained between him and Irem Zât el-'Emád one day's journey; when God sent down upon him and upon the obstinate infidels who accompanied him a loud cry from the heaven of his power, and it destroyed them all by the vehemence of its sound. Neither Sheddád nor any of those who were with him arrived at the city or came in sight of it, and God obliterated the traces of the road that led to it; but the city remaineth as it was in its place until the hour of the judgment.

At this narrative related by Kaab-el-Ahbâr, Mo'áwiyeh wondered, and he said to him, Can any one of mankind arrive at that city?—Yes, answered Kaab-el-Ahbâr: a man of the companions of Mohammed (upon whom be blessing and peace!), in appearance like this man who is sitting here without any doubt.—Esh-Shaabee also saith, It is related on the authority of the learned men of Hemyer, in El-Yemen, that when Sheddád and those who were with him were destroyed by the loud cry, his son Sheddád the Less reigned after him; for his father Sheddád the Greater had left him as successor to his kingdom, in the land of Hadramót and Sebâ, on his departure with the troops who accompanied him to Irem Zât el-'Emád. And as soon as the news reached him of the death of his father on the way before his arrival at the city of Irem, he gave orders to carry his father's body from those desert tracts to Hadramót, and to excavate a sepulchre for him in a cavern. And when they had done this, he placed his body in it, upon a couch of gold, and covered the corpse with seventy robes interwoven with gold and adorned with precious jewels; and he placed at his head a tablet of gold, whereon were inscribed these verses:—

Be admonished, O thou who art deceived by a prolonged life!
I am Sheddád the son of 'Ad, the lord of the strong fortress;
The lord of power and might and of excessive valour.
The inhabitants of the earth obeyed me, fearing my severity and threats;

And I held the east and west under a strong dominion.

And a preacher of the true religion invited us to the right way;

But we opposed him, and said, Is there no refuge from it?

And a loud cry assaulted us from a tract of the distant horizon;

Whereupon we fell down like corn in the midst of a plain at harvest;

And now, beneath the earth, we await the threatened day.

—Eth-Tha'álibee also saith, It happened that two men entered this cavern, and found at its upper end some steps; and having descended these, they found an excavation, the length whereof was a hundred cubits, and its breadth forty cubits, and its height a hundred cubits. And in the midst of this excavation was a couch of gold, upon which was a man of enormous bulk, occupying its whole length and breadth, covered with ornaments and with robes interwoven with gold and silver; and at his head was a tablet of gold, whereon was an inscription. And they took that tablet, and carried away from the place as much as they could of bars of gold and silver, and other things.

Is-hák, the Maiden Khadeejah, and the Sultán

I went forth one night, says Is-hák El-Mósilee, from the presence of El-Ma-moon, and, turning into a by-street, I saw something hanging from one of the houses there. So I felt it, to discover what it was, and found that it was a large basket, with four handles, and covered with brocade; whereupon I said within myself, There must be some cause for this. And I was perplexed at my case.

Intoxication induced me to seat myself in the basket; and when I had done so, lo, the people of the house drew it up with me in it, thinking that I was the person whom they were expecting. And when they had raised it to the top of the wall, behold, four damsels were there, and they said to me, Descend, and may ample enjoyment attend thee. Then a damsel walked before me with a candle until I descended into a mansion in which were sitting-rooms spread [with carpets and other furniture], the like of which I had never seen except in the palace of the Kha-leefeh. And after I had sat a while, suddenly some curtains were raised on one side of the apartment, and, lo, maids walked in with candles in their hands, and with perfuming-vessels containing aloes-wood; and among them was a damsel like the rising full moon. So I rose; and she said, Thou art a welcome visitor. Then having desired me to be seated, she inquired of me my story. I therefore answered her, I came forth from certain of my brethren, and, turning into this street, found a basket let down; whereupon the wine induced me to seat myself in it, and it was drawn up, with me in it, to this house. This, said I, is my case.—And she said, No harm shall befall thee, and I hope thou wilt approve of the result of thine adventure. And what, she added, is thine occupation? I answered, That of a merchant in the market of Baghdád. And she said, Canst thou repeat any verses?—Some trifling pieces, I answered.—Then mention them to us, said she, and recite to us somewhat of them. But I replied, The visitor is bashful: do thou begin. Thou hast spoken truly, she said. And she recited some elegant verses, of the poetry of ancient and of recent composers, some of their most admirable effusions; and I listened, and knew not whether to wonder most at her beauty and loveliness, or at the charming style of her rehearsal. After this she said, Hath thy bashfulness passed away?—Yea, by Allah, I answered. And she said, If thou wilt, recite to us somewhat of that which thou art able to rehearse. So I recited to her an abundance of pieces by a number of old writers; and she approved them, and said, By Allah, I did not imagine that there existed among the sons of the common people such a person as this.

She then gave orders to bring the food; and it was brought, and she began to take and to put before me; and varieties of sweet-smelling flowers were there, with rare fruits, such as are usually found nowhere but in the abodes of Kings. Afterwards she called for the wine, and she drank a cup, and handed one to me, saying, This is the time for conversation and relating stories. I therefore began to converse with her, and to say I have been told that such and such things happened, and there was a man who said so and so,—until I had related to her a number of agreeable stories; with which she was delighted; and said, I wonder how it is that one of the merchants is able to repeat stories like these; for they are such as are proper for Kings. So I said, I had a neighbour who used to converse with the Kings, and serve as their boon-companion; and when he was unoccupied, I used to visit his house, and sometimes he would relate what thou hast heard.—And she replied, By my life, thou hast retained them well. We continued our conversation, whenever I was silent she beginning, until we had passed the greater part of the night, the fumes of the aloes-wood imparting a constant odour to the air; and I was in such a state that if El-Ma-moon could have imagined it, he would have flown with a desire to enjoy it. She then said, Verily thou art one of the most pleasant and polished of men; for thou art a person of surpassing good breeding; and there is but one thing wanting.—And what, said I, is that? She answered, Couldst thou sing verses to the sounds of the lute? So I replied, I used to devote myself to this art of old; but not being endowed with a talent for it, I relinquished it; and my heart is inflamed on that account. I should be glad to sing something well on the present occasion, that my night's enjoyment might be complete.

On hearing this, she said, It seemeth thou hast proposed that the lute should be brought. I replied, It is thine to decide: thou art the conferrer of favours, and art entitled to thanks for thy kindness. And she gave orders to bring a lute; and when it was brought, she sang with a voice which I had never heard equalled in sweetness, with a charming manner, and admirable skill in striking the chords, and altogether with consummate excellence: after which she said, Knowest thou by whom this air was composed, and whose are the verses? I answered, No. And she said, the verses are by such-a-one, and the air is Is-hák's. I said, And is Is-hák (may I be thy ransom!) endowed with such talent?—Wonderful! wonderful! she exclaimed: Is-hák surpasseth all in this art. And I said, Extolled be the perfection of Allah, who hath given to this man what He hath not given to any beside him!—And how then wouldst thou be charmed, she added, if thou heardest this air sung by him!—Thus we continued to pass the time until daybreak, when an old woman, who seemed to be her nurse, addressed her and said, The time hath arrived. So she arose at her words, and said, Keep thou our conduct secret; for social meetings are confidential.—May I be thy ransom! I replied: I required no charge on that subject. I then bade her farewell, and she sent a damsel to walk before me to the door of the house, and she opened to me, and I went forth to my own abode.

Having arrived there, I performed the morning-prayers, and slept; and the messenger of El-Ma-moon came to me; so I repaired to him, and remained with him that day. And when the hour of night-fall came, I reflected upon the pleasure that I had enjoyed during the preceding night, and it was such as none but the fool could be withheld from. I therefore went forth, and, coming to the basket, seated myself in it, and was drawn up to the place in which I was the night before. The damsel said to me, Thou hast been assiduous. But I replied, I do not think myself to have been otherwise than neglectful. We then chatted together, as in the preceding night, each of us supplying subjects of conversation; and reciting poetry, and relating strange tales, until dawn, when I departed to my abode, and performed the morning-prayers, and slept.

The messenger of El-Ma-moon then came to me, and I repaired to him; and after I had passed the day with him, and the hour of nightfall arrived, the Prince of the Faithful said to me, I conjure thee to sit here until I have gone and accomplished an object that I have in view and come back. But when the Khaleefeh had gone away from me, disquieting thoughts arose in my mind, and, reflecting upon my late enjoyment, what I might experience from the Prince of the Faithful seemed of little moment to me. So I sprang up and retired, and went forth running until I came to the basket; whereupon I seated myself in it, and it was drawn up with me to the place of my former visits; and the damsel said, Probably thou art our friend? — Yea, by Allah, I answered. — And she said, Hast thou made our house thine abode? I answered, May I be thy ransom! The right of a stranger to hospitality is for three days; and if I return after that period, ye shall be free to shed my blood. — We then sat amusing ourselves as on the former occasions; and when the time of departure drew near, knowing that El-Ma-moon would certainly question me, and would not be content with any thing but an explanation of the affair, I said to her, I see thee to be one of those who take pleasure in singing, and I have a cousin who is more comely than myself in countenance, and of higher rank, and more accomplished manners, and he is most nearly acquainted of all the creatures of God (whose name be exalted!) with Is-hák. Upon this she said, Art thou a spunger and dost thou urge an impertinent request? I answered her, Thou art the arbitress of the matter. And she replied, If thy cousin be as thou hast described him, we shall have no dislike to be acquainted with him. — Then the time came, and I arose and went homewards.

But before I arrived at my house, the messengers of El-Ma-moon rushed upon me, and violently bore me away to him.

I found him sitting upon a throne, and incensed against me; and he said, O Is-hák, hast thou swerved from allegiance? I answered, No, by Allah, O Prince of the Faithful. — What then is thy story? said he: relate the affair to me with truth. So I replied, Well; but in privacy. He therefore made a sign to those who were before him; whereupon they retired; and I told him the story, and said to him, I promised her that thou wouldst pay her a visit. And he said, Thou hast done well. We then occupied ourselves with our usual pleasures that day; but the heart of El-Ma-moon was intent upon the damsel; and scarcely had the appointed time arrived when we departed. I charged him, saying, Refrain from calling me by my name before her; and be as though thou wert my attendant in her presence. And we agreed on this subject.

We proceeded until we came to the place where the basket had been hung, and we found two baskets: so we seated ourselves in them, and they were drawn up with us to the same place. The damsel then advanced and saluted us; and when El-Ma-moon beheld her, he was astonished at her beauty and loveliness. She began to relate stories to him, and to recite verses, and afterwards caused the wine to be brought, and we drank; she making him the object of her particular favour, and rejoicing in his society, and he shewing the same favour to her, and alike delighted with her. And she took the lute, and sang these verses: —

The beloved visited me towards the close of night. I stood, to shew him honour, until he sat down.

I said, O my intimate, and all my desire, hast thou come this night and not feared the watch?

He answered, The love-smitten feared: but his desire had forcibly deprived him of his reason.

She then said to me, And is thy cousin of the merchants? And she pointed towards El-Ma-moon. I answered, Yes. And she said, Verily ye nearly resemble each other. I replied, Yes.

And when El-Ma-moon had drunk three pints, being moved with joy and merriment, he called out and said, O Is-hák! I replied, At thy service, O Prince of the Faithful. — Sing, said he, this air. And when the damsel discovered that he was the Khaleefeh, she retired into another apartment. So after I had finished my song, El-Ma-moon said to me, See who is the master of this house. Whereupon an old woman quickly answered and said, It belongeth to El-Hasan the son of Sahl. And he said, Bring him hither unto me. The old woman, therefore, was absent for a short time, and, lo, El-Hasan came in. El-Ma-moon said to him, Hast thou a daughter? He answered, Yes: her name is Khadeejah. — Is she married? said the Khaleefeh. El-Hasan answered, No, by Allah. Then, said El-Ma-moon, I demand her of thee as my wife. El-Hasan replied, She is thy hand-maiden, and at thy disposal, O Prince of the Faithful. And the Khaleefeh said, I marry her on the condition of paying in ready money, as her dowry, thirty thousand pieces of gold, which shall be brought to thee this next morning: so, after thou shalt have received the money, do thou convey her to us in the following night. He replied, I hear, and obey. We then went forth; and he said, O Is-hák, tell not this story to any one. I therefore kept it a secret until El-Ma-moon died.

Never had such pleasures altogether fallen to the lot of any one, as those which I enjoyed during these four days, keeping company with El-Ma-moon by day, and with Khadeejah by night. By Allah, I have seen no one among men like El-Ma-moon, and I have not beheld among women the like of Khadeejah, nor any who approached her in intelligence and sense and elocution. — And God is all-knowing.

[Some Arab authors have, not without reason, pronounced this anecdote an invention of Is-hák. It is well known that El-Ma-moon married the daughter of his Wezeer El-Hasan the son of Sahl; but that he became acquainted with her in the manner above described is highly improbable. The marriage took place at Fem-es-Silh, on the bank of the Tigris, near Wásit, and was celebrated with a magnificence scarcely credible. El-Hasan, the father of the bride, scattered, among the officers and other chief persons who were present, balls of musk of the size of hazel-nuts, containing paper inscribed with the names of lands and of female slaves, and the descriptions of beasts, &c., and into whose hand soever a ball fell, the property of which the name or description was written upon the enclosed paper was delivered to him, whether it were a piece of land, or other possession, or a horse, or a female slave, or a memlook. After that, he scattered, among the rest of the people, pieces of gold and silver, and bags of musk, and balls of ambergris. He expended upon the entertainment of El-Ma-moon and his companions, and all his troops and other attendants, the number of whom was incalculable, even the camel-drivers, and the hired conductors of beasts, and the boatmen, so that none had occasion to purchase anything for himself or for his beast. It is said that El-Ma-moon remained with El-Hasan nineteen days, the latter providing the Khaleefeh and all who were with him each day, with every thing that they required; and that the sum which he expended upon them was fifty millions of pieces of silver. El-Ma-moon, on his departure, gave orders to present him with ten millions of pieces of silver, and allotted him Es-Silh as a possession; whereupon El-Hasan sat, and distributed the money among his grantees and companions and retinue. El-Ma-moon likewise gave up to him the revenues of Fâris and of the cities of El-Ahwáz for the period of a year. It is related, also, that when El-Ma-moon first entered the apartment of the bride, and seated himself with her, her grandmother scattered over them both a thousand large pearls from a tray of gold; and that a candle of ambergris weighing forty menns, in a lantern of gold, was lighted that night; but that El-Ma-moon disappeared of it, and pronounced it an act of prodigality.]

NOTE 1. This story is not in the edition of Cairo, nor in the MS. of the Thousand and One Nights from which Galland translated, though he has introduced it in his version; and I am not aware of its being found in any copy of that work, except the one from which the Breslau edition is printed. From these circumstances, and from my having discovered that its chief and best portion is a historical anecdote, related as a fact, I am inclined to think that it is not a genuine tale of the Thousand and One Nights, and that it has been inserted in some copies of that work (perhaps only in one), to supply a deficiency. But as it exists in one copy, and is one of the best tales in Galland's version, I have gladly given it a place in the present collection. The place which it occupies in the order of the Nights, in the edition of Breslau, I have mentioned at the head of this chapter; but in the order of the Tales in that edition, it follows the story of Es-Sindibád of the Sea and Es-Sindibád of the Land.

The author by whom I have found the chief portion of this tale related as a historical anecdote is El-Is-hákee, who finished his history shortly before the close of the reign of 'Osmánlee Sultán Mustafá, apparently in the year of the Flight 1032 (A. D. 1623). He does not mention his authority; and whether it is related by an older historian, I do not know; but perhaps it is founded upon fact.

The story is narrated in El-Is-hákee's work in a simple and agreeable manner: in the Breslau Thousand and One Nights it is given more fully, but in language of a vulgar style, and abounding with errors, of which a few will be found particularized in the following notes. I have, therefore, here availed myself of both these works, each of which, in this case, possesses merits that the other does not. To the former, as far as it has enabled me to do so, I have adhered more closely; but the additions I have made, of the best parts of the narrative in the latter work, constitute the main portion of my translation of the tale. Abu-l-Hasan's marriage, and the subsequent events, are not related by El-Is-hákee.

Galland has evidently added to this story considerable embellishments of his own invention, and made it in many parts inconsistent with Arab manners and customs. But his version of it appears to have been mainly derived from an Arabic original more full than the corresponding text in the Breslau edition; for I distinguish in it several poetical and other passages which are not in the tale as given in that edition, and which are certainly not invented by him. For instance, near the commencement of the story, I observe a loose translation of four verses occurring in the Cairo edition in an earlier tale.

NOTE 2. The word "khaleea," which I render "wag" (though this is not its primary meaning, nor do I find it so explained in any Dictionary, except one in MS. of my own composition), is generally used in the present day to signify "waggish," "frolicsome," or "witty," and has been so used by many good writers. That it is to be thus understood here, and not in the sense of an "abandoned person," or a "reprobate," is evident from the manner in which it is employed at the close of the tale. In like manner, "khalá'ah" signifies "waggishness," &c.

NOTE 3. In the original, "kumájeħ." This word appears to be from the Persian "kumáj," or "kumásh" ("unleavened bread," or "bread baked in the ashes"); but it is commonly used to signify "fine flour," and I have not found it used in any other sense.

NOTE 4. Potash is used for washing the hands after eating; but the most common substitute for soap I have observed to be "dukák," which is the meal of the lupin, called in Arabic "turmus," vulgarly "tirmis."

NOTE 5. In illustration of this part of the story, as it respects the character of Hároon Er-Rasheed, see Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 6. See Note 18 to Chapter vii.

NOTE 7. The morning-prayers consist of only four rek'ahs; namely, two sunneh (or ordained by the Prophet), and two fard (i. e., of divine appointment). Respecting the "rek'ah," see Note 1 to the Introduction.

NOTE 8. After the sunneh prayers, and after the fard, the worshipper, looking upon his right shoulder, says, "Peace be on you, and the mercy of God!" then, looking upon the left shoulder, he repeats the same words. These salutations are considered by some as addressed only to the guardian angels who watch over the believer, and note all his actions; but others say that they are addressed both to angels and men (i. e., believers only), who may be present: no person, however, returns them. Some hold that every believer is attended by two angels; others say, five; others, sixty, or a hundred and sixty.

NOTE 9. In the Breslau edition, four hundred lashes.

NOTE 10. "Kadeeb-el-Bán" signifies "the Twig of the Oriental willow."

NOTE 11. See Note 78 to Chapter v.

NOTE 12. Or hospital. The same building, in an Arabian city, generally serves both as an hospital for the sick and an asylum for the mad.

NOTE 13. "Shut your doors at night," said the Prophet; "and at the time of doing it, remember [or rather repeat] God's name; because the Devil cannot open the door which has been shut in the name of God."—As I have remarked in my work on the Modern Egyptians, it is a common custom of many learned and devout persons, and some others, to say, "In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful," on locking a door, covering bread, laying down their clothes at night, and on other occasions, to protect their property (as well as themselves) from evil genii, or devils.

NOTE 14. Literally, "I have not seen thee to have a heel prosperous to me."

NOTE 15. See Notes 44 and 18 to Chapter x. "The Chapter of Sincerity" is the 112th (or last but two) of the Kur-ân.

NOTE 16. "Nuzhet-el-Fuád" signifies "the Delight of the Heart."

NOTE 17. Two of the customs here mentioned, namely, tying the toes of the corpse, and placing a knife, or rather, a sword, upon the body, are still common in some Muslim countries; but I did not hear of their being observed in Egypt, nor of the custom of putting the salt with the knife or sword. Iron and salt are both believed to repel genii, and to prevent their approach and hence, perhaps, are thus used.

NOTE 18. Nuzhet-el-Fuád must have resigned her office of Treasurer on marrying Abu-l-Hasan.

NOTE 19. Abu-l-Hasan expected the present of the money for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the funeral, and the piece of silk for grave-clothing. See Note 11 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 20. This is a common kind of ejaculation. By the "hour," in this instance, we may understand either "the hour of Abu-l-Hasan's birth, or that in which he was appointed the Khaleefeh's boon-companion.

NOTE 21. Literally "the Hâshimee vein." The vein of anger between the eyes appears to have been especially remarkable in descendants of Hâshim. Whether it was so in Hâshim himself, I do not find; but it is mentioned among the characteristics of his great-grandson, the Prophet.

NOTE 22. The word rendered "pictures" generally signifies "carved images," "effigies," or "models." I suppose pictures to be here meant because carved images are generally representations of living creatures, which representations are forbidden by the Muslim law.

NOTE 23. This is a saying of the Prophet, and is often quoted by a Muslim to silence his wife.

NOTE 24. The text here is faulty; but Dr. Habicht has pointed out the corrections, and I only differ from him in adding the article (in the Arabic) to the last word of the latter of the two proverbs.

NOTE 25. Here, also, the text appears to be faulty. I read "kibleh" for "keeleh" or "keyleh."—Some Muslims turn the head of the corpse in the direction of the Kibleh, or Mekkeh: others, the right side, inclining the face in that direction. In the latter position the corpse is placed in the tomb.

NOTE 26. In this passage, again, I am obliged to have recourse to a conjectural emendation.

NOTE 27. The word here rendered "two clods" also signifies "two lumps of stone," or "two bricks." Beating the bosom with two clods of hard, dry earth, in a case of extreme distress, is not an uncommon action with the Arabs of the lower orders.

NOTES TO CHAPTER THIRTEENTH

NOTE 1. This story, and that in the next chapter of the present work, have, I believe, been translated into French, by M. Caussin, and published in the edition of the Thousand and One Nights mentioned in the first of the notes to my eleventh chapter.

NOTE 2. The kind of cresset here mentioned, called in Arabic "mesh'al," is a staff with a cylindrical frame (commonly of iron) at the top, filled with flaming wood, or having two, three, four, or five of these receptacles for fire. The mesh'al with a single receptacle for fire is the most common, and the entire length is generally about seven feet. Two different kinds are figured in my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. vi. They are borne in various nocturnal processions, and often before a horseman riding by night.

NOTE 3. The term "meezer" or "mizer" is properly applied to a cloth which is wrapped round the waist and reaches to the knees, or lower; and is now also used to signify a pair of drawers.

NOTE 4. What is here meant is doubtful. A cresset-bearer before a horseman might be properly described as having on his shoulder an embroidered saddle-cover, called in Arabic "ghāshiyeh." This was usually borne before a King, and a less costly kind is now often seen on the shoulder of a groom preceding a horseman of the higher or middle rank.

NOTE 5. See Note 52 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 6. Literally, "the second, or the other Khaleefeh." So also in the other instances in which I use the term "False Khaleefeh."

NOTE 7. "Sāj" is the name of an Indian tree, the wood of which is imported into Arabian countries; but our Orientalists disagree as to its species. De Sacy thinks it likely that "sāj" is an Indian name adopted by the Arabs: if so, the tree so called is probably the teak (as he first supposed); this tree being termed in Sanscrit, "sāka."

NOTE 8. In the original, "shādhawān." This word, which I here render in accordance with the manner in which my sheykh has explained it in several places, is also written "shādarwān" and "shādirwān," and is, I believe, generally applied to a fountain, or jet d'eau, with pieces of glass, or glass bells, which, being put in motion by the water, produce a constant tinkling. The word is Persian.

NOTE 9. The "long mattresses" here mentioned are those described in Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 10. For a knowledge of the particular kind of round cushion here mentioned, by the term, "mudowwarah," I am indebted to Mr. Salamé; for although I have one, which I purchased of an Arab at Gibraltar, I either did not inquire, or else forgot, the name. It is generally about fifteen inches in diameter, three or four inches thick, and covered with velvet or leather, embroidered or otherwise ornamented. Cushions of this kind I did not see in the East; but they are common among the Arabs in Western Africa, and have of late years been imported into England, where they are used as footstools. The Arabs use them generally to recline against, and sometimes as pillows for the head.

NOTE 11. Literally, "O full moons." The plural is used for the reason explained in Note 34 to Chapter x.

NOTE 12. Here again the plural is used in the original, to convey a superlative sense.

NOTE 13. It is a general custom among the Arabs when a person is asked "What is the news?" to reply, "Good" (kheyr), even when the news to be imparted is bad.

NOTE 14. I believe I have before mentioned El-'Abbās, as an uncle of the Prophet, and ancestor of the Khaleefehs of Baghdād, who were hence called the 'Abbāsse Khaleefehs.

NOTE 15. 'See Note 8 to the Introduction.

NOTE 16. It is common with the Arabs to say that a day is like milk, or white as milk, to imply that it is fortunate; and that it is like mud, or black as mud, to signify the contrary.

NOTE 17. A money-changer is employed by Kings and grantees to pay and receive their money.

NOTE 18. See Note 39 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 19. The action here mentioned is accompanied with a gentle rubbing. The object in this case was to awake the lady. See Note 55 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 20. These two verses may be explained by the following amplified paraphrase.—“May thy palace never cease to be an object of desire, a place where prayer will be answered, resorted to by multitudes, like the Temple of Mekkeh; and may men ever exhibit tokens of the honours or benefits that they have received there in paying their homage, as a person who has just prayed upon the bare ground exhibits a forehead marked with the dust: thus throughout every country it will be known, that thy palace is like the station of Ibráheem (or Abraham), a place within the inner enclosure of the Kaabeh, where prayer is especially blessed, and that thou art like Ibráheem himself.” But my sheykh remarks, that these verses are not well applied except in praise of a person whose name is Ibráheem.

NOTE 21. See Note 95 to Chapter v.

NOTE 22. This story is followed by four anecdotes, ending with part of the two hundred and ninety-ninth night. The third and fourth of these are here subjoined.

The Lover Who Pretended to Be a Thief

It is related that Khálid the son of 'Abd-Allah El-Kusheyree was Governor of El-Basrah; and there came to him a number of men grasping a young man of surpassing comeliness and evident good breeding and abundant intellect, of handsome figure, of sweet odour, and of a grave and dignified appearance; and they brought him forward unto Khálid. So Khálid inquired of them his story, and they said, This is a thief, whom we caught yesterday in our abode. And when Khálid looked at him, the beauty of his appearance, and his cleanliness, excited his admiration, and he said, Loose him. Then, approaching him, he asked him his story; and the young man answered, The people have spoken truth, and the case is as they have related.—And what, said Khálid, induced thee to do this, when thou hast so comely an appearance and so handsome a form? He answered, Covetousness of worldly goods, and the decree of God, whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted! And upon this, Khálid said, May thy mother be bereft of thee! Hadst thou not in the comeliness of thy face, and the soundness of thy sense, and in thy good breeding, what would suffice to restrain thee from thieving?—Abstain from this language, O Emeer, replied the young man, and proceed to do what God (whose name be exalted!) hath ordained; for such is the recompense of that which my hands have done, and God is not tyrannical towards his servants. And Khálid remained a while silent, reflecting upon the affair of the young man; after which he desired him to draw near, and said to him, Thy confession before the witnesses hath perplexed me so that I know not what to do; and I do not think thee to be a thief. Probably thou hast some story to tell that is not one of theft. Acquaint me then with it.—But the young man replied, O Emeer, let nothing be imagined by thee, except that which I have confessed to thee; for I have no story to relate but this, that I entered the house of these people, and stole what I could, and they caught me, and took the property from me, and conveyed me unto thee. Upon this, therefore, Khálid gave orders to imprison him, and commanded a crier to proclaim throughout El-Basrah, Ho! whosoever desireth to witness the punishment of such-a-one, and the cutting off of his hand, let him come in the morning to such a place!

And when the young man had been a while in the prison, and they had put the irons upon his feet, he sighed heavily, shed copious tears, and recited these verses:—

Khálid hath threatened me with the cutting off of my hand if I reveal not to him her story;

But I said, Far be it from me that I should reveal the love for her which my heart entertaineth!

The cutting off of my hand for that which I have confessed is easier to my heart than disgracing her.

And the persons who were commissioned to guard him, hearing this, came to Khálid, and acquainted him with that which he had said. So when the night grew dark, he gave orders to bring him into his presence; and on his coming before him, he urged him to speak, and found him to be sensible, well-bred, intelligent, polite and discreet. He gave orders to bring him food; and he ate, and conversed a while with him; after which, Khálid said to him, I know that thou hast a story to tell that is not one of theft: so when the morning cometh, and the people are present, with the Kádee, and he asketh thee respecting the theft, deny it, and assert that which may avert from thee the punishment of amputation; for the Apostle of God (may God bless and save him!) hath said, In cases of doubt, avert the punishments fixed by the law. — He then gave orders to take him back to the prison, where he remained that night.

And in the morning the people came to witness the amputation of the young man's hand, and there was not any one in El-Basrah, man or woman, who did not come to behold the punishment of that young man. Khálid mounted attended by the chief persons of El-Basrah, and others, and, having summoned the Kádees, gave orders to bring the young man, who approached, jumping in the chains; and not one of the people beheld him without weeping for him, and the voices of the women rose in shrieks. So the [chief] Kádee commanded to silence the women, and then said to the young man, These people assert that thou enterdest their house, and stolest their property. Probably thou stolest less than the nisáb. — Nay, he replied, I stole a complete nisáb. — Probably, rejoined the Kádee, thou art a partner of the people in some of the property. But the young man replied, Nay: the whole of it was theirs: I had no right in it. And upon this, Khálid was enraged, and came to him and struck him upon the face with the whip, repeating this verse as applicable to his own case: —

Man desireth that his wish may be granted unto him; but God refuseth all save what Himself desireth.

He then called for the butcher, who came, and drew forth the knife, and, stretching forth the young man's hand, put the knife upon it.

But a damsel hastened forward from the midst of the women, clad in tattered and dirty garments, and cried out, and threw herself upon the young man; after which she displayed a face like the moon; whereupon a great clamour arose among the people, and a fiery excitement of the passions of the spectators well nigh ensued in consequence of this spectacle. Then the damsel cried out with her loudest voice, I conjure thee by Allah, O Emeer, that thou hasten not the amputation until thou shalt have read this note. And she gave him a note, which Khálid opened and read, and, lo, in it were written these verses: —

O Khálid, this person is a distracted slave of love, wounded by a glance shot from the bows of my eye-lashes.

An arrow from my eye hath prostrated him; for he is wedded to the ardour of love, and recovereth not from his malady.

He hath avowed a deed that he had not committed, thinking this better than the disgrace of his enamoured.

Have patience then with the afflicted lover; for he is one of the noble of mankind, not a thief.

When Khálid, therefore, read the verses, he withdrew, and separated himself from the people, and, having summoned the woman, inquired of her respecting the case. So she informed him that this young man was enamoured of her, and that she was enamoured of him; and that he had repaired to the house of her family with the desire of visiting her, and thrown a stone into the house to acquaint her with his arrival; but that her father and her brothers heard the sound of the stone, and came up to him; and when he perceived them, he collected all the linen of the house, making it appear to them that he was a thief, in order to protect the honour of his beloved. Therefore when they saw him thus engaged, they took him and said, This is a thief, — and brought him to thee; whereupon he confessed that he had committed theft, and persisted in doing so, that he might not disgrace me. These things he did, making himself a thief, from the excess of his kindness, and the generosity of his mind. — And Khálid replied, Verily he is worthy of the accomplishment of his desire. Then having called the young man to him, he kissed him between the eyes; and he gave orders to bring before him the damsel's father, and said to him, O sheykh, we had determined upon the execution of the sentence upon this young man by the amputation of his hand; but God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!) hath preserved me from that act; and I have ordered that ten thousand pieces of silver be given to him, for his generous exposure of his hand in order to preserve thy honour and the honour of thy daughter, and to protect you both from reproach. I have ordered also that ten thousand pieces of silver shall be given to thy daughter, in consideration of her having informed me of the truth of the affair; and I beg that thou give me permission to marry her to him. — O Emeer, replied the sheykh, I give thee permission to do so. And Khálid praised God, and thanked Him, and recited an eloquent khutbeh; after which he said to the young man, I marry to thee this damsel, such-a-one, who is here present, with her permission and consent, and with the permission of her father, for a dowry consisting of this money, the amount of which is ten thousand pieces of silver. And the young man replied, I accept from thee this offer of marriage. The Khálid gave orders to carry the money to the house of the young man, borne in procession, upon trays; and the people dispersed full of happiness. — I have not witnessed (says the narrator) a day more strange than that day, beginning with weeping and misfortunes, and ending with joy and happiness.

[In the following anecdote, mention is made of an event of a most melancholy nature, the knowledge of which has caused me to derive less pleasure than I should find, if ignorant of the fact, in many of the best stories in the present collection; and I therefore think that some of my readers may prefer passing over it unread.]

The Token of the Bean

A Bedawee of a distant desert used every year to bring an ode to Jaafar El-Bar-mekee, who used to give him a thousand pieces of gold as a largess for his ode; and the Bedawee took the money and departed, and remained expending from it upon his family until the close of the year. Now this Bedawee brought him the ode according to his custom, and, when he came, found Jaafar hanged; and he came to the place where he was hanged, and there, having made his camel lie down, wept violently, mourned greatly, and recited his ode, and slept. And in his sleep he saw Jaafar El-Bar-mekee, who said to him, Thou hast wearied thyself, and come to us, and found us in the state thou seest: but repair to El-Basrah, and inquire for a man whose name is so-and-so, one of the merchants of El-Basrah, and say to him, Jaafar El-Bar-mekee saluteth thee, and saith to thee, Give me a thousand pieces of gold, by the token of the bean.

When the Bedawee, therefore, awoke from his sleep, he repaired to El-Basrah, and inquired for that merchant; and, having met with him, he acquainted him with the words that Jaafar had said in the dream; whereupon the merchant wept violently, so that his soul almost quitted the world. He then treated the Bedawee with honour, seating him by him, and making his stay pleasant; and the Bedawee remained with him three days, honourably entertained. And when he desired to depart, the merchant gave to him a thousand and five hundred pieces of gold, saying to him, The thousand are what I am commanded to give thee, and the five hundred are a present to thee from myself, and thou shalt receive every year a thousand pieces of gold.

And at his departure, the Bedawee said to the merchant, I conjure thee by Allah to acquaint me with the affair of the bean, that I may know its foundation. So the merchant replied, I was, at the commencement of my career, in a state of poverty, going about with hot beans through the streets of Baghdád, and selling them as a means of subsistence. And I went forth on a cold and rainy day, without sufficient clothing on my body to preserve me from the bleakness of the air, now shivering from the severity of the cold, and now falling in the water of the rain, in so horrible a state that the skin quaketh at thinking upon it. Now Jaafar was sitting that day in a pavilion overlooking the street, and with him were his chief attendants and concubines; and his eye fell upon me; whereupon he was moved with pity for my condition, and sent to me one of his servants, who took me and led me in to him; and when he saw me, he said to me, Sell the beans that thou hast with thee to my attendants. So I began to mete them with a measure that I had with me, and every one who took a measure of beans filled the measure with gold, until all that I had with me was exhausted, and there remained nothing in the basket [except one bean]. Then I collected together the gold that had accrued to me; and Jaafar said to me, Doth aught of the beans remain with thee? I answered, I know not. And searching in the basket I found in it nothing but one bean; whereupon Jaafar took it from me, and split it in twain; and he took one half of it, and gave the other half to one of his concubines, saying, For what sum wilt thou buy the half of this bean? She answered, For twice the quantity of this gold. So I was confounded at my case, and said within myself, This is impossible. But while I was wondering, lo, the concubine gave orders to one of her female slaves, who brought a quantity of gold twice as much as that which was already collected. Then Jaafar said, And I will buy the half that I have taken for twice the quantity of the whole. And he said to me, Receive the price of thy bean. And he gave orders to one of his servants, who collected together the whole of the money and put it into my basket; and I took it and departed. After that, I came to El-Basrah, and trafficked with the money in my possession, and God gave me ample wealth. To God therefore be praise and thanks! So if I give thee every year a thousand pieces of gold, derived from the munificence of Jaafar, it injureth me not at all.—Observe, then, the generous disposition of Jaafar, and the praise bestowed upon him living and dead. The mercy of God (whose name be exalted!) be on him!

NOTES TO CHAPTER FOURTEENTH

NOTE 1. This story I suppose to be the same as that which is entitled, in the list of the contents of Von Hammer's MS., as given by Trébutien, "Aboubekr Alkozlan;" the surname, or nickname, which I render "the Lazy," being in my original "El-Keslán."

NOTE 2. So in the two editions of Cairo and Breslau; but what a white emerald is I know not. Perhaps the word which I have rendered "white" may here signify "bright."

NOTE 3. The battlements here mentioned (in the original, "sharáreef," plural of "shurráfeh,") are in general merely ornamental, and of various different forms in different buildings.

NOTE 4. The Arab cupper is generally a barber, and shaving is a more common operation in the bath than bleeding.

NOTE 5. The "Zunooj," also called "Zinj" and "Zenj," are, properly speaking, an Ethiopian nation, the inhabitants of the country commonly called by us "Zanguebar."

NOTE 6. By the term "possessions" we may here understand property consisting of houses, &c., such being the general meaning of the word so rendered. "Raba" is a term commonly applied to a range of dwelling-rooms over shops or magazines.

NOTE 7. "Shereef" (signifying "noble"), and "seyd" or "seyyid" ("master," or "lord"), are titles given to any descendant of the Prophet, however low his station. Men and women of this caste often contract marriages with persons who are not members of the same; and as the title of shereef is inherited from either the father or the mother, the number of persons who enjoy this distinction has become very considerable. The men are privileged to wear the green turban; but not all of them do so. Many of the women wear a green face-veil.

NOTE 8. "It is related that a rich man informed his friends who were sitting with him, that the mice had eaten an iron utensil belonging to him, and they pronounced his assertion to be true: then a poor man told them that the mice had eaten his palm-stick [or staff], and they declared his assertion to be false. So he said to them, How is it that ye do not admit the truth of my assertion that the mouse ate the palm-stick, and ye admit its having eaten the iron?"

NOTE 9. By this description, El-Khidr is evidently meant. See Note 2 to the Introduction.

NOTE 10. "Henád" I suppose to be an imaginary name, as the city so called is said to have been near to the regions of the Jinn.

NOTE 11. The three anecdotes here following occupy the next place to the story of Abou-Mohammad the Lazy, and end with part of the three hundred and eighth Night.

The Generosity of Yahyà

It is related that Hároon Er-Rasheed called for one of his guards, named Sáleh, before the period at which he became changed against the Barmekes, and when the man came before him he said to him, O Sáleh, go to Mansoor, and say to him, Thou owest us a million pieces of silver, and we require that thou bring to us this sum immediately. I command thee also, O Sáleh, that if this sum be not paid to thee forthwith, before sunset, thou sever his head from his body, and bring it to me.—So Sáleh replied, I hear and obey. He repaired to Mansoor, and informed him of that which the Prince of the Faithful had said; whereupon Mansoor exclaimed, I perish, by Allah; for the price of all my property and all that my hand possesseth, if sold for its highest value, would not exceed a hundred thousand: how then, O Sáleh, can I procure the remaining nine hundred thousand pieces of silver? Sâleh therefore said to him, Contrive for thyself some stratagem by which thou mayest save thyself quickly, or thou perishest; for I cannot grant thee a moment's delay after the period which the Khaleefeh hath prescribed me, nor can I fail in aught of that which the Prince of the Faithful hath commanded me to do. Hasten then to employ a stratagem by which to save thy life before the period shall have expired. — Mansoor replied, O Sâleh, I beg thee of thy kindness to take me to my house, that I may bid farewell to my children and my family, and give my directions to my relations. — Accordingly, says Sâleh, I went with him to his house, and he began to take leave of his family; and a clamour arose in his abode, with weeping and crying, and supplication for the aid of God, whose name he exalted!

Then Sâleh said to him, It hath occurred to my mind that God may effect thy relief by means of the Barmekes: so repair with us to the house of Yahyâ the son of Khâlid. And when they went to Yahyâ the son of Khâlid, he acquainted him with his case; whereat Yahyâ grieved, and hung down his head for a while towards the ground; after which, he raised his head, and, having called his treasurer, said to him, How much money is in our treasury? He answered, The sum of five thousand pieces of silver. And Yahyâ ordered him to bring it. He then sent a messenger to his son El-Fadl, with a note, the purport of which was, There have been offered to me for sale some estates of great value, that will never be laid waste: so send to us some money. And he sent to him a million pieces of silver. Then he sent another man to his son Jaafar, with a note, of which the purport was this: We have an important affair to transact, and want for that purpose some money. And Jaafar sent to him immediately a million pieces of silver. And Yahyâ continued to send messengers to the Barmekes until he had collected from them for Mansoor a great sum of money. Sâleh and Mansoor, meanwhile, knew not of this proceeding; and Mansoor said to Yahyâ, O my lord, I have laid hold upon thy skirt, and I know not how to procure this money but from thee, agreeably with thy usual generosity: complete for me then the remainder of my debt, and make me thine emancipated slave. And Yahyâ hung down his head and wept, and said, O page, the Prince of the Faithful presented to our slave-girl Denâneer a jewel of great value. Repair then to her, and tell her to send to us this jewel. — So the page went, and brought it to him; and he said, O Mansoor, I purchased this jewel for the Prince of the Faithful from the merchants for two hundred thousand pieces of gold, and the Prince of the Faithful presented it to our slave-girl Denâneer, the lute-player; and when he seeth it with thee, he will know it, and will treat thee with honour, and spare thy life on our account, in honour of us; and thy money, O Mansoor, is now complete.

So I carried the money and the jewel, says Sâleh, to Er-Rasheed, taking Mansoor with me; but while we were on the way, I heard him repeat this verse, applying it to his own case: —

It was not from love that my feet went towards them; but because I feared to be smitten by the arrows.

And I wondered at the wickedness of his disposition, and his worthlessness and depravity, and the baseness of his origin and birth; and I retorted and said to him, There is not upon the face of the earth any one better than the Barmekes, nor is there any more base or more evil than thyself; for they bought thee off from death, and saved thee from destruction, bestowing upon thee the means of thy deliverance, and thou hast not thanked them nor praised them, nor behaved in the manner of the ingenuous; but hast requited their kindness with these words. — I then went to Er-Rasheed, and related to him the story, acquainting him with all that had happened; and Er-Rasheed wondered at the generosity of Yahyâ, and his munificence and kind disposition, and at the vileness of Mansoor, and ordered that the jewel should be restored to Yahyâ the son of Khâlid, saying, Any thing we give unto him, it is not fit that we revoke. And Sâleh returned to Yahyâ the son of Khâlid, and related to him the story of Mansoor, acquainting him with his evil conduct. But Yahyâ replied, O Sâleh, when a man is in want, with a contracted heart and with a troubled mind, for whatsoever proceedeth from him he is not to be reproached; for it doth not come from his heart. And he sought excuses for Mansoor. And upon this, Sâleh wept, and said, The revolutions of time will never bring about the existence of a person like thee. Alas, then, how can it be that one endowed with a nature like thine and generosity like thine shall be buried in earth! — And he recited these verses: —

Hasten to accomplish any kind intention; for it is not always that generosity can be exercised.

How many a man, when able, hath withheld himself from an act of generosity till poverty prevented him!

The Kindness of Yahyà

It is related also, that there existed, between Yahyà the son of Khálid, and 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik El-Khuzá'ee, a secret enmity, which neither of them manifested; and the reason of this enmity between them was, that the Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, loved 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik so greatly as to occasion Yahyà the son of Khálid and his sons to say, that 'Abd-Allah enchanted the Prince of the Faithful. Thus they continued for a long time, with hatred in their hearts.

And it happened that Er-Rasheed bestowed the government of Irmeeneeyeh upon 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik El-Khusá'ee, and despatched him thither. And after he had established himself there in the seat of government, there came to him a man of the inhabitants of El-'Erák, of surpassing good breeding, and acuteness and intelligence; but his means had become contracted, and his wealth had passed away, and his prosperity had vanished: so he forged a letter in the name of Yahyà the son of Khálid to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik, and journeyed to him in Irmeeneeyeh. On arriving at his door, he delivered the letter to one of his chamberlains, who took the letter and delivered it to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik El-Khuzá'ee; and he opened it and read it, and, considering it, he knew that it was forged. So he gave orders to bring the man; and when he presented himself before him, he prayed for him and praised him and the members of his court; and 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik said to him, What induced thee to undergo this long toil, and to come to me with a forged letter? But be of good heart; for we will not disappoint thy labour. — The man replied, May God prolong the life of our lord the Wezeer! If my coming be troublesome to thee, employ no pretext to repel me; for God's earth is wide, and the Bestower of the means of subsistence existeth: the letter that I have brought to thee from Yahyà the son of Khálid is genuine, not forged. — So 'Abd-Allah said, I will write a letter to my agent in Baghdád, and order him to inquire respecting this letter that thou hast brought to me; and if it prove to be true and genuine, not forged, I invest thee with the government of one of my districts, or I give thee two hundred thousand pieces of silver, with horses and excellent camels of high value, and an honorary gift besides, if thou desire a present: but if the letter prove to be forged, I give orders that thou shalt be beaten with two hundred blows of a staff, and that thy beard shall be shaven. — Then 'Abd-Allah commanded that he should be taken into a chamber; and that what he required should be put for him there until he should have ascertained his case. After this, he wrote a letter to his agent in Baghdád, the purport whereof was as follows: —

There hath come unto me a man with a letter which he asserteth to be from Yahyà the son of Khálid, and I have an evil opinion of this letter. It is therefore necessary that thou neglect not this affair; but go thyself, and ascertain the case of this letter, and hasten to send me a reply, that we may know the truth or the falsity of the matter.

So when the letter was brought to him in Baghdád, he mounted immediately, and repaired to the mansion of Yahyà the son of Khálid. He found him sitting with his boon-companions and chief attendants, and he saluted him, and delivered to him the letter; and Yahyà the son of Khálid read it, and said to the agent, Return to me to-morrow, that I may write for thee the answer. Then looking towards his boon-companions, after the departure of the agent, he said, What shall be the recompense of him who beareth a letter forged in my name, and taketh it to mine enemy? And every one of the boon-companions offered some opinion, and each of them proposed some kind of punishment. But Yahyà said to them, Ye have erred in that which ye have proposed, and this advice which ye have given hath arisen from the baseness and meanness of your minds. Ye all know the close favour in which 'Abd-Allah is held by the Prince of the Faithful, and ye know the wrath and enmity that subsisteth between me and him. Now God (whose name be exalted!) hath made this man a means of effecting a reconciliation between us, and hath fitted him for that purpose, and appointed him to extinguish the fire of hatred in our hearts, which hath been increasing for a period of twenty years; and by his intervention our affairs shall be peaceably adjusted. It is incumbent on me to satisfy this man by verifying his opinions and amending his circumstances; and I will write for him a letter to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik El-Khuzá'ee, to the effect that he shall treat him with increased honour, and continue to exalt and respect him. — And when the boon-companions heard this, they invoked blessings upon him, and wondered at his generosity and the abundance of his kindness. He then demanded the paper and the inkhorn, and wrote to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málík a letter in his own hand, of the following purport:—

In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful. Thy letter hath arrived: may God prolong thy life! and I have read it, and rejoiced at thy safety, and been delighted at the tidings of thy well-being and thy general prosperity. Now thou imaginedst that that ingenuous man forged a letter as from me, and did not bear an epistle from me: but the case was not so; for the letter I myself wrote, and it was not forged; and I hope from thy liberality and kindness and excellence of disposition that thou wilt satisfy the hope and wish of that ingenuous and generous man, and regard him with the respect that he meriteth, and cause him to attain his desire, and make him a particular object of overflowing kindness and abundant favour; and whatsoever thou dost for him, I shall regard myself as the object of it, and shall be thankful to thee.

Then he directed the letter and sealed it and delivered it to the agent. So the agent sent it to 'Abd-Allah, who, when he read it, was delighted at its contents, and, having caused that man to be brought to him, said to him, Whichever of the two things that I promised thee is the more agreeable to thee I will present to thee. And the man replied, The gift will be more agreeable to me than any thing else. Accordingly, 'Abd-Allah gave orders to present him with two hundred thousand pieces of silver, and ten Arab horses, five of them with housings of silk, and five with jewelled saddles such as are used in processions of state, and with twenty chests of clothes, and ten memlooks, horsemen, together with what was appropriate of costly jewels. Then he bestowed upon him a dress of honour, and sent him to Baghdád magnificently equipped.

When he arrived, therefore, at Baghdád, he repaired to the door of the mansion of Yahyà the son of Khálid before he went to his family, and he begged permission to go in to him. So the chamberlain went in to Yahyà, and said to him, O our lord, at our door is a man of respectable appearance and comely form and good condition, with a number of pages, desiring to come in to thee. And he gave him permission to enter; and when he came in to him, he kissed the ground before him, and Yahyà said to him, Who art thou? The man answered, O master, I am he who was killed by the tyranny of fortune, and thou hast brought me to life from the grave of calamities, and raised me to the paradise of desires. I am he who forged a letter in thy name, and conveyed it to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málík El-Khuzá'ee.—And what, said Yahyà, hath he done with thee; and what hath he given to thee? He answered, He gave me of the benefits proceeding from thy liberality and benevolence, and thy comprehensive favours and universal generosity, and thy magnanimity and ample bounty, so that he enriched me, and he distinguished me by especial beneficence, and bestowed presents upon me; and I have brought all his gifts and his presents; they are at the door, and the case is submitted unto thee, to decide upon it as thou wilt. Upon this Yahyà replied, The action that thou hast done for me is better than that which I have performed for thee, and thou art entitled to abundant thanks from me, and great bounty, since thou hast changed the enmity that subsisted between me and that highly-revered man into sincere friendship and affection. I will therefore give thee the like of that which 'Abd-Allah the son of Málík hath given thee.—He then ordered that he should be presented with money and horses, and chests of clothing, such as 'Abd-Allah had bestowed upon him; and thus that man's original prosperity was restored to him by the kindness of these two generous men.

El-Ma-moon and the Learned Man

It is said that there was not among the Khaleefehs of the descendants of El-'Abbás any more learned in all the sciences than El-Ma-moon. On two days in every week, he used to preside at discussions of the learned men; and the professors of religion and law, and the scholastic theologians, by whom the discussions were carried on, used to sit in his presence according to their several ranks and degrees. Now on one occasion, while he was sitting with them, there came in to his assembly a stranger, clad in white, tattered clothing, who seated himself at the lower end, behind the professors, in an obscure place. And when they began the discussion, and entered upon the consideration of the different propositions,—it being their custom to submit the proposition to the members of the assembly one after another, and for each who could offer some quaint addition to what others advanced, or some extraordinary, witty saying, to mention it,—the question was proposed to them by turns until it came to that stranger; whereupon he gave a reply better than the replies of all the professors; and the Khaleefeh approved it, and ordered that he should be raised from the place that he had taken to a higher one. Then, when the second question came to him, he gave a reply better than the first; and El-Ma-moon ordered that he should be raised to a place of higher dignity. And when the third question went round, he gave a reply better and more just than the two former replies; upon which El-Ma-moon ordered that he should sit near unto himself. And after the discussion was ended, the attendants brought the water, and the guests washed their hands; and they brought the repast, and they ate.

The professors then arose and went forth; but El-Ma-moon prevented the stranger from going out with them: he caused him to draw near unto him, and treated him with courtesy, promising him to bestow favours and benefactions upon him. And after this, the banquet of wine was prepared, the comely boon-companions came, and the wine circulated; but when it came round to that man, he rose upon his feet, and said, If the Prince of the Faithful give me permission, I will speak one word. El-Ma-moon replied, Say what thou wilt. And he said, The possessor of eminent judgment (whose eminence may God increase!) knoweth that the slave was to-day, in this noble assembly, one of the obscure among the people, and one of the mean among the company, and that the Prince of the Faithful hath raised him to a place near unto his own person, small as is the wisdom that he hath displayed, and hath elevated him to a rank above others, so that he hath attained to a goal to which his ambition did not aspire; and now he desireth to divest him of that small degree of wisdom which hath exalted him after his meanness, and enriched him after his poverty. But may God forbid, and by no means suffer, that the Prince of the Faithful should envy him for the small degree of wisdom and fame and excellence that he possesseth; for if the slave drink wine, wisdom will depart far from him, and ignorance will draw near to him, and he will be deprived of his politeness, and will return to his former contemptible station, and become despicable and obscure in the eyes of men. I therefore hope that the possessor of eminent judgment, of his bounty and generosity and princely qualities and excellent disposition, will not despise him of this jewel. — And when the Khaleefeh El-Ma-moon heard these words from him, he praised him and thanked him, caused him to sit again in his place and treated him with respect, gave orders to present him with a hundred thousand pieces of silver and to mount him upon a horse, and gave him magnificent apparel. And in every assembly he exalted and favoured him above all the professors, so that he became the highest of them in rank and degree. — And God is all-knowing.

NOTES TO CHAPTER FIFTEENTH

NOTE 1. Though the scenes of this story are Khurásán and some neighbouring country, in, or adjacent to, the north or north-east of Persia, its character throughout is Arabian.

NOTE 2. "Mejd-ed-Deen" signifies "the Glory of the Religion."

NOTE 3. On this first occasion of the mention of 'Alee Shér, the surname (Shér) is omitted in the edition from which I translate; namely, that of Cairo. As there afterwards written, this surname may be pronounced either "Shár" or (by what is termed "imáleh") "Shér:" but the latter is the preferable pronounciation; as the word is evidently the Persian "Shér," signifying "a Lion." In the edition of Breslau it is "Sheer," or "Sheyr."

NOTE 4. This couplet has occurred before: so also have the sixth in the same paragraph, slightly varied, and the eighth, and one in my original which I omit because it is similar to the eighth, which it immediately follows.

NOTE 5. A person who only tastes a thing may find sweetness in it, when it is bitter at the heart. "Dhaka," in the original, is put, by an error of the compositor, for "Dháka."

NOTE 6. See Note 42 to Chapter x.

NOTE 7. "Zumurrud" signifies "Emerald."

NOTE 8. "Rasheed-ed-Deen" signifies, in this case, "Rightly directed in Religion," or "Orthodox."

NOTE 9. The Arabs in general entertain a prejudice against blue eyes; a prejudice said to have arisen from the great number of blue-eyed persons among certain of their northern enemies.

NOTE 10. She compares the old man's mustaches to cotton, with which the nostrils, &c., of a corpse are stuffed. (See the second paragraph of Note 11 to Chapter vi.) From this it appears that the Arabs sometimes stuff the mouth of a corpse with cotton; but I have never heard of their doing so.

NOTE 11. Slapping the back of the neck is a common Arab custom, like slapping the face, or boxing the ears, in England; and beating with the shoe or slipper is one of the greatest insults that an Arab can offer. — The verse to which this note refers is, in my original, immediately followed by one too coarse to be translated.

NOTE 12. The Prophet forbade the dyeing of the hair black.

NOTE 13. The puppetmen here mentioned are the exhibitors of what we term "Chinese shadows," a show common in Arabian and other Eastern countries.

NOTE 14. See Note 81 to Chapter v.

NOTE 15. "Selsebeel" is the name of a fountain in Paradise.

NOTE 16. See Note 53 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 17. See Note 48 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 18. Seven different styles of writing are used by the Arabs in the present day. Herbin has given descriptions and specimens of them in an Essay on Oriental Caligraphy at the end of his "Développemens des Principes de la Langue Arabe Moderne."

NOTE 19. — On the Occupations of the Harem. Next to the service of her husband or master, the care of her children, and attending to other indispensable domestic duties, the most important occupation of the wife or concubine-slave is that of spinning or weaving or needle-work. "Sitting for an hour employed with the distaff is better for women," said the Prophet, "than a year's worship; and for every piece of cloth woven of the thread spun by them they shall receive the reward of a martyr." — 'Aisheh, the Prophet's wife, thus declared the merit of spinning: "Tell the women what I say. There is no woman who spins until she hath clothed herself but all the angels in the Seven Heavens pray for forgiveness of her sins; and she will go forth from her grave on the day of judgment wearing a robe of Paradise, and with a veil upon her head, and before her shall be an angel, and on her right an angel who will hand her a draught of the water of Selsebeel; and another angel will come to her, and carry her upon his wings, and bear her to Paradise. And when she enters Paradise, eighty thousand maidens will meet her, each maiden bringing a different robe; and she will have mansions of emeralds with three hundred doors, at each of which doors will stand an angel with a present from the Lord of the Throne." — The arts above mentioned are pursued by the females in the harems of the middle and higher classes. "Their leisure hours are mostly spent in working with the needle; particularly in embroidering handkerchiefs, head-veils, &c., upon a frame called 'mensej,' with coloured silks, and gold. Many women, even in the houses of the wealthy, replenish their private purses by ornamenting handkerchiefs and other things in this manner, and employing a dellâleh (or female broker) to take them to the market, or to other harems, for sale."

Thus it was in ancient Greece. We are told of Andromache, that — Far in the close recesses of the dome,

Pensive she ply'd the melancholy loom;
A growing work employ'd her secret hours,
Confus'dly gay with intermingled flow'rs.

Such also, until the decline of the Empire, was the habit of the Roman matrons. Of Augustus it is said, that his ordinary apparel was entirely of the manufacture of his wife, sister, daughter, and nieces.

NOTE 20. The word which I render "a tributary" (namely, "dhimmee,") signifies a client of the state, or one who, by paying an annual tribute, is entitled to the protection of the Muslims and to most of the civil rights which the latter enjoy.

NOTE 21.—On the Obligation imposed by eating Bread and Salt. The obligation which is imposed by eating another person's bread and salt, or salt alone, or eating such things with another, is well known; but the following example of it may be new to some readers.—Yaakoob the son of El-Leys Es-Saffâr, having adopted a predatory life, excavated a passage one night into the palace of Dirhem the Governor of Sijistân, or Seestân; and after he had "made up a convenient bale of gold and jewels, and the most costly stuffs, was proceeding to carry it off, when he happened in the dark to strike his foot against something hard on the floor. Thinking it might be a jewel of some sort or other, a diamond perhaps, he picked it up and put it to his tongue, and, to his equal mortification and disappointment, found it to be a lump of rock-salt; for having thus tasted the salt of the owner, his avarice gave way to his respect for the laws of hospitality; and throwing down his precious booty, he left it behind him, and withdrew empty-handed to his habitation. The treasurer of Dirhem repairing the next day, according to custom, to inspect his charge, was equally surprised and alarmed at observing that a great part of the treasure and other valuables had been removed; but on examining the package which lay on the floor, his astonishment was not less, to find that not a single article had been conveyed away. The singularity of the circumstance induced him to report it immediately to his master; and the latter causing it to be proclaimed throughout the city, that the author of this proceeding had his free pardon, further announced, that on repairing to the palace, he would be distinguished by the most encouraging marks of favour." Yaakoob availed himself of the invitation, relying upon the promise which was fulfilled to him; and from this period he gradually rose in power until he became the founder of a Dynasty.

NOTE 22. The Prophet is often invoked as an intercessor but not otherwise.

NOTE 23. Nearly the same couplet has occurred before. The idea expressed in the latter part of the first verse is found in a couplet in Dryden's Spanish Friar:—

There is a pleasure sure in being mad
Which none but madmen know:

and in Cowper's Task we have the following:—

There is a pleasure in poetic pains
Which none but poets know:

upon which Mr. Keightley remarks, "Though I think there is imitation here, I would not positively assert it."

NOTE 24. This is, as my sheykh states in a marginal note, the tradition of the Prophet, namely, his saying, "Whoso is in love, and acteth chastely, and concealeth [his passion], and dieth, dieth a martyr."

NOTE 25. The kind of broom here mentioned, called "mikashsheh," is short and flat and is sometimes made of the thickest part of a palm-stick; the larger portion of which, being soaked, is beaten until the fibres separate.

NOTE 26. From this question it seems that she feared he might be a Jinnee.

NOTE 27. "Kurdee" is the appellation of an individual of the nation called "El-Kurd," whose country, "Kurdistân," is on the south of Armenia. Salâh-ed-Deen (commonly called by Europeans "Saladin") was of this nation.—"Jawân" is a Persian word, from the same root as the Latin "juvenis," and has the same meaning.

NOTE 28. On feasts of this kind, see Note 7 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 29. A "hashshâsh" is a person addicted to the intoxicating hemp, called "hasheesh" and "hasheeshah."—See Note 46 to Chapter ii., and the fourth paragraph of Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 30. "Kishk" (as the word is commonly pronounced, but properly "keshik,") is prepared from wheat, first moistened, then dried, trodden in a vessel to separate the husks, and coarsely ground with a hand-mill: the meal is mixed with milk, and about six hours afterward is spooned out upon a little straw or bran, and then left for two or three days to dry. When required for use, it is either soaked or pounded, and put into a sieve, over a vessel; and then boiling water is poured on it. What remains in the sieve is thrown away: what passes through is generally poured into a saucepan of boiled meat or fowl, over the fire. Some leaves of white bete, fried in butter, are usually added to each plate of it.

NOTE 31. See Note 55 to Chapter ii., and Note 98 to Chapter x.

NOTE 32. The narrator uses this expression, fearing to say, "I am a Christian," even in repeating the words of another. — See Note 8 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 33. This expression again, like that just noticed, is worthy of remark. If a man, reading this work aloud, said, "Divorcement shall be incumbent upon me if henceforth I eat of sweet rice," some persons, having heard him say so, might swear that he applied the words seriously to himself, and had thereby bound himself to divorce his wife if ever he ate of that dish. — See Note 48 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 34. "Hâjj" signifies "pilgrim," and is the usual Arab title of one who has performed the pilgrimage to Mekkeh and Mount 'Arafât. The Turks and Persians use instead of it, the synonymous Arabic word "hâjjee."

NOTE 35: "Biting one's hand" is a common expression of the Arabs similar to ours of "biting one's lip."

NOTE 36. The streets being deserted by the men of the city, it was a fit opportunity for the women to look out from the windows, and for those who were neighbours thus to converse with each other.

NOTE 37. See above, Note 29.

NOTE 38. "His hand descends into the dish resembling the foot of a raven [with the thumb and first and second fingers nearly joined, and the other fingers turned up towards the palm of the hand], and comes up [so full that it is] like the foot of a camel," is a common proverb, applied to a coarse glutton. — See Burckhardt's "Arabic Proverbs," No. 756.

NOTE 39. Properly, "Rustam" (the name of the most celebrated of the Persian heroes); but pronounced by the Arabs, and generally, I believe, by the Turks, "Rustum."

NOTE 40. The words here rendered "I am of their number" also signify, "I am at the point of death," or "— in the agonies of death;" but the first is my sheykh's reading, and is more logical.

NOTE 41. The Sirât is the bridge which all must pass on the day of judgment, extending over the midst of Hell, finer than a hair, and sharper than the edge of a sword.

NOTE 42. See Note 55 to Chapter iii.

NOTES TO CHAPTER SIXTEENTH

NOTE 1. — Invention of the Air-bed. Hâroon Er-Rasheed seems to have been, like many other Easterns, much troubled with sleeplessness. The usual means employed to relieve or divert a person thus suffering are story-telling, music, and a gentle kneading or pressing of the flesh; and for the same purpose the air-bed was invented. El-Makreezee relates, in his account of the constructions of Khumâra-veyh (the Governor of Egypt), the son of Ahmad, the son of Tooloon, that upon his complaining of excessive sleeplessness, his physician advised him to make a pool of quicksilver. This pool he made in front of his palace, which was in the place now called the Rumeyleh: it was fifty cubits in length and the same in breadth; and its construction, and the filling it with quicksilver, cost a great sum of money. At the corners of the pool were pegs of pure silver, to which were attached, by rings of silver, strong bands of silk; and a bed of skins, inflated with air, being thrown upon the pool and secured in the midst of it by the bands of silk, remained in a continual state of agreeable vacillation while the Prince lay upon it.

NOTE 2. "İbn" signifies "son;" and "Ibn-Mansoor," "the Son of Mansoor."

NOTE 3. This is, of course, a monstrous exaggeration.

NOTE 4. So in the edition of Breslau. In the Cairo edition, "like two uk-howânehs." This name is generally given to the chamomile.

NOTE 5. See Note 43 to Chapter x.

NOTE 6. "Lutf" signifies "elegance," "delicacy," &c.

NOTE 7. We may suppose that he had learnt this of some passenger.

NOTE 8. See Note 34 to Chapter x.

NOTE 9. Nearly the same couplet has occurred before. See Note 19 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 10. "Benec-Sheybân" is the name of two tribes of Arabs.

NOTE 11. See Note 112 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 12. "Khoolej," also written "khalenj," is explained in dictionaries as the name of a tree from which wooden bowls are made.

NOTE 13. The word which I render "cranes" ("gharâneek") may perhaps here signify some other kind of long-necked aquatic birds. That which I render "porringers" is "sekáreej," plural of "sukroojeh," also written "sukrujeh," and "sujur-jeh," of Persian origin: the meaning which I have given to it (and which I find in a MS. dictionary of my own) appears to have been unknown to my sheykh. On the "sikbáj" see Note 98 to Chapter v.; but, I may add, there are other kinds of sikbáj than that which is there mentioned: vinegar, I believe, enters into the composition of all. Instead of "mourn over," we may read "call;" but I prefer the former sense, as it implies the celebration of the excellencies of that which is mourned over. The "katâ" is a kind of grouse, and has been before mentioned. The "browned meat" (in the original, "mohammar,") is meat cut into small pieces, and fried for a long time, till it becomes of a reddish-brown colour. — Four other verses follow in the original; but I have omitted them in my text, as I consider them inappropriate, and of little merit. I however insert them here: —

O the sighing of my heart for two dishes of fish that were placed by a cake of new bread on the stairs!
 God be praised for the supper! How excellent it was, with the pulse steeped in the vinegar of the jars,
 And the rice dressed with buffalo's milk, in which hands were plunged even to the arm-lets!
 O my soul, be patient; for God is bountiful: if thy means be narrow, He will give thee relief.

NOTE 14. "Such is the custom of men; when any one acteth ill towards them, they revile both him and every one who cometh from his country."

NOTE 15. He who dieth of love will enjoy Paradise. See Note 24 to Chapter xv.

NOTE 16. That is, forget not to beg mercy for me.

NOTE 17. Lám and Alif, when not united with any other letter, generally have the form of two nearly upright strokes, crossing each other obliquely, and connected at the feet.

NOTE 18. This phrase (in the original, "zálet 'anhu 'illetu-lledhee lá yensarif"), which I have freely rendered, bears another meaning, and conveys an allusion to a rule of grammar, with which the Arabic scholar is acquainted, and of which others will not require an explanation.

NOTE 19. — On the Festival of the New-year's-days. The Festival of the New-year's-days, commencing at the Vernal Equinox, is generally said to have been of Persian origin; but I think it not improbable that it originated from the Jewish Passover. It was the principal festival among the ancient Persians, and continued six days. On the first [called by them 'Now-róz,' and by the Arabs 'Nórooz,'] the King gave his chief attention to promote the happiness of the body of the people; on the second, he entertained the doctors and astrologers; on the third, the priests, and counsellors of state; on the fourth, the princes of the blood, and grandees; on the fifth, the royal children; and on the sixth, which was considered as the King's particular day, his subjects made him free gifts agreeable to their rank. On the eve of the Now-róz, a young man of an elegant figure, personating the new year, was stationed at the door of the royal bedchamber, which he entered without ceremony the moment the sun appeared above the horizon. The King, immediately addressing him, said, 'What art thou? Whence dost thou come? Whither dost thou go? What is thy name? Wherefore dost thou approach? And what dost thou bring?' To which he answered, 'I am the fortunate and the blessed: I am sent hither by God, and, bring with me the new year.' Then sitting down, another appeared with a large silver dish, in which were wheat, barley, peas, vetches, sesame, and rice (seven ears and nine grains of each), with a lump of sugar, and two new-coined pieces of gold, which, as an offering, were placed before the King. Then entered the prime-minister, the general of the forces, the lord high treasurer, and the superintendent of war; after whom followed the nobles and people, according to their dignity and respective classes. A large loaf, made of the above-mentioned grains, being then presented to the King, after eating part of it he offered some to those who were around him, saying, 'This is the new day, of the new month, of the new year, of the new time; when all things consistent with time must be renewed.' Then investing his nobles with rich robes, he blessed and distributed amongst them the presents which had been brought. The origin of this solemnity is carried up to one of their ancient Kings, called Jemshéd, who then made his first public entry into Istakhr (Persepolis), which he had just finished; and, amongst other regulations, ordered that the Persian era should commence from that day."

A custom similar to that described in the passage to which this note refers prevails at the present day in Egypt. It is termed "Shemm en-Naseem" (or "the Smelling of the Zephyr"), and is observed on the first day of the Khamáseen, which is a period of forty-nine days (when hot southerly winds are of frequent occurrence), commencing on the day immediately following the Coptic festival of Easter Sunday, and terminating on the Day of Pentecost, or Whit Sunday. Early in the morning of the first day of this period, many persons, especially women, break an onion, and smell it; and in the course of the forenoon, many of the citizens of Cairo ride or walk a little way into the country, or go in boats, generally northwards, to take the air, or, as they term it, smell the air, which, on that day, they believe to have a wonderfully beneficial effect. The greater number dine in the country, or on the river. — The 'ulamà (or learned), however, have their Shemm en-Naseem at a fixed period of the solar year; the first three days of the spring-quarter corresponding with the Persian Now-róz.

Having mentioned the period of the Khamáseen, I may add that I believe it has been called by all European writers who have mentioned it, except myself, "el-Khamseen," or by the same term differently expressed, signifying "the Fifty:" i. e. "the Fifty Days;" but it is always termed by the Arabs "el-Khamáseen," which signifies "the Fifties," being a vulgar plural of "Khamseen." In like manner, the Arabs call the corresponding period of the Jewish calendar by a term exactly agreeing with "el-Khamáseen;" namely "el-Khamseenát;" only its last day being termed "el-Khamseen;" as may be seen in an extract from El-Makreezee, given by De Sacy. This eminent orientalist, however, appears to have had no authority but that of Europeans for the name of the above-mentioned period of the Coptic calendar; for he has followed the travellers, and written it "khamsein."

NOTE 20. This story is followed by sixteen anecdotes, ending with part of the three hundred and fifty-seventh night; eleven of which I translate, and here insert.

Breaks of Fortune

It is related that a man was burdened with numerous debts, and his circumstances became strait unto him; so he left his people and his family, and went forth wandering in perplexity and at random. He ceased not to proceed until he approached, after a length of time, a city with lofty walls, and great buildings, and he entered it in a state of abasement and despondency. His hunger had become violent, and the journey had wearied him; and as he walked through one of its great thoroughfare-streets, he saw a company of the great passing along; whereupon he proceeded with them until they entered an abode resembling the abode of Kings, and he entered with them, and they went in until they came to a man sitting at the upper end of the mansion. He was of magnificent appearance, and great dignity, and surrounded by pages and servants as though he were of the sons of the wezeers; and when he saw the party he rose to them, and treated them with respectful hospitality. So trouble of mind overcame the man above mentioned at witnessing this thing, and he was confounded at that which he beheld of the beauty of the building, and the servants and dependants. He therefore drew back, in perplexity and distress, fearing for himself, until he seated himself in a place alone, remote from the people, that no one might see him. And while he was sitting, lo, there approached a man with whom were four dogs, of the dogs of the chase, decked with varieties of silk and brocade, and having, upon their necks, collars of gold with chains of silver; and he chained each of them in a separate place. Then he went away, and returned bringing to each dog a dish of gold full of rich food, and he put before each of them his separate dish, and departed and left them. This man therefore began to look at the food, on account of the violence of his hunger, and desired to advance to one of the dogs and to eat with him; but his fear of them prevented him. Presently, however, one of the dogs looked at him.

and God (whose name be exalted!) inspired him with a knowledge of his case: so he drew back from the dish, and made a sign to the man, who thereupon approached, and ate until he was satisfied, when he would have departed; but the dog made a sign to him that he should take the dish, with the food remaining in it, for himself, and pushed it towards him with his fore-paw. He therefore took it, and went forth from the house, and proceeded without any one following him.

He then journeyed to another city, where he sold the dish and, having purchased merchandise with its price, returned with it to his own town. There he sold what he had brought, and discharged the debts that he owed, and his wealth increased so that he became in a state of abundant affluence and perfect prosperity; and he ceased not to reside in his town for a length of time; after which, he said within himself, I must journey to the city of the owner of the dish, and take for him a handsome and suitable present, and pay him the price of the dish which one of his dogs bestowed upon me. Then he took a present befitting that person, and took with him the price of the dish, and set forth on his journey.

He ceased not in his journey days and nights until he arrived at that city, and he entered it, desiring to meet with the man; and he walked along its great thoroughfare-streets until he approached his abode. But he saw nothing of it save mouldering ruins, and a raven uttering its lamentable cry, and dwelling-places rendered desolate, and circumstances changed, and a state of things so altered as not to be recognized; whereupon his heart and soul were agitated, and he recited the words of the poet: —

The recesses are devoid of their hidden treasures, as hearts are devoid of sciences and piety;

And the valley is changed altogether, and its gazelles are not those antelopes, nor is its sand-heap that sand-heap.

And the saying of another: —

The phantom of Soadâ came by night to rouse me, towards morning, while my companions were sleeping in the desert:

But when we awoke to behold the nightly phantom, I saw the air vacant, and the place of visitation distant.

And when that man beheld those mouldering ruins, and saw what the hands of fortune had openly done unto them, and found of the substance nothing but traces, knowledge rendered it needless for him to ask information. He then looked aside, and saw a miserable man, in a state that made the skin to quake at it, and rock to be moved with sympathy for it; and he said, O thou! what have fortune and time done with the master of this place, and where are his shining full moons and brilliant stars, and what hath been the cause of the event that hath happened unto his structures, that there remaineth of them naught save the walls? He answered, He is this miserable wretch whom thou seest, sighing on account of that which hath come upon him. But knowest thou not (he added) that in the saying of the Apostle is a lesson to him who would follow it, and an admonition to him who would be directed aright,—his saying (God bless and save him!), Verily it is the way of God (whose name be exalted!) not to elevate any thing of this world without afterwards bringing it down? If thou inquire respecting the cause of this event, there is nothing in the vicissitudes of fortune wonderful. I was the master of this place, and its founder and proprietor and builder, and the possessor of its shining full moons and magnificent appurtenances and splendid rarities and beautiful slave-girls: fortune however hath turned from me, and taken away the servants and the wealth, and reduced me to this present condition, and brought upon me events that it before kept concealed. But there must be a cause for this thine inquiry. Acquaint me then with it, and cease to wonder.—So the man acquainted him with the whole affair, being the while in grief and distress, and said to him, I have brought thee a present such as souls desire, and the price of thy dish of gold that I took, for it was the cause of enriching me after my poverty, and of the replenishment of my abode after it was desolate, and of the dissipation of the anxiety and straitness that I suffered. But the other man shook his head, and wept and sighed and lamented, and said, O thou! I imagine thou art a madman: for this conduct proceedeth not from a man of sense. How should one of our dogs make thee a present of a dish of gold, and I take it back? My taking back that which my dog hath presented would be wonderful; and were I in the severest anxiety and disease, by Allah there should not find acceptance with me, from thee, any thing of the value of a nail-paring. So go to the place whence thou camest, in health and safety.—The man therefore kissed his feet, and went forth on his return, praising him; and on parting with him, and taking leave of him, recited this verse: —

The men and the dogs are gone together; and on the men and the dogs be peace!

—And God is all-knowing.

The Daring Sharper

There was, in the fortified coast-town of Alexandria, a Wálee named Hosám-ed-Deen; and as he was sitting in his seat of office one night, there came to him a trooper, who said to him, Know, O our lord the Wálee, that I entered this city in the present night, and took up my lodging in such a Khán, and slept there until a third of the night had passed; and when I awoke, I found my pair of saddle-bags cut open, and there had been stolen from it a purse containing a thousand pieces of gold. And his words were not ended when the Wálee sent, and caused the Mukaddams to come before him, and ordered them to bring all who were in the Khán, commanding them also to imprison those persons till the morning. So when the morning came, he gave orders to bring the instruments of punishment. He then caused those men to be brought before him in the presence of the trooper, the owner of the money, and was about to punish them.

But, lo, a man approached, forcing his way among the people until he stood before the Wálee and the trooper; and he said, O Emeer, release all these people; for they are unjustly treated: I am the person who took the property of this trooper, and here is the purse that I took from his saddle-bags. Then he produced it from his sleeve, and placed it before the Wálee and the trooper. So the Wálee said to the trooper, Receive thy property and take possession of it, and thou hast nothing further to demand of the people. And those people, and all who were present, began to praise that man, and to pray for him. But the man said, O Emeer, there was no cleverness in my presenting myself before thee, and bringing this purse: rather there would be cleverness in taking this purse a second time from this trooper. — And how, said the Wálee, didst thou do, O sharper, when thou tookest it?

O Emeer, he answered, I was standing in Cairo in the market of the money-changers, and saw this trooper when he took this gold in change and put it into the purse; and I followed him from by-street to by-street without finding any way of taking the property from him. Then he set forth on his journey, and I followed him from town to town, trying stratagems against him on the way; but could not take it from him. And when he entered this city, I followed him until he entered this Khán; whereupon I took my lodging next to him, and watched him until he slept and I heard his snoring; when I walked gently towards him, cut open the saddle-bags with this knife, and took the purse thus: — So saying, he stretched forth his hand, and took the purse from before the Wálee and the trooper, both of whom, with the rest of the people, drew back, looking at him, and believing that he would only shew them how he took the purse from the saddle-bags: but, lo, he ran, and threw himself into a pool of water. So the Wálee cried out to his dependants and said, Overtake him, and descend after him. They however had not pulled off their clothes and descended the steps before the sharper had gone his way: and they searched for him; but found him not; for the by-streets of Alexandria all communicate one with another. The men therefore returned without catching the sharper; and the Wálee said to the trooper, Thou hast no claim upon the people; for thou hast known thine offender, and taken possession of thy property, and not guarded it. And the trooper arose, his money was lost, and the people were saved from his hands and from those of the Wálee, entirely through the favour of God, whose name be exalted!

The Strange Tales of The Three Wálees

El-Melik en-Násir summoned one day the three Wálees, the Wálee of El-Káhíreh, the Wálee of Boolák, and the Wálee of Misr el-Kadeemeh, and said, I desire that each of you acquaint me with the most wonderful thing that hath happened to him during the period of his holding the office of Wálee. And they replied, We hear and obey.

Accordingly, the Wálee of El-Káhíreh said, Know, O our lord the Sultán, that the most wonderful thing that hath happened to me during the period of my holding the office of Wálee was as follows: — There were, in this city, two legal witnesses, who gave testimony respecting blood and wounds; but they were addicted to the love of [disreputable] women, and the drinking of wine, and iniquity; and I could succeed in no stratagem to revenge myself upon them. So being unable to do this, I charged the vintners, and the sellers of dried fruits, and those of fresh fruits, and the dealers in candles, and the keepers of houses prepared for vicious practices, that they should inform me of these two witnesses whenever they might be in a place drinking, or committing any act of iniquity, whether they should be together or separate, and if they bought, or either of them bought, any thing of these persons that was designed for the purpose of carousing; and that they should not conceal it from me. They replied, that they heard and obeyed. And it happened that a man came to me one night, and said, O our lord, know that the two witnesses are in such a place, in such a by-street, in the house of such-a-one, and that they are engaged in abominable iniquity. So I arose and disguised myself, I and my young man, and I repaired to them without any one accompanying me save my young man, and stopped not on the way until I stood before the door and knocked; whereupon a female slave came to me and opened to me the door, and said, Who art thou? So I entered without answering her; and I beheld the two witnesses and the master of the house sitting, with common women, and with abundance of wine. But when they saw me, they rose to me, treated me with honour, seated me at the upper end of the apartment, and said to me, Welcome to thee, as an excellent guest, and a polite boon-companion! They met me without fearing me or being alarmed; and after that, the master of the house arose from them, and, having been absent a while, returned bringing three hundred pieces of gold, without the least fear; and they said, Know, O our lord the Wálee, that thou canst do more than disgrace us, and that it is in thy power to chastise us; but naught save fatigue would accrue to thee from doing so. It is advisable, therefore, that thou receive this sum, and protect us, for God (whose name be exalted!) is named the Excellent Protector, and He loveth of his servants such as are liberal of protection; and thou wilt receive a reward and recompense.—So I said to myself, Receive this gold from them, and protect them this time; and if thou have them in thy power another time, take thy revenge upon them. I coveted the money, and took it from them, and left them and departed, no one knowing what I had done. But suddenly on the following day a sergeant the Kádee came to me, and said, Wálee, have the goodness to answer the summons of the Kádee; for he citeth thee. I arose, therefore, and went with him to the Kádee, not knowing the cause of this; and when I went in to him, I saw the two witnesses and the master of the house who gave me the three hundred pieces of gold sitting with him; and the master of the house arose and sued me for three hundred pieces of gold. It was not in my power to deny it; and he produced a written obligation, and those two legal witnesses testified against me that I owed the money. So it was established with the Kádee by the testimony of the two witnesses, and he ordered me to pay that sum. I therefore went not forth from them until they had received from me the three hundred pieces of gold; and I was enraged, purposing every kind of mischief against them, and repented that I had not tormented them; and I departed in a state of the utmost confusion.

Then arose the Wálee of Boolák, and said, As to myself, O our lord the Sultán, the most wonderful thing that hath happened to me since I have been Wálee was this:—I had debts to pay amounting to three hundred thousand pieces of gold; and, being distressed thereby, I sold what was behind me and what was before me and what was in my hand, and thus collected one hundred thousand pieces of gold and no more. I therefore remained in great perplexity; and while I was sitting in my house one night, in this state, a person knocked at the door; upon which I said to one of the young men, See who is at the door. And he went forth, and then returned to me with sallow countenance, changed in complexion, and with the muscles of his side quivering. So I said to him, What hath befallen thee? And he answered, Verily at the door is a man stripped of his proper clothing, and clad in apparel of leather, and with a sword, and in his girdle is a knife, and with him is a party of men equipped in the same manner, and he asketh for thee. I therefore took my sword in my hand, and went forth to see who these were and, lo, they were as the young man had said. I asked them, What is your affair? And they answered, We are robbers, and we have acquired this night vast booty, and assigned it to thee, that thou mayest thereby help thyself to manage the affair on account of which thou art in anxiety, and pay the debt that thou owest. I said to them, And where is the booty? And they brought before me a great chest full of vessels [apparently] of gold and silver. So when I beheld it, I rejoiced, and said within myself, I will pay the debt that I owe from this, and there will remain to me as much again as the amount of that debt. I therefore took it, and entered the house, and said within myself, It would not be consistent with humanity in me to let them go without any thing. Accordingly, I took the hundred thousand pieces of gold that were in my possession, and gave it to them, thanking them for what they had done; and they took the pieces of gold and went their way under the covering of night, without any one's knowing of their coming. But when the morning arrived, I saw that the contents of the chest were gilded brass, and tin, the whole of them worth but five hundred pieces of silver; and the thing afflicted me: the pieces of gold that I had were lost: and my grief was increased.

Then the Wálee of Misr el-Kadeemeh arose and said, O our lord the Sultán, with regard to myself, the most wonderful thing that hath happened to me during the period of my holding the office of Wálee was this:—I hanged ten robbers, each on a separate gallows, and charged the guards to watch them, and not to suffer the people to take away any one of them. But on the morrow I came to see them, and beheld two men hanged upon one gallows: so I said to the guards, Who did this, and where is the gallows on which was the second of these hanged men? They however denied the fact; and I was about to beat them, when they said, Know, O Emeer, that we slept last night; and when we awoke, we found that one hanged man had been stolen, together with the gallows on which he was suspended; whereupon we feared thee; and, lo, a peasant on a journey approached us having with him an ass; and we seized him and killed him, and hanged him instead of the one that was stolen, on this gallows. And I wondered at this, and said to them, What was with the peasant? They answered, With him was a pair of saddle-bags on the ass.—And what, said I, was in them? They answered, We know not. And I said to them, Bring me the saddle-bags. So they placed them before me; and I gave orders to open them; and, lo, in them was a murdered man, cut in pieces; and when I saw this, I wondered at it, and said within myself, Extolled be the perfection of God! The cause of the hanging of this peasant was naught but the crime that he had committed against this murdered man; and thy Lord is not tyrannical towards his servants!

The Robber Who Tricked the Money-changer

It is related that a man of the money-changers had with him a purse full of gold, and he had passed by the robbers; whereupon one of the sharpers said, I am able to take this purse. The others said to him, How wilt thou do? And he replied, See ye. Then he followed the money-changer to his abode, and the latter entered, and, having thrown down the purse upon the suffeh, called to a slave-girl to bring a ewer of water for ablution; and the slave-girl took the ewer to him, and followed him into a private chamber, leaving the street-door open. So the robber entered, took the purse, and repaired with it to his companions, whom he told what had happened to him with the money-changer and the slave-girl. They replied, By Allah, that which thou hast done was a clever exploit, and not every man is capable of performing such; but (they added) immediately the money-changer will come forth from the private chamber, and, not finding the purse, will beat the slave-girl, and inflict upon her a painful punishment; and it seemeth that thou hast not done any thing for which thou art to be praised. If then thou be a clever sharper, save the slave-girl from the beating and punishment.—So he said to them, If it be the will of God (whose name be exalted!), I will save the slave-girl and the purse.

Then the robber returned to the house of the money-changer, and found him punishing the slave-girl on account of the purse; and he knocked at his door; whereupon the money-changer said to him, Who is this? And he answered him, I am the young man of thy neighbour in the Keysá-reeyeh. The money-changer therefore came forth to him, and said to him, What is thy business? And he answered him, My master saluteth thee, and saith to thee, thy habits are all changed. How is it that thou throwest down such a thing as this purse at the door of the shop, and goest and leavest it? Had any stranger found it, he had taken it and gone away.—And had not my master seen it and taken care of it, thou hadst lost it.—He then took forth the purse, and showed it to him; and when the money-changer saw it, he said, This is my purse itself. And he stretched forth his hand to take it from the sharper; but the latter said to him, By Allah I will not give it to thee until thou write a paper to my master stating that thou hast received the purse from me; for I fear he may not believe me that thou hast taken the purse and received it safely unless thou write for me a paper and seal it with thy seal. So the money-changer entered to write for him a paper acknowledging the safe arrival of the purse as he had told him, and the robber went his way with the purse, and the slave-girl was saved from the punishment.

[The next anecdote describes a trick exactly of the same kind as that related by the second of "the Three Wálees;" and therefore I omit it.]

The Girl with the Beautiful Hands

It is related that the Prince of the Faithful, El-Ma-moon, said to Ibráheem the son of El-Mahdee, Tell us the most wonderful thing that thou hast witnessed. And he replied, I hear and obey, O Prince of the Faithful.

Know that I went forth one day to divert myself, and my course led me to a place where I smelt the odour of food, and my soul longed for it. I stopped, O Prince of the Faithful, in perplexity, unable to depart from the spot or to enter that dwelling; and I raised my eyes, and, lo, there was a lattice-window, behind which were a hand and wrist, than which I had never beheld any more beautiful. My reason fled at the sight of them, and I forgot the odour of the food on account of that hand and wrist, and began to devise a stratagem by means of which to obtain access to that dwelling. And, lo, there was a tailor near unto that place: so I advanced to him and saluted him, and he returned my salutation. I then said to him, To whom belongeth this house? He answered, To a man of the merchants. And I said, What is his name?—His name, he answered, is such-a-one the son of such-a-one, and he carouseeth with none but the merchants. And while we were speaking, lo, there approached two comely, intelligent men, and he informed me that they were his most particular associates, and acquainted me with their names.

I therefore urged on my beast until I met them, when I said to them, May I be your ransom! The father of such-a-one hath thought you tardy.—And I proceeded with them till we arrived at the door; whereupon I entered, and the two men entered also; and when the master of the house saw me with them, he doubted not that I was their associate: so he welcomed me, and seated me in the highest of places. Then the servants brought the table, and I said within myself, God hath granted me the attainment of my desire with respect to these viands, and there remain the hand and the wrist. And after this, we removed for the purpose of carousal to another apartment, which I found decked all over with elegant objects; and the master of the house busied himself in shewing me courtesy, addressing his conversation to me, as he imagined me to be a guest of his guests, while they in like manner treated me with the utmost courtesy, imagining me to be a companion of the master of the house. They all continued incessantly their politeness to me until we had drunk several cups, when there came forth to us a damsel like a willow-branch, of the utmost elegance and comeliness of appearance, and she took a lute, and, with exciting modulations, sang these verses:—

Is it not wonderful that one house should contain us, and yet thou drawest not near, nor speakest?

Only eyes reveal the secrets of souls, and the breaking of hearts by love's fire inflamed. We have only signals with the eyes and eyebrows, and sidelong glances, and the hand saluting.

Disquieting feelings were excited in me, O Prince of the Faithful, and I was moved with delight by the excess of her beauty, and the elegance of her verses that she sang, and envied her for the excellence of her performance; but I said, Thou wastest one thing, O slave-girl. And upon this, she threw the lute from her hand in anger, and said, When were ye wont to bring impertinent dolts into your assemblies?

So I repented of that which I had done, and I saw that the party were displeased with me; wherefore I said, All that I hoped for hath eluded me, and I see no resource by which to avert reproach from me save this: I demanded a lute, and said, I will shew what was omitted by her of the air that she played. And the party replied, We hear and obey. They immediately brought me a lute, and I tuned its strings, and sang these verses:—

This is thy lover, prostrated in his passion; the enamoured, whose tears are running down upon his body;

He hath one hand raised in supplication to the Compassionate, for the attainment of his hope, and the other on his heart.

O thou who beholdest one perishing of his love, his death is occasioned by his eye and by his hand.

And upon this the slave-girl sprang up, and threw herself upon my feet, kissing them, and said, It is thine to excuse, O my master! By Allah I knew not thy dignity, nor have I ever heard the like of this performance.—Then the party began to honour and exalt me, after they had been moved with extreme delight; and each of them requested me to sing. I therefore sang an exciting piece, and the party became intoxicated, their reason quitting them, so that the two guests were carried away to their houses, and the master of the house alone remained with the slave-girl. And after he had drunk some cups with me, he said, O my master, my life hath passed unprofitably, since I have not known such a person as thyself before the present time. By Allah, then, O my master, tell me who thou art, that I may know my cup-companion with whom God hath favoured me this night.—And I began to give ambiguous hints, without telling him plainly my name. But he conjured me: so I informed him. And when he knew my name, he sprang upon his feet, and said, I wondered to think that this excellence could belong to any but thyself; and fortune hath granted me a favour for which I am unable to render due thanks; but perhaps this is a dream; for when did I hope that one connected with the Khaleefeh would visit me in my abode, and pass this night carousing with me?

I conjured him to sit; and he sat, and began to enquire of me the cause of my visiting him, in the most polite manner. So I acquainted him with the affair from first to last, concealing nothing of it, and said, With regard to the food, I have attained what I sought; but with regard to the hand and wrist, I have not attained my desire. He replied, With regard to the hand and wrist, thou shalt attain thy desire, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! Then he said, O such-a-one [mentioning a female name], tell such-a-one that she is to come down. And he proceeded to call for his female slaves, one after another, and to shew them all unto me; but I saw not the object of my affection, until he said, By Allah, O my master, there remain none save my mother and my sister; but, by Allah, they must be brought down to thee and shewn to thee, that thou mayest see them. And I wondered at his generosity, and his frankness of mind; and I said, May I be thy ransom! Begin then with the sister.—He replied, With pleasure. Then his sister came down and he shewed me her hand, and, lo, she was the person, whose hand and wrist I had seen. So I said, May I be thy ransom! This damsel is she whose hand and wrist I saw.—And he ordered the young men to bring the witnesses immediately. They therefore brought them; and he produced two myriads of pieces of gold, and said to the witnesses, This our lord, Seyyidee Ibrâheem the son of El-Mahdee, the uncle of the Prince of the Faithful, demandeth in marriage my sister such-a-one, and I call you to witness that I have married her to him and he has given her as her dowry a myriad. And after this he said, I marry to thee my sister such-a-one for the said dowry. I replied, I accept that offer, and approve of it. Then he paid one of the two myriads to his sister, and the other to the witnesses; and said, O our lord, I desire to furnish one of the chambers for thee and thy wife. But I was abashed at that which I had experienced of his generosity, and was ashamed to accept his proposal: so I said, Equip her and send her to my abode.—And by thy existence, O Prince of the Faithful, there were brought to me, of her paraphernalia, such things that our rooms were too small to contain them, spacious as they were. Then I had by her this boy who is standing before thee.

And El-Ma-moon wondered at the generosity of this man, and said, Divinely was he gifted! I have never heard of the like of him!—He ordered Ibrâheem the son of El-Mahdee to bring the man that he might see him. So he brought him before the Khaleefeh, who desired him to speak, and his politeness and good breeding so pleased him that he made him one of his chief attendants.—And God is the Giver, and the Liberal Bestower.

The Reward of Charity

It is related that a certain King said to the people of his dominions, if any one of you give aught in alms, I will assuredly cut off his hand. So all the people refrained from alms-giving, and none could bestow upon another. And it happened that a beggar came to a woman one day, and hunger tormented him, and he said to her, Give me somewhat as an alms.—How, said she, can I bestow an alms upon thee when the King cutteth off the hand of every one who doth so? But he rejoined, I conjure thee by God (whose name be exalted!) that thou give me an alms. So when he conjured her by God, she was moved with pity for him, and bestowed upon him two cakes of bread. And the news reached the King; whereupon he gave orders to bring her before him; and when she came, he cut off her hands. And she returned to her house.

Then the King, after a while, said to his mother, I desire to marry: therefore, marry me to a comely woman. And she replied, There is, among our female slaves, a woman than whom none more beautiful existeth; but she hath a grievous defect.—And what is it? he asked. She answered, She is maimed of the two hands.

The King however said, I desire to see her. Wherefore she brought her to him, and when he saw her, he was tempted by her beauty, and married her. And that woman was she who bestowed upon the beggar the two cakes of bread, and whose hands were cut off on that account. But when he had married her, her fellow-wives envied her, and wrote to the King, telling him that she was unchaste: and she had given birth to a son. And the King wrote a letter to his mother, in which he commanded her to go forth with her to the desert, and to leave her there, and return.

His mother therefore did so: she took her forth to the desert, and returned. And that woman began to weep for the misfortune that had befallen her, and to bewail violently, with a wailing not to be exceeded. And while she was walking, with the child upon her neck, she came to a river, and kneeled down to drink, because of the violence of the thirst that had affected her from her walking and fatigue and grief; and when she stooped her head, the child fell into the water. So she sat weeping violently for her child; and while she wept, lo, there passed by her two men, who said to her, What causeth thee to weep? She answered, I had a child upon my neck, and he fell into the water. And they said, Dost thou desire that we rescue him, and restore him to thee? She answered, Yes. And upon this they supplicated God (whose name be exalted!), and the child came forth to her safe and unhurt. Then they said to her, Dost thou desire that God should restore to thee thy hands as they were? She answered, Yes. And they supplicated God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!); whereupon her hands returned to her in the most perfect state. After this they said to her, Knowest thou who we are? — God, she replied, is all-knowing. And they said, We are thy two cakes of bread which thou gavest as an alms to the beggar, and which alms occasioned the cutting off of thy hands. Therefore praise God (whose name be exalted!) that He hath restored to thee thy hands and thy child. — And she praised God (whose name be exalted!), and glorified Him.

The Generous Israelite

There was, among the Children of Israel, a devout man, having a family who spun cotton; and he used every day to sell the thread that they spun, and to buy fresh cotton; and with the profit that arose he bought, for his family, food, which they ate that day. And he went forth one day, and sold the thread which they had spun, and there met him one of his brethren, who complained to him of his need; whereupon he gave him the price of his thread, and returned to his family without either cotton or food. So they said to him, Where is the cotton and the food? And he answered them, Such-a-one met me, and complained to me of his need; wherefore I gave him the price of the thread. They said, And what shall we do; for we have nothing to sell? But they had a broken wooden bowl, and a jar; and he took them to the market. No one, however, would buy them of him; but while he was in the market, there met him a man with a stinking, swollen fish, which no one would buy of him; and the owner of the fish said to him, Wilt thou sell to me thy unmarketable property for mine? He answered, Yes: — and gave the man the wooden bowl and the jar, receiving from him the fish, which he brought to his family. They said, What shall we do with this fish? He answered, We will broil it and feed upon it until God (whose name be exalted!) please to supply us with sustenance. They therefore took it, and ripped open its belly, and they found in it a pearl. So they informed the sheykh [the devotee]; and he said, See if it be pierced; for if so, it belongeth to some one of the people; but if it be not pierced, it is a gift which God (whose name be exalted!) hath bestowed upon you. And they looked, and, lo, it was not pierced. And when the morning came, he went with it to one of his brethren, of those who were acquainted with pearls; and this person said, O such-a-one, whence gottest thou this pearl? He answered, It is a gift which God (whose name be exalted!) hath bestowed upon us. And the man said, Verily it is worth a thousand pieces of silver, and I will give thee that sum; but take it to such-a-one; for he is of more wealth and knowledge than myself. So he took it to him, and he said, Verily it is worth seventy thousand pieces of silver: not more than that. Then he paid him seventy thousand pieces of silver; and the sheykh called the porters, who carried for him the money until he arrived at the door of his dwelling; when a beggar came to him, and said to him, Give me of that which God (whose name be exalted!) hath given unto thee. And he said to the beggar, We were yesterday like thee. Take half of this money. — And when he had divided the money into two equal portions, and each of them had taken his half, the beggar said to him, Keep thy money, and take it: may God bless thee in it: for verily I am a messenger of thy Lord, who hath sent me to thee to try thee. And the sheykh said, To God be praise and thanks!—And he ceased not to pass a most comfortable life, he and his family, until death.

Aboo-Hassán and the Dream of El-Ma-moon

Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee saith, My circumstances one day became severely straitened, so that the grocer and the baker and the rest of the tradesmen importuned me, and my affliction became violent, and I found no resource. But while I was in this state, not knowing what to do, lo, there came in to me a young man belonging to me, and he said, At the door is a man on pilgrimage, who desireth to come in to thee. So I said, Give him permission. And he came in; and, behold, he was a man of Khurásán. He saluted me, and I returned his salutation; and he said, Art thou Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee? I answered, Yes. And what, said I, dost thou want?—I am a stranger, he answered, and am desirous of performing the pilgrimage, and I have with me a sum of money, the carrying of which is a burden to me: wherefore I desire to deposit with thee these ten thousand pieces of silver until I accomplish my pilgrimage and return: and if the caravan return and thou see me not, know that I have died, and the money is a present from me unto thee; but if I return, it is mine. I replied, Thy desire shall be complied with, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! And he took forth a leathern bag; and I said to the young man, Bring me a pair of scales. So he brought a pair of scales, and the man weighed the money, and, having delivered it to me, went his way. I then summoned the tradesmen, and paid my debts, and expended and made ample purchases, saying within myself, Ere he returneth, God will aid me with somewhat of his gifts.

But after a day, the young man came in to me, and said to me, Thy acquaintance the man of Khurásán is at the door. I replied, Give him permission: And he entered, and said, I had determined on performing the pilgrimage; but news hath been brought to me of the death of my father; and I have resolved to return; therefore give me the money that I entrusted to thee yesterday. Now when I heard from him these words, excessive anxiety overcame me, such as none hath ever experienced; and I was perplexed, and returned him not a reply; for if I denied, I knew that he would require me to swear, and ignominy would have been my lot in the world to come; and if I informed him that I had expended it, he would [I imagined] have cried out, and disgraced me. So at last I said, God preserve thee in health! This my abode is not a strong nor a secure place of custody for that money; and when I received thy leathern bag, I sent it to him with whom it now is: therefore return to us to-morrow to receive it, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted!—Accordingly he departed from me; and I passed the night in perplexity on account of the return of the man of Khurásán to me, and sleep came not to me that night, nor could I close my eye. So I arose and went to the young man, and said to him, Saddle for me the mule.—O my lord, he replied, it is now the first third of the night, and indeed nought of the night hath passed. I therefore returned to my bed; but sleep was forbidden me, and I ceased not to rouse the young man, who continued to turn me back from my purpose, until the dawn rose, when he saddled for me the mule, and I mounted. I knew not whither to go: so I threw the mule's bridle upon her shoulders, and became occupied with reflection and anxieties, while she proceeded to the eastern side of Baghdád.

And while I was passing on, lo, I beheld a company, and I turned from them, and went out of their way to another way; but they followed me; and when they saw me with a teylesán, they hastened towards me, and said to me, Dost thou know the abode of Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee? I answered them, I am he. And they said, Answer the summons of the Prince of the Faithful. I therefore proceeded with them until I went in to El-Ma-moon; and he said to me, Who art thou? I answered, A man of the companions of the Kádee Aboo Yoosuf, one of the professors of the law and of the traditions. He asked, By what surname of relationship art thou called? I answered, By the surname of Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee. And he said, Explain to me thy case. So I explained to him my story, and he wept violently, and said, Wo to thee! The Apostle of God (may God bless and save him!) suffered me not to sleep this last night because of thee; for when I slept in the beginning of the night, he said to me [in a dream], Aid Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee. And I awoke, and knew thee not. Then a second time I slept, and he came to me, and said to me, Wo to thee! Aid Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee.— And I awoke, and knew thee not. Then I slept again, and he came to me, and still I knew thee not. And again I slept, and he came to me, and said to me, Wo to thee! Aid Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee.— So I dared not sleep after that. I remained awake the whole of the remainder of the night, and roused the people, and sent them to seek for thee in every quarter.— He then gave to me ten thousand pieces of silver, saying, This is for the man of Khurásán. And after that, he gave me ten thousand more pieces of silver, and said, Make, with this ample purchases, and reform thy circumstances with it. Then he gave me thirty thousand pieces of silver, saying, Equip thyself with this, and when the day of the state-procession arriveth, come to me, that I may invest thee with an office.

So I went forth, taking the money with me, and having returned to my house, performed there the morning-prayers; and, lo, the man of Khurásán came. I brought him into the house, and produced to him ten thousand pieces, saying to him, This is thy money, But he replied, This is not my very money. I said, Yes. And he asked, What is the cause of this? I therefore related to him the story; whereupon he wept, and said, By Allah, hadst thou told me the truth in the beginning of the affair I had not demanded the money of thee; and now, by Allah, I will not accept aught of this money: thou art absolved of responsibility with respect to it. And he departed from me. I then arranged my affairs, and repaired on the day of the state-procession to the gate of El-Ma-moon, and I went in to him as he sat. And when I presented myself before him, he called me near to him, and produced unto me a written appointment from beneath his prayer-carpet, saying, This is an appointment conferring the office of Kádee of the Noble City, from the western side [of the mosque], from the Báb es-Selám, to an extent unlimited; and I have assigned thee such and such allowances every month. Then fear God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!), and be mindful of the solicitude of the Apostle of God (may God bless and save him!) respecting thee.— And the people wondered at his words, and asked me their meaning: so I acquainted them with the story from beginning to end, and the report spread among the people.

And Aboo-Hassán Ez-Ziyádee ceased not to be Kádee in the Noble City until he died, in the days of El-Ma-moon. The mercy of God be on him!

A Friend in Need

It is related that a man possessed great wealth, and it departed from him, and he became destitute of everything; whereupon his wife advised him to seek of one of his friends something wherewith to repair his condition. So he betook himself to a friend of his, and mentioned to him his necessity; and this friend lent him five hundred pieces of gold, that he might traffic with them. Now he was originally a jeweller. He therefore took the gold, and went to the market of jewels, where he opened a shop to buy and sell. And when he sat in the shop, there came to him three men, who inquired of him respecting his father; and he told them of his death; upon which they said to him, hath he left any offspring? He answered, He hath left the slave who is before you.— And who, said they, knoweth that thou art his son? He answered, The people of the market. And they said to him, bring them together to us, that they may testify that thou art his son. He therefore collected them, and they testified to that fact. And the three men produced a pair of saddle-bags containing the sum of thirty thousand pieces of gold, together with jewels and precious minerals; and they said, This was deposited with us in trust for thy father. Then they departed; and there came to him a woman, who demanded of him some of those jewels worth five hundred pieces of gold, and bought them of him for three thousand pieces of gold. And he sold them to her, and took the five hundred pieces of gold that he had borrowed of his friend, and carried them to him, and said to him, Receive the five hundred pieces of gold that I borrowed of thee; for God hath aided me and prospered me. But his friend replied, I presented thee with them, and gave them up for the sake of God: therefore take them; and take this paper, but read it not until thou art in thy house, and act agreeably with its contents: so he took the money and the paper, and repaired to his house; and when he opened the paper, he found written in it these verses:—

The men who came to thee were my relations, my father and my paternal uncle and my maternal uncle Sálch the son of 'Alee.

In like manner, what thou soldest for cash, to my mother thou soldest it; and the money and jewels were sent from me.

I desired not, by doing so, any detriment to thee; but to spare thee the embarrassment of bashfulness before me.

The Man Enriched Through a Dream

It is related also, that a man of Baghdád was possessed of ample riches and great wealth; but his wealth passed away, and his state changed, and he became utterly destitute, and could not obtain his sustenance save by laborious exertion. And he slept one night, overwhelmed and oppressed, and saw in his sleep a person who said to him, Verily thy fortune is in Cairo: therefore seek it and repair to it. So he journeyed to Cairo; and when he arrived there, the evening overtook him, and he slept in a mosque. Now there was, adjacent to the mosque, a house; and as God (whose name be exalted!) had decreed, a party of robbers entered the mosque, and thence passed to that house; and the people of the house, awaking at the disturbance occasioned by the robbers raised cries; whereupon the Wálee came to their aid with his followers, and the robbers fled. The Wálee then entered the mosque, and found the man of Baghdád sleeping there: so he laid hold upon him, and inflicted upon him a painful beating with mikra'ahs, until he was at the point of death, and imprisoned him; and he remained three days in the prison; after which, the Wálee caused him to be brought, and said to him, From what country art thou? He answered, From Baghdád.—And what affair, said the Wálee, was the cause of thy coming to Cairo? He answered, I saw in my sleep a person who said to me, Verily thy fortune is in Cairo: therefore repair to it. And when I came to Cairo, I found the fortune of which he told me to be those blows of the mikra'ahs, that I have received from thee.—And upon this the Wálee laughed so that his grinders appeared, and said to him, O thou of little sense, I saw three times in my sleep a person who said to me, Verily a house in Baghdád, in such a district, and of such a description, hath in its court a garden, at the lower end of which is a fountain, wherein is wealth of great amount: therefore repair to it and take it. But I went not; and thou, through the smallness of thy sense, hast journeyed from city to city on account of a thing thou hast seen in sleep, when it was only an effect of confused dreams.—Then he gave him some money, and said to him, Help thyself with this to return to thy city. So he took it and returned to Baghdád. Now the house which the Wálee had described, in Baghdád, was the house of that man; therefore when he arrived at his abode, he dug beneath the fountain, and beheld abundant wealth. Thus God enriched and sustained him; and this was a wonderful coincidence.

The Arrogant Slave Girl

There were, in the palace of the Prince of the Faithful, El-Mutawekkil 'ala-lááh, four hundred concubines, two hundred Greeks, and two hundred muwelledehs and Abyssinians; and 'Obeyd the son of Táhir gave to El-Mutawekkil four hundred slave-girls, two hundred white, and two hundred Abyssinians and muwelledehs. Among these was a slave-girl of the muwelledehs of El-Basrah, named Mahboobeh. She was preeminent in beauty and loveliness, and in elegance and amorous manners; she played upon the lute, and sang well, composed verses, and wrote an excellent hand; and El-Mutawekkil in consequence became captivated by her, and could not bear to be absent from her a single hour. But when she saw his affection for her, she behaved arrogantly towards him, and was ungrateful for his favours: so he became violently incensed against her, and deserted her, forbidding the inmates of the palace to speak to her.

She remained in that state some days; but El-Mutawekkil still had an affection for her; and he arose in the morning one day, and said to his usual associates, I dreamed this last night that I became reconciled to Mahboobeh. They replied, We beg of God (whose name be exalted!) that such an event may happen when thou art awake. And while he was speaking, lo, a maid-servant came, and communicated some information to him: upon which he arose from the assembly and entered the abode of the Hareem. And the communication that she made to him was this: she said to him, We heard from the chamber of Mahboobeh the sound of singing, and playing upon the lute, and we know not the cause of this. And when he arrived at her chamber, he heard her singing to the lute, striking it sweetly, and singing these verses:—

I wander through the palace and behold not any one unto whom to complain, nor any one to speak to me;
As though I had committed an act of rebellion, of which no repentance could avail to acquit me.
Is there any intercessor to plead for me with a King who hath paid me a visit in sleep and made peace with me,
And who, when the daybreak appeared unto us, resumed his desertion, and severed me from him?

So when El-Mutawekkil heard her words, he wondered at these verses, and at this strange coincidence; at Mahboobeh's seeing a dream agreeing with his dream. He therefore went in to her in the chamber; and when he entered and she was sensible of his presence, she hastened to rise to him, and threw herself upon his feet, kissing them, and saying, By Allah, O my lord, I saw this event in my sleep last night; and when I awoke, I composed these verses. — By Allah, replied El-Muttawekkil, I beheld in my sleep the like of this. Then they embraced each other, and became reconciled; and he remained with her seven days with their nights. And Mahboobeh had written upon her cheek, with musk, the name of El-Mutawekkil; and his name was Jaafar; and when he beheld his name so written, he composed and recited these verses: —

She wrote Jaafar with musk on her cheek.
With my soul would I ransom her who wrote on the cheek what I see.
If her fingers have inscribed one line upon her cheek, she hath deposited many lines in my heart.
O thou whom Jaafar among mankind possesseth, may God fill Jaafar with the draught of thy love!

And when El-Mutawekkil died, all the female slaves that had belonged to him dismissed him from their minds, except Mahboobeh; for she ceased not to mourn for him until she died, and she was buried by his side. — The mercy of God be on them all!

NOTES TO CHAPTER SEVENTEENTH

NOTE 1. The words "in the country of the Persians" are not in my original. In the Breslau edition, the King mentioned immediately after is called "a King of the Persians, named the King Sáboor," an Arabic corruption of "Shápoor," which was a name borne by several Kings of Persia. In the old version, the court of this monarch is said to have been at Sheeráz. — On the origin of the tale of the Magic Horse some remarks will be made in the last note of the present series.

NOTE 2. — On the Persian Festival of the Autumnal Equinox. The sentence to which this note refers I have taken from the Breslau edition, correcting some errors. Of the first of the two festivals here mentioned, I have already given some account.

The festival of the Autumnal Equinox, called "Mihrgán," "Mihrrján," and "Mah-ráján" (the last of which terms is that by which the Arabs call it), was one of the greatest of those celebrated by the ancient Persians. It began on the 16th of Mihr, the seventh month. "Many traditional motives are assigned for the origin of this solempity, which was held for six days; but the most rational conjecture leads us to conclude that it was instituted at this season of the autumnal equinox in honour of their great ostensible deity, the Sun; as the other high festival of the Now-róz was, on the same principles, intended to celebrate the sun's entering the constellation of Aries. The sixteenth was more particularly distinguished than the rest; all who could afford the purchase anointing themselves then with the oil of bân, sprinkling themselves with rose-water, and eating of various fruits, from an idea that such observances would defend them from a number of evils which might otherwise distress them in the course of the year. The King, on the first day of this festival, after anointing himself with the oil of bân, dressed in a superb robe of many colours, his head adorned with the royal táj (or diadem), on which was a splendid figure of the Sun, seated himself on his throne; when the high priest, entering alone, with a large silver dish, filled with sugar, peaches, quinces, apples, citrons, pomegranates, the jujube, the lote, a bunch of white grapes, and seven myrtle-berries, muttered over them a prayer, and presented them to the King, who ate of them all; after which, the nobility and others, approaching according to their rank, followed their sovereign's example; when a variety of robes and other rich furniture, from the royal wardrobes, were distributed amongst them in proportion to their degree. On this day it was esteemed fortunate to wean or name children; and if a son was then born to the King, he was immediately, with great solemnity, consecrated high priest of the Sun."

NOTE 3. The words "during one of these festivals" I have inserted from the Breslau edition.

NOTE 4. In the Breslau edition, the peacock is described as being in the middle of a basin of silver, and surrounded by four and twenty young ones of gold; and the owner of it explains that at the expiration of each hour, the peacock would peck one of its young ones; then, at the end of another hour, a second of them; and so on; and that at the termination of the month, it would open its beak, and that the new moon would be seen in it.

NOTE 5. Instead of a mere trumpet, the Breslau edition describes "a figure of gold set with fine and precious stones and jewels, with a trumpet of gold in its hand;" but "nakeer" is put for "nefeer," a trumpet.

NOTE 6. In the Breslau edition, the sage is said to have first mounted the ebony horse, and ascended on it, and descended. Afterwards, the King's youngest daughter, whom he had granted in marriage to the owner of the horse, disgusted with the hideous aspect of this person, implores the assistance of her brother, who remonstrates with the King, and is induced by him to try the wonderful properties of the horse in order that he may consent to the marriage, nearly as in the tale of Cleomades and Claremond, with which, in some other particulars, the story of the Magic Horse in the Breslau edition agrees more nearly than that in the edition of Cairo; as also does the story in each of these editions more than that in Galland's version. To the tale of Cleomades and Claremond I shall have occasion to revert.

NOTE 7. See Note 15 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 8. Literally, "by 'Say, I seek refuge with the Lord of Men,' and 'the Daybreak:'" that is, by repeating the last Chapter, and the last but one of the Kur-án; which are called "the Two Preventives." See Note 18 to Chapter x., and Note 58 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 9. See Note 50 to Chapter x.—This would refer the story to a period antecedent to the conquest of Persia by the Muslims; but such is evidently not the idea of the Arab narrator.

NOTE 10. That is, as though he would eat the Prince. See Note 21 to the Introduction.

NOTE 11. In the Breslau edition, this King is called "Keysar;" that is, Cæsar:

but in the edition from which I translate, his kingdom is El-Yemen, or Arabia Felix.

NOTE 12. This princess is called, in the Breslau edition, "Shems-en-Nahâr," which signifies "The Sun of Day."

NOTE 13. San'à is the capital of El-Yemen, and a very ancient city. It is celebrated for its trees and waters, and hence compared to Damascus.

NOTE 14. From the commencement of this paragraph to the end of the two verses, I have taken from the Breslau edition, correcting some obvious errors.

NOTE 15. In the original, "Bilád er-Room." This name is applied by some of the Arab geographers to the territories constituting Modern Greece and European Turkey; but by others, to the greater part of Asia Minor. The latter I suppose to be here meant. Instead of "the country of the Greeks," we have in the Breslau edition, China; and in Galland's version, Kashmeer.

NOTE 16. "Kisrawee" here signifies "a subject of a Kisrà;" i.e. of the Persian Monarch.

NOTE 17. This name, I fancy, has been altered by a copyist.

NOTE 18. It is the general belief of the Arabs, that furious or dangerous madness is occasioned by the patient's being possessed by a devil, or evil Jinnee; and the usual term applied to it (namely "ju-noon") signifies this.

NOTE 19. Literally, "this accident," or "—misfortune," &c. My sheykh, by a note on a later passage, authorizes the rendering which I have adopted.

NOTE 20. This story differs so little from that of Cleomades and Claremond that it is evident that one of these was derived, immediately, or mediately, from the other, or that both of them are derived from a common origin. Of the latter story, Mr. Keightley has given a copious extract, to which he has subjoined several notices of the mention of magic horses of wood, the brazen horse of King Cambuscan, and enchanted horses of flesh and blood. He shews that "Cleomades and Claremond" was written in the thirteenth century of our era, and remarks, "The story, as every one must see, is that of the Enchanted

Horse in the Thousand and One Nights; and it is a very remarkable instance of the transmission of fictitious narratives, little altered, from distant regions. . . . The Enchanted Horse," he adds, "is in my opinion an ancient Persian tale, from the time of the Shápoors and Yezdejirds." I agree with him in regarding it as an old Persian tale, and think that it is probably derived from the "Hezár Afsáneh."

NOTES TO CHAPTER EIGHTEENTH

NOTE 1. THIS story has been given in French, but greatly abridged, by Trébutien; and in English, still more abridged, by Dr. Scott. I have felt that I could not convey a fair notion of the original without translating not only the whole of the prose (with the exception of a very few words), but also considerably more than half of the poetry. The latter, whatever may be thought of it in other respects, has the merit of being characteristic; and though specimens of the amatory poetry of the Arabs are not wanting in other parts of the present work, I hope that the reader will excuse their abundance in this story as it is entirely one of love.

The story is evidently Arabian; but the countries in which its scenes are laid are doubtful. In one part (as will be shewn in a subsequent note), we seem to have an exaggerated description of a part of the Nile, and of a small island there situate, namely that of Philæ. In another, a country is mentioned as near to Ispahán.

NOTE 2. "El-Ward fi-l-Akmám" signifies "the Rose in the Calyx," or, literally, "— in the segments of the Calyx:" i. e. "the Rose bud," or "the Unblown Rose."

NOTE 3. The game here mentioned appears to be that of goff.

NOTE 4. The lattice-windows in the East generally have small frames opening upon hinges.

NOTE 5. I read "baghtatan" instead of "burhatan," as recommended by my sheykh.

NOTE 6. My sheykh explains the meaning of "Uns-el-Wujood" (vulgarly pronounced "Anas-el-Wujood") by the words "Lezzet (or Ledhdhet) ed-Dunyà," which signify "the Delight of the World." "Uns" is here used, and in many other cases, as synonymous with "eenás," (infinitive noun of "ánasa," fourth conjugation), though I do not know that it is so interpreted in any published dictionary; and "el-wujood" often signifies "the world;" as in "Hosn-el-Wujood" (a female name), "the Beauty of the World."

NOTE 7. In this verse, in the original, there is a play upon the name of Uns-el-Wujood, which I have not attempted to imitate.

NOTE 8. "Noon" and "Sád" are two letters of the Arabic alphabet. The former, lengthened, as it often is, forms an elegant curve; and the latter, without the curve, which is added to it when it occurs alone or at the end of a word, resembles the outline of a human eye, almond-shaped.—"The Benevolent" is one of the many epithets of the Deity.

NOTE 9. The prayers of two rek'ahs, here mentioned, are not the only practice observed by Muslims with the view of obtaining a right direction; several others I have described in my work on the Modern Egyptians, towards the close of Chapter xi. in the First Volume.

NOTE 10. The words which I render "the Sea of the Kunooz" are "Bahr el-Kunooz." The term "bahr" is applied to "a large river" as well as "a sea," and "Kunooz" may be rendered "Treasures;" but I prefer retaining the latter of these two Arabic words untranslated, for the following reasons:—The people who inhabit the banks and islands of the Nile from a considerable distance north of Aswán as far as Wádee es-Subooa are called "the Kunooz;" therefore that portion of the Nile which flows through their country may be properly called "Bahr el-Kunooz;" and Philæ, which is in this part of the Nile, near the northern limits of Nubia, is now called "the Island of Anas- (or more properly Uns-) el-Wujood." Hence it appears to me most probable that the author of this story founded it upon some tradition that was preserved in Philæ and its neighbourhood; and without having heard any exaggerated description of that picturesque island, he may have taken the liberty of magnifying it, as well as giving it a new name (which the story required him to do), and of converting a great river into a sea. Burckhardt renders "Anas-el-Wujood;" "the social pleasures of Wujood;" and adds, "Wujood, say the Arabs, was the name of the mighty King who built the temples of Philæ." But, if my memory deceive me not, I was there told that "Anas-el-Wujood," not simply "Wujood," was the name of the builder of those temples; and of his history I could learn nothing; the tradition relating to him being lost.

NOTE 11. This is commonly done in expectation of immediate death.

NOTE 12. "Abu-l-Hârith" is a surname of the lion, given to him on account of his abundant acquisitions.

NOTE 13. Seyhoon and Jeyhoon are the rivers anciently called Jaxartes and Oxus, which flow into the sea of Aral.

NOTE 14. That is, because he is of my portion, according to my sheykh. But may not the meaning be, because his cheek cannot be rosy if mine be not?

NOTE 15. Of these fibres, which grow at the top of the trunk, and which are called in Arabic "leef," are made most of the ropes used by the Arabs.

NOTE 16. The kind of net here mentioned (in the original "shinf") has the form of a large sack.

NOTE 17. So in the Breslau edition. In the edition of Cairo by the omission of a dot, the word signifies "branch" instead of "gourd."

NOTE 18. See Note 30 to the Introduction.

NOTE 19. The "hezâr" is a species of nightingale, and is so called from the great variety of its notes; the word "hezâr" (which is Persian) signifying "a thousand."

NOTE 20. "Dirbâs" is one of the many Arabic words signifying "a lion."

NOTE 21. "Shâmikh" signifies "high," "lofty," and "proud."

NOTE 22. This deception is accounted for, by the information which El-Ward fi-l-Akmâm had given to the King, respecting the obstacles that had been raised against her marriage to Uns-el-Wujood.

NOTE 23. By "Arabs," we are here to understand Bedawees, or Arabs of the Desert.

NOTE 24. In illustration of this passage, see Note 63 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 25. The Wezeer Ibrâheem, it seems, inferred that Uns-el-Wujood had come to this palace, and, seeing the doors opened, had carried off his beloved.

NOTE 26. "The Requirer" is one of the epithets of the Deity.

NOTE 27. The words rendered "around us" literally signify "in the four quarters of the horizon," or, "among the flapping [standards]," as my sheykh explains in a marginal note. Perhaps these words, with those immediately connected with them, may be also meant to convey an allusion to the palpitating of the heart occasioned by the hearing of glad tidings. The word which bears the significations above mentioned also signifies "palpitating" or "throbbing;" and that rendered "our drums of glad tidings" may with equal propriety be applied to any things announcing such news.

NOTE 28. "On the seventh day after a marriage, the wife receives her female relations and friends during the morning and afternoon; and sometimes the husband entertains his own friends in the evening; generally hiring persons to perform a khatmeh or a zikr." Professional vocal and instrumental performers are also often hired on this occasion, as on others of a similar kind, to amuse each party of guests. In the case to which the present note refers, we may suppose the musicians to have been sent by the King.

NOTE 29. Next follows a long series of forty-eight anecdotes, ending with part of the four hundred and twenty-fourth Night. Twenty-two of these I have selected for translation, and here insert.

The Pauper and his slave-girl

It is related that a man of the inhabitants of El-Basrah purchased a slave-girl whom he educated and instructed well; and he loved her extremely, and expended all his property in diversion and amusement while he lived with her, so that nothing remained in his possession, and excessive poverty afflicted him. The slave-girl therefore said to him, O my master, sell me; for thou art in need of my price, and I am moved with pity for thee by the state of poverty into which thou hast fallen. If thou sell me and employ my price for thy support, it will be better for thee than my remaining with thee! and perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) will make thy means of subsistence ample.—So he assented to her proposal on account of the straitness of his circumstances. He took her and went down with her to the market, and the broker offered her for sale to the Governor of El-Basrah, whose name was 'Abd-Allah Ibn-Maamar Et-Teymee; and she pleased him, and he bought her for five hundred pieces of gold, which sum he paid to her master. But when her master had received the money, and was about to depart, the slave-girl wept and recited this couplet:—

May the money which thou hast collected delight thee! But for me, nought remaineth save sorrow and anxiety.
I say to my grievously oppressed soul, Mourn little or much: the beloved is separated.

On hearing which, her master uttered groans, and thus replied:—

If thou have not any resource in this case, and find not aught but death, yet excuse me.
Eve and morn the remembrance of you will console me, and comfort a heart severely troubled.
Peace be on thee! Henceforth shall no visit nor meeting take place between us unless Ibn-Maamar willeth.

And when 'Abd-Allah Ibn-Maamar heard their verses, and witnessed their sorrow, he said, By Allah, I will not be a means of separating you. It hath become evident to me that ye love one another; so take the money and the slave-girl, O man. May God bless thee in them both! for the separation of two lovers is painful to them.—They both, therefore, kissed his hand, and departed; and they ceased not to live together until death parted them.—Extolled be the perfection of Him whom death doth not overtake!

Two Victims of Love

There was a graceful man of the tribe of 'Odhrāh, who was never free from the passion of love for a single day. And it happened that he loved a beautiful woman of his tribe, and he sent messages to her during the space of some days; but she ceased not to treat him with cruelty and aversion until desire and transport and distraction afflicted him, and he fell into a violent sickness. He confined himself to the pillow, and relinquished sleep; his case became manifest to the people, and his passion notorious; his infirmity increased, and his pain became severe, so that he almost died. His family and the family of his beloved incessantly begged her to visit him; but she refused, until he was at the point of death, when they acquainted her with this, and at length she was moved with compassion for him, and granted him the favour of a visit. And upon his beholding her, his eyes poured forth tears, and, with a broken heart, he recited these words:—

By thy life, when my corpse passeth by thee, borne upon the necks of four men, Wilt thou not follow the bier, to salute the grave in which that corpse shall be laid?

And when she heard his words, she wept violently, and said to him, By Allah, I did not imagine that thy desire had risen to such a pitch as to cast thee into the arms of death. Had I known that, I had aided thee in thine affair, and thou hadst enjoyed the union thou desirest.—And on his hearing what she said, his tears became like rain; and he repeated the saying of the poet:—

She drew near at the time when death was parting us, and favoured me with union when it would not profit me.

Then he uttered a groan, and died. And upon this, she threw herself upon him, kissing him and weeping, and she ceased not to weep until she fell down by him in a fit. And when she recovered, she charged her family that they should bury her in his grave when she should have died. Then she poured forth tears, and recited these two verses:—

We lived upon the earth a life of comfort, and the tribe and abode and home were proud of us;
But fortune, with its changes, hath parted us from each other, and now the grave-clothes will unite us.

And after she had ended her verses, she wept violently, and ceased not to weep and wail till she fell down in a fit, in which she remained three days; and then she died, and was buried in his grave.—This was one of the strange coincidences that have happened in love.

Love in a School

A boy and a slave-girl learned in one school, and the boy became affected with a violent passion for the slave-girl: so, one day, when the other boys were inadvertent, he took her tablet, and wrote upon it these two verses: —

What sayest thou of him whom disease hath wasted by excessive love of thee, and who hath become perplexed:

Who in transport and pain complaineth of his passion, unable to conceal the feelings of his heart?

When the slave-girl, therefore, took the tablet, she saw these verses written upon it; and after she had read them, and understood their meaning, she wept in compassion for the boy, and wrote beneath his lines, this couplet: —

If we behold a lover whom desire hath afflicted, we will confer favours upon him;

And that which he requireth of us he shall obtain, whatever happen to us in consequence.

And it happened that the teacher came in to them, and, finding the tablet at a moment when it was lying unheeded, took it, and read what was upon it; whereat he was moved with pity for their state, and wrote these two verses (addressed to the girl) beneath those which they had written: —

Receive thy lover, and fear not punishment; for he hath become perplexed in his passion.
As to the teacher, fear not his authority; for he hath long been afflicted by love.

Then the master of the slave-girl happened to enter the school, and he found the girl's tablet; so he took it, and read the words of the slave-girl, and those of the boy, and those of the teacher; and beneath the verses of them all, he wrote this couplet: —

May God never cause a separation between you; and may your slanderer be perplexed and wearied!

As to the teacher, never, by Allah, have my eyes beheld a greater fosterer of intrigues.

The master of the slave-girl then sent for the Kádee and witnesses, and performed the ceremony of her contract of marriage to the youth in their presence. He made for them also a feast, and treated them with great beneficence; and they continued together in joy and happiness until they were overtaken by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions.

A Faithless Wife

There was a man who had a mill, and an ass which turned it; and he had a wicked wife, whom he loved; but she hated him, and loved a neighbour of hers, who detested her, and withheld himself from her. And her husband dreamt that a person said to him, Dig in such a spot in the ass's circuit in the mill: thou wilt find a treasure. And when he awoke, he told his wife of his dream, commanding her to conceal the secret. But she acquainted with it her neighbour whom she loved, for the purpose of ingratiating herself with him, and he promised to come to her at night. Accordingly he came to her in the night, and dug in the circuit of the mill, and they found the treasure, and took it forth. He then said to her, What shall we do with this? She answered, We will divide it into two equal portions, and thou shalt part thyself from thy wife, and I will devise a stratagem to separate myself from my husband: then thou shalt marry me; and when we are united, we will put all the money together and it shall be in our possession. Her neighbour however replied, I fear that the Devil will seduce thee, and that thou wilt take some other man in my stead; for gold in the house is like the sun in the world; and the right opinion is, that the money be all in my keeping, in order that thou mayest eagerly study to effect thy release from thy husband and to come to me. But she rejoined, I also fear the like of that which thou fearest, and I will not give up to thee my share of this money; for I was the person who gave thee information of it. And when he heard these words from her, covetousness incited him to kill her: so he killed her, and threw her into the place of the treasure; after which, daylight overtook him, and prevented his concealing her. And the miller awoke, and found not his wife; and he went into the mill, attached the ass there, and urged it with his voice; whereupon it walked on, and then stopped. The miller beat it violently; but every time that he did so, it drew back; for it took fright at the dead woman, and could not advance. All this while, the miller knew not the cause of the stopping of the ass; and he took a knife, and goaded it many times; yet still it would not move from its place; and upon this, he was enraged at it, and stabbed it in the side, and the ass fell down dead. Then, when day came, the miller saw the ass dead, and his wife dead, and found her in the place of the treasure; and his rage increased at discovering the loss of the treasure and the slaughter of his wife and the ass, and great sorrow came upon him.—All this happened in consequence of his revealing his secret to his wife, and not concealing it.

A Simpleton and a Sharper

A certain simpleton was walking along, holding the halter of his ass, which he was dragging after him; and two sharpeners saw him; whereupon one of them said to his companion, I will take this ass from this man.—How wilt thou take it? said the other. The first replied, Follow me, and I will shew thee. So he followed him; and that sharper, advancing to the ass, unloosed from it the halter, and gave the ass to his companion; after which, he put the halter upon his own head and walked on behind the simpleton until he knew that his companion had gone away with the ass. Then he stopped: so the simpleton dragged him by the halter; but he advanced not. The man therefore looked back at him, and, seeing the halter upon the head of a man, he said to him, What art thou? The sharper answered, I am thy ass, and my story is wonderful; and it is this:—I had a mother, a virtuous old woman, and I went to her one day in a state of intoxication; whereupon she said to me, O my son, turn with repentance unto God (whose name be exalted!) from these sins. But I took a staff, and beat her with it; and she uttered an imprecation against me; upon which God (whose name be exalted!) transformed me into an ass, and caused me to fall into thy possession, and I remained with thee all this time. To-day, however, my mother remembered me, and God inclined her heart towards me; so she prayed for me, and God restored me to the human shape as I was.—And the simpleton said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! By Allah, O my brother, absolve me of responsibility for that which I have done unto thee, in riding thee and in other things.—Then he left the sharper to go his way, and he himself returned to his house intoxicated with anxiety and grief. His wife therefore said to him, What hath afflicted thee, and where is the ass? He said to her, Hast thou no knowledge of the case of the ass? Then I will acquaint thee with it.—And he related to her the story; on hearing which, she exclaimed, Alas for the punishment that we shall receive from God, whose name be exalted!

How hath it happened that all this time hath passed over us and we have been making a son of Adam to labour for us!—Then she gave alms, and prayed for the forgiveness of God. And the man remained a long time in the house without work. So his wife said to him, How long wilt thou remain in the house without work? Go to the market and buy for us an ass with which to work.—He therefore went to the market, and stopped by the asses; and, lo, he beheld his own ass for sale. And when he recognized it, he advanced to it, and, putting his mouth to its ear, said to it, Wo to thee, O unlucky! Doubtless thou hast returned to intoxication, and beaten thy mother again. By Allah, I will never again buy thee!—Then he left it, and departed.

The King and the Merchant of Cairo

It is related that El-Hákím bi-amri-lláh was riding in his state procession one day, and he passed by a garden, where he saw a man surrounded by slaves and servants; and he demanded of him a draught of water. The man therefore gave him to drink; after which he said, Perhaps the Prince of the Faithful will honour me by alighting and paying me a visit in this garden. So the King alighted, and his troops also, and entered that garden; and the man above mentioned caused a hundred carpets to be brought out, and a hundred skins, and a hundred pillows, and a hundred dishes of fruits, and a hundred bowls full of sweets, and a hundred saucers full of sherbet of sugar. El-Hákím bi-amri-lláh was amazed at this, and he said, O man, verily thy case is wonderful. Didst thou know of our coming, and prepare for us this?—The man answered, No, by Allah, O Prince of the Faithful: I knew not of your coming. I am a merchant, of the number of thy subjects, and I have a hundred concubines; and when the Prince of the Faithful honoured me by alighting and paying me a visit, I sent to each of them, desiring her to send me the dinner in the garden; and each of them sent somewhat of her furniture and the surplus of her food and her drink. Each of them sendeth to me every day a dish of meat, and a dish of something cooling, and a dish of fruit, and a bowl full of sweetmeat, and a saucer of sherbet; and this is my dinner every day: I have not added to it any thing for thee.—And the Prince of the Faithful prostrated himself, offering up thanks to God (whose name be exalted!), and said Praise be to God, who hath made to be of the number of our subjects one upon whom He hath bestowed such affluence that he feedeth the Khalefeh and his troops without preparing for them, but only of the surplus of his food! Then he gave orders to present to him all that the government-treasury contained of coins struck during that year; and they amounted to three millions and seven hundred thousand; and he mounted not until he had caused them to be brought, and had given them to that man, saying to him, Make use of them as thy case may require; for thy generosity is worthy of a greater recompense. Then the King mounted and departed.

The King and the Village Damsel

The just King, Kisrà Anooshirwán, rode forth one day to the chase, and separated himself from his troops, pursuing a gazelle; and as he proceeded after it, he saw a tract of cultivated land near unto him. He was exceedingly thirsty; so he repaired thither, and, going to the door of the house of a family, he asked for some water to drink; whereupon there came forth to him a damsel, who looked at him, and then returned to the house, and pressed for him a single sugar-cane, mixed its juice with water, poured it into a cup, and put into it some sweet-scented substance resembling dust. Then she gave it to Anooshirwán, who looked into the cup, and saw in it something like dust. He therefore drank it slowly, until he came to the end of it, when he said to the damsel, O damsel, excellent was the water, and how sweet had it been but for those particles swimming upon the surface; for they rendered it turbid. The damsel replied, O guest, I purposely threw into it those particles which rendered it turbid.—And why didst thou that? said the King. She answered, Because I saw thee to be violently thirsty, and feared that thou wouldst drink it at a single draught, and it would have been injurious to thee; and had there not been in it those particles upon the surface, thou wouldst have drunk it up quickly at once, and thy doing so would have been hurtful to thee. So the just King, Anooshirwán, wondered at her words and her intelligence, knowing that what she had said had proceeded from intelligence and acuteness and excellence of understanding; and he said to her, From how many canes didst thou press that juice? She answered, From one cane. And Anooshirwán wondered, and demanded the register of the taxes that arose from the village there; and he saw that its taxes were little; wherefore he purposed in his mind, when he should return to his seat of government, to increase those taxes; saying, Wherefore should the taxes of a village from a single sugar-cane of which this juice proceedeth be so little?

Then he departed from that village to the chase; and at the close of the day he returned to it, and passing alone by that door again, he asked a second time for water to drink; upon which that same damsel came forth to him; and seeing and knowing him, she returned to bring him the water. But she was long absent from him. So Anooshirwán hastened her, and said, Wherefore hast thou been tardy? She answered, Because there proceeded not from one cane as much as thou wastest; therefore I pressed three canes; and there came not from them as much as before came from one cane. The King said, What is the cause of that? And she answered, The cause of it is, that the purpose of the Sultán hath become changed. He therefore asked her, Whence learnedst thou this? She answered, We have heard from the wise, that, when the purpose of the Sultán becometh changed against a people, their prosperity ceaseth, and their blessings are diminished. And Anooshirwán laughed, and dismissed from his mind that which he had purposed against the people; and forthwith he married that damsel, being pleased with the excess of her intelligence and acuteness, and the excellence of her speech.

The King and the Clever Fisherman

Khusrow, who was one of the Kings [of Persia], was fond of fish; and he was one day sitting in his saloon, with Sheereen, his wife, when there came a fisherman with a large fish, which he gave to Khusrow. And the King was pleased with that fish, and gave orders to present the man with four thousand pieces of silver. But Sheereen said to him, Evil is that which thou hast done!—And why? he asked. She answered, Because if, after this, thou give any one of thy dependants this sum, he will despise it, and say, He hath given me the like of the sum which he gave to the fisherman. And if thou give him less than that, he will say, He hath despised me, and given me less than he gave to the fisherman.—So Khusrow replied, Thou hast spoken truth; but it is disgraceful in Kings to take back their gifts, and this hath passed. Sheereen however rejoined, I will contrive for thee a means of getting back the present from him.—And how so? said he. She answered, If thou desire that, call the fisherman, and ask him of what species is this fish. And if he say to thee, Of such a species,—reply, We desired one of another kind.—He therefore sent after the fisherman, who returned; and this fisherman was a person of intelligence and acuteness; and the King Khusrow asked him, of what species was the fish which he had brought; whereupon the fisherman kissed the ground, and said, This fish is of a mixed kind, and of no one particular species. And Khusrow laughed at his words, and gave orders to present him with four thousand more pieces of silver.

The fisherman therefore went to the treasurer, and received from him eight thousand pieces of silver, which he put into a leathern bag that he had with him; and he raised it upon his neck, and was about to go forth, when there fell from him one piece of silver; upon which he set down the leathern bag from his shoulders, and stooped to pick up the piece of silver, and took it. Now the King and Sheereen were looking at him; and Sheereen said, O King, hast thou seen the vilceness of this man, and his meanness, in that when there fell from him a piece of silver, it was not easy for him to leave it for one of the pages of the King to take it? And when the King heard her words, he was enraged at the fisherman, and said, Thou hast spoken truth, O Sheereen. Then he gave orders to bring back the fisherman, and said to him, O thou devoid of spirit! Thou art not a man! How was it that thou puttdest down this money from thy shoulders, and stoopedst for a piece of silver, and wast too covetous to leave it in its place?—But the fisherman kissed the ground, and answered, May God prolong the life of the King! I took not up that piece of silver from the ground on account of its value in my estimation; but I did so because upon one of its faces is the effigy of the King, and upon its other face his name, and I feared that some person might put his foot upon it unknowingly, and that would be dishonouring the name of the King, and his effigy; and I should be the one to be blamed for this offence. And the King wondered at his words, and approved what he said, and gave orders to present him with four thousand more pieces of silver. He also commanded a crier to proclaim and say, It is not fit that any one should follow the counsel of women; for he who followeth their counsel will lose with his piece of silver two pieces of silver beside.

The Hospitality of Yahyà

It is related that Yahyà the son of Khâlid El-Barmekkee went forth from the palace of the Khaleefeh to return to his house, and saw, at the door of the house, a man, who, when he approached, rose and saluted him, and said to him, O Yahyà, I am in need of that which is in thy hand, and I beg of God to conciliate thy favour for me. And Yahyà gave orders to appropriate to him a place in his house, and commanded his treasurer to take to him every day a thousand pieces of silver, and directed that he should be fed with the choicest of his food. Thus the man remained a whole month; at the expiration of which, he had received thirty thousand pieces of silver; but he feared that Yahyà would take from him the money, on account of its large amount: so he departed privily. And they informed Yahyà of this. He however replied, By Allah, had he remained with me for his life, and for all his days, I had not withheld my gifts, nor deprived him of the honours of my hospitality.—And the excellencies of the Barmekkees were incalculable; and their virtues cannot be fully described: especially those of Yahyà the son of Khâlid; for he chiefly abounded in illustrious actions, as the poet hath said of him:—

I asked Liberality, Art thou free? He answered, No; but I am the slave of Yahyà the son of Khâlid.
By purchase? said I.—God forbid! he answered; for he had me by inheritance from father after father.

Mohammad El-Emeen and the Slave-girl

Jaafar the son of Moosà El-Hádee had a slave-girl, a lute-player, whose name was El-Bedr el-Kebeer, and there was not in her time any more beautiful in face, or of more just figure, or more graceful, or more skilful in the art of singing, and striking the chords: she was endowed with the utmost loveliness and elegance, and every charm. And Mohammad El-Emeen the son of Zubeydeh heard of her, and besought Jaafar to sell her to him: but he replied, Thou knowest that it cometh not such a person as myself to sell female slaves and to set prices upon concubines; and were she not brought up in my house, I would send her as a present to thee, and not covetously withhold her from thee. Then Mohammad El-Emeen repaired one day, for the purpose of exhilaration, to the house of Jaafar, who thereupon shewed him the hospitality suitable to friends, and ordered his slave-girl El-Bedr el-Kebeer to sing to him and make him merry. She therefore tuned the instruments, and sang with the sweetest of melodious tones. And Mohammad El-Emeen betook himself to drinking and making merry, and ordered the cup-bearers to give abundance of wine to Jaafar, that they might intoxicate him. He then took the slave-girl with him, and repaired to his residence; but he extended not his hand towards her. And in the morning he gave orders to invite Jaafar; and when he came he placed the wine before him, and commanded the slave-girl to sing to him within the curtain. When Jaafar, therefore, heard her voice, he knew her; and he was enraged at this; but he shewed not his rage, by reason of the nobleness of his nature, and his magnanimity; and he manifested no change in his convivial converse. And as soon as the carousal was ended, Mohammad El-Emeen gave orders to one of his dependants to fill the skiff in which Jaafar had come to him, with pieces of gold and silver, and varieties of jewels and jacinths and rich apparel, and exceeding wealth. So he did as he commanded him, putting into the skiff a thousand myriads of pieces of money, and a thousand large pearls, each pearl of the value of twenty thousand pieces of silver; and he ceased not to put in it varieties of rarities, until the boatmen called out for aid, and said, The skiff cannot carry any thing more. And he ordered them to convey the wealth to the house of Jaafar. — Such are the noble actions of the great. May God have mercy on them!

El-Fadl and Jafaar the Generous Bar-mekees

Sa'eed the son of Sálím El-Báhílee saith, My circumstances became difficult in the time of Hároon Er-Rasheed; many debts were accumulated upon me, burdening my back, and I was unable to discharge them. My means were contracted, and I became perplexed, not knowing what to do; for payment was vehemently urged upon me, the persons to whom I was indebted surrounded my door, those who had demands to make crowded upon me, and the creditors constantly importuned me. Thus my invention of expedients was straitened, and my trouble of mind was excessive. So when I saw my affairs involved in difficulty, and my circumstances changed, I repaired to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik El-Khuza'ee, and besought him to aid me by his advice, and direct me to the door of relief by his good counsel; and he said, No one can save thee from thy trouble and anxiety, and straitness and grief, except the Bar-mekees. I replied, And who can bear their pride, and endure their haughtiness? — Thou wilt bear that, he rejoined, for the sake of amending thy circumstances. I therefore rose from his presence, and went to El-Fadl and Jaafar, the sons of Yahyà the son of Khálid, related to them my case, and shewed them my condition. And they said, May God give thee his aid, and render thee independent of his creatures by his beneficence, and liberally bestow on thee abundant prosperity, and grant thee sufficiency above any being beside Him; for He is able to do whatsoever He willeth, and is gracious unto his servants, and acquainted with their wants.

So I departed from them, and returned to 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik with contracted bosom, perplexed mind, and broken heart, and repeated to him what they had said; and he replied, It is expedient that thou remain to-day with us, that we may see what God (whose name be exalted!) will decree. I therefore sat with him a while; and, lo, my young man approached and said, O my master, at our door are many mules, with their loads, and with them is a man who saith, I am the agent of El-Fadl the son of Yahyà, and Jaafar the son of Yahyà. Upon this, 'Abd-Allah the son of Málik said, I hope that relief hath approached thee: rise then, and see what is the affair. Accordingly, I rose from his presence, and hastened running to my house, and saw at my door a man with a note, in which was written, —

When thou hadst been with us, and we had heard thy words, we repaired, after thy departure, to the Khaleefeh, and informed him that thou hadst been reduced to the ignominious necessity of begging; whereupon he commanded us to convey to thee, from the government-treasury, a million pieces of silver. But we said to him, This money he will disburse to his creditors, and he will pay with it his debts; and whence is he to sustain himself? So he gave orders to present thee with three hundred thousand pieces of silver besides. And each of us also hath sent to thee, of his proper wealth, a million pieces of silver. The whole sum, therefore, is three millions and three hundred thousand pieces of silver, wherewith thou shalt amend thy circumstances and affairs.

See then this generosity evinced by these noble persons. May God (whose name be exalted!) have mercy on them!

A Deceitful Wife

It is related that a woman practised a stratagem against her husband; and it was this:—Her husband brought her a fish, on a Friday, and desired her to cook it and make it ready by the time that the congregational prayers should be ended. He then went forth to his work; and her friend came to her, and invited her to attend a wedding in his house; to which she assented. She put the fish into a water-jar in her abode, and went with him, and remained absent from her house until the next Friday; while her husband was searching in other houses, and inquiring for her; but no one gave him any tidings of her. Then she came on the following Friday, and took forth to him the fish alive, and, having collected a number of people before him, related to them her tale; whereupon they pronounced the man a liar, and said to him, It is impossible that the fish should remain alive all this time. They made it appear evident that he was mad, and imprisoned him and laughed at him.

The Slayer Who Was Pardoned

The shereef Hoseyn the son of Reiyán hath related, that the Prince of the Faithful, 'Omar the son of El-Khattáb, was sitting one day to judge the people, and to exercise jurisdiction among his subjects, attended by the chiefs of his companions, of those possessed of judgment and just perception. And as he sat, there approached him a young man, of the most comely of young men, of clean apparel, upon whom two of the most comely of young men had laid hold; and they dragged him by the upper edge of his vest, and stationed him before the Prince of the Faithful. So the Prince of the Faithful looked at the two young men, and at the other, and, having ordered them to withdraw from him, caused him to draw near unto him, and said to the two young men, What is your affair with him?—O Prince of the Faithful, they answered, we are two brothers by the same mother, and suited to follow the truth. We had a father, a very old man, prudent, honoured among the tribes, free from meannesses, well known for virtues, who reared us from infancy, and bestowed on us great favours, a person of abundant virtues and illustrious actions, deserving of the praise of the poet:—

They said, Is Aboo Sakr of Sheybán? I answered them, Nay, by my life; but Sheybán is of him:

For how many a father hath derived eminence from a noble son, as did 'Adnán from God's Apostle!

And he went forth to an orchard belonging to him, to recreate himself among its trees, and to pluck its ripe fruits, and this young man slew him, swerving from the path of rectitude. We therefore request thee to retaliate his offence, and to pass sentence upon him in accordance with the command of God.

So 'Omar cast a terrifying glance at the young man, and said to him, Thou hast heard what these two young men have stated. What then sayest thou in reply?—Now that young man was of firm heart and bold tongue; he had cast off the garments of dastardy, and divested himself of the apparel of fear: so he smiled, and spoke with a most eloquent tongue, complimenting the Prince of the Faithful with elegant language. Then he said, By Allah, O Prince of the Faithful, I have retained in my mind their charge, and they have spoken truth in that which they have said in relating what happened and the command of God is a determinate decree. But I will state my case before thee, and it is thine to decide upon it. Know, O Prince of the Faithful, that I am of the choicest of the genuine Arabs, who are the most noble of the races under heaven. I grew up in the dwellings of the desert, and gloomy times of oppressive sterility afflicted my people; wherefore I came to the environs of this town, with my family and wealth and children. I followed one of the roads around it leading amid its gardens of trees, with she-camels of high estimation and dear unto me, among which was a male camel of high breed and of numerous offspring and beautiful form, whereby they bore abundantly, and he walked among them like a king wearing a crown. Now one of the she-camels ran away to the orchard of the father of these two young men, and its trees appeared above the wall, and she reached them with her lips; so I drove her away from that orchard. But, lo, a sheykh appeared through an interstice of the wall, the flame of his rage casting forth sparks, and with a stone in his right hand; and he walked like the lion that swayeth in his pace, and, smiting the male camel with that stone, he killed it; for the stone struck its eye.

Therefore when I saw that the male camel had fallen down by my side, I felt the burning coals of anger lighted in my heart, and I took up that same stone, and smote him with it, and it was the cause of his destruction. Thus he found an evil result to his action; the man being killed with that wherewith he had killed. And when he was struck with the stone, he uttered a great cry and a painful shriek; whereupon I hastened from my place; but these two young men hastened after me, and laid hold upon me; and they brought me unto thee, and placed me before thee.

On hearing this, 'Omar (may God, whose name he exalted, be well pleased with him!) said, Thou hast confessed the crime that thou hast committed: liberation hath become difficult, retaliation is necessary and there is no opportunity of escape. The young man replied, I hear and obey the sentence which the Imám hath passed, and consent to that which the law of El-Islám requireth. But I have a young brother, and he had an old father, who, before his death, assigned him abundant wealth, and a great sum of gold, and committed the care of him to me, calling God to witness against me, and saying This is in trust with thee for thy brother: keep it then carefully. I therefore received that money from him, and buried it; and no one knoweth of it but myself. So if thou now pass sentence of death upon me, the wealth will be lost, and thou wilt be the cause of its loss, and the child will sue thee for his right on the day when God will judge his creatures. But if thou grant me three days delay, I will appoint some one to act as guardian to the boy, and I will return to discharge my obligation; and I have one who will be my surety for the fulfilment of this promise. — And upon this, the Prince of the Faithful hung down his head. Then he looked at those who were present, and said, Who will be surety unto me for his return to his place? — And the young man looked at the faces of those who composed the assembly, and, pointing to Aboo-Dharr in preference to the rest of the persons present, said, This will be my guarantee and my surety. So 'Omar (may God, whose name he exalted, be well pleased with him!) said, O Aboo-Dharr, hast thou heard this saying, and wilt thou be surety unto me for the return of this young man? He answered, Yes, O Prince of the Faithful: I will be surety for him for three days. 'Omar, therefore, consented to this, and gave permission to the young man to depart.

And when the period of delay had drawn towards its close, and the time had almost expired, or had expired, the young man had not come unto the assembly of 'Omar, whom the Companions were surrounding like the stars around the moon. Aboo-Dharr was present, and the plaintiffs were waiting, and they said, Where is the delinquent, O Aboo-Dharr? How shall he who hath fled return? But we will not move from our place until thou bring him to us, that our blood-revenge may be taken. — Aboo-Dharr replied, By the Omniscient King, if the three days expire and the young man shall not have come, I will discharge the obligation of surety, and surrender myself to the Imám! And 'Omar (may God be well pleased with him!) said, By Allah, if the young man delay his coming, I will assuredly pass sentence upon Aboo-Dharr according as the law of El-Islám requireth! And upon this, the tears of the persons present flowed, and the sighs of the spectators rose, and great was the clamour. The chiefs of the Companions proposed to the two young men to take the pecuniary compensation, and obtain the thanks of the people. But they refused, and would admit nothing but the taking of the blood-revenge.

While the people, however, were in a state of tumult and clamour in their lamentation for Aboo-Dharr, lo, the young man approached, and stood before the Imám, and greeted him with the most courteous salutation. His face was shining brightly, and glistening with perspiration; and he said to the Imám I have committed the youth unto his maternal uncles, and acquainted them with all his affairs and informed them of what had been done with his wealth: then I rushed into the sultry mid-day heat, and fulfilled my promise with the fidelity of the ingenuous. And the people wondered at his veracity and good faith, his ready offering of himself to death, and his boldness. And some of them said, How generous a young man art thou, and how faithful in the performance of thy promise and duty! But the young man replied, Are ye not convinced that when the period of death hath come, no one can escape from it? Verily I fulfilled my promise that it might not be said, Fidelity hath departed from among men. — And Aboo-Dharr said, By Allah, O Prince of the Faithful, I became surety for this young man and knew not of what tribe he was, nor had I seen him before that day. But when he turned from all else who were present, and desired me, and said, This will be surety and guarantee for me, — I deemed it not right to reject him, and humanity refused to disappoint his desire; for there is no evil in complying with a desire, that it may not be said, Virtue hath departed from among men.—And upon this, the two young men said, O Prince of the Faithful, we give up to this young man the blood of our father, since he hath converted sadness into a cause of cheerfulness, that it may not be said, Kindness hath departed from among men. And the Imám rejoiced at the pardon granted to the young man, and at his veracity and his fidelity in the performance of his duty, and he highly extolled the humanity of Aboodharr above his companions, and approved of the resolution of the young men in the shewing of kindness: he bestowed upon them grateful thanks, and recited, as applicable to their case, the saying of the poet:—

He who acteth kindly among men will be requited for it. Kindness is not lost with God nor with men.

Then he offered to pay them the fine for their father's blood from the government-treasury. But they said, Verily we pardoned him from a desire of seeing the face of God, the Bountiful, the Exalted; and he whose intention is of this nature doth not make his kindness to be followed by reproach for his benefits, nor by detriment.

An Impudent Thief

A man, who was a robber, turned with repentance unto God (whose name he exalted!), and his repentance was sincere, and he opened for himself a shop in which to sell stuffs. This life he led for a length of time; and it happened, one day, that he locked his shop, and went to his house; and one of the artful robbers came, and, having disguised himself in the garb of the owner of the shop, took forth from his sleeve some keys. This was in the night; and he said to the watchman of the market, Light for me this candle. So the watchman took it from him, and went to light it; and the robber opened the shop, and lighted another candle that he had with him; and when the watchman came again, he found him sitting in the shop, with the account-book in his hand, and he was looking at it, and calculating with his fingers. Thus he continued to do until the first appearance of daybreak, when he said to the watchman, Bring me a camel-driver with his camel, to convey for me some of the merchandise. Accordingly he brought him a camel-driver with his camel, and the robber took and gave him four bales of stuffs, which he placed upon the camel. Then he locked the shop, gave to the watchman two pieces of silver, and followed the camel-driver; the watchman believing that he was the owner of the shop.

And when the morning arrived, and daylight appeared, the owner of the shop came, and the watchman began to greet him with prayers for his prosperity, on account of the two pieces of silver. So the owner of the shop disavowed what he said, and wondered at it; and when he opened the shop, he found the wax that had run down from the candles, and the account-book thrown down, and, examining the shop, he found four bales of stuffs missing; whereupon he said to the watchman, What hath happened? He therefore told him of that which had been done in the night, and of what had been said to the camel-driver respecting the bales; and the owner of the shop said, Bring to me the camel-driver who took up the bales with thee at daybreak. The watchman replied, I hear and obey;—and brought him. And the owner of the shop said to him, Whither conveyedst thou the stuffs at daybreak? He answered, To such a landing-place, and I stowed them in the vessel of such-a-one. And the merchant said to him, Go with me thither. He accordingly went thither with him, and said to him, This is the vessel, and this is her owner. So he said to the boatman, Whither conveyedst thou the merchant and the stuffs? He answered, To such a place, and he brought to me a camel-driver, who placed the stuffs upon his camel, and departed, and I know not whither he went. The owner of the shop said to him, Bring me the camel-driver who conveyed the stuffs from thee. And he brought him; and he said to him, Whither conveyedst thou the stuffs from the vessel, with the merchant?—To such a place, he answered. And he said to him, Go with me thither, and shew it to me. And the camel-driver went with him to a place distant from the bank of the river, acquainted him with the Khán in which he had deposited the stuffs, and shewed him the magazine of the [pretended] merchant. So he advanced to the magazine and opened it, and found the four bales of stuffs in their original state, unopened; and he gave them to the camel-driver. The robber had placed his cloak upon the stuffs; and the owner of the stuffs handed it also to the camel-driver, who placed the whole upon his camel. Then he closed the magazine, and departed with the camel-driver. And, lo, the robber confronted him, and followed him until he had embarked the stuffs in the boat; when he said to him, O my brother, mayest thou be in the keeping of God! Thou hast taken thy stuffs, and nought of them is lost: so give me the cloak. — And the merchant laughed at him, and gave him the cloak, and did not molest him; and each of them went his way.

The Penalty of Greed

The Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, was troubled one night with an exceeding restlessness; so he said to his Wezeer Jaafar the son of Yahya El-Bar-mekee, I am sleepless this night, and my heart is contracted, and I know not what to do. Now his eunuch Mesroor was standing before him, and he laughed. The Khaleefeh therefore said to him, At what dost thou laugh? Dost thou laugh in contempt of me, or because thou art mad? — He answered, No, by Allah, O Prince of the Faithful, by thy relationship to the chief of Apostles, I did it not willingly; but I went forth yesterday to walk without the palace, and proceeded until I came to the bank of the Tigris, where I saw a crowd of people collected together: so I stopped, and I saw a man making the people laugh. He is named Ibn-El-Kárib-ee. And I remembered just now his words, and laughter overcame me; for which I beg thy pardon, O Prince of the Faithful. — Upon this, the Khaleefeh said, Bring him unto me immediately. Mesroor therefore went forth and hastened until he came to Ibn-El-Kárib-ee; and he said to him, Answer the summons of the Prince of the Faithful. — I hear and obey, replied Ibn-El-Kárib-ee. And Mesroor said to him, But on the condition that, if thou go in to him and he bestow upon thee any thing, the quarter of it shall be thine, and the rest be mine. — Nay, replied Ibn-El-Kárib-ee; thou shalt have half, and I half. But Mesroor said, No. And Ibn-El-Kárib-ee said, I will have a third, and thou shalt have two thirds. And to this, Mesroor assented, after excessive striving.

Then Ibn-El-Kárib-ee arose and went with him, and when he came into the presence of the Prince of the Faithful, he greeted him with the salutation usually given to Khaleefehs, and stood before him; and the Prince of the Faithful said to him, If thou do not make me laugh, I beat thee three times with this leathern bag. So Ibn-El-Kárib-ee said within himself, And it will be no great matter if three blows be inflicted with this leathern bag, when beating with whips hurteth me not. For he imagined that the leathern bag was empty. He then uttered sayings that would make the enraged to laugh, with varieties of drolleries; but the Prince of the Faithful laughed not, nor even smiled; and Ibn-El-Kárib-ee wondered at him, and was vexed, and feared; and the Prince of the Faithful said to him, Now thou hast deserved the beating. Accordingly, he took the leathern bag, and beat him once; and there were in it four pebbles, each pebble of the weight of two pounds; and the blow fell upon his neck; so he uttered a great cry, and, remembering the agreement made between him and Mesroor, he said, Pardon, O Prince of the Faithful! Hear from me two words! — The Khaleefeh replied, Say what thou wilt. And he said, Verily Mesroor imposed on me a condition, and I agreed with him respecting it; and it was, that of whatsoever the Prince of the Faithful should bestow upon me, one third of it should be for me, and two thirds for him; and he consented not to this my proposal save after excessive striving. Now thou hast not bestowed on me aught save beating, and this blow is my share, and the remaining two blows are his share; for I have received my share, and here he is standing, O Prince of the Faithful; therefore pay him his. — And when the Prince of the Faithful heard his words, he laughed until he fell backwards; and, having called Mesroor, he gave him a blow, whereupon he cried out, and said, O Prince of the Faithful, the third sufficeth me, and do thou give him the two thirds. And the Khaleefeh laughed at them, and gave orders to present each of them with a thousand pieces of gold. And they departed, rejoiced at that which he had bestowed upon them.

The Devout Prince

The Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, had a son who had attained the age of sixteen years, and he was averse from the world, following the course of the abstinent and the devotees. He used to go forth to the burial-grounds, and to say, Ye were in possession of the world; but that saved you not; and ye have gone unto your graves. Would then that I knew what ye said, and what was said unto you! — And he wept as the fearful and the dreading, and recited the saying of the poet: —

The funerals constantly terrify me, and the weeping of the wailing women grieveth me.

And it happened that his father passed by him one day, proceeding in state, surrounded by his wezeers and the great men of his empire and of the people of his dominions, and they saw the son of the Prince of the Faithful with a woollen jubbeh upon his body, and a piece of woollen stuff (as a turban) upon his head. So one of them said to another, This youth hath disgraced the Prince of the Faithful among the Kings, and if he reproved him, he would relinquish his present course. And the Prince of the Faithful, hearing their words, spoke to him on that subject, and said to him, O my child, thou hast disgraced me by thy present life. But his son looked at him, and answered him not. Then he looked at a bird upon one of the battlements of the palace, and said to it, O bird, by Him who created thee, drop upon my hand. Whereupon the bird darted down upon the youth's hand. And he said to it, Return to thy place. And it returned. He then said to it, Drop upon the hand of the Prince of the Faithful. But it refused to do so. And the youth said to his father, Thou hast disgraced me among the Weles by thy love of the world, and I have resolved to part from thee, never to return unto thee save in the world to come. Then he went down the river to El-Basrah, where he employed himself in working with the labourers in mud; and he worked not each day save for a piece of silver and a sixth: with the sixth, he fed himself; and with the piece of silver, he gave alms.

Aboo-'Amir of El-Basrah hath related as follows:—A wall having fallen in my house, I went forth to the station of the labourers, to see for a man to repair it; and my eye fell upon a comely youth, of beautiful countenance; whereupon I went to him and saluted him and said to him, O my friend, dost thou desire service? He answered, Yes. And I said, Arise and come with me to build a wall. He replied, On certain conditions which I will impose upon thee.—O my friend, said I, what are they? He answered, The hire shall be a piece of silver and a sixth; and when the Muëddin chanteth the call to prayer, thou shalt let me go to pray with the congregation. I replied, Well. Then I took him and went with him to the house, and he worked in a manner of which I have not seen the like. And I mentioned to him the dinner; but he said, No:—so I knew that he was fasting. And when he heard the call to prayer, he said to me, Thou knowest the condition. I replied, Yes. And he loosed his girdle, and applied himself to the ablution, performing it in a manner that I have not seen surpassed. He then went forth to prayer, and, having prayed with the congregation, he returned to his work. And when the afternoon-call to prayer was chanted, he performed the ablution again and went to prayer, and returned to his work. Upon this I said to him, O my friend, the period of work is ended; for the work of the labourers is until the time of afternoon-prayers. But he replied, Extolled be the perfection of God! Verily my work is until night.—And he ceased not to work till night, when I gave him two pieces of silver; on seeing which, he said, What is this? I answered, By Allah, this is but a portion of thy hire, on account of thy diligence in my service. But he threw them back to me, saying, I desire not any addition to that for which we agreed together. I urged him; but could not prevail upon him. So I gave him a piece of silver and a sixth, and he went away.

And when the next morning came, I went early to the station; but found him not. I therefore inquired respecting him; and it was told me, He cometh not hither save on Saturday only. And when the next Saturday arrived I repaired to that place, and found him; and I said to him, In the name of Allah, do me the favour to come to work. He replied, On the conditions which thou knowest. I said, Yes. And I went with him to my house, and stood and looked at him without his seeing me. And he took a handful of mud, and placed it upon the wall, and, lo, the stones ranged themselves, one upon another. So I said, Thus are the Weles of God! He worked that day, and exceeded what he had done before; and when the night came, I paid him his hire, and he took it and departed.

Again, on the third Saturday, I went to the station; but found him not; wherefore I asked respecting him, and was answered, He is sick, and lying in the booth of such a woman. This was an old woman well known for devotion, and she had a booth of reeds in the burial-ground. And I went to the booth, and entered it; and, lo, he was lying upon the ground, with nothing under him: he had placed his head upon an unburnt brick, and his face was beaming with light. I saluted him, and he returned my salutation; and I seated myself at his head, weeping on account of his youth, and his absence from his native place, and his aptness to the obedience of his Lord. Then I said to him, Hast thou any want? He answered, Yes.—And what is it? I asked. He answered, To-morrow come to me, at the mid-time between sunrise and noon, and thou wilt find me dead. Wash me, and dig my grave, without acquainting any one with it; and shroud me in this jubbeh that is upon me; and after unsewing it, search its breast, take forth what is within it, and keep it in thy possession. Then, when thou hast prayed over me, and deposited my body in the earth, repair to Baghdád, and watch for the Khaleefeh, Hároon Er-Rasheed, until he cometh forth, and give him what thou shalt find in the breast of my jubbeh, with my salutation.—Having said this, he repeated the professions of the faith, and praised his Lord with the most eloquent words, and recited these verses:—

Convey the deposite of him whom death awaiteth to Er-Rasheed; for thou wilt be rewarded for that act;

And say to him, A stranger, desirous of beholding thee, long loving and distant, hath offered thee his homage.

Neither hatred nor weariness hath removed him from thee; for by kissing thy right hand, he is brought near to God;

But that which hath estranged him from thee, O my father, is a soul which forbearth to share thy worldly pleasures.

Then he employed himself in begging God's forgiveness, and in prayer, and invoking blessings upon the Chief of the Just, and reciting some verses of the Kur-án, and repeated these lines:—

O my father, be not thou deceived by enjoyment; for life will pass away, and enjoyment will end.

When thou art informed that a people are oppressed, know that thou wilt be inquired of respecting them;

And when thou conveyest a corpse unto the tombs, know that thou likewise wilt be borne after it.

And when the youth had ended his charge and his recitations, I departed from him and went to my house. And on the following morning I repaired to him again, at the mid-time between sunrise and noon, and found that he had died. May the mercy of God be on him! So I washed him, and unsewed his jubbeh, and I found in its breast a ruby worth thousands of pieces of gold; whereupon I said within myself, By Allah, this young man hath abstained from worldly pleasures with the extreme of abstinence.

Then, after I had buried him, I repaired to Baghdád, and, arriving at the palace of the Khaleefeh, I watched for Er-Rasheed's coming forth until he came; when I presented myself before him in one of the streets, and gave to him the ruby. As soon as he saw it, he knew it, and fell down in a fit; upon which the servants laid hold upon me; but when he recovered, he said to them, Loose him, and send him with courtesy to the palace. So they did as he commanded them; and on his entering his palace, he summoned me, and took me into his chamber, and said to me, What did the owner of this ruby? I answered him, He is dead. And I described to him his case; whereupon he wept, and said, The son hath profited, and the father hath been disappointed! Then he called out, O such-a-one! (naming a female);—and a woman came forth; but when she saw me, she was about to return: so he said to her, Come hither. Thou needest not mind him.—She therefore entered and saluted, and he threw to her the ruby; on seeing which she uttered a great cry, and fell down in a fit. And when she recovered from her fit, she said, O Prince of the Faithful, what hath God done with my son? He said to me, Acquaint her with his case. And weeping overcame him. Accordingly I informed her of his case; and she began to weep, and to say with a faint voice, O, how I longed to meet thee! O delight of mine eye! Would that I had given thee to drink when thou foundest not any to do so! Would that I had cheered thee when thou foundest not a cheerer!—Then she poured forth tears, and recited these verses:—

I weep for a stranger who died in solitude, with no friend unto whom to complain of his misery.

After glory, and union with those who loved him, he became lone and desolate, seeing no one.

What fortune concealeth a while will be manifest. Death never spareth any one among us.

O absent! my Lord decreed thine absence; and after nearness thou becamest remote from me!

Though death makes me hopeless of meeting thee now, O my son, we shall meet on the day of account.

And I said, O Prince of the Faithful, was he thy son? He answered, Yes; and before I held this office he used to visit the learned men, and keep company with the just; and when I assumed this office he avoided me, and estranged himself from me. So I said to his mother, This youth is devoted unto God (whose name be exalted!), and probably adversities may befall him, and he may be afflicted with trials; therefore give to him this ruby, that he may find it in the time of his wanting it. Accordingly, she gave it to him, conjuring him to retain it, and he complied with her desire and took it from her. Then he left our worldly enjoyments to us, and absented himself from us, and ceased not to remain absent from us until, pious and pure, he met God, to whom be ascribed might and glory!

And after this, the Khaleefeh said to me, Arise, and shew me his tomb. I therefore went forth with him, and journeyed on until I shewed it to him; whereupon he wept and lamented until he fell down in a fit; and when he recovered from his fit he begged forgiveness of God and said, Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return! And he invoked blessings on his son. After which, he asked me to become his associate; but I replied, O Prince of the Faithful, I have, in the case of thy son, the most momentous of admonitions.

The Illiterate Schoolmaster

It is related that a certain man among the collegians, neither acquainted with writing nor with reading, practised stratagems upon the people for the purpose of obtaining his bread. And it occurred to his mind one day that he should open for himself a school, and teach boys in it to read. So he collected writing-tablets and written papers, and hung them up in a place, and he enlarged his turban, and seated himself at the door of the school. The people therefore, passing by him, and looking at his turban, and at the writing-tablets and papers, imagined that he was an excellent fakeeh, and brought to him their children. And he used to say to this one, Write;—and to this, Read;—and thus the boys taught one another. But as he was sitting one day at the door of the school as usual, lo, a woman approached from a distance, with a letter in her hand; whereupon he said within himself, Without doubt this woman is coming to me, that I may read to her the letter that she holdeth; and how shall I manage with her, when I know not how to read writing? He meditated upon descending to flee from her; but she came up to him before he had descended, and said to him, Whither goest thou? He answered her, I desire to perform the noon-prayers, and to return.—Noon, she replied, is yet distant: therefore read for me this letter. And he took it from her, and turned it upside down, and began to look at it; and one moment he shook his turban, and another moment moved about his eyebrows, and manifested rage. Now the husband of the woman was absent, and the letter was sent to her from him. So when she saw the fakeeh in this state, she said within herself, No doubt my husband is dead, and this fakeeh is ashamed to tell me that he is dead. She therefore said to him, O my master, if he be dead, tell me. And he shook his head, and was silent. And the woman said to him, Shall I rend my clothes?—Rend, he answered.—Shall I slap my face? she asked. He answered her, Slap.

So she took the letter from his hand, and returned to her abode; and she and her children began to weep; whereupon some of her neighbours, hearing the weeping, inquired respecting her state; and were answered, A letter hath come to her acquainting her with the death of her husband. But a man among them replied, Verily this assertion is false; for her husband sent me a letter yesterday informing me in it that he was well, in prosperity and health, and that after ten days he will be with her. And he arose immediately, and, coming to the woman, said to her, Where is the letter that hath come to thee? She therefore brought it to him, and he took it from her and read it, and, lo, it contained these words: To proceed, I am well, in prosperity and health, and after ten days I shall be with you; and I have sent unto you a quilt and a mekmarah.—So she took the letter, and returned with it to the fakeeh, and said to him, What induced thee to act as thou hast done with me? And she acquainted him with that which her neighbour had said, respecting the safety of her husband, and his having sent to her a quilt and a mekmarah; whereupon he replied, Thou hast spoken truth; but, O respectable woman, excuse me; for I was at that time enraged, troubled in mind, and, seeing the mekmarah wrapped up in the quilt, I imagined that he had died, and that they had shrouded him. And the woman knew not the trick; so she said to him, Thou art excused. And she took the letter from him, and departed.

The Quill of The Rukh'

A man of the people of Western Africa had travelled in various regions, and traversed the wastes and the seas, and destiny cast him upon an island, where he remained a long time. Then he returned to his country, bringing with him the quill-part of a feather from the wing of a young rukh', which was in the egg, and had not come forth from it into the world; and that quill held as much as a goat's skin of water. It is said that the length of the wing of the young rukh', at the time of its coming forth from the egg, is a thousand fathoms; and the people wondered at that quill when they saw it. This man was named 'Abd-Er-Rahmán El-Maghrabee; and he became commonly known by the surname of the Chinese, on account of his long residence in China; and he used to relate wonders.

Result of Restraint upon two Lovers

El-Kásim the son of 'Adee hath related that a man of the tribe of the Benec-Temeem said, I went forth to seek a stray beast, and, coming to the waters of the tribe of Teiyi, I saw two parties of people, near unto each other, and among one of them words were passing like as among the people of the other. And I looked attentively, and saw among one of the parties a young man whom disease had emaciated, so that he was like a worn-out, dried-up water-skin; and while I was looking at him, he recited these verses:—

Wherefore doth the beauteous damsel not return? Is it from niggardness in her, or aversion?

I fell sick, and each member of my family visited me. Then wherefore wast thou not seen among them?

Hadst thou been sick, I had come unto thee, and threats would not have prevented my doing so.

I missed thee among them, and became desolate. Grievous was thy loss, O my heart's abode!

And a damsel of the other party heard his words, and hastened towards him. Her family followed her; but she encountered them with blows; and the young man, perceiving her, sprang towards her, while the people of his party quickly followed him. He however dragged himself from them, and she in like manner dragged herself from her party until she liberated herself, and each of them ran to the other till they met between the two parties, and embraced each other: then they fell down upon the ground, dead. Upon this, an old man came forth from one of the adjacent tents, and, standing over them, exclaimed, Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him return!—and wept violently; after which he said, May God (whose name be exalted!) have mercy on you both! By Allah, if ye were not united in your lives I will assuredly unite you after death!—Then he gave orders to prepare them for burial; and they were washed, and shrouded in the same grave clothes; one grave was dug for them, and the people prayed over them, and buried them in that grave; and there was not a male nor a female among the two parties that I did not see weeping for them, and slapping [the face]. So I inquired of the old man respecting them; and he answered me, This was my daughter, and this was the son of my brother. Their love hath brought them to the issue which thou beheldest.—I said to him, May God give thee reparation! Didst thou not marry them to each other?—He answered, I feared reproach and disgrace, and now I have fallen into both.—This is one of the wonders in the histories of lovers.

A Distracted Lover

Abu-l-'Abbás El-Mubarrad saith, I repaired to El-Bereed, with a party of men, on some business, and, passing by the Convent of Heraclius, we alighted in its shade; and there came to us a man who said to us, There are in the convent some madmen, among whom is one that uttereth wisdom; and if ye saw him, ye would wonder at his words. So we all arose and entered the convent, and we saw a man sitting in a private chamber, upon a skin, with his head uncovered, and his eye fixed upwards towards the wall. We saluted him, and he returned our salutation without looking at us; and a man said, Recite to him some poetry; for when he heareth poetry, he will speak. I therefore recited these two verses:—

O thou best of all men to whom Eve hath given birth! but for thee, the world were not beautiful nor pleasant.

The man whom God sheweth thy form hath obtained immortality, and will grow neither decrepit nor hoary.

And when he heard me say this, he turned towards us, and recited thus:—

God knoweth that I am in affliction. I cannot make manifest the pain that I feel.

Two souls have I: one place containeth one soul; and another place, the other.

I imagine that my absent soul is like my present, and that she experienceth what I do.

Then he asked, Have I said well or ill? We answered him, Thou hast not said ill; but well and admirably. And he stretched forth his hand to a stone that was by him, and took it. So we imagined that he would smite us with it, and we fled from him. But he began to beat with it his own bosom, with violent blows, and said, Fear ye not. Draw near to me, and hear from me something: receive it from me.—We therefore approached him; and he recited these verses:—

When they made their white camels kneel down, near daybreak, they mounted, and the camel departed with the beloved.

My eye, through the interstice of the prison, beheld them, and I said, in my anguish, with tears overflowing,

O camel-driver, turn, that I may bid her farewell; for in parting, and in bidding her farewell, I shall die.

I am faithful to the vow of love, and have not broken it. Would that I knew how she hath acted with regard to it!

He then looked towards me, and said, Hast thou any knowledge of what the beloved hath done? I answered, Yes: she hath died. May God (whose name be exalted!) have mercy on her!—And upon this, his countenance changed, and he sprang upon his feet, and said, How knewest thou her death? I answered, Had she been alive, she had not left thee thus. And he replied, Thou hast spoken truth, by Allah: but I also love not life after the loss of her. Then the muscles of his side quivered, and he fell upon his face; whereat we hastened to him, and moved him, and found him dead. The mercy of God (whose name be exalted!) be on him. And we wondered at this, and grieved for him violently; and we prepared his body for the grave, and buried him. And when I returned to Baghdád, and went in to El-Mutawekkil, he saw the traces of tears upon my face; whereupon he said, What is this? So I related to him the story; and it distressed him, and he said, What induced thee to act so? By Allah, if I knew that thou mournedst not for him, I should reprove thee for it.—And he mourned for him all the rest of the day.

The Converted Prior

Aboo-Bekr the son of Mohammad El-Ambáree saith, I went forth from El-Ambár, on one of my journeys, to 'Am-mooriyeh, in the country of the Greeks, and alighted on the way, at the Convent of the Lights, in a village near 'Am-mooriyeh, whereupon there came forth to me the chief of the convent, the Prior, whose name was 'Abd-El-Meseeh; and he conducted me into the convent. I found in it forty monks; and they honoured me that night with a hospitable entertainment. Then on the morrow I departed from them, after I had seen, of their exceeding diligence in their exercises, and of their devotion, what I had not seen exhibited by others, and I returned to El-Ambár. And in the following year I performed the pilgrimage to Mekkeh; and while I was compassing the House, lo, I beheld 'Abd-El-Meseeh the monk compassing also, and with him five persons of his companions, the monks. Therefore when I was sure that I knew him, I advanced to him, and said to him, Art thou 'Abd-El-Meseeh the monk? He answered, Rather I am 'Abd-Allah the suppliant. So I began to kiss his hoary hairs, and to weep; and, taking him by the hand, I turned to a side of the Temple, and said to him, Acquaint me with the cause of thy conversion to El-Islám. And he replied, It was one of the most wonderful of wonderful events, and it was this.

A party of Muslim devotees passed by the village in which is our convent, and sent a young man to buy for them food, and he beheld in the market a Christian damsel selling bread; and she was of the most beautiful of women in form. On beholding her he was fascinated by her and fell down upon his face in a fit, and when he recovered, he returned to his companions, and informed them of that which had befallen him, and said to them, Depart ye to your business; for I go not with you. They reprovéd him and admonished him; but he paid no regard to them; so they departed from him; and he entered the village, and seated himself at the door of the shop of that woman. She therefore asked him what he wanted, and he informed her that he was enamoured of her; whereupon she turned from him. He remained in his place three days without tasting food; keeping his eye fixed upon her face, and when she saw that he would not depart from her, she went to her family, and told them of him; and they set upon him the boys, who pelted him with stones until they fractured his ribs and broke his head; notwithstanding which, he would not depart. The people of the village, therefore, resolved to kill him; but a man of them came to me, and acquainted me with his case; upon which I went forth to him, and beheld him laid prostrate; and I wiped the blood from his face, and conveyed him to the convent, where I applied remedies to his wounds, and he remained with me fourteen days. As soon, however, as he was able to walk he went forth from the convent to the door of the damsel's shop, and sat again gazing at her. And when she saw him, she rose to him, and said to him, By Allah, I am moved with compassion for thee. Wilt thou then adopt my religion, that I may marry thee?—But he answered, God preserve me from abandoning the religion of the Unity, and adopting the religion of Polytheism!—Then depart from me, said the damsel.—My heart, he replied, will not consent to my doing so. And she turned her face from him. And the boys seeing him again, came to him, and pelted him as before with stones, and he fell upon his face, saying, Verily my helper is God, who sent down the Book, and He taketh charge of the just!—I therefore went forth from the convent, and drove from him the boys, and lifting up his head from the ground, I heard him say, O my Lord, unite me with her in Paradise!—I conveyed him to the convent; but he died before I had arrived there with him; and I took him forth from the village, dug a grave for him, and buried him.

And in the following night, when half of it was spent, that woman shrieked out as she lay in her bed; whereupon the people of the village came together to her, asking her what had happened to her; and she answered, While I was asleep, this Muslim came in to me, and, taking me by my hand, went away with me to Paradise. But when he arrived with me at its gate, its Guardian prevented my entering it, saying, It is denied unto the infidels. So I made profession of El-Islâm to him, and entered with him; and I beheld in it pavilions and trees such as I cannot describe to you. Then he took me to a pavilion of jewels, and said to me, Verily this pavilion is for me and thee. I will not enter it but with thee; and after five nights thou wilt be with me in it, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted!—And thereupon he stretched forth his hand to a tree at the door of that pavilion, and plucked from it two apples, which he gave to me, saying, Eat this, and conceal the other, that the monks may see it. I therefore ate one; and I have tasted nothing more sweet than it. He then took me by my hand, and went forth with me until he conducted me to my house; and when I awoke, I found the taste of the apple in my mouth, and the other apple with me.—Having said this, she produced the apple, and it shone in the darkness of night as though it were a glistening star. So they brought the woman to the convent, and the apple with her; and she related to us the vision, and produced to us the apple. We had seen nothing like it among all the fruits of the world; and I took a knife, and divided it in pieces according to the number of my companions; and we had not tasted any thing more delicious than its flavour, nor smelt any thing more sweet than its odour. But we said, Perhaps this was a devil who presented himself to her to seduce her from her religion. And her family took her and departed. And she abstained from eating and drinking: and when the fifth night arrived, she rose from her bed, went forth from her house, and repaired to the grave of that Muslim; and she threw herself upon it, and died; her family not knowing what she had done.

Then, in the morning, there came to the village two Muslim sheykhs, attired in apparel of hair-cloth, and accompanied by two women in the like garb; and they said, O people of the village, ye have among you a Weleeyeh of God; she hath died a Muslimeh, and we will take charge of her in preference to you. So the people of the village sought that woman, and they found her upon the grave, dead. But they said, This was our friend; she died in our religion, and we will take charge of her. The two sheykhs said, Nay: she died a Muslimeh, and we will take charge of her. And the altercation and dispute between them became violent. Therefore one of the two sheykhs said, The sign of her having embraced El-Islâm shall be this: the forty monks of the convent shall come together, to drag her from the grave; and if they be able to lift her from the ground, she died a Christian; but if they cannot do so, one of us shall advance and drag her; and if she come with him, she died a Muslimeh. And to this the people of the village consented. The forty monks assembled, and encouraged one another, and came to her to lift her; but they could not do so; and we tied to her waist a great rope, and attempted to drag her; but the rope broke, and she moved not. The people of the village also advanced and did the like: yet she moved not from her place. So when we were unable to lift her by any means that we adopted, we said to one of the two sheykhs, Advance thou, and lift her. Accordingly one of them advanced to her, and wrapped her in his cloak, and saying, In the name of God, the Compassionate, the Merciful, and through the religion of the Apostle of God, may God favour and preserve him!—he carried her in his bosom. The Muslims conveyed her to a cavern there, and put her in it; and the two women came, and washed her and shrouded her. Then the sheykhs carried her, and prayed over her, and buried her by the side of his grave, and departed; we having witnessed all this.

And when some of us were in private with others of our associates, we said, Verily the truth is most deserving of being followed, and the truth hath become manifest to us by ocular witness, and we can have no proof of the truth of El-Islâm more manifest to us than what we have beheld with our eyes. Then I embraced El-Islâm, and so also did all the monks of the convent, and the people of the village. After this, we sent to the people of El-Jezeereh, supplicating for a professor of religion and law, to teach us the ordinances of El-Islâm, and the precepts of the religion; and a professor, a just man, came to us, and taught us the rites of divine worship, and the precepts of El-Islâm; so that we are now enjoying abundant happiness; and to God be praise and thanks!

Aboo-'Eesà and the Girl Kurrat-el-'Eyn

'Amr the son of Mes'adah hath related, that Aboo-'Eesà the son of Fr-Rasheed and brother of El-Ma-moon was enamoured of Kurrat-el-'Eyn, the slave-girl of 'Alee the son of Hishâm, and she also was enamoured of him; but Aboo-'Eesà concealed his love, and revealed it not, nor complained of it to any one, nor acquainted any one with his secret. Thus he did from his magnanimity and generosity. He endeavoured, however, to purchase her of her lord by every expedient. But he could not attain his object; and when his patience failed him, and his transport of love became violent, and he found no means of obtaining her, he went in to El-Ma-moon on a festival-day, after the departure of the people from him, and said, O Prince of the Faithful, if thou wouldst try thy heart this day and pay unexpected visits, thou wouldst distinguish the people of generosity from others, and wouldst know the place of each of them, and the quality of his mind. Aboo-'Eesà desired, by these words, to get an opportunity of sitting with Kurrat-el-'Eyn in the house of her lord. And El-Ma-moon replied, Verily this advice is right. He gave orders to prepare a bark which was named the Flyer: so they brought it forward to him, and he embarked in it, together with a party of his chief officers; and the first pavilion that he entered was that of Homeyd Et-Taweel, of Toos. They went in to him in the pavilion when he expected them not, and found him sitting upon a mat, with the singers before him, having lutes and flutes and other instruments of music in their hands; and after El-Ma-moon had sat a while, there were brought to him dishes of the flesh of beasts, without any of the flesh of birds; and El-Ma-moon paid no regard to any of those viands. So Aboo-'Eesà said, O Prince of the Faithful, we entered this place unexpected, and its owner knew not of thine approach. Arise then and go with us to a place prepared for thee and suited to thee.

The Khaleefeh accordingly arose, with his chief officers and his brother Aboo-'Eesà, and they repaired to the house of 'Alee the son of Hishâm. And when he knew of their coming, he received them in the most honourable manner, kissing the ground before the Khaleefeh. Then he conducted them into a pavilion, and opened a chamber, such as none had seen surpassed in beauty. Its floor and columns and walls were of varieties of marbles, it was decorated with various kinds of Greek paintings, and its floor was spread with mats of Es-Sind, and furniture of El-Basrah, made to suit the length and breadth of the chamber. El-Ma-moon sat a while contemplating the apartment and the roof and the walls; after which he said, Give us some food. And there were brought to him immediately nearly a hundred dishes of fowls, besides other birds, and thereeds and fries and cold things; and when he had eaten, he said, Give us something to drink, O 'Alee. And there was brought to him aromatic wine, prepared with fruits and fragrant spices, in vessels of gold and silver and crystal; and those who brought in that wine were pages like moons, attired in garments of stuff of Alexandria interwoven with gold, and before their bosoms were bottles of crystal containing rose-water infused with musk. El-Ma-moon wondered exceedingly at that which he beheld, and said, O Abu-l-Hasan. Whereupon he sprang to the carpet and kissed it, and then, standing before the Khaleefeh, replied, At thy service, O Prince of the Faithful. And the Khaleefeh said, Let us hear some mirth-exciting songs. His host replied, I hear and obey, O Prince of the Faithful. Then he said to one of his servants, Bring the singing slave-girls. So the eunuch replied that he heard and obeyed; and, after he had been absent a moment, returned with ten eunuchs bringing ten chairs of gold. And when they had placed the chairs, there came ten maids like shining full moons and flowery gardens, attired in black brocade, and with crowns of gold upon their heads; and they walked forward until they seated themselves upon the chairs, when they sang varieties of melodies. Then those slave-girls departed, and ten others came, and sang; and after these, came ten others; and again, after them, ten others.

El-Ma-moon then said, Bring forward the boat. And he was about to embark and go. But 'Alee the son of Hishâm arose and said, O Prince of the Faithful, I have a slave-girl whom I purchased for ten thousand pieces of gold, and who hath captivated my whole heart, and I desire to shew her to the Prince of the Faithful. If she please him, and he approve of her, she shall be his; and if not, let him hear from her something.—So the Khaleefeh said, Bring her unto me. And there came forth a damsel like a twig of the Oriental willow, with fascinating eyes, and eyebrows like two bows, and upon her head was a crown of red gold set with large pearls and with jewels, beneath which was a bandage whereon was worked with chrysolites this verse:—

A Jinneeyeh, and she hath Jinn who teach her to smite hearts by means of a stringless bow.

This damsel walked forward like a fugitive gazelle; and she would have fascinated a devotee. She continued to advance till she seated herself upon a chair; and when El-Ma-moon beheld her, he wondered at her beauty and loveliness; and Aboo-'Eesà was pained in heart; his complexion became sallow, and his whole state changed. El-Ma-moon therefore said to him, What is the matter with thee, O Aboo-'Eesà, that thy state hath changed? He answered, O Prince of the Faithful, it is by reason of a malady that cometh upon me sometimes. And the Khaleefeh said to him, Hast thou known this slave-girl before the present day?—Yes, O Prince of the Faithful, he answered. And can the moon (he added) be hidden?—Then El-Ma-moon said to her, What is thy name, O damsel? She answered, My name is Kurrat-el-'Eyn, O Prince of the Faithful. And he said to her, Sing to us, O Kurrat-el-'Eyn. So she sang; and the Khaleefeh said to her, Divinely art thou gifted! By whom are these verses?—She answered, By Deabil, El-Khuzá'ee, and the air is by Zurzoor Es-Sagheer. And Aboo-'Eesà looked at her, and weeping choked him, so that the company wondered at him.

Then the damsel looked towards El-Ma-moon, and said to him, O Prince of the Faithful, wilt thou give me permission to change the words of my song? He answered, Sing what thou wilt. And, with exciting modulations, she sang these verses:—

If thou please one and he also please thee publicly, be more careful of preserving thy love in secret;

And reject the assertions of the slanderers; for seldom do they wish for aught but the estrangement of the lover.

They have averred that whenever the lover approacheth, he is wearied; and that absence is the remedy for passion.

We have tried both remedies, and not been cured; but nearness of abode is better than distance:

Yet nearness of abode is of no advantage when the person thou lovest doth not love thee.

And when she had finished her song, Aboo-'Eesà said, O Prince of the Faithful, if we be disgraced, we shall be at ease. Wilt thou give me permission to reply to her?—The Khaleefeh answered him, Yes: say to her what thou wilt. And he restrained his tears, and sang these two verses:—

I was silent, and said not that I was a lover; but concealed my affection from my own heart.

If my love, notwithstanding, appear in my eye, 'tis because it is near to the shining moon.

Then again the damsel took the lute and sang; and again Aboo-'Eesà sang in reply to her; and when he had ended, 'Alee the son of Hishám sprang to his feet and kissed them, saying to him, O my master, God hath answered thy prayer, and heard thy secret, and consented to thy taking her with all her appurtenances of rarities and beautiful things, if the Prince of the Faithful have no desire for her. And El-Ma-moon said, If we had a desire for her, we had given Aboo-'Eesà the preference to ourself, and aided him in the attainment of his desire. Then El-Ma-moon arose, and embarked in the boat. Aboo-'Eesà remained behind to take Kurrat-el-'Eyn, and he took her and departed with her to his abode, with a dilated heart.—Consider then the generosity of 'Alee the son of Hishám.

NOTE 2. "When any one of you dies," said the Prophet, "you must not keep him in the house; but carry him quickly to his grave;" and again, he said, "Be quick in lifting up a bier; for if the deceased be a good man, it is good to take him up quickly, and carry him to his grave, to cause the good to arrive at happiness; and if the deceased be a bad man, it is a wickedness which ye put from your neck."

NOTE 3.—Ceremonies observed after a Death. Towards the eve of the first Friday after the funeral, and, often, early in the morning of the Thursday, the women of the family of the deceased repeat their wailing, in the house, accompanied by some of their female friends: male friends of the deceased also visit the house shortly before or after sunset; and three or four persons are hired to perform a recitation of the whole of the Kur-án. On the following morning, some or all of the members of the deceased's family, but chiefly the women, visit the tomb; they or their servants carrying palm-branches, and sometimes sweet basil, to lay upon it. The palm-branch is broken into several pieces, and these, or the leaves only, are placed on the tomb. Often, also, the visitors take with them some kind of food, as bread, pancakes, sweet cakes of different kinds, or dates, to distribute to the poor on this occasion. They recite the Opening Chapter of the Kur-án; or, if they can afford it, employ a person to recite first the Thirty-sixth Chapter, or a large portion of the Kur-án; and many persons cause a recitation of the whole of the Kur-án to be performed at the tomb, or in the house, by men hired for that purpose.—These ceremonies are repeated on the same days of the next two weeks; and again on the eve and morning of the Friday which completes, or next follows, the first period of forty days after the funeral; whence this Friday is called "El-Arba'een," or "Jum'at el-Arba'een.

NOTE 4. This is one of the instances in which coffee is mentioned in the Thousand and One Nights in a manner not to be mistaken; but perhaps by a copyist. The word rendered "coffee-makers" is "kahwejeeyeh," plural of "kahwejee," a compound of Arabic and Turkish, pronounced by the Turks "kahwejee." It occurs also in the same passage in the Breslau edition.

NOTE 5. Er-Ródah is a very pleasant island in the Nile, about two miles and a half in length, near Cairo; lying to the south-west of that city. Its name signifies "The Garden," &c. The Nilometer is at its southern extremity.

NOTE 6. The term "hósh" generally signifies "the court of a house;" but it is often applied, as in this case, to a court surrounded by mean lodgings, inhabited by persons of the lower orders.

NOTE 7. Boolák is the principal port of Cairo. It was founded, and became a considerable town, in the eighth century of the Flight (or the fourteenth of our era). The plain upon which it is situate arose in consequence of a gradual change in the course of the Nile, which formerly flowed very near by the western side of Cairo.

NOTE 8. Dimyát is the town commonly called by us Damietta. Its name is generally pronounced by the modern Egyptians Dumyát.

NOTE 9. See Note 48 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 10. A takhtarawán, described in Note 8 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 11. The terms "akkám" and "farrásh" have been explained in Note 28 to Chapter xi and Note 16 to Chapter x. By "light-bearers" are meant men who bear the kind of cresset described in Note 2 to Chapter xiii.

NOTE 12. See Note 8 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 13. "Hosn el-Wujood" signifies "the Beauty of the World." See Note 6 to Chapter xviii.

NOTE 14. "Ulamà" is the plural of "álim," which signifies a man of science or learning, but is a term more particularly given to a doctor of the law. European writers generally use the plural form of this appellation for the singular.

NOTE 15. See Note 18 to Chapter x.

NOTE 16. This story is followed by an anecdote, of which I here give a translation.

A Townsman and a Bedaweeeyeh

It is related that a man of the pilgrims slept a long sleep, and then awoke, and saw no trace of the other pilgrims. So he arose and walked on; but he wandered from the way, and he proceeded until he saw a tent, and an old woman at its door, and he found by her a dog asleep. He approached the tent, saluted the old woman, and begged of her some food; whereupon she said to him, Go to yon valley, and catch as many serpents as will suffice thee, that I may broil some of them for thee. The man replied, I dare not catch serpents, and I never ate them. The old woman therefore said, I will go with thee, and catch some of them, and fear thou not. Then she went with him, and the dog followed her, and she caught as many of the serpents as would suffice, and proceeded to broil some of them. The pilgrim could not refrain from eating; for he feared hunger and emaciation: so he ate of those serpents. And after this, being thirsty, he demanded of the old woman some water to drink; and she said to him, Go to the spring, and drink of it. Accordingly he went to the spring; but he found its water bitter; yet he could not refrain from drinking of it, notwithstanding its exceeding bitterness, on account of the violence of his thirst. He therefore drank, and then returned to the old woman, and said to her, I wonder at thee, O thou old woman, and at thy residing in this place, and thy feeding thyself with this food, and thy drinking of this water. — How then, said the old woman, is your country? He answered her, Verily in our country are spacious and ample houses, and ripe and delicious fruits, and abundant sweet waters, and excellent viands, and fat meats, and numerous sheep, and every thing good, and blessings of which the like exist not save in the Paradise that God (whose name be exalted!) hath described to his just servants. — All this, replied the old woman, I have heard; but tell me, have you any Sultán who ruleth over you, and oppreseth in his rule while ye are under his authority; and who, if any one of you committeth an offence, taketh his wealth, and destroyeth him; and who, if he desire, turneth you out from your houses, and eradicateth you utterly? The man answered her, That doth sometimes happen. And the old woman rejoined, If so, by Allah, that dainty food and elegant life and those delightful comforts, with oppression and tyranny, are penetrating poison; and our food, with safety, is a salutary antidote. Hast thou not heard that the most excellent of boons, after El-Islám, are safety and health?

Now these may be through the justice of the Sultan, the vicegerent of God upon his earth, and through his good policy. The Sultán of former times loved to be distinguished by the lowest degree of awfulness; because, when his subjects saw him, they feared him: but the Sultán of this age loveth to be distinguished by the most perfect policy and the utmost awfulness; because men now are not like those of former days. This our age is one of a people opprobrious, and greatly calamitous; since they are noted for folly, and for hardness of heart, and are bent upon vehement hatred, and upon enmity. Therefore, if the Sultán (in God, whose name be exalted, be our refuge!) should be weak among them, or not characterized by policy and awfulness, no doubt that would be the cause of the ruin of the country. And among the proverbs is this: — The oppression of the Sultán for a hundred years, rather than the oppression of the subjects, one over another, for a single year. — And when the subjects oppress, God setteth over them an oppressive Sultán and a violent King. Thus it is related in the histories, that there was sent up to El-Hajjáj the son of Yoosuf, one day, a petition wherein was written, Fear God, and oppress not God's servants with every kind of oppression. And when he had read the petition, he ascended the pulpit (and he was eloquent), and he said, O ye people, verily God (whose name be exalted!) hath set me over you on account of your actions; and if I die, ye will not be free from oppression with these wicked actions; for God (whose name be exalted!) hath created many like me; and if I be not, there will be one worse than I, and more severe in oppression, and more violent in impetuosity. As the poet hath said, —

There is no hand but God's hand is above it, nor oppressor that shall not meet with an oppressor.

— Oppression is feared; but justice is the best of all qualities. We beg God to amend our states.

[The above anecdote is followed by the Story of Taweddud, the Learned Slave-girl, ending with part of the four hundred and sixty second Night. This story almost entirely consists in a display of Taweddud's profound knowledge in religion, &c., in which she surpassed the most eminent professors in an examination before Hároon Er-Rasheed; and as it would not only require a volume of commentary, but be extremely tiresome to most readers of the present work, I omit it.

Next is a series of eighteen anecdotes (or rather fictions related as facts), ending with part of the four hundred and eighty-second Night. From these I have selected for translation only four. Almost all of them relate to saints and miracles. The first of those which I translate is preceded in the original by two of a similar kind.]

A Tyrannical King and the Angel of Death

A tyrannical King, one of the Kings of the Children of Israel, was one day sitting upon his throne, and he beheld a man who had entered the door of the palace, having an offensive form and a terrible appearance. So the King shuddered at his sudden intrusion upon him, and was terrified at his appearance; and he sprang up in his face, and said, Who art thou, O man, and who gave thee permission to intrude upon me, and who commanded thee to come to my abode? He answered, The Lord of the abode commanded me, and none excludeth me, nor do I require permission to go in unto Kings, neither do I fear the rule of a Sultán nor the multitude of guards: I am he whom no tyrant hindereth, and none can escape from my grasp: I am the terminator of delights and the separator of companions. And when the King heard these words, he fell upon his face, a tremor crept through his body, and he fell down in a fit; and on his recovery he said, Art thou the Angel of Death? He answered, Yes. And the King said, I conjure thee by Allah to give me one day's delay, that I may beg forgiveness of my sin, and seek pardon of my Lord, and restore the wealth that is in my treasuries to its owners, so that I may not suffer the affliction of a reckoning with respect to it, and the misery of punishment on account of it. But the Angel of Death replied, Far, far from thee be that! Thou hast no way of attaining that wish. How can I grant thee a delay when the days of thy life are reckoned, and thy breaths are numbered, and thy moments are fixed and written? — The King said, Grant me an hour's delay. He replied, Verily the hour is included in the account, and it hath passed while thou wast heedless, and hath expired while thou wast careless. Thou hast fulfilled the number of thy breaths, save that there remaineth to thee one breath only. — And the King said, Who will be with me when I am removed to my grave? He answered, Nought will be with thee but thy work. The King replied, I have [done] no work. And the Angel of Death said, Without doubt thine abode will be in the fire; and thy destination, to suffer the anger of the Omnipotent. — Then he seized his soul: so he tumbled from his throne, and fell to the ground; and a clamour arose among the people of his kingdom; their voices were raised, and their cries and weeping were loud; and had they known the indignation that he had gone to endure from his Lord, their weeping for him had been greater, and their lamentation had been more violent and more abundant.

Advantages of Piety and Industry

There was, among the Children of Israel, a good man, who applied himself diligently to the worship of God, and abstained from worldly enjoyments, discarding them from his heart; and he had a wife who aided him in his pursuit, and who always obeyed him. They lived by making trays and fans, working all the day; and at the close of the day, the man went forth with the things that he had made in his hand, and walked with them along the streets and roads, seeking a purchaser, to whom to sell them; and they fasted continually. Now one day the man went forth as usual, and an event befell him which constrained him to throw himself from the top of a lofty house, in order to avoid an act of disobedience unto his Lord; but God sent to him an angel, who bore him upon his wings, and set him down upon the ground in safety, without any injury happening to him. And when he rested upon the ground, he praised God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!) for the protection which He had afforded him, and the mercy that He had granted him, and returned without any obstacle to his wife. He had been long absent from her, and entered bringing nothing with him: so she asked him respecting the cause of his tardiness, and respecting the things which he had taken forth in his hand, and as to what he had done with them, and how he had returned without any thing. He therefore informed her of the temptation that had happened to him, and that he had thrown himself down from that place, and God had saved him. And his wife said, Praise be to God who hath averted from thee the temptation, and interposed between thee and the calamity! Then she said, O man, verily the neighbours have been accustomed to observe that we light our oven every night, and if they see us this night without fire, they will know that we are destitute. Thankfulness to God requireth the concealment of our poverty, and the conjoining of the fast of this night with that of the past day, and spending it in the service of God, whose name be exalted! — Accordingly she arose and went to the oven, filled it with firewood, and set light to it to delude the women who were her neighbours; and she recited these verses:—

I will conceal the desire and the griefs that I suffer, and will light my fire to delude my neighbours.

I approve of that which my Lord hath decreed:
perhaps He will see my submission, and approve me.

After this, she and her husband arose, and performed the ablution, and began to pray. But, lo, one of her female neighbours begged permission to light from their oven. They therefore said to her, Go to the oven, and do as thou desirest. And when the woman drew near to the oven to take the fire, she called out, O such-a-one! (mentioning the name of the woman of the place) come to thy bread before it burneth. So she said to her husband, Heardest thou what this woman said? And he replied, Arise and see. She arose, therefore, and went to the oven, and, lo, it was filled with fine white bread; and she took the cakes of bread and went in to her husband, thanking God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!) for the abundant good, and great favour, which He had bestowed. They ate of the bread, and drank some water, and praised God, whose name be exalted! Then the woman said to her husband, Come, let us supplicate God (whose name be exalted!); perhaps He will favour us with something that will render us independent of the trouble necessary to obtain our livelihood, and of the fatigue of working, and will aid us to employ ourselves in his worship and to occupy ourselves with his service. He replied, Well. So the man supplicated his Lord, and the woman said Amen to his supplication; and, lo, the roof clove asunder, and there descended a ruby, which illuminated the chamber by its lustre; whereupon they increased in their thanksgiving and praise. They were greatly rejoiced with that ruby, and said as many prayers as God (whose name be exalted!) willed. Then, at the close of the night, they slept; and the woman saw in her sleep as though she entered Paradise, and beheld many pulpits ranged in order, and chairs set; whereupon she said, What are these pulpits, and what are these chairs? She was answered, These are the pulpits of the prophets, and these are the chairs of the just and the good.—And where, said she, is the chair of my husband, such-a-one? She was answered, It is this. And she looked at it, and, lo, in its side was a hole. She therefore said, What is this hole? And she was answered, It is the hole of the ruby that descended upon you from the roof of your house.—So she awoke weeping and mourning for the defect of the chair of her husband among the chairs of the just; and she said, O man, supplicate thy Lord to restore this ruby to its place; for the endurance of hunger and poverty during the days that are few will be a lighter matter than the hole in thy chair among the people of excellencies. And the man supplicated his Lord, and, lo, the ruby flew up to the roof, while they looked at it: and they ceased not to live in their poverty and devotion until they met God, to whom be ascribed might and glory.

The Muslim Warrior and the Christian Maiden

The Prince of the Faithful, 'Omar the son of El-Khattâb, sent an army of the Muslims against the enemy, in Syria, and they besieged vehemently one of their fortresses; and there were among the Muslims two men, brothers, to whom God had given impetuosity and boldness against the enemy, so that the lord of that fortress said to his auxiliaries, and to his heroes who were before him, If these two Muslims were made prisoners, or slain, I should suffice you against the rest of the Muslims. They ceased not to set snares for these two men, and to employ stratagems against them, laying ambushes, and increasing the number of the men in the lurking-places, until one of the two Muslims was taken prisoner, and the other was slain a martyr. So the captive Muslim was carried to the lord of that fortress; and when the latter saw him, he said, Verily the slaughter of this man would be an evil, and his return to the Muslims would be a calamity. I wish that he would embrace the Christian faith, to be an auxiliary and a helper to us. And one of his Batrecks said, O Emeer, I will seduce him so that he shall apostatize from his religion; for the Arabs are exceedingly fond of women, and I have a daughter endowed with loveliness and perfect beauty: so if he see her, he will be seduced by her. The Emeer therefore said, He is committed unto thee: then convey him away.

Accordingly he conveyed him to his abode, and clad the damsel in attire which increased her beauty and loveliness; after which, he took the man into the house, and caused the food to be brought; and the Christian damsel stood before him as a maid serving her master and waiting for him to give her some command which she should perform. And when the Muslim saw what had befallen him, he kept himself from sin by seeking refuge with God (whose name be exalted!); he closed his eyes, and occupied himself with the worship of his Lord, and reciting the Kur-ân. Now he had an excellent voice, and an effective talent in the use of it; and the Christian damsel was affected with a violent love for him, and became greatly enamoured of him; and this state of affairs continued seven days, until the damsel said, Would that he may consent to my embracing El-Islâm! And when her patience failed, and her heart was contracted, she threw herself down before him, and said, I conjure thee by thy religion that thou hear my words! He replied, And what wouldst thou say? She answered, Propose to me El-Islâm. So he proposed it to her and she became a Muslimeh. Then she purified herself, and he taught her how to pray; and when she had done so, she said, O my brother, Verily my embracing El-Islâm was on thine account, and from my wish to have thee near unto me. He replied, El-Islâm forbiddeth marriage unless there be two legal witnesses, and a dowry, and a guardian; and I find not the two witnesses, nor the guardian, nor the dowry; but if thou contrive means of our going forth from this place, I may hope to arrive in the abode of the Muslims, and I will make a covenant with thee that I will have no wife among the Muslimehs but thee. So she said, I will contrive a stratagem to accomplish that. She then called her father and her mother, and said to them, Verily the heart of this Muslim hath become softened, and he desireth to embrace the faith; and I will grant him the accomplishment of that which he desireth of me. He hath said, however, This shall not happen unto me in a town where my brother was killed; but if I go forth from it, that my heart may be diverted, I will do as thou desirest. No harm will ensue if ye send me forth with him to another town; for I am a surety to you and to the King for the accomplishment of that which ye desire.

So her father went to their Emeer, and informed him; and he was greatly rejoiced at that, and gave orders to send her forth with him to the town that she had mentioned. Accordingly they went forth, and when they had arrived at the town, and remained the rest of the day, and the darkness of night overshadowed them, they departed, and pursued their way, like as one of the poets hath said,—

They said, The time of our departure hath drawn near. I replied, How oft shall I be threatened with departure?
I have nothing to do but to cross the waste, and to traverse the earth, mile after mile.
If the beloved journey towards another land,
I travel thither, a son of the road;
I make my desire my director to her, and it sheweth me the way without other guide.

And they proceeded throughout the night. The young man had mounted a swift horse and placed her behind him; and he ceased not to traverse the earth until morning was near, when he turned with her from the road and set her down; and they performed the ablution, and recited the morning-prayers. But while they were thus engaged, they heard the clashing of weapons, and the clinking of bits and bridles, and the voices of men, and the sounds of the hoofs of horses. So he said to her, O such-a-one (mentioning her name), this is a troop of the Christians in pursuit, which hath overtaken us; what then shall be our resource, when the horse hath become wearied and jaded so that he cannot stir a step? But she replied, Wo to thee! Art thou alarmed and afraid?—He said, Yes.—Where then, she rejoined, is the power of thy Lord, of which thou toldest me, and His succour to those who seek it? Come let us humble ourselves before Him, and supplicate Him: perhaps He will grant us His succour, and make us to participate in His gracious protection; extolled be His perfection, and exalted be His name!—And he replied, Excellent, by Allah, is that which thou hast said! Accordingly they began to humble themselves before God (whose name be exalted!), and he recited these verses:—

Verily I am hourly in need of thine assistance, and should be though a crown were placed upon my head.
Thou art my greatest want, and if my hand obtained what I desire, I should have no wants remaining.
Thou hast not any thing that Thou withholdest;
for the flood of thy munificence floweth copiously and in torrents;
But I am excluded by my transgression: yet resplendent is the light of thy pardon, O Clement!
O Dispeller of anxiety, remove my affliction!
for who but Thyself can dispel this anxiety?

And while he was supplicating, and the damsel was saying Amen to his supplication, and the tramping of the horses was approaching them, the young man heard the voice of his brother the martyr, saying, O my brother, fear not nor grieve; for the approaching troop is the troop of God, and it is his Angels, whom He hath sent unto you to witness your marriage. Verily God hath gloried in you before his Angels, and given you the recompense of the blessed and the martyrs, and contracted for you the earth, so that in the morning thou wilt be among the mountains of El-Medeeneh. And when thou meetest 'Omar the son of El-Khattáb (may God be well pleased with him!), greet him with salutation from me, and say to him, May God recompense thee well for the Muslims; for thou hast given good counsel, and laboured with diligence. — Then the Angels raised their voices, saluting him and his wife, and said, Verily God (whose name be exalted!) decreed her in marriage to thee before the creation of your father Adam (on whom be peace!) by two thousand years. And upon this they experienced joy and happiness, and security and gladness: confidence was increased, and the guidance of the pious was confirmed: and when day-break came, they performed the morning-prayers.

Now 'Omar the son of El-Khattáb (may God be well pleased with him!) used to perform the morning-prayers in the darkness before dawn; and sometimes he entered the place of prayer in the mosque, followed by two men, and began with the Chapter of Cattle, or the Chapter of Women; whereupon the sleeper awoke, and he who would perform the ablution performed it, and he who was at a distance came, so that the first rek'ah was not completed before the mosque was filled with people. Then he performed the second rek'ah with the recitation of a light chapter, and doing it quickly. But on that day, he recited in the first rek'ah a light chapter, doing it quickly, and in like manner in the second; and when he had pronounced the salutations, he looked towards his companions, and said, Come forth with us that we may meet the bridegroom and bride. So his companions wondered, and understood not his words; and he advanced, with them following him, until he went forth to the gate of the city.

The young man, as soon as the light appeared to him, and he beheld the standards of El-Medeenah, advanced towards the gate, with his wife behind him; and 'Omar and the Muslims his companions met him and saluted him. And when they entered the city, 'Omar (may God be well pleased with him!) gave orders that a feast should be prepared; and the Muslims came and ate. The young man entered with his bride; and God (whose name be exalted!) blessed him by her with children who fought in the way of God, and kept their genealogies, because they gloried in them; and they ceased not to pass a most comfortable life, and to enjoy the most perfect happiness, until they were visited by the terminator of delights and the separator of companions.

The Justice of Providence

A certain prophet employed himself in devotion upon a lofty mountain, beneath which ran a spring of water; and during the day he used to sit upon the summit of the mountain, so that people saw him not. There he repeated the praises of God (whose name be exalted!), and saw such persons as came to drink at the spring. And as he was one day sitting looking towards the spring, he beheld a horseman, who approached, and alighted from his horse, put down a leathern bag that was slung to his neck, and rested, and drank of the water; after which he departed, leaving the leathern bag, in which were pieces of gold. And, lo, a man came to drink of the water, and he took the leathern bag with the money, and drank of the water, and departed in safety. Then there came after him a man who was a wood-cutter, bearing a heavy bundle of firewood upon his back, and he seated himself by the spring, to drink of the water. But, lo, the horseman first mentioned approached in a state of distress, and he said to the wood-cutter, Where is the leathern bag that was here? He answered, I know nothing of it. And the horseman drew his sword, struck the wood-cutter, and slew him; and he searched in his clothes, and found nothing: so he left him, and went his way.

And that prophet said, O Lord, one person took a thousand pieces of gold, and another hath been slain unjustly. But God said to him by revelation, Occupy thyself with thy devotion; for the government of the kingdom is not thine affair. Verily the father of this horseman had taken by force a thousand pieces of gold of the property of the father of this man; so I have put the son in possession of his father's property: and verily the wood-cutter had slain the father of this horseman; wherefore I have enabled the son to take retaliation. — And thereupon that prophet said, There is no deity but Thou! Extolled be thy perfection! Thou art all-knowing with respect to secret things!

[Next to the series of anecdotes from which the above are selected, follows the Story of Hâsib Kereem-ed-Deen, or rather, a combination of the stories of Hâsib, Bulookiyâ, and Jânshâh, ending with the five hundred and thirty-sixth Night. It is mainly a compound of the most extravagant absurdities, and would, I think, be extremely tedious to many readers of the present translation, with the exception of the portion relating to Jânshâh; but this is similar in its general character, and in the incidents upon which it is chiefly founded, to the Story of Hasan of El-Basrah, which is one that I purpose to include in this work. I therefore pass on to the five hundred and thirty-seventh Night, with which commences the Story of Es-Sindibád of the Sea (the famous Voyager) and Es-Sindibád of the Land.

The stories which I omit in these volumes I do not consider destitute of interest or value, nor should I regard them, with the exception of a few, as unworthy of being presented to English readers, if some were abridged, and considerable alterations were made in others, when the omission of gross passages would render them incoherent; but even if they were thus abridged and altered, I should not think it advisable to introduce them in this collection, which is designed to comprise no tales that are greatly inferior in interest to those in the old version.]

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTIETH

NOTE I. Before I considered the composition of this story, it appeared to me utterly incredible that one person, or even two or three, could have composed the greater portion of a series of tales so numerous and so varied as those of the Thousand and One Nights. But my opinion was changed when I found that nearly every one of the most wonderful incidents occurring in the voyages of Es-Sindibád of the Sea was described in other Arabic works, and when I considered that, these works being professedly scientific, it would be unreasonable to entertain the slightest suspicion that their authors borrowed from a tale of fiction. Thus I discovered that one of the tales which seemed to have required in its composer the greatest power of imagination did in reality require very little of this faculty, and that the merit of the composition lay not so much in the matter, as in the manner. I obtained also a confirmation of De Sacy's opinion (which some learned men have doubted), that the story of the voyages of Es-Sindibád is a "roman vraiment arabe d'origine," and not "the Book of Es-Sindibád" mentioned in the passage relating to the Hezár Afsáneh in the Golden Meadows of El-Mes'oodé. May not most of the tales of the Thousand and One Nights have been composed in the same manner as the one which I now endeavour to illustrate?

Of the age in which this story was composed, I can offer no certain evidence; but I see no reason to think it older than most of the tales in the present work. It is evidently founded upon the exaggerated reports of a variety of travellers, and almost all these reports I find related in the "'Ajáib el-Makhlookát" of El-Kazweenee and the "Khareedet el-'Ajáib" of Ibn-El-Wardee. The former author flourished in the latter half of the thirteenth century, and the latter died about the middle of the fourteenth. I am unable to discover whether the "travellers' lies" here alluded to have been recorded by earlier writers; but considering the popularity of the two works above mentioned, I think it probable that they were the mines from which the author of the voyages of Es-Sindibád of the Sea drew most of the materials for the composition of this tale.

Mr. Hole's ingenious and admirable illustrations of this story, which, he observes, "may be not unjustly denominated 'the Arabian Odyssey,' . . . if small things may be compared with great," are well known; and I shall often avail myself of them in the present series of notes; but not so amply as I should have done had I not traced almost all the marvels of the tale to their proper Arabian sources.—Here I must also mention a learned and instructive article on the Thousand and One Nights in No. 47 of the Foreign Quarterly Review. The writer of that article (the perusal of which has afforded me much gratification), alluding to the voyages of Es-Sindibád, observes that a singular poem, which has escaped the notice of Hole, contains some highly curious coincidences with these voyages and with some other portions of the Arabian Nights. "They tend at the same time," he adds, "to prove the antiquity of these particular stories, as it is improbable that the eastern story-tellers should have been indebted to the writer of a German metrical romance of the twelfth century. The romance alluded to is Duke Ernest of Bavaria. It was composed in German Rhyme by Henry of Veldeck, who flourished about 1160; and a Latin poem on the same subject, by one Odo, appeared about the same time. A prose version of the outlines of the story is still popular in Germany. In this singular romance we find the æronautic excursion in the second voyage of Sindbad, with no material variation; the pigmies and cranes as well as the adventure borrowed from the Odyssey in the third voyage; and the subterraneous voyage in the sixth. We have likewise the magnetic mountain, occurring in the story of the Third Calendar, which has also been transplanted into the miraculous legend of the Irish Saint, Brandanus."—It will be seen, however, that the incidents in Es-Sindibád's Voyages here alluded to, and many more, occur in other works; and I think it may be reasonably inferred, that they were subjects of common report in the East long before they were introduced into the present collection.

In the translation, I have occasionally deviated from the Cairo edition, following, in cases which will be pointed out in the notes, the Breslau edition of the Thousand and One Nights, the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and an edition of the story of Es-Sindibád in the original Arabic appended by the learned M. Langlès to Savary's Grammaire de la Langue Arabe, and also published in a separate form, accompanied by a faithful version in French.

NOTE 2. In Langlès' edition, and the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, the porter is called "El-Hindibád." The etymology of this name, and of "Es-Sindibád," I must leave in doubt. If the former be the name by which the author of the tale called the porter, I conclude that he derived the two names, respectively, from "El-Hind" and "Es-Sind;" the former of which is the appellation of the main portion of India; and the latter, that of Western India. "Es-Sindibád" is a name which not unfrequently occurs in Arabian tales.

NOTE 3. See Note 30 to the Introduction, and Note 1 to Chapter ix.

NOTE 4. See Note 19 to Chapter xviii.

NOTE 5. The "keerawán," more commonly, and I believe more properly, called "karawán," is the stone-curlew, or charadrius ædicnemus of Linnæus. The following extract from the Encyclopædia Britannica, art. "Charadrius," appears to be a good account of this bird. "Hasselquist informs us that this bird is also met with in Lower Egypt, in the acacia groves, near the villages of Abusir [Aboo-Seer] and Sackhara [Sakkárah], near the sepulchres of the ancient Egyptians, and in the deserts. The Arabians call it Kervan [karawán]. It has a shrill voice, somewhat resembling that of the black woodpecker, which it raises and lowers successively, uttering agreeable notes. The Turks and Egyptians value it much, if they can get it alive; and keep it in a cage for the sake of its singing. Its flesh is hard, and of a very good taste, inclined to aromatic. It is a very voracious bird, catching and devouring rats and mice, which abound in Egypt. It seldom drinks; and when taken young, and kept in a cage in Egypt, they give it no water for several months, but feed it with fresh meat macerated in water, which it devours very greedily. It is found in deserts, and is therefore accustomed to be without water."

NOTE 6. In the latter hemistich of this verse I follow the Breslau edition.

NOTE 7. "The day of death is better than the day of birth, because nothing is wanted after the day of death, and the contrary is the case with respect to the day of birth. And a living dog is better than a dead lion, because the uses of the lion end with his death: so the living dog is better than he, because advantage may be hoped for from him. And the grave that hideth the poor man is better than the palace in which a man is in want." (Marginal note by my sheykh.)—The first saying is from Ecclesiastes, ch. vii. v. 1; and the second, from the same book, ch. ix. v. 4. The third saying, in Langlès' edition, and in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, is, "the grave is better than poverty:" but I do not know any saying of Solomon in the Bible agreeing with either reading.

NOTE 8.—The Fish mistaken for an Island. The origin of this first marvel related by Es-Sindibád of the Sea I find in El-Kazweenee's "ʿAjāib el-Makhlookāt." In his account of animals of the water, he says, "The tortoise ('sulahfáh,' also written 'sulahfá,' &c.) is a sea and land animal. As to the sea-tortoise, it is very enormous, so that the people of the ship imagine that it is an island. One of the merchants hath related, saying, 'We found in the sea an island elevated above the water, having upon it green plants; and we went forth to it, and dug [holes for fire] to cook; whereupon the island moved, and the sailors said, Come ye to your place; for it is a tortoise, and the heat of the fire hath hurt it; lest it carry you away!—By reason of the enormity of its body,' saith he, [i. e., the narrator above mentioned,] 'it was as though it were an island; and earth collected upon its back in the length of time, so that it became like land, and produced plants.'"

Though the above is so apposite, I am tempted to copy from Hole's work (pages 22 and 23) the following quotation from Milton, who mentions the Leviathan as "that seabest"

"—— which God of all his works
Created hugest that swim the ocean flood.
Him haply slumbering on the Norway foam,
The pilot of some small night-foundered skiff,
Deeming some island, oft, as seamen tell,
With fixed anchor in his scaly rind,
Moors by his side.

P. L., B. i.

and another (in pages 253 and 254) from Olaus Magnus:—"Habet etiam Cetus super corium suum superficiem tanquam sabulum quod est juxta littus maris: unde plerumque elevato dorso suo super undas a navigantibus nihil aliud creditur esse quam insula. Itaque nautæ ad illum appellant et super eum descendunt, inque ipsum palos figunt, naves alligant, focos pro cibis coquendis accendunt: donec tandem cetus sentiens ignem sese in profundum mergat, atque in ejus dorso manentes, nisi funibus à navi protensis se liberare queant, submergantur." (L. xxi. c. 25.)

Pliny, as Hole suggests, may have been "the general source of these sea-monsters."

NOTE 9. Thus this title is pronounced and written by the Arabs. In my original, and in the Breslau edition, it is written "El-Mahrajân." It is a corruption of the Indian title "Maha Râja," or "Great King." The situation of the kingdom of the Mîhrâj will presently be considered.

NOTE 10. — On the Sea-Horse. Here I have abridged a little.—"The Water-Horse," says El-Kazweenee, in his account of animals of the water, "is like the land-horse, save that he is larger in the mane and tail, and more handsome in colour; and his hoof is cloven, like the hoof of the wild ox (bakar el-wahsh, a species of bovine antelope), and his size is smaller than that of the land-horse, but larger than that of the ass, by a little." He adds that sometimes a foal is produced having a water-horse for its sire and a land-mare for its dam, and that it is of extreme excellence and beauty; and he mentions an instance (similar to what is related in the Thousand and One Nights): the water-horse, in this case, was black, with white spots like pieces of silver. He also states that it is found in the Nile; and it is evident from this that the well-known hippopotamus is the animal thus incorrectly described, and which has suggested the fable here related.

NOTE 11. Here again I abridge a little.

NOTE 12. — On the Island of the Mîhrâj, and some other Islands in the Seas of China and India. I shall here endeavour to determine the positions of several islands in the Seas of China and India, including, among these islands, that of the Mîhrâj. After having commenced with one of which the position is most easily ascertained, I shall pass on to others which are mentioned in the story that I am illustrating, and on subsequent occasions I shall refer the reader to this note.

In the "Accounts of India and China by two Mohammadan Travellers in the ninth Century," we are told (in page 3 of the English translation) that among the islands of the Sea of [El-] Harkend [a name given both to the Sea of China and to a part of that of India], towards Sarendeb [or Ceylon], one "is called Ramni, and is under several princes; being eight or nine hundred leagues in dimension. [Afterwards, in page 61, this island is mentioned by the name of Rahmi, and is said to be eight hundred leagues in compass.] Here," it is added, "are gold-mines, and particularly those called Fansur (or Fanfur?); as also an excellent sort of Camphire."—It appears hence, beyond a doubt, that the island called by the Arab geographers "Râminee," "Râmin," "Râmee," &c., is Sumatra, the Java Minor of Marco Polo, described by him (book iii. ch. 16,) as two thousand miles in circuit (which appears to be near the truth), and as containing eight kingdoms, governed by so many kings; one of which kingdoms is called by him Fansur, or Fanfur, and said to contain the best kind of camphor, much superior in quality to any other. This kingdom, and five of the others, Marco Polo visited; and he remained in one of the ports of the island five months: his authority therefore, which is in general good, is in this case especially so.—El-Kazweenee says that in the island of Râmin, in the Sea of China, are a naked people, whose language is not understood: for it is like whistling. He adds that they shun mankind, that the height of one of them is four spans, that on their faces is red downy hair, and that they climb up trees; and he states that in it are the camphor-tree, brasil-wood, and the Indian cane, and likewise the rhinoceros, and buffaloes without tails.

The next island of which I shall consider the position is that which is called in the works of the Arab geographers "Zánij," "Zálij," "Zábij," "Ránij," "Rálij," "Ráij," "Ráneh," &c. The name of this island, which name is also employed to include some other islands dependant on the principal one, is written in the "Accounts of India and China," above quoted, "Zabage" (page 10), and "Zapage" (page 60), in both places probably for "Zábij." In the latter place we are informed, that "the province of Zapage is opposite to China, and a month's sail distant therefrom by sea, or less, if the wind be fair. The King of this country," it is added, "is called Mehrage, and they say it is nine hundred leagues in circumference, and that this King is master of many islands which lie round about; thus this kingdom is above a thousand leagues in extent. Among these islands there is one called Serbeza, which is said to be four hundred leagues in circuit, [nearly the circuit of Java,] and that also of Rahmi [above identified with Sumatra].—From these descriptions of the size of the great island of the Mihráj, and its situation with respect to China and Sumatra it seems evident to me that it can be no other island than Borneo, as Sir William Jones and others have supposed. El-Kazweenee says that the King of the Island of Ráij (or Zábij, &c.) is called El-Mihráj; that in this island is a mountain where are huge serpents, some of which will swallow the elephant; and that it contains also the camphor-tree, which is of enormous size. El-Kazweenee describes this island as "on the confines of China, the furthest of the countries of India."

"In this same kingdom [I continue the extract from the 'Accounts of India and China' begun in the preceding paragraph] is the Island of Cala, which is in the mid-passage between China and the country of the Arabs. This island, they say, is four-score leagues in circumference; and hither they bring all sorts of merchandise, wood-aloes of several sorts, camphire-sandal-wood, ivory, the lead called Cabahi, ebony, red-wood, every kind of spice, and many other things too tedious to enumerate. At present the commerce is most usually carried on from Oman ['Omán] to this island, and from this island to Oman."

(Page 61.) In my MS. of Ibn-El-Wardee, this island is called "Kulleh." This geographer describes it as in the "Sea of India" (a very vague appellation), and says, "It is a great island: in it are trees and rivers and fruits. A King of the sons of Jábeh the Indian dwelleth in it; and in it are mines of tin, and camphor-trees, one tree of which shadeth a hundred men, and more: in it also is the Indian cane; and among its wonders are such things that the describer of them would incur disbelief." El-Idreese (1st Climate, 9th Section,) describes this island, mentions the same particulars, and gives an account of the mode of obtaining the camphor similar to that in Es-Sindibád's Second Voyage. He adds, that in the neighbourhood of the said island are those of Jábeh, Seláhit, and Hereej; each about two leagues from another; and states that they all obey the same King, named Jábeh.—From these notices of situation, size, and the existence of tin-mines, I am induced to think that this island is the one called in our maps Banca, the rich tin-mines of which are well known; though Renaudot places it near the point of Malabar, and does not consider it as an island. From page 15 of the English translation of his Remarks on the "Accounts," it appears that in page 10 of the latter, "Calabar" is put for the name which in the extract at the commencement of this paragraph is written "Cala." Now in this page of the "Accounts," the place thus named is said to have been dependant on "the Kingdom of Zabage." That a tract near the point of Malabar should be so is extremely improbable; and it is afterwards said, as I have shewn above, that it was in that Kingdom. It is stated in the same work (page 9), that from Mascát (or Maskat) to Kaucammali, in the course to China, is a month's sail, with the wind aft. [The name of the latter place is written by El-Idreese (2nd Climate, 7th Section,) "Koolam Melee." It is evidently the Koulam of Marco Polo (who says that it was a resort of Arabian and Manji, or Southern Chinese, merchants), and the Coulán of our maps, in Malabar, or Malayala, nearly ninety British miles from Cape Comorin.] Here the Arabs, we are told, in the voyage to China, took in water: then they entered the sea of El-Harkend, and having sailed across it, they touched at Lajabalus [before called (in page 4) "Najabalus" (supposed to be the Nicobar Islands)], and, after about a month's voyage from Kaukam [i. e. Koulam], arrived at Cala [in the translation Calabar]. It is added, that from this place to one called Betuna is ten days, in the course to China; that ten days further in the same course is Kad-range; ten days further, Senef [or Sanf], whence "comes the aromatic wood we call Hud al Senefi" [el 'ood es-Sanfee]; ten days further, Sandarfulat; and a month further, China: altogether, from the place in question to "Canfu" [or "Khánfoo," also written by Arab geographers "Khán-koo," supposed to be "Kuang-cheu-fu," called by us "Canton"], the chief port of China, two months and ten days. The latter part of the voyage, it appears, was tedious: it was probably circuitous, for the sake of traffic; and eight whole days were consumed in clearing some rocks and shoals called the Gates of China.

I next consider the position of Sanf. Its distance from the supposed Canton has been stated above, as one month and ten days. El-Idreesee (2nd Climate, 9th Section,) calls it a Chinese island, or peninsula (the term generally rendered "island" is very vague), and afterwards (1st Climate, 10th Section,) he makes it only fourteen days from Khánkoo (or Canton?); but his authority I think of much less weight than that before cited. He states also, that from Sanf to Meláy or Maláy was a voyage of twelve days, among islands and rocks.—These indications of its position, and the assertion of El-Idreesee (1st Climate, 9th Section,) and others, that it produces the best kinds of aloes-wood, lead me to conclude that it is the tract called in our maps Tsiampa. Mr. Marsden has shewn (in note 1172 to his translation of Marco Polo) that the best kind of aloes-wood is that of the mountains of Tsiampa, on the south of Cochinchina, about the 13th degree of north latitude. This is called Kalambak. The resemblance of the names "Tsiampa" and "Sanf" I also think of some weight; especially as the Arabs, having no p, substitute, for that letter, f or b.—The author of the Kámoos says, that the Sanfee aloes-wood (or aloes-wood of Sanf) is inferior to the Kamáree; but the contrary statement, being more fully expressed, I think more entitled to credit.

The position of Kamár, which produced the Kamáree aloes-wood, is more difficult to determine. In the "Accounts of India and China," which mention its aloes-wood, the island (or peninsula) of Kamár is said (in page 64) to be divided from the kingdom of the Mihráj (or Borneo) "by a passage of ten or twenty days' sail, with a very easy gale." This will by no means allow us to identify it with Cape Comorin, as some European writers have done. El-Idreesee says (1st Climate, 9th Section), that it is near Sanf, separated only by three miles; but perhaps "miles" may be a mistake for "days." I can only conjecture that it is either a part of the Malayan peninsula, or on the opposite side of the Gulf of Siam, adjacent to Tsiampa.

I now revert to the Mihráj and his Island, which is described in the "Accounts of India and China" (page 61) as "extremely fertile, and so very populous that the towns almost crowd one upon the other." In the next page it is said that the palace of a former Mihráj was "still to be seen," in the time of the author, "on a river as broad as the Tigris at Baghdád or at El-Basrah." And it is added, "The sea intercepts the course of its waters, and sends them back again with the tide of flood; and during the tide of ebb, it streams out fresh water a good way into the sea. This river is let into a small pond close to the King's palace, and every morning the officer who has charge of his household brings an ingot of gold wrought in a particular manner, which is unknown, and throws it into the pond in the presence of the King. The tide rising with the flood, covers it with many others, its fellows, and quite conceals it from sight; but low water discovers them, and they appear plain by the beams of the sun. The King comes to view them at the same time that he repairs to an apartment of state which looks upon this pond. This custom is very scrupulously observed, and thus they every day throw an ingot of gold into this pond, as long as the King lives, nor touch the same upon any account. When the King dies, his successor causes them all to be taken out, and not one of them is ever missed. They count them, and melt them down, and this done, the sums proving from this great quantity of gold are distributed to those of the royal household, to the men, to the women, and to the children, to the superior and to the inferior officers, each receiving a part, in proportion to the rank he bears, and according to the order established among them for this distribution; and the surplus is given away to the poor, and to the infirm. Then they reckon up the number of ingots, and what they weigh, and say, Such a one reigned so many years, for he left so many ingots of gold in the pond of the Kings, and they were distributed, after his death, to the people of his kingdom. It is a glory, with them, to have reigned a long while, and to have thus multiplied the number of these ingots, to be given away at their death."—Nearly the same account is given in other Arabic works. — "The hospitality, power, and magnificence, of the King of Borneo, Raia Siripada, is mentioned by Pigafetta (Purchas's Pilg. v. i. b. 2.), Magellan's fellow-traveller, and the first literary circumnavigator. He reigned, it is said, over many other kings, islands, and cities, and that which was his place of residence contained 25,000 houses Maximilian of Transylvania, who gives an account of the same voyage, enlarges on these circumstances; but adds, 'equi perexigui et exiles sunt.' We are not to wonder, therefore, that the monarch in the text was so desirous of improving the diminutive race."

NOTE 13. The "Shákireeyeh," called in the Breslau edition "Sekáribeh," and by El-Idreese "Sákireeyeh," are evidently the "Kshatriyas," the second caste of the Hindoos. By El-Idreese, as well as in the Thousand and One Nights, they are called the first caste. He says (1st Climate, 10th Section), "They are the most noble: it is from among them, only, that the Kings are chosen [which is true]. All the others," he adds, "prostrate themselves before them; but they do not prostrate themselves before any others."

NOTE 14. This idea of the Bráhmans I suppose to be derived from the music and dances at religious ceremonies.

NOTE 15. So in the Breslau edition. In the Cairo edition, "Jews" (Yahood), which is clearly a mistake.

NOTE 16. In the Breslau edition, "forty-two sects." So also says El-Idreese.

NOTE 17. Thus written in the Breslau edition, the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition: in the edition of Cairo, "Kábil." It is evidently the island called by El-Kazweene that of "Bartáil." He describes it as in the Sea of India, and near to the Islands of Ez-Zenj (evidently a mistake for Zánij, i. e. Borneo), and says, on the authority of Ibn-El-Fakeeh, "There are in it a people whose faces are like the shields made of coats of leather, and their hair is like the tails of pack-horses; and in it is the rhinoceros. In it also are mountains whence are heard by night the sounds of the drum and tambourine, and disturbing cries, and disagreeable laughter; and the sailors say that Ed-Dejjál is in it, and that he will come forth from it. In this island, moreover, cloves are sold, and in this manner. The merchants land there, and put their goods and commodities upon the shore, and, having returned to their ships, pass the night in them. Then, when they arise in the morning, they come to their commodities, and find by the side of each lot of goods a quantity of cloves. If the owner of the goods approve of this, he taketh it, and leaveth the goods; but if he take the goods and the cloves, the ship cannot depart until the taker of the goods restoreth them to their place. And if any one desire an addition, he leaveth the goods and the cloves, and an addition to these is made for him. One of the merchants hath related that he went up into this island, and saw there a people beardless, of yellow complexion, whose faces were like the faces of the Turks, and their ears were perforated, and their hair was like that of women. They disappeared from his sight, and the merchants after that continued a long time frequenting the shore; but no cloves were brought out to them: so they knew that this was on account of their looking at them. Then, after some years, they resumed their former habits." — Cloves, it should be observed, grow only within the tropics but they are not the growth of either Borneo or Java. (See Marsden, M. Polo, p. 591.) The Island of Bartáil or Kásil I suppose to have been not far from Borneo. Hole suggests (p. 38), that the roaring of the waves amidst its hollow rocks might, not improbably, have resembled the sound of drums; and afterwards (page 41) he remarks, "Bartholomew Leonardo de Argensola, a learned divine, employed by the president and council of the Indies to write a history of the discovery and conquest of the Moluccas, observes, that near Banda is 'a desert and uninhabited island, called Poelsetton, infamous for stronger reasons than the Acroceraunian rocks. There are cries, whistles, and roarings, in it at all times, and dreadful apparitions are seen, &c.; and long experience has shewn that it is inhabited by Devils.' May it not be reasonably suspected," he adds, "that this is the same island as Kásil; and that the Spanish writer, like the Arabian, appropriated to the superstition of his own country a traditional report of India?" — I think the reader must answer, "Yes."

NOTE 18. Thus in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition: in the Cairo edition, instead of the words "that Ed-Dejjál is in it," we read, "that they [the inhabitants] are a people of industry and good judgment."—Necessary illustrations of this passage have been given in the note immediately preceding.

NOTE 19. The words "and the fishermen fear it," &c., are inserted on the authority of the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights and Langlès' edition. El-Kazweenee says, "In the Sea of China is a fish more than three hundred cubits long: fear is entertained for the ship on account of it; and it is found by the island of Wák-Wák; and when the people know of its passing by, they call out, and beat with wood, that it may flee away at their noises: when it raiseth its fin, it is like an enormous sail." The same writer also, and Ibn-El-Wardee, say, that in the Sea of El-Kulzum is an enormous fish, that beateth the ship with its tail, and sinketh it: its length is about two hundred cubits.

NOTE 20. The two authors just cited state, that in the Sea of El-Kulzum is also a fish a cubit long, the body of which is like that of a fish, and its face like the face of the owl.

NOTE 21. This is a common phrase to express utter desolation.

NOTE 22.—On the Rukh'. This enormous bird has already been mentioned, and some idea of its size, in the opinion of the Arabs, has been conveyed by an anecdote in page 1173 of this work; but it is time to give some further account of it.—Ibn-El-Wardee mentions, among the islands of the Sea of China, the Island of the Rukh', and says, "The Rukh', by the name of which this island is known, is an enormous and extraordinary bird, of terrible appearance; so much so that it is said, that the length of one of its wings is about ten thousand fathoms"! This he relates on the authority of a zoological work by El-Háfiz Ibn-El-Joozee, who had been visited by an eye-witness of the bird, 'Abd-El-Rahmán El-Maghrabee, also surnamed the Chinese, on account of his long residence in China, the person mentioned in the anecdote above referred to. He then narrates two anecdotes, one of which is that just mentioned, and another which would illustrate the incident to which this note refers, but which more particularly agrees with an adventure in Es-Sindibád's Fifth Voyage: therefore I defer the insertion of it.

Of this bird, Marco Polo heard during his travels. He says, "The people of the island [of Madagascar] report that at a certain season of the year, an extraordinary kind of bird, which they call a rukh', makes its appearance from the southern region. In form it is said to resemble the eagle; but it is incomparably greater in size; being so large and strong as to seize an elephant with its talons, and to lift it into the air; from whence it lets it fall to the ground, in order that, when dead, it may prey upon the carcass. Persons who have seen this bird assert that when the wings are spread they measure sixteen paces in extent from point to point; and that the feathers are eight paces in length, and thick in proportion." He adds that some messengers sent to the island by the Grand Khán brought back with them "a feather of the rukh' positively affirmed to have measured ninety spans, and the quill-part to have been two palms in circumference." (Marsden's Transl. p. 707.)

Several writers have remarked, that the condor suggested the monstrous descriptions of the rukh'; and Bishop Heber, who was of this opinion, says in his "Journal," "Lieutenant Fisher shot one very lately at Degra, which measured thirteen feet between the tips of its extended wings, and had talons eight inches long. He was of a deep black colour, with a bald head and neck." But Mr. Harvey, in his designs illustrative of Es-Sindibád's Voyages, has taken the bearded vulture as the archetype of the rukh'; justly observing to me, that the talons of the condor are not so formed as to enable it to carry off with them any weighty animal; and pointing out to me, that a bearded vulture "killed in the French expedition to Egypt, and measured in the presence of MM. Monge and Berthollet, is said by M. Larrey to have exceeded fourteen Parisian, or upwards of fifteen English feet," from point to point of its expanded wings. (See "Gardens and Menagerie of the Zoological Society Delineated," vol. ii. p. 181.) It should also be observed that the condor is a native of South America, confined to the region of the Andes; and it is therefore improbable that a solitary specimen should have strayed to the Chinese or Indian Seas, and given rise to the fable of the rukh'.—The rukh', however, may be purely imaginary. If so, it may be a fabulous species of a fabulous genus: but I rather think that it is the same as the 'ankà and seemurgh, which Arab and Persian writers have described in the like monstrous manner. El-Kazweenee states, that the 'ankà is the greatest of birds; that it carries off the elephant as the kite carries off the mouse; that, in consequence of its carrying off a bride, God, at the prayer of a prophet named Handhalah, banished it to an island in the Circumambient Ocean, unvisited by men, under the Equinoctial Line; that it lives one thousand and seven hundred years, &c. He also states, that when the young 'ankà has grown up, if it be a female, the old female bird burns herself; and if a male, the old male bird does so. This reminds us of the phoenix.

NOTE 23.—The Aerial Voyage. I scarcely hoped to find any narrative, related as a fact, that could have suggested the description of this wonderful adventure; but I have succeeded in doing so. El-Kazweenee, in his account of the Sea of Persia, relates the following anecdote.

"The author of the 'Kitáb el-'Ajáib' saith, A man of Isfahán related to me, that he was burdened with debts and the expense of supporting his family; so he quitted Isfahán, and misfortunes so encompassed him that he went to sea with some merchants. The waves, saith he, beat us about until we came to the well-known whirlpool (durdoor) of the Sea of Persia; whereupon the merchants came together to the master, and said, Dost thou know any way of escape for us from this predicament? He answered, O people, verily no ship escapeth from this whirlpool save such as God (whose name be exalted!) willeth [to escape]: but if one of you will liberally give himself for his companions, I will use my endeavours. Perhaps God (whose name be exalted!) will save us.—So I said, O people, we are all in a place of destruction, and I am a man wearied by misery. I wished for death; and there was in the ship a party of men of Isfahán: I therefore said to them, Swear that ye will discharge my debts, and act with beneficence to my children, and I will ransom you with myself. And I said to the master, What dost thou command me to do? He answered, That thou stand upon this island (for there was near unto the whirlpool an island, the extent of which was six days' journey with their nights), and that thou cease not to beat this drum. So I replied, I will do it. Accordingly they swore to me severe oaths that they would comply with the condition that I had imposed upon them; and they gave me of water and food what would suffice me for some days. And I stood on the shore of the island, and began to beat the drum; whereupon I beheld the waters move, and they bore the ship along, while I looked at it, until it was out of my sight. I then went to and fro upon the island, and, lo, I beheld an island on which was an enormous tree, such that I have not seen any greater; and upon it was something like a large roof. And at the close of the day, I heard a great, vehement, harsh voice; and, lo, a huge bird, than which I have not seen any greater, came and alighted upon the roof on that tree. So I hid myself, fearing lest he should make me his prey, until the light of morning approached, when he shook his wings, and flew away. The next night, he came and alighted again upon his nest, and again I was in despair of my life, and was content to meet destruction. I approached him; but he shewed no hostility to me, and flew away in the morning. And when the third night came, I sat by him without consternation, until he shook his wings at daybreak; and on his doing so, I laid hold upon his legs, and he flew away with me with a most rapid flight until the daylight rose, when I looked towards the earth, and saw not aught save an abyss of water. Upon this I was about to quit my hold of his legs, by reason of the violence of the pain that affected me; but I constrained myself to have patience, and, looking again at the earth, I beheld the villages, or towns, and the people looking at it [at the bird], and I beheld the dwellings. Then it approached the earth, and set me down upon a heap of straw in a threshing-floor belonging to one of the villages, after which it left me and soared into the sky, and became absent from me. And the people collected, and conveyed me to their chief, and, having brought to me a man who understood my language, they said to me, Whence art thou? So I related to them my whole story, whereupon they wondered at me, and they suffered me to remain with them, and the chief gave orders to present me with money. I remained with them some days; and having walked one day to the seashore to divert myself, lo, I met the ship of my companions, who, when they beheld me, hastened to me, asking me respecting my case. And I answered them, O people, verily I gave myself away for the sake of God (whose name be exalted!) and He delivered me in a wonderful way, and made me a sign unto men, and blessed me with wealth, and brought me to the place of destination before you.—This is a wonderful story, and it is not [a case] foreign from the grace of God, whose name be exalted!"

NOTE 24. Though I believe that there no known substance with which the diamond can be cut or ground except its own substance, I think it not improbable that the Eastern lapidaries may be acquainted with some ore, really, or supposed by them to be, an ore of lead, by which it may be broken, and that this is what is here called "the lead-stone," or "the stone of lead." It is well known that those diamonds which are unfit for any other purpose than that of cutting and grinding others are broken in a steel mortar.

NOTE 25. See above, the third paragraph of Note 12.

NOTE 26. — The Valley of Diamonds. El-Kazweenee, after describing the diamond, — saying, "It breaketh all other stones except [that of] lead (el-usrub); for if it be struck with this, the diamond breaketh," — related as follows: —

"To the place in which the diamond is found, no one can gain access. It is a valley in the land of India, the bottom of which the sight reacheth not; and in it are venomous serpents which no one seeth but he dieth; and they have a summer-abode for six months, and a winter-abode [where they hide themselves] for the like period. El-Iskender [either Alexander the Great or the first Zu-l-Karney] commanded to take some mirrors and to throw them into the valley, that the serpents might see in them their forms, and die in consequence. It is said also that he watched for the time of their absenting themselves [or retiring into their winter-quarters], and threw down pieces of meat, and diamonds stuck to these: then the birds came from the sky, and took pieces of that meat, and brought them up out of the valley; whereupon El-Iskender ordered his companions to follow the birds, and to pick up what they easily could of the meat."

The valley or valleys of diamonds we also find described by other writers, and among these by Marco Polo, in his account of the kingdom of Murphili or Monsul. This, observes Mr. Marsden, "is no other than Muchli-patan, or, as it is more commonly named, Masuli-patam; the name of a principal town, by a mistake not unusual, being substituted for that of the country. . . . It belongs to what was at one period termed the kingdom of Golconda, more anciently named Telingana. . . . Golconda, of which Masuli-patam is the principal sea-port, is celebrated for the production of diamonds. In the astronomical observations of Mr. Topping, printed in Dalrymple's Oriental Repertory, mention is made of the famous diamond-mines of Golconda, at a place named Malvellee, not far from Ellore. Vol. i. p. 435. Cæsar Fredericke, who was at Bijanagar in 1567, mentions that the diamond-mines were six days' journey from that city." — Es-Sindibád's adventure in the valley of diamonds has been amply illustrated by the learned writer from whom the above remarks are borrowed, and by Hole; and I shall quote some of their observations, after inserting an extract from Marco Polo's Travels.

"In the mountains of this kingdom" [of Murphili], says the Venetian Traveller, "it is that diamonds are found. During the rainy season the water descends in violent torrents amongst the rocks and caverns, and when these have subsided, the people go to search for diamonds in the beds of the rivers, where they find many. Messer Marco was told that in the summer, when the heat is excessive and there is no rain they ascend the mountains with great fatigue, as well as with considerable danger from the number of snakes with which they are infested. Near the summit it is said there are deep valleys full of caverns and surrounded by precipices, amongst which the diamonds are found, and here many eagles and white storks, attracted by the snakes on which they feed, are accustomed to make their nests. The persons who are in quest of the diamonds take their stand near the mouths of the caverns, and from thence cast down several pieces of flesh, which the eagles and storks pursue into the valleys, and carry off with them to the tops of the rocks. Thither the men immediately ascend, drive the birds away, and, recovering the pieces of meat, frequently find diamonds sticking to them."

Mr. Marsden, in a note, alludes to the adventures of Es-Sindibád, and says, of the Arabian Tales, "These tales, as appears from the mention of persons and circumstances in the course of the narrative, must have been composed chiefly in the thirteenth century, and one of them in particular is fixed, by an astronomical observation, taken by a singular personage, to the year 1255." But surely this date, even if it were the same in every MS. (which is not the case), would prove nothing more than that the tale in which it occurs was not composed before this period: or rather it should lead us to infer that the tale was composed long after, as it professes to relate events of ancient times.

—Mr. Marsden afterwards transcribes, from Hole's ingenious work, part of a quotation from Epiphanius; upon which he remarks, "Thus it appears incontrovertibly, that so early as the fourth century of our era, the tale [of the valley of diamonds, and of the mode of procuring the precious stones from it,] was current, divested, it is true, of the extraordinary incident of the adventurous sailor's escape, but in conformity with what was related to our author [Marco Polo]; with the exception of the scene being laid in Scythia or western Tartary, where, in fact, diamonds are not found. The question of locality," he adds, "is however determined by another oriental navigator, Nicolo di Conti, who visited the coast of the peninsula in the fifteenth century." He then gives a quotation from this navigator, differing little from the story of Marco Polo given above, and that of Epiphanius afterwards alluded to, but making the site fifteen days' journey from Bisinagar (or Bijanagar), towards the north.—Hole observes (in page 60), that a story somewhat resembling this of the valley of diamonds is recorded in the travels of Benjamin of Tudela (Engl. transl. p. 144); and that the translator supposes it to have been borrowed from the Thousand and One Nights. "I, however," he adds, with better judgment, "rather suspect, that the account of Benjamin of Tudela and of Es-Sindibad were derived from some common origin."

NOTE 27. My sheykh remarks, in a marginal note, that many men strike their hands together when they are enraged; that persons clap their hands also to call a servant, as the Franks ring a bell; and likewise to testify joy; and that some of the performers of zikrs do so. On various occasions of rejoicing too, or for amusement at other times, the Egyptian peasants, forming a ring, clap their hands in time, and to certain measures, with or without singing.

NOTE 28. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition, this island is called "Er-Rahà," "Er-Ruhà," or "Er-Rihà;" and in the old version, "Roha;" but I do not know any island so named. From the camphor-trees here mentioned, and the rhinoceros afterwards, and a strange kind of buffalo, I doubt not that Sumatra is the island meant. (See the second paragraph of Note 12 in the present series. See also the fourth paragraph of the same note.)

Mr. Marsden says that the camphor-tree does not grow anywhere to the south of the line; and that the finest kinds of camphor are produced by a tree in Sumatra and Borneo; but perhaps he applies the first remark only to Sumatra; for I believe that this tree grows to the south of the line in Borneo. He also observes that the camphor-tree of China and Japan, "the only species of the laurel-genus growing in China, and there a large and valuable timber-tree, . . . is not to be confounded with the camphor-tree of Borneo and Sumatra, which is also remarkable for its great size, but is of a genus entirely distinct from the laurus."

NOTE 29. In the Cairo edition (erroneously), "kezkezân:" in others "karkadân" and "karkend." "Karkadân is the vulgar modern term: the correct term is "Karkedden."

NOTE 30. The word "alak" I have rendered "the tender leaves of trees." It oftener signifies "the leech," or "leeches."

NOTE 31. So in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition: in the editions of Cairo and Breslau, "ten cubits."

NOTE 32. El-Kazweenee says, in his description of the rhinoceros, "upon its horn is a curved branch, the curve of which is contrary in direction to that of the [main] horn. It hath virtues; and the sign of its perfection is this; that there is seen in it the form of a horseman. That branch," he adds, "is not found save in the possession of the Kings of India." He mentions also its various virtues, which are medicinal and magical.—El-Idreese gives a somewhat different account, agreeing more with what is said in the old version, and the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and the edition of Langlès; especially the last. He says, that in some rhinoceros' horns, when cut, are seen the figures of men, birds, &c., perfectly portrayed in white; and that with these are made girdles, of high price. These girdles are mentioned in the two Arabic editions above referred to, and their price is said to be a thousand pieces of gold.

NOTE 33. "The account of the rhinoceros, and its combat with the elephant," says Hole (pp. 61 and 62), "after allowing for one or two trifling additions, agrees with what is said by Pliny (Nat. Hist. L. viii. c. 30), Ælian (Nat. An. L. xvii. c. 44), and Diodorus Siculus (L. iii. c. 2)."

NOTE 35. These words, "and God is all knowing," &c., are an apology of the writer for relating such fables.

NOTE 36. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition, "the islands of the wild, downy [creatures]."

NOTE 37. In the two editions just mentioned, they are described as red downy creatures.

NOTE 38.—The Island of Apes. What is called in my translation (from the Cairo edition) "the Mountain of Apes," is named in the edition of Breslau, "the Island of Apes;" and Ibn-El-Wardee gives the following account of it.—"Among the islands of the Sea of China is the Island of Apes. It is large, and in it are marshy forests, and numerous apes; and the apes have a king there, to whom they submit themselves: they carry him upon their shoulders and their necks; and he governeth the island so that none oppresseth another. Those, however, who come to them in ships, they torture with biting and scratching and stoning; but the people of the two Islands of Khartán and Martán employ stratagems against them and hunt them, and sell them for a high price. The people of El-Yemen desire them much, and take them as guards of their shops, like slaves; and they are endowed with extreme acuteness."—El-Idresee (1st Climate, 7th Section,) gives a similar account; but states that this island is two days' voyage from that of Sukutrâ (or Socotra). There is, however, a contrariety in his text; and though what is said of the inhabitants of Khartán and Martán seems to favour the opinion that the island in question is not far from Arabia, I think that it is Sumatra. It is very probable that different navigators often designated the same island by different names, and thus misled the geographers. El-Idresee also describes the apes as of a reddish colour. (See the note immediately preceding this.) Creatures in the island of Rámin (or Sumatra) four spans high, and with red downy hair on their faces, have already been mentioned (in the second paragraph of Note 12 in the present series), on the authority of El-Kazweenee, who likewise says, "The sailors relate that when the waves of the sea of China are tumultuous, there appear from it black persons, each of four spans high, like the children of the Abyssinians;" but he adds, "and they ascend the ships without injury."

That the pigmies of antiquity, and of early travellers, were apes, cannot reasonably be doubted. It is remarkable that Marco Polo mentions pretended pigmies which were brought from India, and which were the bodies of apes stuffed in Java Minor, or Sumatra; mentioned above as the country of red-downy-faced creatures, four spans high.—For ample illustrations of the pigmies, see Hole, pp. 64-78.

NOTE 39. In the old version, this giant is described as having only one eye, in his forehead; but not so in any of the four editions of the original that I have by me. In these editions, however, subsequent incidents are remarkable for their agreement with the story of Polyphemus. Stories of monsters like the Cyclops appear to have been current in the East; and so also, probably, was the tale of Ulysses and Polyphemus. Sir John Mandeville says, that in one of the Indian islands were giants who had but one eye, in the middle of the front, and who ate nothing but raw flesh and raw fish. He mentions others who ate more gladly man's flesh than any other flesh. In another isle, he was told that there were giants of greater stature, some of fifty cubits high, who many times took men out of the sea in their ships, and brought them to land, two in one hand and two in another, eating them going, all raw and all quick.—Hole thinks that Virgil and Ovid supplied the knight with the preceding descriptions; but this I doubt. El-Kazweenee says, that behind the island of El-Beenán, in the Sea of China, are two islands of great length and breadth, wherein are a black people like the tribe of 'Ad, of enormous size, with crisp hair, and long faces: the foot of one of them, he adds, is a cubit long; and they eat men. One of these two islands our author may have confounded with that of the Apes. El-Idresee (1st Climate, 8th Section,) places the Island of El-Beenán on the south of that of Er-Rámeé or Sumatra). Our giant had enormous ears, hanging down upon his shoulders; and Mr. Marsden (as observed by Hole) says, that "the inhabitants of Neas, an adjacent island to Sumatra, [on the south-west of the latter,] bore their ears, and encourage the aperture to a monstrous size, so as in many instances to be large enough to admit the hand, the lower parts being stretched till they touch the shoulders."

NOTE 40. In the Cairo edition, "and make for ourselves a vessel like a boat." The reading I have adopted is that of the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and of Langlès' edition, as well as of the old version.

NOTE 41. See Note 88 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 42. "Ulysses and his friends were more fortunate in their escape from Polypheme, but suffered nearly in the same manner by Antiphates and his gigantic attendants."

NOTE 43. El-Kazweenee says, that among the creatures of the Sea of China are "two enormous serpents, that come forth upon the land, and one of them will swallow the buffalo or the elephant, and wind itself round a tree or rock, and so break in pieces the bones of the animal in its belly."

NOTE 44. The name of this island is thus written in Langlès' edition and by El-Idreese; in the Cairo edition, "Es-Selâhitah;" in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, "Es-Selâmit;" and in the Breslau edition, "El-Kalâsitàh." It has been mentioned in a former note (Note 12 in the present series, fourth paragraph); and from what is there said, I suppose it to be near Java. In my copy of El-Kazweenee, its name is written Es-Selâmit. He says, "From it are brought sandalwood, spikenard, and camphor; . . . and in it is a spring that spouteth up, the water boiling from it, and near it is a lake, into which it descendeth: what remaineth of the sprinkled water in the day becometh white stone, and what remaineth of it in the night becometh black stone." El-Idreese (1st Climate, 9th Section,) describes in it a volcano constantly and exceedingly active. Such a volcano there is in the island called in our maps "Sum-bawa," well known.

NOTE 45. The words "where sandalwood is abundant" are inserted on the authority of the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and Langlès' edition.

NOTE 46. Here is added in my original, "and I was submerged at the island, with the rest who were submerged:" but this was during the First Voyage.

NOTE 47. Here the master says, that many were drowned at that island, and Es-Sindibâd of the Sea among them: but this again refers to the First Voyage.

NOTE 48. "Es-Sind" is Western India.

NOTE 49. El-Kazweenee and Ibn-El-Wardee relate, that in the Sea of El-Kulzum is a fish in the form of a cow, which bringeth forth its young and suckleth like a cow. The Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and Langlès' edition, mention these particulars, and add, "and shields are made of its skin." The same editions also here mention "fish twenty cubits long, a tortoise twenty cubits wide, and fish in the form of camels." The two Arab writers quoted above say, that in the Sea of El-Kulzum is a fish twenty cubits long, the back of which is [like] excellent tortoise-shell, and it bringeth forth young and suckleth like human beings. El-Kazweenee also relates, that in the Sea of China are "tortoises each twenty cubits in circumference. Each of them," he adds, "layeth a thousand eggs: and this is found at the island of Wâk-Wâk."—But these are too small. Revert to Note 8.

"The account of these animals," observes Hole (pp. 90 et seqq.), "is not to be attributed to a licentious exuberance of fancy in the Arabian author. He might have seen in Ælian (Hist. An. L. xvi. c. 17.) that tortoises whose shells were fifteen cubits in length, and sufficiently large to cover a house, were to be found near the island of Taprobane Pliny (Nat. Hist. L. ix. c. 10.) and Strabo (Geog. L. xv.) mention the same circumstance: they likewise turn them upside down, and say, that men used to row in them as in a boat. Diodorus Siculus adds to their testimony, and assures us (B. iii. c. 2.), on the faith of an historian, that the Chelonophagi (or shell-fish-eaters) derived a threefold advantage from the tortoise, which occasionally supplied them with a roof to their houses, a boat, and a dinner. . . . I have been informed that boats, made of wicker, and covered with a skin, resembling the upper skin of a tortoise, are frequently used for passing rivers in different parts of India. May we not suppose that inaccurate observation, misapprehension, or wilful misrepresentation of the natives, misled in this and many other respects the voyagers of antiquity? Boats of a similar structure are to be found in Wales, where they are called Coracles. They appear to be the vitilia navigia of Pliny, and are supposed to have derived their name from being covered with coria or hides. They are mentioned likewise by Cæsar and Lucan.—The fish like a cow may be intended for the hippopotamus, whose skin, as Pliny observes, is scarcely to be penetrated by any missive weapon, and therefore may, with great probability, have been used as a covering for bucklers by different nations. [Shields, it is said, are made of the hippopotamus' hide by the Nubians. I have a Nubian shield of the hide of the giraffe or hippopotamus (I am not certain which), and another of crocodile's hide.] . . . He observes, that those animals live indifferently in rivers, or in the ocean, or on the land. . . . The Manatee, or Cowfish, agrees likewise with Es-Sindibád's account, and is to be found in the Mauritius, the Philippine, and the Comori islands: it suckles its young, like the seal and porpoise; and the dorsal protuberance of the latter would naturally suggest to Arabian seamen the idea of a camel."

NOTE 50. A creature with the head of an ass in the Indian Sea is mentioned by Pliny (Nat. Hist. L. ix. c. 3.—See Hole, p. 96); as well as others with the heads of horses, and of bulls: but what could have suggested the idea of the "bird that cometh forth from the sea-shell," unless it were the nautilus, I am unable to conjecture.

NOTE 51. "Ghool," here, may signify merely a cannibal. See Note 21 to the Introduction.

NOTE 52.—The Cannibals who stupefy and fatten Men, and then eat them. The adventure of Es-Sindibád of the Sea, and his companions, among these cannibals appears to be mainly founded on the following anecdote, related by Ibn-El-Wardee and El-Kazweenee. In translating it, I avail myself of the narratives of both these writers.

"Among the islands of the Sea of the Zenj (or Ethiopians) is the Island of Seksár. Yaakoob Ibn-Is-hák, the traveller, saith, I met with a man having many scratches on his face, and asked him respecting them, and he said, I went upon the sea, and the wind drove me to the Island of Seksár, and we could not depart from it on account of the violence of the wind. And there came to us a people whose faces were like the faces of dogs, and their bodies like the bodies of men; and one of them came forward to us with a staff, and a party came behind us, and drove us to their abodes, where we saw skulls and legs and arms of men. They then took us into a house in which was a sick man, and brought us fruits and other food, whereupon that man said, They feed you that ye may become fat, and him among you who is fat they eat. So I ate little, that I might not grow fat; and every one of my companions who became fat they ate, until only I and that man remained; for I was lean, and he was ill. And that man said to me, A festival of theirs hath arrived, and they all go out to celebrate it, and are absent at it three days: so if thou canst make thine escape, do so: but as for me, as thou seest, I am unable to move, and cannot flee: see then to thyself. I therefore replied, May God compensate thee with Paradise! I went forth, and journeyed by night, and hid myself in the day. And when they returned from their festival, they searched for me, and followed my track, and overtook me as I lay beneath a tree; but they quitted me."—This is not the whole of the anecdote; but the remaining portion I reserve for a subsequent note, as it illustrates an incident in the Fifth Voyage.

Marco Polo's account of the inhabitants of the Andaman Islands, which he calls "Angaman," remarkably agrees with what is said above of the cannibals of Seksár; and though this island is described as in the Ethiopian Sea, we might almost conclude, from his statement, that, if the anecdote which I have just given be not entirely a fiction, its narrator was cast upon one of the Andamans. "The inhabitants [of Angaman]," says the Venetian traveller, "are idolaters, and are a most brutish and savage race, having heads, eyes, and teeth, resembling those of the canine species. Their dispositions are cruel, and every person, not being of their own nation, whom they can lay their hand upon, they kill and eat."—Our author might perhaps also have heard of an island in the Sea of India, called the Island of El-Kasr (or the Pavilion), on which, as related by El-Kazweenee, is a white pavilion, and whoever enters this, sleep and insensibility overcome him, and the inhabitants take him.—But several circumstances connected with the adventures of Es-Sindibád on the island of the cannibals seem rather to point out Sumatra as the scene; and I think it most probable that this island is meant by "Seksár." Hole observes (page 111), "Notwithstanding the striking similarity between the inhabitants of the Andamans and Es-Sindibád's negroes, other circumstances render it more probable that he was wrecked on the coast of Sumatra. Some old voyagers mention a stupefying, or rather enebriating, vegetable as peculiar to it: others say that it was customary with its inhabitants to fatten children in order to eat them. The Mohammadan travellers in the ninth century describe them as cannibals, and those of the kingdom of Batta continue so to this day.—'In Lam-aray' (Sumatra), says Mandeville, 'is a cursed custom, for thei eaten more gladly mannes flesche than any other flesche. . . . Thidre gon marchauntes, and bryngen with hem children, to selle to hem of the ctree, and thei byzen [buy] hem: and zif thei ben fatte, thei eten hem anon: and zif thei ben lene, thei feden hem, tille thei ben fatte, and thanne thei eten hem." (Page 214.)

The food which stupefied the companions of Es-Sindibád we may suppose to have been mixed with hemp, henbane, hellebore, datura, or opium; all of which are often used in various countries of the East for this purpose, though more frequently to induce a pleasurable intoxication. Hole remarks (page 126), that "Davis, who sailed to Sumatra in the year 1599, says, 'In this country there is a kind of seed, whereof a little being eaten, maketh a man to turn fool, all things seeming to him to be metamorphosed.'"—"Dampier," also, he observes, "mentions that the inhabitants of Sumatra 'make use of a certain herb like hemp, called Ganga or Bang, which, if infused in any liquor, exerts its operation upon those that taste it after a very odd manner, according to their different constitutions; for some it stupefies, others it makes sleepy, others merry, and some quite mad.'" The term "benj," or "beng," is applied by the Arabs both to hemp and henbane: the former, from the effects above described, appears to be here meant. Dampier might have been ignorant of the intoxicating property of hemp, and therefore prudently used the words "like hemp."—It is scarcely necessary to add, that Sumatra abounds with cocoanuts.

NOTE 53. "Es-Sindibád's travelling eight days [or seven days and nights] before he finds white men on another part of the coast will not agree with the contracted size of the Andaman or Nicobar islands. . . . Pepper is the common product of the Sunda islands, and more peculiarly so of Sumatra." (Hole, page 130.)

NOTE 54. The words "with all her apparel and ornaments and wealth" I have inserted on the authority of the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and Langlès' edition.

NOTE 55. The name of the island where the living spouse was buried with the dead is not mentioned; but we may suppose it to be not far from Sumatra. That such a custom prevailed in any of the Eastern islands or elsewhere, the reader will not expect to be proved: but the burial of the living husband with the dead wife, in a city beyond an extensive desert on the northern frontiers of India, is mentioned in another Oriental romance. Mandeville, also, "mentions, that in 'the yle of Calanak ['an island supposed to be not very remote from Java,' and consequently perhaps the island where this custom is said to have prevailed in our story], zif a man that is maryed dye, men buryen his wif with him alle quyck.'" . . . Mr. Grose, likewise in his voyage to the East Indies in 1745, says that among a particular caste of Indians, a plate of rice, a jar of water, and the cloaths and jewels a wife wore when alive, were buried with her. But he further informs us, that the husband usually divested her of the latter before the grave was filled up." (Hole, page 139.) Perhaps, then, our author might have heard some account of the custom which he here describes; or merely the Hindoo practice of burning the widow with the corpse of her husband may have suggested to him the idea.

NOTE 56. My sheykh observes that this is a mistake, unless it be meant that the women, because they were weaker than the men, had a larger stock of provisions. In the Breslau edition we read here "a mug of water and seven cakes of bread," as usual.

NOTE 57. Hole remarks (page 140), that Es-Sindibád's escape "may have been suggested by an incident that took place in a very early period of Grecian history, relative to Aristomenes, the Messenian general, who was taken prisoner by the Spartans, and with fifty of his countrymen precipitated into a deep, gloomy cavern. All the others were killed by the fall; and for three days he lay almost dead with hunger and the stench of corrupted carcases, when he perceived a fox near him, gnawing a dead body. With one hand he caught it by the hind leg, and with the other held its jaw when it attempted to bite him. Following, as well as he could, his struggling guide to the narrow crevice at which he entered, he there let him go, and soon forced himself a passage through it to the welcome face of day."

NOTE 58. This and the next two sentences I insert from Langlès' edition.

NOTE 59. Of "the Island of the Bell" I find no mention in any other work. May it not be the island mentioned in

Note 17 in the present series? The original meaning of the word which I have rendered "bell" (namely "nákoos") is, a wooden instrument used by the Eastern Christians to announce the times of prayer, consisting of two pieces of wood of unequal lengths, which were knocked together. The noisy island of Bartáil might therefore not inaptly be called "the Island of the Nákoos."

NOTE 60. The orthography of this name is uncertain, as the signs that would fix it are omitted. It is evidently the "Cala" and "Kulleh" in the fourth paragraph of Note 12 in the present series; which see. For the word "Kingdom," afterwards occurring, we may read "seat of government;" and for "a mine of lead," it appears that we should read "a mine of tin."

NOTE 61. In the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, this is called "the City of El-Abáteel," that is "—— of Vanities," or "Lies," &c.

NOTE 62.—The Egg of the Rukh', and the consequence of breaking it. Ibn-El-Wardee, after having given the brief notice which I have quoted in Note 22 in the present series, respecting the Island of the Rukh', and the bird after which it was named, on the authority of 'Abd-Er-Rahmán El-Maghrabee, relates two anecdotes of this man, both of which are included among the historical anecdotes of the Cairo edition of the Thousand and One Nights. Of the former I have given a translation in page 1173 of this work. The latter I omitted there that I might not anticipate the adventures of Es-Sindibád to which this note, and the one above referred to, relate. It is given in Ibn-El-Wardee's work as follows, and nearly in the same words in the Thousand and One Nights, in both works as related by 'Abd-Er-Rahmán El-Maghrabee.

"He said that he made a voyage in the Sea of China, and the wind drove them to a great, large, wide island, where the people of the ship landed to procure water and firewood, taking with them axes and ropes and water-skins, and he was with them. And they saw upon the island a dome, white, of enormous size, shining, glistening, more than a hundred cubits high. So they went towards it and approached it, and, lo, it was an egg of the rukh'. They began to strike it with the axes and with masses of rock and with wood, until it broke, and disclosed the young rukh', which was like a firm mountain; and they caught hold of a feather of its wing, and pulled it; whereupon it became dissevered from the wing; and the formation of the feathers was not complete. After this they killed the bird, and carried away as much as they could of its flesh. They also cut off the lower portion of the feather, from the extremity of the quill-part, and departed. And some of those who entered the island had cooked of the flesh, and eaten. Among these were old men with white beards; and when they arose in the morning, they found that their beards had become black; and not one of the people who ate became grey after that: wherefore they said, that the stick with which they stirred what was in the pot of the flesh of 'the young rukh' was of the tree of youth: but God is all-knowing. And when the sun rose, and the people were in the ship, and she was proceeding with them, lo, the rukh' [the old bird] approached, coming down like a vast cloud, having in its claw a fragment of a mountain, like an enormous house, and bigger than the ship. And when it came over the ship, in the sky, it cast down the stone upon her, and upon those who were in her. But the ship was swift in her course; so she got before the stone, which fell into the sea, and its fall occasioned a most terrible commotion in the sea. God, says the narrator, decreed us safety, and delivered us from destruction."

The above anecdote is also related by Ed-Demeeree, who died, according to D'Herbelot, in the year of the Flight 808 (A. D. 1405-6), and apparently with little variation, judging from a Latin translation of it by Bochart (Hierozoicon, vol. ii. p. 854), which Hole has quoted.

NOTE 63. The word which I have rendered "a streamlet" (namely "sákiyeh") is also applied to a water-wheel for irrigation, and is used in this sense in my original and in the Breslau edition; but not so in the two other editions that I have by me. We must suppose that there were no men who could make use of a water-wheel in this part.

NOTE 64.—The Old Man of the Sea. I must now continue the anecdote commenced in Note 52 in the present series, describing the adventures of a man upon an island which, as there stated, I suppose to be Sumatra.

"Being then secure from them, I journeyed over that island, night and day, and came at last to trees bearing fruits, beneath which were men of handsome form, but without bones in their legs. I sat, and I understood not their language, nor did they understand mine; and I was not aware of it before one of them mounted on my neck, wound his legs round my throat, and urged me to rise. So I rose with him, and strove to release myself from him, and to throw him down from me; but I could not; and he began to scratch my face with his sharp nails. I therefore proceeded to carry him about among the trees, and he ate of their fruits, and fed his companions, who laughed at me. But while I was bearing him about among the trees a thorn of a tree entered his eye, and he became blind. Then I pressed for him some grapes, and said to him, Stoop. And he stooped; whereupon his legs became loosened from me, and I threw him down from my neck, and departed, and God saved me by his grace. And these scratches were made by him."

El-Kazweenee also mentions, in the khátimeh (or conclusion) of his work, that in the island in which is a people with faces like the faces of dogs, that is, the island which is said to have been the scene of the adventure above related, "there is a people in the form of men, like the handsomest existing, and there is no bone in their legs." He adds, "They drag themselves along; and when they find a man walking, they leap upon his neck, and fold their legs upon that walking man; and if the latter strive to throw down the man upon his neck, he scratcheth him upon his face, and he curbeth him as one of us curbeth his beast."

But in another place, in his account of animals of the water, he gives a somewhat different account of "the Old Man of the Sea;" as follows:—"The water-man resembleth a man, saying that he hath a tail. . . . One of them was found in our time dried, and was shewn to the people, and his form was as we have described it. It is related that, from the Sea of Syria, sometimes, there cometh up from the water to the abode of men [a creature in] the form of a man, having a white beard, and they name it the Old Man of the Sea, and it remaineth some days, without descending; and when the people see it, they rejoice in expectation of plenty. It is also related that a water-man was brought to one of the Kings, who desired to know his condition: so he married a woman to him, and they had a son who understood the languages of both his parents. And it was said to the son, What saith thy father? To which he answered, He saith, The tails of all [other] animals are on the lower part of their bodies: how then is it that the tails of these are upon their faces?"—This important observation of the water-man does not confirm what is said before, that this creature hath a white beard: but the above account was apparently founded on the fact of the exhibition of the dried water-man.

Is it not highly probable that this dried Old Man of the Sea was one of the apes mentioned in a former note, No. 38 in the present series? And does not this strengthen the opinion that Sumatra is the island of this creature? Es-Sindibád's next adventure after his escape from the Old Man of the Sea also appears to me to confirm this opinion. I agree with Hole in the latter of the two conjectures which he thus states (as well as in the inference he thence draws).—"I would willingly suppose the phrase 'of the sea' to be an addition of the translator, not countenanced by the original; or that it was applied to Es-Sindibád's persecutor merely on account of his insular abode, or usual appearance by the sea-side.—If either of these conjectures," he adds, "be allowed, we may pronounce him, without any hesitation, to be an Ourang Outan. It is to be observed, that he never speaks, but expresses his meaning by gesticulation; he lives on fruits; the skin of his legs resembles that of a cow [or buffalo]; and his winding them around Es-Sindibád's neck is consistent with the pliability of limb belonging to that animal: even his draining the calabash, in imitation of Es-Sindibád, is characteristic of our humiliating copyists."

Two stories similar to that of Es-Sindibád and the Old Man of the Sea occur in two other Eastern romances. One I have met with in the romance of Seyf Zu-l-Yezen. Two of Seyf's companions are related to have fallen into the power of the monsters above mentioned, whom they intoxicated, and thus they effected their liberation. This romance, I was told in Cairo, is much older than the Thousand and One Nights.—The other story, which was pointed out to me by Dr. W. C. Taylor, is in the Adventures of Cámarupa. See pages 72-81 of the translation by Franklin, who shews, in a note, the prevalence of a belief in the existence of the monsters in question, whom his author calls "Duwál Páyán," that is, "men with slender and pliant legs," or, as he renders the words, "men with leathern feet." I find them described in Richardson's Dictionary (Johnson's edition), as, "a people in India, who, according to Castellus, have legs thin and ductile, like leathern straps; they pretend to be lame, and importune travellers to carry them on their backs; which proves fatal to such whose compassion induces them to comply; as the villains twist their legs round their necks, and instantly strangle them." And here I may appropriately add an extract from No. 47 of the Foreign Quarterly Review, before referred to.—"In the story of Sindibád, many of the incidents which are attributed to the Greeks were undoubtedly borrowed by them from Persia; and the fabulous deduction assuredly sprung from an historical fact. Thus, as noted on a former occasion, the Old Man of the Sea simply signifies the chief (sar) of the sea or lake (yangi), i. e. of the coast;—and there is no greater perversion in the translation than in that of sheykh, used sometimes as chief, sometimes as old man, or elder, (so too our eoldermann,) as in patriarchal countries. The same compound word, sar-yangi, is obviously the name preserved by Arrian, and Quintus Curtius, as Zarangæ, a Scytho-Persic tribe. This singular identity is established by the fact that the Avari, or shepherds, of our Indian frontier, Scyths also, are in a vulgar tradition represented as riding upon the conquered inhabitants; while the buskin, mentioned (if we remember rightly, by Herodotus,) as the appendage of the Scythian tribes, at once explains the phantasy of the leather legs of these man-bestridding Ancients." (Pages 145 and 146.) May not the name of the Old Man of the Sea have originated hence and been transferred by the Arabs to a kind of Ape, which they imagined a man? That they applied this name to an ape I cannot doubt.

NOTE 65. The City of the Apes appears to be in the Island of Apes, which I suppose to be Sumatra. See above, Note 38. If Es-Sindibád's adventures during his Fifth Voyage were founded on the experience and reports of a single navigator, and agreed with the account of the latter in the order of events, there would still be, here, nothing inconsistent with what immediately precedes; as a person might be several "days and nights" in passing from one part of Sumatra to another. What follows, too, is especially applicable to this island.

NOTE 66. Hole mentions (page 157), on the authority of Grossier's Description of China, a similar mode of gathering tea, said to be practised in that country; and Chinese drawings confirming the account.

I have myself likewise seen paintings in ancient Egyptian tombs representing the mode of gathering fruit by means of tame monkeys. See an engraving of one of these designs in the invaluable work on the Ancient Egyptians by Sir Gardner Wilkinson, vol. ii. p. 150.

NOTE 67. This, as Hole observes, might be any of the islands near the straits of Sunda. The cinnamon is mentioned only in one of the four editions that I have of the original. In the Breslau edition, for "cinnamon" we have "cloves."

NOTE 68. El-Kazweenee says of the pepper-vine, that when the sun becomes hot upon the bunches of pepper leaves fold over each bunch, that it may not be burnt by the sun; and when the sun is withdrawn from it, the leaves are also, that it may receive the zephyr; but I remember to have seen, somewhere in the work of El-Idreessee, an account agreeing with that of our author.

NOTE 69. In Langlès' edition, this is called the Island of El-Kamáree; and in the same edition, after mentioning the aloes-wood, it is added, "its inhabitants prohibit fornication and wine." This is also added in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, which does not mention the name of the island. Hence it is evident that the name should be Kamár (respecting which see Note 12 in the present series); for in the "Accounts of India and China" (before quoted), the same remark is made (page 64) of the inhabitants of the island or country so called.

NOTE 70. I read "Sanfee" for "Seenee" (or "Chinese"). See again the note just referred to, fifth paragraph. But if what I have there said, respecting the position of Sanf, be correct, an Arab writer might regard this country as a part of China, and I have shewn that El-Idreessee calls it "a Chinese island" (or peninsula). In Langlès' edition, the Sanfee aloes-wood is mentioned as the product of the Island of "El-Kamáree."

NOTE 71. In the Breslau edition, these remarks are applied to the inhabitants of the Island of the Kamáree aloes-wood.

NOTE 72. The word which I render "bay" is "birkeh." It generally signifies a lake or pool; but is also applied to a bay (ex. gr. "Birket Far'oon," or "Pharaoh's Bay," in the Red Sea), and to a reach of a river. There is a pearl-fishery "in the gulf of a bay that lies between Maabar [the southernmost part of India] and the island of Zeilan [or Ceylon]," in the course of Es-Sindibád's homeward voyage.

NOTE 73. Or rather a peninsula, as the sequel will shew; for it afterwards appears that the vessel was wrecked upon the coast of Ceylon, though, as Hole remarks, it would be no easy matter to find the particular spot here described. The author seems, in this case, to have given the reins to his imagination, and scarcely to have curbed it on any occasion until his mention, by name, of the island of Sarandeeb, or Ceylon.

NOTE 74. The introduction of the words here inserted between crotchets is justified by what follows in the text.—In the old version, the stream of sweet water here mentioned is said to run out of the sea. But in this passage, I think Galland has mistaken the sense of his original: in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition, the stream, or river, is described as coming forth from the seaside. Hole mentions submarine springs of fresh water in the Persian Gulf, near El-Bahreyn, on the authority of Ives and Chardin.

NOTE 75. So in Langlès' edition. In the Cairo edition, "Chinese," as in a former instance. The reading of the Breslau edition is "good aloes-wood."—What is said of the abundance of jewels in this place is founded upon truth. Marco Polo observes (Book iii. chap. 19), that the island of Ceylon "produces more beautiful and valuable rubies than are found in any other part of the world, and likewise sapphires, topazes, amethysts, garnets, and many other precious and costly stones." And his learned translator, Mr. Marsden, adds, "Mr. Cordiner enumerates, as the production of Ceylon, the ruby, emerald, topaz, amethyst, sapphire, cat's-eye or opal, cinnamon-stone or garnet, agate, sardonix, and some others." Ancient authors also give similar accounts of the natural riches of this island, called by them "Taprobane."

NOTE 76. Through an opening, we may suppose, in the mountain.—In the old version, this spring is called "a sort of fountain of pitch or bitumen;" and Hole remarks (pp. 168-171), "The fountain of pitch and bitumen is not to be objected against. Similar ones existed on the banks of the Euphrates at a place called Eit or Ait. [properly, Heet], about five days' journey from ancient Babylon, and two 'from modern Babylon or Bagdad.' . . . If we are to credit Bartholomew de Argensola, we must consider Es-Sindibád as merely stating a well-known matter of fact; for he assures us, that in Ceylon were 'springs of liquid bitumen thicker than our oil, and some of pure balsam.'" El-Idresee (1st Climate, close of 7th Section,) says, that ambergris is a substance which flows from sources at the bottom of the sea, as naphtha flows from the sources of Heet. See Note 78 below.

NOTE 77. In the original, "el-hawâish" (plural of "háisheh"). My sheykh, in a marginal note, explains that this term is applied to "such creatures as the crocodile and buffalo and terrific things that come forth from the sea; but as to common fish," he adds, "they are not so called." The author seems to have intended to allude to the whale, of which El-Kazweenee, describing it under the name of "bál," says, that some of the Zenj (or Ethiopians) catch it, and take forth from it ambergris.

NOTE 78. It is added in my original, "and no one can ascend that mountain:" but we are told that Es-Sindibád and his companions did. It should rather have been said, "and no ship can approach it in safety."

"In regard to the ambergris which the waves threw on the beach, it may be observed," says Hole (page 171), "that 'the Mohammadan traveller [of the ninth century] mentions a particular species of it which was frequently cast by the sea on the Barbarian and Indian coasts; which swam in great lumps, and, when swallowed by certain fish of the whale kind, destroyed them.' Renaudot, in his observations, says, that 'these authors thought with some of the ancients that it grew like a plant at the bottom of the sea;' and that another asserted, 'it rose in springs like pitch and bitumen.' He quotes another who observes, that 'one sort of it was black like pitch, soft, and often ill-scented, because, as the inhabitants report, whales and other fishes, and even birds, swallow it as often as they see it floating on the surface.'—These circumstances, which the author of the tale might have heard but not thoroughly understood, suggested possibly the idea in the text of the supposed metamorphosis these inflammatory substances underwent by being lodged for a short period in the stomach of a fish. Ambergris is said to abound chiefly in those seas that are inhabited by the spermaceti-whale, and is often found in the body and excrements of that animal. Yet many naturalists agree in opinion with the Mohammadan traveller, and imagine it to be a fossil or vegetable substance, which, when devoured by the whale, throws it into a state of torpidity and sickness."—El-Kazweenee says, some persons assert that ambergris comes from a spring in the sea, like bitumen; others, that it is a kind of dew; and others, that it is from an animal of the water. He adds, that it is not denied that the sea throws it up on the shore; and states that the sea of the Zenj (or Ethiopians) throws up large masses, the largest being a thousand mithkâls; that it is often found in the belly of the sea-fish; and that the fish which eats it dies.—It is mostly found on the eastern shores of Africa, and on the shores of the adjacent islands. Sir Gardner Wilkinson has shewn me a cylindrical lump of ambergris three inches and a quarter in length, and one inch and a half in diameter, which he found on the western shore of the Red Sea, at Jebel ez-Zeyt. He was informed by the Arabs that similar, but smaller, lumps were often found there.

NOTE 79. This is not unfrequently done in similar cases. See my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. ii. ch. xv., first paragraph.

NOTE 80. Here, and afterwards, I read "kelek" for "fulk," as in a former instance. In Langlès' edition, and the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, what is called a boat in the edition of Cairo is sometimes termed a boat and sometimes a raft ("kelek," and "remes," for "remeth").

NOTE 81. Because, by being drowned, he would die a martyr. See Note 88 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 82. Here again I read "Sanfee" for "Seenee," or Chinese.

NOTE 83. In the Romance of Seyf Zul-Yezen, mentioned before, I find a similar story of a subterranean river, and a voyage upon it, which may have suggested this incident to our author; or perhaps, as Hole observes, the idea may have been taken from the fact that the river Zenda-rood passes under the earth from Ispahân to Kirmân.

NOTE 84. The words "who was the King of Sarandeeb" (i.e. Ceylon) are in the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and in Langlès' edition; but not in the editions of Cairo and Breslau.

NOTE 85. For the remainder of this voyage, and the whole of the next (which is the last), I follow the text of the Calcutta edition of the first two hundred Nights, and occasionally that of Langlès' edition; for in the Cairo edition, and in that of Breslau also, the latter part of the Sixth Voyage is less amply related, and the Seventh is altogether very different from that in the old version. I therefore think it better to subjoin a translation of the Seventh Voyage as related in the Cairo edition to the present series of notes.

NOTE 86. Though this is far from the truth, Diodorus Siculus and Ptolemy have said the same of this island, the ancient Taprobane. See Hole, p. 176.

NOTE 87. Es-Sindibâd's brief description of Sarandeeb (or Ceylon) has been amply illustrated by Hole, pp. 178-187. Its jewels I have already noticed; and I shall only add a few words respecting its great mountain, called by the Arabs "Er-Râhoon;" and by Europeans, "Adam's Peak." The Arabs say, that when our first parents were cast down from Paradise, Adam fell upon this mountain; and Eve, near Juddah (commonly called Jiddeh), the port of Mekkeh. They also say, that on the summit of the said mountain is the print of Adam's foot; and that, when one of his feet was on this spot, the other was in the sea.

NOTE 88. This word I find only in Langlès' edition, and what animal is meant by it I know not. Hole states (page 192), on the authority of a gentleman who long resided in the East Indies, that "the skin of the hog-deer, a beautiful and uncommon animal found at Prince's Island in the straits of Sunda, is of a yellowish colour when alive, and might easily be dressed as yellow parchment."

NOTE 89. The elephants of Ceylon are said to be the best in the world. See Hole, p. 194.

NOTE 90. The belief in the sanative properties of a serpent's skin is a superstition of ancient times, and still prevailing, as shewn by Hole, pages 204 and 205. El-Kazweenee says, "In the sea of the Zenj (or Ethiopians) is the island of Ed-Dôdâ (i. e. Vociferation), which is a white island, whence are heard vociferation and clamour. No one of mankind dwelleth in it; but sometimes the sailors have entered it, and drunk of its water, which they have found sweet and good, and having the odour of camphor; and they say, 'We know not its extremity; but near it are great mountains, wherein burneth by night a great fire.' They have related also, that on its shores a serpent appeareth once every year, and the Kings of the Zenj find death in taking it; and when they have taken it, they cook it, and make, of its skin, beds, upon which the person who is afflicted with elephantiasis sitteth, and so becometh cured of his disease; and that [skin] is found in the treasures of Kings." — Serpents that swallow the elephant have been mentioned in Note 12 (3rd paragraph) and Note 43, in the present series.

NOTE 91. This ceremony is consistent with what we read in the "Accounts of India and China," page 31. "When a King dies in the Island of Sarandeeb, they lay his body on a car, in such a manner that his head hangs backwards till it almost touches the ground, and his hair is upon the earth; and this car is followed by a woman with a broom in her hand, therewith to sweep dust on the face of the deceased, while she cries out with a loud voice, 'O men! behold your King who was yesterday your master; but now the empire he exercised over you is vanished and gone. He is reduced to the state you behold, having left the world; and the arbiter of death hath withdrawn his soul. Reckon therefore no more upon the uncertain hopes of life.'"

NOTE 92. Es-Suweys is the town commonly called by us "Suez."

NOTE 93. "The Table of Suleymán" I suppose to be a figure engraved in the cup. The figure called the Seal of Suleymán is often engraved in the bottom of a drinking-cup. — The word rendered "carpets," in the same passage, is "zawálee." I have so rendered it conjecturally, judging from the manner in which I have found it used in other instances, where it expressly denotes either carpets or mattresses of some kind. I suppose it to be the same as "zelálee."

NOTE 94. I do not know any book having this title; but similar titles are borne by many Oriental works.

NOTE 95. Here and afterwards I have taken the liberty of writing "teeth" for "bones." — And now I must insert one more extract from Hole's learned and entertaining "Remarks."

"Nothing material occurs in the last voyage, this instance of the elephant's sagacity excepted. They had slain, it appears, many former slaves employed in the same office Es-Sindibád had undertaken; but finding no end to their persecution, and being aware of its cause, they adopted this judicious method of suppressing the merchants' hostilities, which proceeded solely from their avarice; and it were devoutly to be wished that this was a solitary instance of warfare originating from the same principle. — This story relative to the half-reasoning elephant is sufficiently consonant to European as well as Asiatic ideas concerning him, to vindicate the author from the charge of extravagance. We find an anecdote in Topsell's Gesner (page 152) which likewise represents these animals as equally sensible of the value which mankind set on their teeth; and, therefore, when they dropped out, which was commonly the case every tenth year, they carefully covered them with earth, to hide them from the view of their persecutors." — Hole afterwards shews, "that the elephants of Pliny and Es-Sindibád were equally conscious of the value which mankind set on their teeth."

NOTE 96. For the reason given in a former note, I here subjoin a translation of

The Seventh Voyage of Es-Sindibád of the Sea as related in the Cairo Edition of the Thousand and One Nights

Know, O company, said Es-Sindibád of the Sea, that when I returned from the sixth voyage, and resumed my former life of enjoyment and pleasure, and sport and merriment, I remained thus for a length of time in uninterrupted joy and happiness night and day; and had acquired abundant gains, and great profits. Then my soul again longed for diversion in other countries, and voyaging upon the sea, and associating with the merchants, and hearing news. So I resolved upon that. I packed up bales suited for the sea, consisting of costly commodities, and conveyed them from the city of Baghdád to the city of El-Basrah, where I saw a ship prepared for a voyage, and in her was a company of great merchants. I therefore embarked with them, and made myself familiar with them, and we set forth in safety and health on our voyage. The wind was fair to us until we arrived at a city called the City of China, and we were in the utmost joy and happiness, conversing together on travel and commerce. But while we were in this state, a stormy wind arose from the quarter ahead of the ship, and there fell upon us a violent rain, by which we were wetted, and our bales also: wherefore we covered the bales with felt and canvas, fearing that the goods would be spoiled by the rains; and we began to supplicate God (whose name be exalted!) and to humble ourselves before Him, that He might remove the affliction that had befallen us. And thereupon the master of the ship arose, and tightened his girdle and tucked up his clothes, and ascended the mast. Then he turned his eyes to the right and left, after which he looked at the people of the ship, and slapped his face and plucked his beard. So we said, O master, what is the news? And he answered us, Seek ye of God (whose name be exalted!) escape from the peril into which we have fallen, and weep for yourselves, and bid one another farewell; for know that the wind hath prevailed against us, and cast us into the furthest of the seas of the world. The master then descended from the mast-head, and opened his chest, and took forth from it a cotton bag, which he untied, and he took out of it some dust like ashes, moistened this with water, and, having waited over it a little, he smelt it; after which he took forth from that chest a small book, and read in it, and said to us, Know, O ye passengers, that in this book is a wonderful property, indicating that whosoever arriveth at this region, he will not escape from it, but will perish; for this region is called the Clime of the Kings, and in it is the tomb of our lord Suleymán the son of Dáood (on both of whom be peace!), in which are serpents of enormous size and of terrible appearance; and whatsoever ship arriveth at this region, there cometh up to her from the sea a great fish, which swalloweth her with all that she containeth.

So when we heard these words from the master, we wondered extremely at his account; and he had not finished his speech to us, when the ship began to rise with us from the water, and then to descend, and we heard a great cry, like the loud-pealing thunder, whereat we were struck with terror, and became as dead men, making sure, at that moment, of destruction. And, lo, a great fish approached the ship, like a lofty mountain, and we were terrified at

it. We wept for ourselves with a violent weeping, and prepared for death, and were looking at that great fish, wondering at its terrible formation, when, lo, another great fish approached us; and we had not beheld aught more monstrous than it, nor any thing greater. Upon this, therefore, we bade one another farewell, weeping for ourselves. And, lo, a third great fish approached, and it was greater than the two that had come to us before it. So we became without memory and without understanding, and our minds were stupefied by the violence of our fear and terror. Then these three great fishes began to compass the ship, and the third fish darted down to swallow the ship with all that was in her. But, lo, there rose a great wind, whereupon the ship rose, and fell upon a great reef, and broke in pieces; all the planks were separated, and all the bales, and the merchants and other passengers, were submerged in the sea. I therefore pulled off all the clothes that were upon me except one garment, and swam a little, and reached one of the planks of the ship, and caught hold of it. Then I got upon it and bestrode it, and the waves and the wind sported with me upon the face of the water, while I kept grasping that plank. The waves carried me up and down, and I was in a state of the most violent distress and fear, and hunger and thirst. I began to blame myself for that which I had done; my soul was weary after enjoying ease, and I said to myself, O Sindibád of the Sea, thou repentest not; and every time thou sufferest troubles and fatigue, yet repentest not of voyaging upon the sea; and, if thou sayest that thou repentest, thou liest: suffer then all that thou meetest with; for thou deservest all that happeneth to thee. All this, I added, is decreed to befall me by God (whose name be exalted!) that I may relinquish my covetousness; and this that I suffer is occasioned by my covetousness; for I had abundant wealth.—Then I returned to my reason, and said, Verily, in this voyage, I turn unto God (whose name be exalted!) sincerely repenting of travel, and I will never again in my life mention it with my tongue, nor in my mind. I ceased not to humble myself before God (whose name be exalted!) and to weep; and afterwards I reflected in my mind upon my former state of ease and happiness and sport and merriment and joy. Thus I continued the first day and the second day, until I landed upon a great island, wherein were many trees and rivers. So I ate of the fruits of those trees, and drank of the water of those rivers, until I was revived, and my soul returned to me, and my energy was strengthened, and my bosom expanded.

I then walked along the island, and I beheld, in its opposite side, a great river of sweet water, running with a strong current, whereupon I remembered the affair of the raft upon which I was before, and said within myself, I must make for me a raft like it, and perhaps I may escape from this predicament. If I so escape, my desire is attained, and I turn unto God (whose name be exalted!) repenting of travel; and if I perish, my heart is relieved from fatigue and distress. Then I arose and collected pieces of wood from those trees, consisting of high-priced sandal-wood, the like of which existeth not; but I knew not what it was. And when I had collected those pieces of wood, I made shift with twigs and herbs of the island, twisting them like ropes, and bound with them the raft; and I said If I be preserved, it will be by God's help. I embarked upon the raft, and proceeded upon it along that river during the first day and the second day and the third day after my departure thence. I lay down, and ate not during this period any thing; but when I thirsted, I drank of that river; and I was like a giddy young bird, by reason of the violence of my fatigue and hunger and fear, until the raft conveyed me to a high mountain, beneath which the river entered. So when I saw this, I feared for myself, on account of the distress that I had suffered before on the former river, and I desired to stop the raft, and to get off from it to the side of the mountain; but the current overpowered me, and drew the raft, with me upon it, and descended with it beneath the mountain. On beholding this, therefore, I made sure of destruction, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! The raft ceased not to proceed for a short distance, after which it passed forth into a wide place, and, lo, it was a great valley, through which the water roared, making a noise like thunder and with a rapidity like that of the wind. I grasped the raft with my hand, fearing lest I should fall from upon it, the waves tossing me to the right and left in the midst of the stream. The raft continued to descend with the current along that valley, and I could not prevent it, nor was I able to bring it to the land, until it stopped with me by a city of grand appearance, well built, and containing a numerous population. And when the people beheld me upon that raft, descending in the midst of the river with the current, they cast a net and ropes upon me and the raft, and drew forth the raft from the river to the land.

I fell down in the midst of them like a dead man, by reason of excessive hunger and sleeplessness and fear; and there came to me from among the assemblage an aged man, a sheykh of high dignity, who welcomed me, and threw over me an abundance of comely apparel, with which I covered myself decently. Then he took me and conducted me into the bath, brought me reviving beverages and exquisite scents, and, after we had come forth from the bath, took me to his house, and led me into it; and his family rejoiced at my coming. He seated me in an elegant place, and prepared for me some rich food: so I ate until I was satiated, and praised God (whose name be exalted!) for my escape; and after that, his pages brought to me hot water, and I washed my hands; and his female slaves brought to me drying-towels of silk, with which I dried my hands, and wiped my mouth. Then that sheykh arose immediately, and appropriated to me a place alone, in a part of his house, and made his pages and his female slaves to serve me, and to perform my wants and all my affairs. They therefore paid constant attention to me, and in this manner I ceased not to remain with him in the mansion of entertainment three days, enjoying good eating and good drinking and sweet scents, until my soul returned to me, and my terror subsided, and my heart was calmed, and my mind was at ease. And on the fourth day, the sheykh came to me and said to me, Thou hast cheered us by thy company, O my son, and praise be to God for thy safety! Wilt thou now arise and go with me to the bank of the river, and go down into the market and sell the goods and receive their price? Perhaps thou wilt buy for thyself with it something wherewith thou mayest traffic.—So I was silent for a little while, and said within myself, Whence have I goods, and what is the cause of the words? And the sheykh said, O my son, be not anxious nor be thoughtful; but arise and go with us to the market, and if we see any one who will give thee for thy goods a price that will content thee, I will receive it for thee; but if what will content thee be not offered for them, I will deposit them for thee in my magazines until the days of selling and buying arrive. So I meditated upon my case, and said to myself, Comply with his desire, that thou mayest see what these goods are. And I said to him, I hear and obey, O my uncle the sheykh, and what thou doest will be attended by blessing, and it is impossible to oppose thee in aught. I then went with him to the market, and found that he had unbound the raft on which I came, and which was of sandal-wood, and he commissioned the crier to announce it for sale. The merchants came, and opened the bidding for the wood, and increased their offers for it until its price amounted to a thousand pieces of gold; whereupon they ceased to bid more; and the sheykh, looking towards me, said, Hear, O my son: this is the price of thy goods in such days as the present. Wilt thou then sell them for this price, or wilt thou wait, and shall I put them for thee in my magazines until the time come when their price will be greater, and then sell them for thee?—I answered him, O my master, the affair is thine: so do what thou desirest. And he said, O my son, wilt thou sell me this wood for a hundred pieces of gold above what the merchants have offered for it?—Yes, I answered him: I have sold it to thee, and received the price. And upon this he ordered his young men to transport that wood to his magazines, and I returned with him to his house, where we sat, and he counted to me the whole price of the wood, brought to me bags, and, having put the money into them, locked them up with a lock of iron, of which he gave me the key.

And after a period of some days and nights, the sheykh said, O my son, I will propose to thee something, and I hope that thou wilt comply with my desire respecting it. So I said to him, And what is that affair? And he answered me, Know that I have become a man of great age, and I have not a male child; but I have a daughter, small in age, elegant in form, having abundant wealth and loveliness; therefore I desire to marry her to thee, and thou shalt reside with her in our country: then I will put thee in possession of all that I have, and what my hand possesseth; for I have become an old man, and thou wilt supply my place. And I was silent, and spoke not. And he said to me, Obey me, O my son, in that which I say to thee; for my wish to thee is good, and if thou comply with my desire, I will marry thee to my daughter, and thou shalt be as my son; and all that my hand hath, and what I possess, shall be thine; and if thou desire to traffic, and to return to thy country, no one will prevent thee: this is thy property, under thy disposal: do therefore with it what thou wilt and what thou choosest. So I replied, By Allah, O my uncle the sheykh, thou hast become as my father: I have suffered many horrors, and have neither judgment nor knowledge remaining: it is thine, therefore, to determine in all that thou desirest to do. And upon this the sheykh ordered his pages to bring the Kádee and the witnesses. Accordingly they brought them, and he married me to his daughter, made for us a grand entertainment and a great feast, and introduced me to her; and I found her to be endowed with the utmost beauty and loveliness, with handsome figure and just stature, and upon her was an abundance of various ornaments and articles of apparel, minerals, and ornaments of gold, and necklaces and precious jewels, the value of which was not less than thousands of thousands of pieces of gold, and no one could pay their price. When I went into her presence, she pleased me; affection for each other ensued, and I remained with her for a length of time in a state of the utmost delight and enjoyment. Her father was then admitted to the mercy of God (whose name be exalted!), and we prepared his body for the grave, and buried him, and I put my hand upon his property: all his young men became mine, and under my authority in my service, and the merchants instated me in his office; for he was their chief, and none of them purchased aught but with his knowledge and by his permission; he being their sheykh; and I became in his place.

Now when I mixed with the people of that city, I found that their state became changed every month, and there appeared upon them wings, wherewith they flew to the upper region of the sky, and there remained not behind in the city any but the children and the women. So I said within myself, When the first day of the month cometh, I will ask one of them, and perhaps they will convey me with them whither they go. And when the first day of that month came, their appearances became altered, and their forms became changed, and I went in to one of them, and said to him, I conjure thee by Allah that thou convey me with thee, in order that I may divert myself and return with you. He replied, This is a thing that cannot be. But I ceased not to solicit him until he granted that favour. I agreed with them, and caught hold of that man, and he soared with me in the air; but I informed not any one of my family nor any of my young men nor any of my companions; and that man continued to fly, with me upon his shoulders, until he rose so high with me into the sky that I heard the praises of the angels in the vault of the heavens. So I wondered at that, and said, Extolled be the perfection of God! and praise be to God! And I had not finished the words of praise when there came forth a fire from heaven, and it almost burnt them. They therefore all descended, and, having cast me upon a lofty mountain, departed in the utmost rage against me, and they went and left me. Thus I became alone upon that mountain, and I blamed myself for that which I had done, and said, There is no strength nor power but in God, the High, the Great! Verily, every time that I escape from a calamity, I fall into a calamity that is mightier than the former one!

I remained upon that mountain, and knew not whither to go, when, lo, two young men passed along, like two moons, each having in his hand a rod of gold, on which he leaned. I advanced to them, and saluted them, and they returned my salutation; and I said to them, I conjure you by Allah to tell me who ye are and what is your business. And they answered me, We are of the servants of God, whose name be exalted! Then they gave me a rod of red gold that they had with them, and went their way and left me. And I proceeded along the top of that mountain, leaning upon the rod, and reflecting upon the case of these two young men, and, lo, a serpent came forth from beneath the mountain, having in its mouth a man whom it had swallowed to his middle, and he was crying out and saying, Whosoever will deliver me, God will deliver him from every difficulty! I therefore advanced to that serpent, and struck it with the rod of gold on its head, whereat it threw the man from its mouth. And upon this the man came to me and said, Since my deliverance from this serpent hath been effected by thy means, I will not henceforth quit thee: thou hast become my companion on this mountain. So I replied, Thou art welcome. And we proceeded along the mountain, And, lo, a party of people came towards us, and I looked at them, and among them was the man who bore me upon his shoulders and flew with me. Therefore I advanced to him, and excused myself to him, addressing him courteously, and saying to him, O my friends, friends act not thus one to another. The man replied, Thou wouldst have destroyed us by thy words of praise upon my back. And I rejoined, Be not displeased with me; for I had no knowledge of the matter; but I will never again speak. So he consented to take me with him, making a condition with me that I should not mention God, nor praise Him, upon his back. He then took me up, and flew away with me as before, until he conveyed me to my abode, when my wife met me and saluted me, and congratulated me on my safety; and she said to me, Beware of going forth again with these people, and be not familiar with them; for they are the brothers of the devils, and they know not the celebration of God, whose name be exalted! I said to her, How did thy father live with them? And she answered me, My father was not of them, nor did he as they; and it is my opinion, since my father is dead, that thou shouldst sell all that we have, and purchase goods with the price, and voyage back to thy country and thy family, and I will go with thee; for I have no need of residing here in this city after the loss of my mother and my father.

So upon this I betook myself to selling the commodities of the sheykh, one thing after another, and to watching for some one who would set forth on a voyage from that city, that I might go with him. And while I was so doing, lo, a company of men in the city desired to perform a voyage, but found not for themselves a ship; wherefore they bought wood, and made for them a great ship; and I engaged for a passage with them, and paid them the whole of the hire. I then embarked my wife, and all that we had, in the ship; and, leaving the other possessions and the estates, we proceeded, and ceased not in our course over the sea from island to island, and from sea to sea; and the wind and the voyage were pleasant to us until we arrived in safety at the city of El-Basrah. I sojourned not there; but engaged for a passage in another vessel, to which I transferred all that I had with me, and I went on to the city of Baghdád. Then I entered my quarter and came to my house, and met my family and companions and friends, and stowed all the goods that I had with me in my magazines; and my family calculated the period of my absence from them during the seventh voyage, and found it to be seven and twenty years; so that they had given up all hope of my return.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-FIRST

NOTE 1. This city, which, we are told in the tale, derived its name from its having two towers of brass (or yellow copper), is not to be identified with that which is mentioned in the Story of Aboo-Mohammad the Lazy; as the latter was in a different part of the world, though it was like the former in having no visible gate. The Story of the City of Brass appears to have been suggested partly by a tradition related by Et-Tabaree, and partly by accounts, or actual observation, of the ancient temples and tombs of Egypt, with their inscriptions, statues, mummies, &c. And here I may mention, that the term "mask-hoot," employed to signify "a human being converted by the wrath of God into stone," is commonly applied in Egypt to an ancient statue. Hence the Arabs have become familiar with the idea of cities whose inhabitants are petrified, such as that described in "the Story of the First of the Three Ladies of Baghdád."

NOTE 2. 'Abd-El-Melik the son of Marwán was the fifth Khaleefeh of the house of Umeiyeh, and reigned A. D. 685-705.

NOTE 3. Namely, reptiles, and the wind.

NOTE 4. The word rendered "bottles" is the plural of "kumkum." For a description of the vessel thus called see Note 2 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 5. Thus in the edition of Breslau, in the Cairo edition, "to the land of India." The reading which I have adopted is more agreeable with the sequel.

NOTE 6. Here, in my original, but not in the Breslau edition, is added, "nor know we aught of this religion."

NOTE 7. Our author has erred in making En-Nábighah Edh-Dhubyánee contemporary with 'Abd-El-Melik the son of Marwán; for he flourished in the reign of En-Noamán Ibn-El-Mundhir, surnamed Aboo-Káboos, and died before the promulgation of El-Islám. The verses, also, given as his paraphrase of words addressed to Solomon by God ("the Wise, the First"), are misquoted. In their stead we should read,—

Except Suleymán, when the Deity said to him, Assume the government of mankind, and withhold them from error:

And bring under the Jinn; for I have commanded them to construct Tedmur with slabs and pillars.

Whoso obeyeth, reward him for his obedience; as he hath obeyed thee, direct him aright: And whoso opposeth thee, punish him severely: so prohibit the unjust. . . .

See the original in De Sacy's Chrestomathie Arabe, 2nd ed., vol. ii. pp. 145-6 of the Arabic text; and his translation and notes, pp. 406 and 442.—Hence it is evident, as this great scholar has remarked, that the legends relating to Solomon which are read in the Kur-án, especially in Chapters 34 and 38, were current among the Arabs before Mohammad.

NOTE 8. "The Western Country" is Northern Africa, west of Egypt.

NOTE 9. In my original, erroneously written "Nasr."

NOTE 10. "That is, 'a white ensign to take with thee.' It is also said, in the vulgar dialect, 'The ensign of such-a-one is white,' when he fails not in the performance of his affairs." White ensigns, &c., were more particularly distinctive of the rivals of the 'Abbásee Khaleefehs; and black, of the 'Abbásees themselves; but these also gave white ensigns to their governors.

NOTE 11. By "Misr" we must here understand El-Fustát, now vulgarly called "Masr el-'Ateekah" (or old Masr); as Cairo was not yet founded.

NOTE 12. "'Abd-Es-Samad" signifies "Servant of the Lord," or "—of the Everlasting," &c.; and "'Abd-El-Kuddoos," "Servant of the Holy." The surname written in my original "Es-Samoodée" is doubtful; in the Breslau edition it is "El-Masmoodee."

NOTE 13. In my original, "Dárán."—The Breslau edition describes preparations made for encountering the hot and dry winds of the desert; but no mention is afterwards made of these difficulties. It also relates, that the party wandered from the right way before they arrived at the first of the wonderful objects which they beheld in their journey.

NOTE 14. "That is, in the tabernacles of the world, or the tabernacles of their souls."

NOTE 15. "For worship, and what will follow it."

NOTE 16. This verse, omitted in my original, I have inserted from the Breslau edition.

NOTE 17. See Note 95 to Chapter x.

NOTE 18. This is doubtless a mistake for "Koosh the son of Hám," or Cush the son of Ham.

NOTE 19. "Esh-Shám," which generally applies to Syria, or its capital Damascus, here signifies the northern parts of Arabia, opposed to El-Yemen; and "from Misr unto 'Adnán," from the country of Misr (i. e. Egypt) to that of 'Adnán, ancestor of most of the Ishmaelite Arabs. My sheykh remarks, that these verses are a modern forgery, as is shewn, among other things, by the fact that 'Adnán lived long after Koosh. The tale presents numerous anachronisms throughout.

NOTE 20. "Every man is given on pledge for that which he shall have wrought." (Kur-án, ch. lii. v. 21. That is, as Sale explains the words, "Every man is pledged unto God for his behaviour; and if he does well, he redeems his pledge; but if evil, he forfeits it:" or, as El-Bey-dáwee says, if he act righteously, He will release him; but otherwise, He will destroy him."

NOTE 21. "Dáhish" signifies "amazed;" and "aamash," "having weak eyes, with a frequent flowing of tears."

NOTE 22. That is, prepare to answer God, on the day of judgment.

NOTE 23. This is a common phrase, and may be rendered, "his fury, or passion, rose," or "he was violently moved."

NOTE 24. See Note 115 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 25. From this point to the end of the next paragraph is from the edition of Breslau; very little of it being in the Cairo edition.

NOTE 26. By the word rendered "king," I suppose a king of the Jinn to be meant.

NOTE 27. This name I suppose to be imaginary, unless it be a mistake for "Kookoo," which word, in Arabic characters, differs little from "Karkar." If the "Kookoo" of El-Idreesee were the "Kouka" of our modern maps (the chief town of Bornou), the sea in question might be the great lake "Tchad," or "Tsad;" but Kouka, as Dr. Barth tells us, is quite a modern place. Ibn-El-Wardee, however, mentions a place in Central Africa called "Karkar;" probably the same as the "Kerker," or "Gerger," of Dr. Barth.

NOTE 28. "El-Andalus" is the name by which the Arabs call, not merely Andalusia, but the whole of Spain. In the tradition related by Et-Tabaree, and alluded to in the first of these notes, the City of Brass is said to have been built in a desert, beyond a city named El-Andalus. But according to its tradition, the whole city was constructed of brass. God, as we are told in the Kur-án, made a fountain of molten brass to flow for Suleymán; and the tradition relates, that the Jinn, having transported this fountain to the place above mentioned, built there a great city, twelve miles in length, and the same in breadth, in which he (Solomon) deposited his books and treasures. The tradition also narrates some particulars of the expedition of Moosà the son of Nuseyr to this city, stating its result, however, to have been unsuccessful.—The Book of Hidden Treasures, mentioned in the paragraph to which this note refers, is probably the name of a work on the treasures still currently believed in the East to be concealed in ancient edifices and similar places.

NOTE 29. I have made a correction here on the authority of the Breslau edition.

NOTE 30. In my original, the inscriptions of three more of the tablets are given, and in the Breslau edition, those of all the seven; but they are so much alike, that I have thought it sufficient to give only one as a specimen.

NOTE 31. That is, the verses which cause safety to their reciter; as the saying of Him whose name be exalted!—"And wherefore should we not put our trust in God?" [Kur-án, ch. xiv. v. 15.]—"Say, Nothing shall befall us but what God hath decreed for us." [Idem, ch. ix. v. 51.]

NOTE 32. This phrase means "a long time."

NOTE 33. "God is most great!" is the usual Muslim cry of victory.

NOTE 34. See Note 67 to Chapter v.

NOTE 35. Literally, "green lapis-lazuli;" but this is doubtless a mistake of a copyist.

NOTE 36. Respecting the coats of mail and the lances here mentioned, see Note 5 to Chapter viii., and Note 2 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 37. See Note 7 to Chapter xiii.

NOTE 38. The word here rendered "curtains" is the plural of "burko," which generally signifies "a woman's face veil;" but it is also sometimes applied to a door-curtain. The curtain which is suspended over the entrance of the Kaabeh is thus called.

NOTE 39. In this sentence are some errors in my original which the Breslau edition has enabled me to correct. — The greater part of the description of the palace given in the edition of Cairo is wanting in that of Breslau.

NOTE 40. Respecting Károon and Há-mán see the twenty-eighth chapter of the Kur-án. The former is the Korah of the Bible: the latter was the chief minister of the Pharaoh who oppressed the Israelites.

NOTE 41. "Ken'án" is the Canaan of the Bible; and "the Lord of the Stakes" is an appellation given (in the Kur-án, ch. xxxviii. v. 11) to the Pharaoh above mentioned. The words bearing this meaning Sale renders "the contriver of the stakes;" and he gives the following note upon them: — "For they say Pharaoh used to tie those he had a mind to punish, by the hands and feet, to four stakes fixed in the ground, and so tormented them. Some interpret the words, which may also be translated, The Lord of master of the stakes, figuratively, of the firm establishment of Pharaoh's kingdom; because the Arabs fix their tents with stakes; but they may possibly intend that prince's obstinacy and hardness of heart."

NOTE 42. There are errors here in the Cairo and Breslau editions. I have followed what appears (from Trébutien's translation) to be the reading of Von Hammer's MS. — "Tedmur" is the original and present name of Palmyra, which, according to the Arabs, was named after its Queen Tedmur, the daughter of Hassán the son of Udheyneh. Our author, however, can hardly be supposed to have here meant this Queen; the situation and grand remains of the city bearing her name being so well known.

NOTE 43. Some words in my original, immediately following the verses, I omit, as they are similar to the many exhortations which have occurred before, and are not inserted in the Breslau edition.

NOTE 44. The word rendered "sacks" (namely "aadál") is also applied to other receptacles for provisions, &c., two of which form a camel's load, one being attached on each side of the animal.

NOTE 45. It is said, in my original, that he ascended the steps "until he was between the two columns, and reached the spot between the two men." These columns not being elsewhere mentioned, I have omitted the words here relating to them.

NOTE 46. The "burnus," also called "burnoos," is a hooded cloak, generally made of white woollen stuff, and mostly worn by the people of Northern Africa. The people of Kookoo are described by El-Idreese as wearing skins. Revert to Note 27.

NOTE 47. Or El-Khadir. According to my sheykh, this does not apply to the prophet [or saint] mentioned in Note 2 to the Introduction, but I know not whom else it can mean.

NOTE 48. What the Muslims term "the night of Friday" is the night immediately preceding the day of Friday; as they class each night with the day which immediately follows it.

NOTE 49. By "the Spirit" is here meant the Angel Gabriel.

NOTE 50. Jerusalem is here called in my original, and by the Muslims generally, "El-Kuds," which signifies "holiness." The Muslims, like the Christians and Jews, regard it with great veneration.

NOTE 51. The next story in my original is that of "the King and his Son and the Damsel and the Seven Wezeers," which ends with part of the six hundred and sixth Night. It is similar in its framework to the Bakhtyár Náme, as observed by an orientalist who (in the Asiatic Journal, N. S. vol. xxx., No. 120) has given a summary of its contents, comprising numerous short tales selected from it, translated from a manuscript of a portion of the Thousand and One Nights in the British Museum; in which manuscript the story is related nearly as in the Cairo edition. It is also related nearly in the same manner in a fragment of the Thousand and One Nights brought from India; and from that fragment, Dr. Jonathan Scott made a translation, which is included in his "Tales, &c., from the Arabic and Persian." The story in my original, as well as in the manuscripts above mentioned, abounds with indecent passages and incidents; but among the short tales of which it is composed are some of considerable interest, and some others which I think not entirely unworthy of being presented to the English reader. I shall therefore follow the example of the first of the translators mentioned above, and, distinguishing by inverted commas the portions which will be fully rendered, or only curtailed of a few objectionable words, give an

Abstract of the Story of the King and his Son and the Damsel and the Seven Wezeers

There was, in ancient times, a certain King, of great power, who had reigned a long time, but had not been blessed with a son. At length, however, after he had earnestly prayed for an heir, his wife, the daughter of his uncle, bore him a male child, with a face like the disc of the moon in its fourteenth night. At the age of five years, the boy was committed to the care of a sage named Es-Sindibâd, and he became unequalled in science, and polite learning, and intelligence, and horsemanship. But one day the sage discovered, by observing the stars, that the young man was threatened with destruction, if, during the next seven days, he should speak one word. The King, therefore, by the sage's advice, delivered him to a female slave, to be diverted with music in the pavilion of the women, and to be kept there until the expiration of that period. Now there were in the pavilion forty private chambers, in each of which were ten slave-girls, every one of whom had a musical instrument, and when any one of them played, the pavilion danced at the melodious sounds that she produced; and around the pavilion ran a river, the banks of which were planted with all kinds of fruit-trees and sweet-smelling flowers. But here the favourite concubine of the King became violently enamoured of his son: the young man was indignant at hearing from her the avowal of her passion; and she in consequence complained to his father, reversing the true state of the case. The King thereupon was furiously enraged, and, having summoned his Wezeers, ordered them to put his son to death. The Wezeers, however, feared that he would afterwards repent, and blame them for not having dissuaded him: so they determined to divert him, if possible, from his purpose. This they endeavoured to do by relating to him numerous short tales; and the guilty damsel endeavoured to counteract their influence by similar means.

The First Wezeer, as an instance of the stratagems (but not of the wickedness) of women, begins by relating that,—

A certain King saw a beautiful damsel upon the roof of her house, and was captivated by her charms, and, learning that she was the wife of his Wezeer, he sent this minister to examine the state of one of the provinces, and went to pay her a visit. But he received from her a reproof which confounded him. He quitted her abode abruptly, leaving his seal-ring by mistake, in his confusion, beneath the cushion against which he had been reclining; and when the Wezeer returned to his house, he happened to put his hand beneath the cushion, and there found the King's seal: so he separated himself from his wife for the space of a whole year, not even speaking to her. She knew not the cause of his anger; and at length, when she was wearied by his conduct, she complained to her father, who went in to the King, and, "finding the Wezeer in his presence, and the Kâdee of the army before him, accused the Wezeer in these words:—May God (whose name be exalted!) amend the circumstances of the King! I had a beautiful garden, which I planted with my hand, and I expended upon it my wealth, until it bore fruit, and its fruit was ripe, when I gave it to this thy Wezeer, and he ate of it what was pleasant to him, after which he abandoned it; so its flowers withered, and its beauty departed, and its state altogether changed.—And thereupon the Wezeer said, O King, this person hath spoken truth in that which he hath said. I guarded it, and ate of it; but I went one day to it, and saw the footstep of the lion there; so I was afraid of him, and withdrew myself from it.—The King therefore understood that the footstep which the Wezeer had found was the King's seal that he had left by mistake in the house; and upon this he said to the Wezeer, Return, O Wezeer, to thy garden, and thou wilt be safe and secure; for the lion drew not near it. It hath been told me that the lion came thither; but he did it no injury, by the honour of my fathers and my ancestors!—So the Wezeer, on hearing this, said, I hear and obey. He returned to his house, and sent to his wife, made peace with her, and confided in her honesty."

The same Wezeer then relates the story of the Husband and the Parrot. The Damsel next tells a short tale of a father who perished in attempting to save his son from drowning, and another tale unfit for translation. Then the Second Wezeer relates a story of a nasty trick played upon a merchant by an old woman, and a tale which is as follows:—

A woman received visits from two men unknown to her husband: one of them was the treasurer of the King, and the other was that officer's young man. And one day, when the latter was with her, his master knocked at the door: so she took the young man, and put him down into a chamber beneath a trap-door; after which, she opened the door, and the master entered. "But, lo, her husband knocked at her door; whereupon he said to her, Who is this? She answered, My husband. And he said to her, What shall I do, and what shall be my resource in this case? She answered him, Arise, draw thy sword, and stand at the entrance of the passage: then abuse me and revile me; and when my husband cometh in to thee, depart, and go thy way. He therefore did so; and when her husband came in, he saw the King's treasurer standing, with his drawn sword in his hand, reviling his wife, and threatening her; and the treasurer, on seeing him, was abashed, and sheathed his sword, and went forth from the house. So the man said to his wife, What is the cause of this? And she answered him, How blessed is this hour in which thou hast come! Thou hast delivered a believing soul from slaughter. And the case was no other than this: I was spinning upon the house-top, and, lo, a young man came in unto me, an outcast, distracted, panting in fear of slaughter; and this man, with his drawn sword, was hastening after him striving in pursuit of him. So the young man threw himself upon my protection, kissing my hands and my feet, and said, O my mistress, deliver me from him who desireth my slaughter unjustly! Wherefore I hid him in the chamber here beneath the trap-door; and when I saw that this man had entered, with his sword drawn, I denied the young man to him on his demanding him of me, and he began to revile me and threaten me as thou sawest. And praise be to God who hath sent thee unto me; for I was perplexed, having no one with me to rescue me.—Her husband thereupon said to her, Excellently hast thou done, O woman! Thy reward is due from God, and He will recompense thee well for thy deed.—Then her husband went to the chamber beneath the trap-door, and called the young man, saying to him, Come up! No harm shall befall thee.—So he came up from the chamber, but in a state of fear; and the man said to him, Cheer thyself. No harm shall befall thee.—And he was grieved for that which had befallen him, while the young man prayed for him. Thus they both went forth, and knew not of the stratagem which this woman had contrived."

On the third day (for on each day one Wezeer tries his influence), the Damsel relates "the Story of the Envious Wezeer and the Prince and the Ghooleh." Then the Third Wezeer enters, and narrates the two following anecdotes:—

"There was a huntsman who hunted the wild beasts in the desert, and one day he entered a cave in a mountain, and found in it a hollow which was filled with honey. So he collected some of that honey in a water-skin that he had with him: then he carried it upon his shoulder, and conveyed it to the city, having with him a hound that was dear unto him. And the huntsman stopped at the shop of an oilman, to whom he offered the honey for sale, and the shopman, agreeing to buy it, opened the water-skin and emptied from it the honey, to see it. But there dropped from the skin a drop of honey, and a bird pounced down upon it; and the oilman had a cat, and it sprang upon the bird; and the huntsman's dog saw it, and sprang upon the cat and killed it; and the oilman sprang upon the huntsman's dog and killed it; and the huntsman sprang upon the oilman and killed him; and the oilman was of one village, and the huntsman of another, and the people of these two villages heard of this event; so they took their weapons and arms, and rose against each other in anger: the two ranks met, and the swords ceased not to be brandished about among them until there died of them a great multitude, the number of whom none knoweth but God, whose name be exalted!

"It hath been told me also, O King, among the stories of the artifice of women, that a woman's husband gave her a piece of silver to buy some rice, and she took it of him and went with it to the rice-dealer, who gave her the rice, and began to joke with her and ogle her; and he said to her, Rice is not sweet unless with sugar; and if thou desire it, come in. So the woman went into his shop, and he said to his slave, Weigh for her a dirhem's worth of sugar. And he gave him a wink; whereupon the slave took the handkerchief from the woman, and, having emptied it of the rice, put in the place of it dust; and instead of sugar, he put stones; after which, he tied the handkerchief, and left it by her. Therefore when the woman went forth from him, she took her handkerchief and departed to her abode, thinking that what was in her handkerchief was rice and sugar; and on arriving at her abode, she put the handkerchief before her husband, who found in it dust and stones. So when she brought the cooking-pot, her husband said to her, Did we tell thee that we had aught to build, that thou hast brought us dust and stones? And on her seeing this, she knew that the slave of the dealer had cheated her; and having brought the cooking-pot in her hand, she said to her husband, O man, in consequence of the trouble of mind that hath befallen me, I went to bring the sieve and brought the cooking-pot. Her husband said to her, And what hath troubled thy mind? And she answered him, O man, the piece of silver that I had with me dropped from me in the market, and I was ashamed before the people to search for it, and it was not a light matter to me that the piece of silver should go from me; wherefore I collected the dust from the place where it fell, and desired to sift it; and I was going to bring the sieve and brought the cooking-pot. Then she went and brought the sieve, and gave it to her husband, saying to him, Sift thou it; for thy sight is more clear than mine. So the man sat sifting the dust until his face and his beard were covered with it, and he perceived not her artifice, and discovered not that which had happened to her."

On the fourth day, the Damsel again presents herself to the King, and relates an instance of the perfidy of men.

A King of former times had an only son, whom he contracted in marriage to the daughter of another King. But the damsel, who was endowed with great beauty, had a cousin who had sought her in marriage, and had been rejected; wherefore he sent great presents to the Wezeer of the King first mentioned, requesting him to employ some stratagem by which to destroy his master's son, or to induce him to relinquish the damsel; and the Wezeer consented. Then the father of the damsel sent to the King's son, inviting him to come and introduce himself to his daughter, to take her as his wife; and the father of the young man sent him with the treacherous Wezeer, attended by a thousand horsemen, and provided with rich presents. And when they were proceeding over the desert, the Wezeer remembered that there was near unto them a spring of water, called Ez-Zahrâ, and whosoever drank of it, if he were a man, he became a woman. He therefore ordered the troops to alight near it, and induced the Prince to go thither with him; and when they arrived at that spring the King's son dismounted from his courser, and washed his hands, and drank; and, lo, he became a woman; whereupon he cried out and wept until he fainted. The Wezeer asked him what had befallen him; so the young man informed him; and on hearing his words, the Wezeer affected to be grieved for him, and wept. The King's son then sent the Wezeer back to his father, to inform him of this event, determining not to proceed nor to return until his affliction should be removed from him, or until he should die.

He remained by that fountain during a period of three days with their nights, neither eating nor drinking; and on the fourth night there came to him a horseman with a crown upon his head, appearing like one of the sons of the Kings, and this horseman said to him, Who brought thee, O young man, unto this place? So the young man told him his story; and when the horseman heard it, he pitied him, and said to him, The Wezeer of thy father is the person who hath thrown thee into this calamity; for no one of mankind knoweth of this spring except one man. Then the horseman ordered him to mount with him. He therefore mounted; and the horseman said to him, Come with me to my abode; for thou art my guest this night. The young man replied, Inform me who thou art before I go with thee. And the horseman said, I am son of a King of the Jânn, and thou art son of a King of mankind; and now be of good heart and cheerful eye on account of that which shall dispel thine anxiety and thy grief; for it is unto me easy.

So the young man proceeded with him from the commencement of the day, forsaking his troops and soldiers (whom the Wezeer had left at their halting-place), and ceased not to travel on with his conductor until midnight, when the son of the King of the Jinn said to him, Knowest thou what space we have traversed during this period? The young man answered him, I know not. And the son of the King of the Jinn said, We have traversed a space of a year's journey to him who travelleth with diligence. So the young man wondered thereat, and asked, How shall I return to my family? The other answered, This is not thine affair: it is my affair; and when thou shalt have recovered from thy misfortune, thou shalt return to thy family in less time than the twinkling of an eye; for to accomplish that will be to me easy. And the young man, on hearing these words from the Jinnee, almost flew with excessive delight: he thought that the event was a result of confused dreams, and said, Extolled be the perfection of Him who is able to restore the wretched, and render him prosperous! They ceased not to proceed until morning, when they arrived at a verdant, bright land, with tall trees, and warbling birds, and gardens of surpassing beauty, and fair palaces; and thereupon the son of the King of the Jinn alighted from his courser, commanding the young man also to dismount. He therefore dismounted, and the Jinnee took him by the hand, and they entered one of those palaces, where the young man beheld an exalted King and a Sultán of great dignity, and he remained with him that day, eating and drinking, until the approach of night. Then the son of the King of the Jinn arose and mounted his courser, and the son of the King of men mounted with him, and they went forth and proceeded during the night with diligence until morning; and, lo, they came to a black land, not inhabited, abounding with black rocks and stones, as though it were a part of Hell; whereupon the son of the King of men said to the Jinnee, What is the appellation of this land? And he answered, It is called the Dusky Land, and belongeth to one of the Kings of the Jinn, whose name is Zu-l-Jenáheyn: none of the Kings can attack him, nor doth any one enter his territory unless by his permission; so stop in thy place while I ask his permission. Accordingly the young man stopped, and the Jinnee was absent from him for a while, and then returned to him; and they ceased not to proceed until they came to a spring flowing from black mountains; when the Jinnee said to the young man, Alight. He therefore alighted from his courser, and the Jinnee said to him, Drink of this spring. And the young man drank of it, and immediately became again a male, as he was at first, by the power of God (whose name be exalted!); whereat he rejoiced with great joy, not to be exceeded. And he said to the Jinnee, O my brother, what is the name of this spring? The Jinnee answered, It is called the Spring of the Women; no woman drinketh of it but she becometh a man: therefore praise God and thank him for thy restoration, and mount thy courser. So the King's son prostrated himself, thanking God, whose name be exalted!

Then he mounted, and they journeyed with diligence during the rest of the day until they had returned to the land of that Jinnee; and the young man passed the night in his abode in the most comfortable manner; after which they ate and drank until the next night, when the son of the King of the Jinn said to him, Dost thou desire to return to thy family this night? The young man answered, Yes. So the son of the King of the Jinn called one of his father's slaves, whose name was Rájiz, and said to him, Take this young man hence, and carry him upon thy shoulders, and let not the dawn overtake him before he is with his father-in-law and his wife. The slave replied, I hear and obey, and with feelings of love and honour will I do it. Then the slave absented himself from him for a while and approached in the form of an 'Efreet: and when the young man saw him, his reason fled, and he was stupefied; but the son of the King of the Jinn said to him, no harm shall befall thee. Mount thy courser, and on it ascend upon his shoulders. — The young man however replied, Nay, I will mount alone upon his shoulders, and leave the courser with thee. He then alighted from the courser, and mounted upon the slave's shoulders; and the son of the King of the Jinn said to him, Close thine eyes. So he closed his eyes; and the slave flew with him between heaven and earth, and ceased not to fly along with him, while the young man was unconscious; and the last third of the night came not before he was on the top of the palace of his father-in-law, whereupon the 'Efreet said to him, Alight. He therefore alighted: and he said to him, Open thine eyes; for this is the palace of thy father-in-law and his daughter. Then he left him and departed. And as soon as the day shone, and the alarm of the young man subsided, he descended from the roof of the palace; and when his father-in-law beheld him, he rose to him and met him, wondering at seeing him descend from the top of the palace, and he said to him, We see other men come through the doors; but thou comest down from the sky. The young man replied, What God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!) desired hath happened. And when the sun rose, his father-in-law ordered his Wezeer to prepare great banquets, and the wedding was celebrated; the young man remained there two months, and then departed with his wife to the city of his father. But as to the cousin of the damsel, he perished by reason of his jealousy and envy.

Next, the Fourth Wezeer relates a story of a bath-keeper and his wife and a young man: but this must be passed over. He then tells a story of which the following is a very brief abstract:—

A young and beautiful and virtuous wife was corrupted by an old woman, and sent her to bring a young man who was enamoured of her. But the old woman, being unable to find the lover at the time appointed, brought another man, whom she knew not, and this happened to be the damsel's husband, who had been on a journey. She conducted him into the saloon, and when the wife came in, and her eye fell upon her husband, she quickly had recourse to a stratagem. Pulling off her khuff from her foot she said to her husband, Not thus is our mutual vow observed! How is it that thou deceivest me, and actest with me in this manner? When I had heard of thine arrival I tried thee by means of this old woman, and I have caused thee to fall into that against which I cautioned thee, and have certified myself of thy conduct, and that thou hast violated the vow that was between me and thee. Before now I imagined that thou wast chaste, until I beheld thee with mine eye with this old woman, and found that thou frequentest women of bad character.—Then she began to beat him with the khuff upon his head, while he declared himself to be innocent of the offence, and swore to her that he had never deceived her during the course of his life. But she still beat him, and wept and cried out, saying, Come to me, O Muslims! So he held her mouth with his hand, and she bit it; and he humbled himself to her, kissing her hands and her feet. And after she had continued some time longer slapping him, she made a sign to the old woman that she should withhold her hand from him. The old woman therefore came to her, and proceeded to kiss her hands and her feet until she made them both sit down; when the husband kissed the old woman's hand, and said to her, May God recompense thee with every thing good, for thy having delivered me from her! And the old woman wondered at the artifice of the wife.

On the fifth day, the Damsel comes in to the King with a cup of poison in her hand, threatening to destroy herself with it if he gratify not her revenge; and she relates a story of which an abridgement is here inserted.

A certain amorous goldsmith saw upon a wall of a chamber in the house of a friend a picture of a most beautiful damsel, and was smitten by it with so violent a passion that he fell sick and was at the point of destruction. But learning that the damsel of whom it was a portrait was a singing-girl belonging to one of the Wezeers, and that she was in the city of Kashmeer, he encouraged himself, and journeyed thither, from Persia, where he resided. On his arrival there, he inquired of a perfumer respecting the character of the King, and was informed that he was a just monarch, hating nothing in the world except enchanter, and that every enchanter or enchantress who fell into his hand he cast into a pit outside the city, and left to die of hunger. Then the goldsmith questioned the perfumer respecting the King's wezeers; and the latter informed him of the character of each Wezeer until he mentioned the singing-girl, and he told him that she was with such a Wezeer. So the goldsmith waited after that some days, till he had contrived a stratagem; and during a night of rain and thunder and stormy winds, he took with him a band of robbers, and repaired to the mansion of the Wezeer who was the owner of the damsel. He attached a ladder with grappling-irons, and ascended to the roof of the palace, and thence he descended into its court, where he beheld all the female slaves sleeping, each upon her couch; and he saw a couch of alabaster, whereon was a damsel like the full moon. He approached her, and seated himself at her head, and removed the covering from her. It was a covering of gold stuff; and at her head was a candle, and at her feet a candle, each in a candlestick of brilliant gold, and these two candles were of ambergris; and beneath the cushion was a box of silver, containing all her ornaments, covered, and placed at her head. And thereupon he took forth a knife, and struck her upon the hip, making a manifest wound. So the damsel awoke in terror; but when she saw him, she feared to cry out; wherefore she was silent, imagining that he desired to take the ornaments. She then said to him, Take the box and what is in it. The slaughter of me will not profit thee; and I throw myself upon thy protection and thy generosity!—The man therefore took the box with its contents, and departed.

And on the following morning he took the box in which were the ornaments, and, going in with it to the King of the city, kissed the ground before him, and said to him, O King, I am a man who would give thee good counsel. I am of the country of Khurásán, and have come a refugee unto thy majesty, on account of the fame of thy good qualities and thy justice to thy subjects: wherefore I desired to be under thy banner. I arrived at this city at the close of the day, and found the gate shut: so I slept outside it; and while I was between sleeping and waking, lo, I saw four women, one of them riding upon a broom and one of them riding upon a fan. I therefore knew, O King, that they were enchantresses who would enter thy city; and one of them drew near to me, and kicked me with her foot, and beat me with the tail of a fox that was in her hand, and pained me: so passion seized me by reason of the blow, and I struck her with a knife that was with me, wounding her hip, as she turned her back in flight. And when I wounded her, she fled away before me, and there fell from her this box with its contents; and I took it and opened it, whereupon I saw in it these precious ornaments. Therefore take thou it; for I have no need of it, as I am a wanderer about the mountains, and have rejected the world from my heart, and forsaken it with what it containeth, seeking to behold the face of God, whose name be exalted! — Then he left the box before the King, and departed; and when he had gone forth, the King opened the box, and, having taken out all the ornaments from it, began to turn them over, and found among them a necklace which he had bestowed upon the Wezeer, the master of the damsel. So the King summoned the Wezeer; and when he came before him, he said to him, This is the necklace that I presented to thee. And as soon the the Wezeer saw it, he knew it, and said to the King, Yes; and I presented it to a singing-girl in my abode. The King therefore said to him, Bring to me the damsel immediately. And he brought her; and when she came before the King, he said to her master, Uncover her hip, and see if there be a wound upon it, or not. Accordingly the Wezeer uncovered it, and saw upon it a wound inflicted by a knife: so he said to the King, Yes, O my lord: there is a wound upon it. And the King thereupon said to the Wezeer, This is an enchantress, as the devotee told me, without doubt. Then he gave orders to put her into the pit of the enchanters; and they sent her thither that day.

Therefore when the night came, and the goldsmith knew that his stratagem was accomplished, he went to the guard of the pit, having in his hand a purse containing a thousand pieces of gold; and he sat with the guard conversing until the expiration of the first third of the night, when he said to him, Know, O my brother, that this damsel is innocent of this crime which they have laid to her charge, and it was I who caused her to fall into the calamity. And he related to him the story from beginning to end; after which he said to him, O my brother, Take this purse; for in it are a thousand pieces of gold; and give me the damsel, that I may journey with her to my country; for these pieces of gold will be more profitable to thee than the imprisonment of the damsel. Obtain our recompense, and we both will offer prayers in thy favour for prosperity and safety. — And when he heard his words, he wondered extremely at this stratagem and its accomplishment. He then took the purse with its contents, and left the damsel to him, binding him not to remain with her in the city a single hour. So the goldsmith took her immediately, and departed, and he journeyed with diligence until he arrived at his country, having attained his desire.

The Fifth Wezeer then enters, and relates the following story of “the man who never laughed for the rest of his life:” —

“There was a man, of those possessed of houses and riches, who had wealth and servants and slaves and other possessions; and he departed from the world to receive the mercy of God (whose name be exalted!), leaving a young son. And when the son grew up, he took to eating and drinking, and the hearing of instruments of music, and songs, and was liberal, and gave gifts, and expended the riches that his father had left to him until all the wealth had gone. He then betook himself to the sale of the male black slaves and the female slaves, and other possessions, and expended all that he had of his father's wealth and other things, and became so poor that he worked with the labourers. In this state he remained for a period of years; and while he was sitting one day beneath a wall, waiting to see who would hire him, lo, a man of comely countenance and apparel drew near to him and saluted him. So the youth said to him, O uncle, hast thou known me before now? The man answered him, I have not known thee, O my son, at all; but I see the traces of affluence upon thee, though thou art in this condition. The young man replied, O uncle, what fate and destiny have ordained hath come to pass. But hast thou, O uncle, O comely-faced, any business in which to employ me?—And the man said to him, O my son, I desire to employ thee in an easy business. The youth asked, And what is it, O uncle? And the man answered him, I have with me ten sheykhs in one abode, and we have no one to perform our wants. Thou shalt receive from us, of food and clothing, what will suffice thee, and shalt serve us, and thou shalt receive of us thy portion of benefits and money. Perhaps, also, God will restore to thee thine affluence by our means.—The youth therefore replied, I hear and obey. The sheykh then said to him, I have a condition to impose upon thee.—And what is thy condition, O uncle? asked the youth. He answered him, O my son, it is, that thou keep our secret with respect to the things that thou shalt see us do; and when thou seest us weep, that thou ask us not respecting the cause of our weeping. And the young man replied, Well, O uncle.

“So the sheykh said to him, O my son, come with us, relying on the blessing of God, whose name be exalted! And the young man followed the sheykh until the latter conducted him to the bath, when he took him into it, and caused the hardened dirt to be removed from his person; after which he sent a man, who brought him a comely garment of linen, and he clad him with it, and went with him to his abode and his associates. And when the young man entered, he found it to be a high mansion, with lofty angles, ample, with chambers facing one another, and saloons; and in each saloon was a fountain of water, and birds were warbling over it, and there were windows overlooking, on every side, a beautiful garden within that mansion. The sheykh conducted him into one of the chambers, and he found it decorated with coloured marbles, and found its ceiling decorated with ultramarine and brilliant gold, and it was spread with carpets of silk; and he found in it ten sheykhs sitting facing one another, wearing the garments of mourning, weeping and wailing. So the young man wondered at their case, and was about to question the sheykh [who had brought him]; but he remembered the condition, and therefore withheld his tongue. Then the sheykh committed to the young man a chest containing thirty thousand pieces of gold, saying to him, O my son, expend upon us out of this chest, and upon thyself, according to what is just, and be thou faithful, and take care of that wherewith I have intrusted thee. And the young man replied, I hear and obey. He continued to expend upon them for a period of days and nights; after which, one of them died; whereupon his companions took him, and washed him and shrouded him, and buried him in a garden behind the mansion. And death ceased not to take of them one after another, until there remained only the sheykh who had hired the young man: so he remained with the young man in that mansion, and there was not with them a third, and they remained thus for a period of years. Then the sheykh fell sick; and when the young man despaired of his life, he addressed him with courtesy, and was grieved for him, and said to him, O uncle, I have served you, and not failed in your service one hour for a period of twelve years, but acted faithfully to you, and served you according to my power and ability. The sheykh replied, Yes, O my son, thou hast served us until these sheykhs have been taken unto God (to whom be ascribed might and glory!), and we must inevitably die. And the young man said, O my master, thou art in a state of peril, and I desire of thee that thou inform me what hath been the cause of your weeping, and the continuance of your wailing and your mourning and your sorrow. He replied, O my son, thou hast no concern with that, and require me not to do what I am unable to do; for I have begged God (whose name be exalted!) not to afflict any one with my affliction. Now if thou desire to be safe from that into which we have fallen, open not that door (and he pointed to it with his hand, and cautioned him against it); and if thou desire that what hath befallen us should befall thee, open it, and thou wilt know the cause of that which thou hast beheld in our conduct; but thou wilt repent, when repentance will not avail thee.—Then the illness increased upon the sheykh, and he died; and the young man washed him with his own hand, and shrouded him, and buried him by his companions.

“He remained in that place, which with its contents was sealed; but notwithstanding this, he was uneasy, reflecting upon the conduct of the sheykhs. And while he was meditating one day upon the words of the sheykh, and his charge to him not to open the door, it occurred to his mind that he might look at it. So he went in that direction, and searched until he saw an elegant door, over which the spider had woven its webs, and upon it were four locks of steel; and when he beheld it, he remembered the action against which the sheykh had cautioned him, and departed from it. His soul desired him to open the door, and he restrained it, during a period of seven days; but on the eighth day, his soul overcame him, and he said, I must open that door, and see what will happen to me in consequence; for nothing will repel what God (whose name be exalted!) decreeth and predestineth, and no event will happen but by his will. Accordingly he arose, and opened the door, after he had broken the locks; and when he had opened the door, he saw a narrow passage, along which he walked for the space of three hours; and, lo, he came forth upon the bank of a great river. At this the young man wondered; and he walked along that bank, looking to the right and left; and, behold, a great eagle had descended from the sky, and, taking up the young man with its talons, it flew with him between heaven and earth, until it conveyed him to an island in the midst of the sea, and it threw him down upon it, and departed from him.

"So the young man was perplexed at his case, not knowing whither to go; but while he was sitting one day, lo, the sail of a vessel appeared to him upon the sea, like the star in the sky; wherefore the heart of the young man became intent upon the vessel, in the hope that his escape might be effected in it. He continued looking at it until it came near unto him; and when it arrived, he beheld a bark of ivory and ebony; the oars of which were of sandal-wood and aloes-wood, and the whole of it was encased with plates of brilliant gold. There were also in it ten damsels, virgins, like moons; and when the damsels saw him, they landed to him from the bark, and kissed his hands, saying to him, Thou art the King, the bridegroom. Then there advanced to him a damsel who was like the shining sun in the clear sky, having in her hand a kerchief of silk, in which were a royal robe, and a crown of gold set with varieties of jacinths; and having advanced to him, she clad him and crowned him; after which the other damsels carried him upon their arms to that bark, and he found in it varieties of carpets of silk of divers colours. They then spread the sails, and proceeded over the abysses of the sea.—Now when I proceeded with them, says the young man, I felt sure that this was a dream, and knew not whither they were going with me. And when they came in sight of the land, I beheld it filled with troops, the number of which none knew but God (whose perfection be extolled, and whose name be exalted!), clad in coats of mail. They brought forward to me five marked horses, with saddles of gold set with varieties of pearls and precious stones; and I took a horse from among these, and mounted it. The four others proceeded with me; and when I mounted, the ensigns and banners were set up over my head, the drums and the cymbals were beaten, and the troops disposed themselves in two divisions, right and left. I wavered in opinion as to whether I were asleep or awake, and ceased not to advance, not believing in the reality of my stately procession, but imagining that it was a result of confused dreams, until we came in sight of a verdant meadow, in which were palaces and gardens, and trees and rivers and flowers, and birds proclaiming the perfection of God, the One, the Omnipotent. And now there came forth an army from among those palaces and gardens, like the torrent when it poureth down, until it filled that meadow; and when the troops drew near to me, they halted; and, lo, a King advanced from among them, riding alone, preceded by some of his chief officers walking.

"The King, on approaching the young man, alighted from his courser; and the young man, seeing him do so, alighted also; and they saluted each other with the most courteous salutation. Then they mounted their horses again, and the King said to the young man, Accompany us; for thou art my guest. So the young man proceeded with him, and they conversed together, while the stately trains in orderly disposition went on before them to the palace of the King, where they alighted, and all of them entered the palace, together with the King and the young man, the young man's hand being in the hand of the King, who thereupon seated him on a throne of gold, and seated himself by him. And when the King removed the lithám from his face, lo, this supposed King was a damsel, like the shining sun in the clear sky, a lady of beauty and loveliness, and elegance and perfection, and conceit and amorous dissimulation. The young man beheld vast affluence and great prosperity, and wondered at the beauty and loveliness of the damsel. Then the damsel said to him, Know, O King, that I am the Queen of this land, and all these troops that thou hast seen, including every one, whether of cavalry or infantry, are women: there are not among them any men. The men among us, in this land, till and sow and reap, employing themselves in the cultivation of the land, and the building and repairing of the towns, and in attending to the affairs of the people by the pursuit of every kind of art and trade; but as to the women, they are the governors and magistrates and soldiers. — And the young man wondered at this extremely. And while they were thus conversing, the Wezeer entered; and, lo, she was a gray-haired old woman, having a numerous retinue, of venerable and dignified appearance; and the Queen said to her, Bring to us the Kádee and the witnesses. So the old woman went for that purpose; and the Queen turned towards the young man, conversing with him, and cheering him, and dispelling his fear by kind words, and, addressing him courteously, she said to him, Art thou content for me to be thy wife? And thereupon he arose and kissed the ground before her; but she forbade him; and he replied, O my mistress, I am less than the servants who serve thee. She then said to him, Seest thou not these servants and soldiers, and wealth and treasures and hoards? He answered her, Yes. And she said to him, All these are at thy disposal; thou shalt make use of them, and give and bestow, as seemeth fit to thee. Then she pointed to a closed door, and said to him, All these things thou shalt dispose of; but this door thou shalt not open; for if thou open it, thou wilt repent, when repentance will not avail thee. And her words were not ended when the Wezeereh, with the Kádee and the witnesses, entered, and all of them were old women, with their hair spreading over their shoulders, and of venerable and dignified appearance; and when they came before the Queen, she ordered them to perform the ceremony of the marriage-contract. So they married her to the young man; and she prepared the banquets and collected the troops; and when they had eaten and drunk, the young man took her as his wife; and he resided with her seven years, passing the most delightful and most comfortable and most agreeable and most sweet life.

“But he meditated one day upon opening the door, and said, Were it not that there are within it great treasures, better than what I have seen, she had not prohibited me from opening it. He then arose, and opened the door; and, lo, within it was the bird that had carried him from the shore of the great river and deposited him upon the island; and when the bird beheld him, it said to him, No welcome to a face that will never be happy! So when he saw it, and heard its words, he fled from it; but it followed him, and carried him off, and flew with him between heaven and earth for the space of an hour, and deposited him in the place from which it had carried him away; after which it disappeared from him. He thereupon sat in that place, and, returning to his reason, he reflected upon what he had seen of affluence and glory and honour, and the riding of the troops before him, and commanding and forbidding; and he wept and wailed. He remained upon the shore of the great river, where that bird had put him, for the space of two months, wishing that he might return to his wife; but while he was one night awake, mourning and meditating, a speaker spoke (and he heard his voice, but saw not his person), calling out, How great were the delights! Far, far from thee is the return of what is past! And how many therefore will be the sighs! — So when the young man heard it, he despaired of meeting again that Queen, and of the return to him of the affluence in which he had been living. He then entered the mansion where the sheykhs had resided, and knew that they had experienced the like of that which had happened unto him, and that this was the cause of their weeping and their mourning; wherefore he excused them thereupon. Grief and anxiety came upon the young man, and he entered his chamber, and ceased not to weep and moan, relinquishing food and drink, and pleasant scents, and laughter, until he died; and he was buried by the side of the sheykhs.”

On the sixth day, the Damsel presents herself before the King with a drawn knife in her hand, threatening to stab herself if he persist in sparing his son, and tells a tale of a King's son who was enamoured of the wife of a jealous merchant, and caused himself to be conveyed into her abode in a chest. She also relates a story of a slave who inveigled his master's wife by pretending to understand the language of birds. Then enters the Sixth Wezeer, who tells two humorous but gross stories. The former of these is similar to the “Story of the Lady of Cairo and her Four Gallants” in Scott's version: in some respects more humorous, but in others less so, and related in such a manner that I must omit it. The latter differs little, except in its abominable grossness, from a tale familiar to us from childhood: it is the tale of the Three Wishes. — On the Seventh day, the Damsel, for the last time, tries the influence of her tales upon the King. Having lighted a great fire, and declared to him her determination to cast herself into it if he avenge her not upon his son, she relates to him three tales; but they are of little interest, and therefore here but slightly noticed. The first is similar to the story of the Maid and the Magpie. The wife of a king, while bathing, left a valuable necklace under the care of a holy woman; and while the latter was praying, a bird carried off the necklace, and hid it in a crevice in a wall of the palace. The King accused the holy woman of the theft, and tortured and imprisoned her; but afterwards discovered his error.—The second tale is of two pigeons, a male and a female, who stored up some wheat and barley in their nest for the days of winter. During the summer, the grains, drying, appeared less in number; and the male bird accused his mate of having eaten of them, and killed her. In the winter, however, the grains recovered their original size, and he was convinced that he had killed her unjustly, and pined away until he died.—The third tale is of a King's daughter, named Ed-Detmâ, a damsel of unequalled beauty, who (like several heroines of Arab and of European romances) refused to marry any man that could not overcome her in single combat. Each suitor whom she vanquished she despoiled of his horse and arms and apparel, and branded on the forehead with the words, This is the freedman of Ed-Detmâ. A Persian prince, named Bahrâm, engaged her, and was on the point of overcoming her, when she displayed her face, and he was so confounded by her beauty, that his energy failed him, and he was unhorsed and branded. But afterwards, by a stratagem, he inveigled her in her garden, and, with her consent, carried her off.—After the relation of these tales, the Seventh Wezeer enters, and narrates the story of the Old Woman and the Son of the Merchant, of which the following is an abstract:—

The son of a wealthy merchant journeyed to Baghdád, and selected for his residence a magnificent mansion; but its door-keeper informed him that every one who lodged in it remained there no more than a week, or two weeks, and came not forth from it, without being either sick or dead; in consequence of which its monthly rent was only ten pieces of gold. On hearing this, the young man reflected, and, having sought refuge with God from Satan the accursed, and dismissed apprehension from his mind, he took up his abode in it, and sold and bought; and some days passed over him without there befalling him any thing of the kind mentioned to him by that door-keeper. "But as he was sitting one day at the door of the house, there passed by him a gray-haired old woman, like the speckled, black and white, serpent: she was uttering many ejaculations expressive of the perfection and holiness of God, and removing the stones and other hurtful things from the way; and, seeing the youth sitting at the door, she looked at him, and wondered at his case. So he said to her, O woman, dost thou know me, or dost thou doubt of me whether I be, or be not, some one whom thou knowest? And when she heard his words, she walked quickly up to him, and saluted him, saying to him, How long hast thou been residing in this house? He answered her, O my mother, a period of two months. And she said, At this I wonder; for I, O my son, know thee not, nor dost thou know me, nor did I doubt of thee whether thou wert some one known to me or not, but I wondered because no one but thyself inhabiteth this house without coming forth from it either dead or sick; and I doubt not but that thou, O my son, art exposing thy youth to peril. Hast thou not ascended to the top of the pavilion, nor looked from the mandharah that is in it?—Then the old woman went her way; and when she had parted from him, the youth meditated upon her words, and said within himself, I have not ascended to the top of the pavilion, and know not that there is in it a mandharah. And thereupon he entered immediately, and began to search about the corners of the house, until he saw in a corner of it an elegant door, over which the spider had woven its webs among the trees. So when he saw it, he said within himself, Probably the spider hath not woven its webs over this door but because death is within it. But he placed his reliance upon [the efficacy of uttering] the saying of God (whose name be exalted!), say, Nothing shall befall us but what God hath decreed for us. He then opened that door, and ascended a flight of elegant stairs until he came to the top, when he saw a mandharah, and he seated himself in it to rest and divert himself, and beheld an elegant, clean abode, on the top of which was a lofty mak'ad overlooking the whole of Baghdád, and in that mak'ad was a damsel like a Hooreeyeh. She took possession of his whole heart, and deprived him of his reason and understanding, occasioning him the malady of Eiyooob, and the grief of Yaakoob. When the youth, therefore, beheld her, and viewed her exactly, he said within himself, Probably the people say that no one dwelleth in this mansion without dying or falling sick on account of this damsel; and would that I knew how my deliverance may be effected; for my reason hath departed."

He then descended, and seated himself again at the door; and, lo, the old woman passed by as before. So when the youth saw her, he rose upon his feet, greeted her first with salutation and compliments, and said to her, O my mother, I was in prosperity and health until thou advisedst me to open the door, and I have seen the mandharah and opened it, and, looking from it, I beheld what stupefied me. I imagine now that I am about to perish, and I know that there is no physician for me except thee.—And when she heard him, she laughed, and replied, No harm shall befall thee, if it be the will of God. So the youth arose, and entered the house, and brought out to her, in his sleeve, a hundred pieces of gold, which he gave to her; and she desired him to go to the silk-market, to inquire for the shop of Abu-l-Fet-h the son of Keydám (the husband of the damsel), and to purchase of him the most beautiful face-veil in his possession. Accordingly, on the following morning, he purchased the veil, for which he gave fifty pieces of gold, and he returned happy to his residence. The old woman then came again, and he gave her the veil; whereupon she took a live coal, and burnt with it the edge of the veil; after which, she folded it up, and went with it to the house of Abu-l-Fet-h. Being acquainted with the mother of the damsel, she obtained admission by pretending that she desired to perform the ablution and to pray; and while the damsel was inadvertent, she put the veil under a cushion of the mattress upon which the husband usually sat, and departed. And at the close of the day, the merchant came home, and seated himself upon the mattress; and after he had eaten, he reclined upon the cushion, and, lo, the edge of the veil appeared from beneath it. So when he saw it, he knew it, and conceived an evil suspicion of the damsel. He therefore called her, and said to her, Whence came to thee this veil? And she swore to him that no man had come to her but himself; whereupon he was silent, fearing to be publicly disgraced; for he was accustomed to sit with the Khaleefeh. He then said to the damsel, It hath been told me that thy mother is lying sick, from a pain in her heart, and that all the women are with her, weeping for her: so I desire thee to go forth to her. Accordingly she went to her mother; but when she entered the house, she found her mother well; and soon after, the porters came to her, bringing all her things from the merchant's house. Her mother therefore asked her what had happened to her; and she denied having offended; and the mother wept and mourned for the separation of her daughter from that man.

Then, some days after this, the old woman came to the damsel, and saluted her, expressing the longing she had felt to see her again, and said to her, What is the matter with thee, O my daughter, O my beloved? Thou hast disturbed my mind.—And she went in to the damsel's mother, and said to her, O my sister, what is the news, and what is the story of the damsel with her husband; for it hath been told me that he hath divorced her? What offence then hath she committed that requireth all this?—The damsel's mother replied, Perhaps her husband will return to her by means of the blessing attendant upon thee: so pray for her, O my sister; for thou fastest much, and art up all thy night [in prayer].—And after this, the old woman repaired to the young man, and desired him to make ready for the reception of the damsel. She then returned to the damsel's mother, and said to her, O my sister, we are celebrating a wedding-festivity; so send the damsel with me, that she may divert herself, and that her anxiety and grief may be dispelled: then I will bring her back to thee as I took her from thee. The damsel's mother therefore arose, and clad her in the richest of her apparel, adorning her with the best of her ornaments and attire, and the damsel went forth with the old woman. Her mother went with her to the door, and charged the old woman, saying to her, Beware of suffering any man of the creatures of God (whose name be exalted!) to see her; for thou knowest the station of her husband with the Khaleefeh; and delay not; but return with her as soon as possible. So the old woman took her to the residence of the young man; the damsel imagining that it was the house where the wedding was celebrated; and when the damsel entered the house, and saw the young man, she was amazed at his beauty, and easily consented to his taking her as his wife.—But she was eventually taken back to her mother's house, and restored to her former husband by means of a stratagem contrived by the old woman, and thus put in practice.

The young man repaired to the shop of the merchant Abu-l-Fet-h and seated himself with him; and, lo, the old woman passed by the shop, having in her hand a string of beads, with which she was telling her ejaculations in praise of God; whereupon the young man arose and pulled her by her clothes, and began to revile her and abuse her, while she, addressing him with courtesy, said to him, O my son, thou art excused. So the people of the market assembled around them, saying, What is the matter? And the young man answered, O people, I purchased of this merchant a veil for fifty pieces of gold, and my slave-girl wore it for one hour, and sat fumigating it; and there flew forth a spark, which burned its edge; wherefore we delivered it to this old woman, that she might give it to some one who should darn it, and return it to us; but from that time we have never seen her until now. The old woman then said, This youth hath spoken truth. Yes, I took it of him, and went with it into one of the houses that I am accustomed to enter, and left it by mistake in some place in one of those houses; but know not where it is; and being a poor woman, I feared its owner, and did not face him.—So when the merchant Abu-l-Fet-h heard this, he begged God's forgiveness of his faults and suspicion, and said to the old woman, Dost thou enter our abode? She answered him, O my son, I do enter thine abode, and the abodes of others, for the sake of alms; and from that day, no one hath given me tidings of the veil. The merchant said to her, Hast thou asked any one respecting it in our house? She answered, O my master, I went to the house and inquired; but they said to me, The merchant hath divorced the lady of the house. So I returned, and asked not any one after that to the present day.—And thereupon the merchant looked towards the young man, and said to him, Let this old woman go; for the veil is in my possession. And he took it forth from the shop, and gave it to the darning woman before the people who were present. Then he went to the damsel, gave her some money, and took her again as his wife, after he had made abundant excuses to her, and begged God's forgiveness, not knowing what the old woman had done.

The same Wezeer then tells the story of the damsel kept by an 'Efreet in a box, nearly as related in the Introduction to this work; and the King thereupon determines that he will not kill his son. On the eighth day, the King's son, being no longer withheld from speaking by the foreseen danger, goes in to the King, and, in most eloquent words, praises his father and his Wezeers, and the lords of his empire, and thanks them. And the King says to his Wezeers, If I had killed my son, would the crime have been on me or on the damsel or on the instructor Es-Sindibád? But the persons present are silent. And Es-Sindibád says to the youth, Give the answer, O my son. So the King's son says,—

"I have heard that a guest alighted at the house of a certain merchant, who thereupon sent his slave-girl to purchase for him from the market some milk in a jar. And she took the milk in her jar, desiring to return to the house of her master; but while she was on her way, there passed over her a kite flying with a serpent in its talons, and pressing it with them; and there dropped a drop of poison from the serpent into the jar, without the girl's knowing it. So when she came to the house, the master took from her the milk, and drank of it, he and his guests; and the milk had not settled in their stomachs before they all died."

See then, O King (adds the youth), whose was the fault in this case.—One of the persons present says, The fault was on the part of those who drank the milk. Another says, The fault was on the part of the damsel, who left the jar uncovered. But Es-Sindibád desires the young man to give his opinion, and the latter says, They have erred: the fault was not on the part of the damsel, nor of the people who drank; for the terms of their lives had expired, with their means of subsistence, and their death was decreed to be effected by means of that event.—Upon this, the persons present wonder extremely at the youth, and declare him to be unequalled in wisdom. He, however, replies, that a blind sheykh, and a boy three years old, and a boy five years old, were wiser than he, as shewn by three stories which he relates. The first is this:—

"There was a certain merchant, who possessed great riches, and had travelled much to all cities, and, desiring again to journey to a city, he inquired of those who had come from it, and said to them, What merchandise is productive of great gain there? And they answered him, Sandal-wood; for it is there sold at a dear price. The merchant therefore purchased sandal-wood with all the money that he had, and journeyed to that city. Now when he arrived there, it was the close of the day; and, lo, there was an old woman driving some sheep belonging to her; and on her seeing the merchant, she said to him, Who art thou, O man? He answered her,

I am a merchant, a stranger. And she said to him, Beware of the inhabitants of the city; for they are cheats and thieves: they deceive the stranger that they may overcome him and eat what he hath with him: and I have given thee good advice. Then she departed from him. And when the morning came, a man of the inhabitants of the city met him, and saluted him and said to him, O my master, whence hast thou come? He answered him, I have come from such a city. And the man said, What merchandise hast thou brought with thee? He answered, Sandal-wood; for I have heard that it is of value with you. But the man of the city said, He hath erred who advised thee to do so; for we burn not beneath the cooking-pot any thing but that sandal-wood, and the value of it is with us the same as that of common firewood. And when the merchant heard the words of that man, he sighed and repented; but wavered between believing and disbelieving. He then alighted at one of the Kháns of the city, and made a fire of sandal-wood beneath the cooking-pot. So when that man saw him, he said to him, Wilt thou sell this sandal-wood for a sáa of whatsoever thy soul shall desire? The merchant answered him, I sell it thee. The man therefore removed all the sandal-wood that the merchant had, and deposited it in his own abode; and the seller purposed to take gold. And on the following morning, the merchant walked in the city, and there met him a blue-eyed man, of the inhabitants of that city: this man had lost one eye, and he laid hold upon the merchant, saying to him, Thou art the person who deprived me of my eye, and I will never let thee go. So the merchant denied that, and replied, This cannot be established. And the people collected around them, and asked the one-eyed man to grant the other a delay until the morrow, when the latter should give him the price of his eye; wherefore the merchant appointed a person to be his guarantee, and so they let him go. Then the merchant went away; and his shoe was rent in consequence of the dragging of the one-eyed man. He therefore stopped at the shop of a cobbler, and gave it to him, saying to him, Repair it, and thou shalt receive of me what will please thee. He then departed from him; and, lo, there were some people sitting playing; and he seated himself with them, by reason of his anxiety and grief, and they asked him to play. So he played with them, and they overcame him, and, having done so, gave him his choice, either to drink up the sea, or else to disburse the whole of his wealth; whereupon he arose and said to them, Allow me a delay until to-morrow.

"He went away, grieved for that which he had done, and not knowing what would be the result of his case. So he sat in a place, meditating, sorrowful, anxious; and, lo, the old woman passed by him, and, looking towards him, she said to him, Probably the people of the city have overcome thee; for I see thee anxious on account of that which hath befallen thee. He therefore related to her all that had happened from first to last; and she said to him, Who is he who hath cheated thee in the affair of the sandal-wood; for with us the value of every pound of sandal-wood is ten pieces of gold? But I will contrive for thee a plan, by means of which I hope thy deliverance may be effected; and it is this: that thou go towards such a gate; for in that place is a blind sheykh, who is deprived of the use of his legs, and he is wise, knowing, old, skilful. All the people visit him, asking him respecting what they will, and he pointeth out to them what will be advisable for them; for he is acquainted with artifice and enchantment and tricking. He is a sharper, and the sharpers meet at his abode by night. Therefore go thou thither, and hide thyself from thine offenders, so that thou mayest hear their words and they may not see thee; for he will acquaint them with the case in which one overcometh and that in which one is overcome. Probably thou wilt hear from him the mention of a subterfuge that may deliver thee from thine offenders.

"So the merchant departed from her to the place of which she had told him, and hid himself. He then looked at the sheykh, and seated himself near unto him; and there had not elapsed more than a short time when there came his party, who resorted to him as their judge. On their coming before the sheykh, they saluted him and each other, and seated themselves around him; and when the merchant saw them, he found his four offenders among the number of those who were present. The sheykh caused some food to be placed before them, and they ate; after which, each of them related his story of the events that had happened to him during the past day. The buyer of the sandal-wood advanced, and informed the sheykh of that which had happened to him that day; that he had bought sandal-wood of a man for less than its value; and that the sale had been settled between them on the condition of his giving the measure of a sáa of whatsoever the seller should desire. Upon this the sheykh said to him, Thine adversary hath overcome thee. The man asked, How can he overcome me? The sheykh replied, If he say to thee, I will take the measure in gold or silver—wilt thou give it him? The man said, Yes, I will give it him, and I shall be the gainer. But the sheykh rejoined, And if he say to thee, I will take the measure of a sâa of fleas, half males and half females—what wilt thou do? So the man knew that he was overcome.—Then the one-eyed man advanced, and said, O sheykh, I saw to-day a blue-eyed man, who is a stranger to the country, and I assailed him and laid hold upon him, saying to him, Thou hast deprived me of my eye—and I let him not go until a party had become guarantees that he should return to me and satisfy me for my eye. But the sheykh replied, If he desire to overcome thee, he will overcome thee.—And how, said the man, will he do so? He answered, He may say to thee, Pull out thine eye, and I will pull out my eye, and we will weigh each of them; and if my eye be equal in weight to thine, thou art veracious in that which thou hast asserted. Then thou wilt owe him the fine for his eye, and thou wilt be blind; but he will see with his other eye.—So the man knew that the merchant might overcome him by means of this subterfuge.—Next, the cobbler advanced, and said, O sheykh, I saw to-day a man who gave me his shoe, and said to me, Repair it. Whereupon I said to him, Wilt thou not give me the remuneration? And he answered me, Repair it, and thou shalt receive of me what will please thee. Now nothing will please me but all his wealth.—The sheykh however replied, If he desire to take his shoe from thee and not give thee aught, he may take it.—And how so? said the cobbler. The sheykh answered, He may say to thee, The enemies of the Sultân are defeated, and his opponents have become weak, and his children and his auxiliaries are multiplied. Art thou pleased or not?—If thou say, I am pleased—he will take his shoe from thee and depart: and if thou say, No—he will take his shoe and beat with it thy face and the back of thy neck.—He therefore knew that he was overcome.—Then advanced the man who played with the merchant for a wager, and he said, O sheykh, I found a man, and laid a wager with him and overcame him; whereupon I said to him, If thou drink up this sea, I will give up the whole of my wealth to thee, and if thou drink it not, give thou up the whole of thy wealth to me. The sheykh replied, If he desire to overcome thee, he may overcome thee. The man said, And how so? And the sheykh answered, He may say to thee, Hold for me the mouth of the sea with thy hand, and hand it to me, and I will drink it. And thou wilt not be able: so he will overcome thee by means of this subterfuge.

“When the merchant therefore heard that, he knew what subterfuges to employ against his offenders. Then they arose and left the sheykh, and the merchant departed to his lodging. And when the morning arrived, the man who had laid the bet with him came to him.” The merchant proposed to him what the sheykh had said, and the man released himself by paying him a hundred pieces of gold. Then came the cobbler; and the merchant took his shoe without giving remuneration. Next came the one-eyed man; and he was obliged to conciliate the merchant by giving him a hundred pieces of gold. Lastly came the buyer of the sandal-wood; and this man also was compelled to release himself by paying the merchant a hundred pieces of gold, and returning the wood. The merchant then sold the sandal-wood as he desired, received its price, and journeyed back to his own country.

The tale relating to the boy three years old is unworthy of translation. The other instance of precocious intelligence is thus related:—

“Four merchants were sharers in a sum of a thousand pieces of gold, which they had mixed together, and put into one purse; and they went with it to purchase merchandise, and, finding in their way a beautiful garden, they entered it, and left the purse with a woman who was the keeper of that garden. Having entered, they diverted themselves in a tract of the garden, and ate and drank and were happy; and one of them said, I have with me some perfume. Come, let us wash our heads with this running water; and perfume ourselves.—Another said, We want a comb. And another said, We will ask the keeper: perhaps she hath with her a comb. And upon this, one of them arose and went to the keeper, and said to her, Give me the purse. She replied, When ye all present yourselves, or thy companions order me to give it thee. Now his companions were in a place where the keeper could see them, and she could hear their words. And the man said to his companions, She is not willing to give me aught. So they said to her, Give him. And when she heard their words, she gave him the purse; and he went forth fleeing from them. Therefore when he had wearied them by the length of his absence, they came to the keeper, and said to her, Wherefore didst thou not give him the comb? And she replied, He demanded of me nothing but the purse, and I gave it not to him save with your permission, and he hath departed hence and gone his way. And when they heard the words of the keeper, they slapped their faces, and seized her with their hands, saying to her, We gave thee not permission save to give the comb. She replied, He did not mention to me a comb. And they seized her and took her up to the Kádee; and when they presented themselves before him, they stated to him the case; whereupon he bound the keeper to restore the purse, and bound a number of her debtors to be answerable for her.

"So she went forth perplexed, not knowing her way; and there met her a boy, whose age was five years; and when the boy saw her, thus perplexed, he said to her, What is the matter, O my mother? But she returned him not an answer, despising him on account of the smallness of his age. And he repeated his question to her a first and a second and a third time." So at length she told him what had happened to her. "And the boy said to her, Give me a piece of silver that I may buy some sweetmeat with it, and I will tell thee something by which thine acquittance may be effected. The keeper therefore gave him a piece of silver, asking him, What hast thou to say? And the boy answered her, Return to the Kádee, and say to him, It was agreed between me and them that I should not give them the purse save in the presence of all the four. So the keeper returned to the Kádee, and said to him as the boy had told her; upon which the Kádee said to the three men, Was it thus agreed between you and her? They answered, Yes. And the Kádee said to them, Bring to me your companion and take the purse. Thus the keeper went forth free, no injury befalling her; and she went her way."

The King's son is then highly applauded by all present, and embraced and kissed by his father, who desires him to decide upon the punishment of the Damsel; to kill her, or to do what else he may choose with her. The young man replies, "Banish her from the city."

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-SECOND

NOTE 1. My sheykh supposes "Joodar" to be for "Ju-dhar," which signifies "the young of the wild cow" (a kind of antelope): but it will be seen by a note (No. 45) on a passage near the end of the story, that the appellation of a quarter in Cairo suggested this name to the author, and that the said quarter was not, as he pretends, called after a person named Joodar. Joodar is, however, a proper name, as appears from El-Makreezee; although my sheykh does not seem to have known of it.

NOTE 2. Had the merchant left his property to be divided after his death, and not made a will, his wife would only have inherited one eighth. By will, he might have left to her one third of his property, and she would have inherited besides one eighth of the remainder; but he could not have thus increased the share of a relation without the consent of all the co-heirs.

NOTE 3. My sheykh observes, in a marginal note, that this alludes to bribes, as well as to the legal fees. The bribery practised in Muslim courts of law is notorious. For a striking instance, see my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. i. ch. iv.

NOTE 4. That is, look for the time when vengeance and punishment shall befall the oppressor from God.

NOTE 5. That the word "nufs" (which is omitted in the original) should be here supplied seems evident from the sequel. Respecting the nusf, see Note 17 to Chapter iii., and Note 14, to this chapter.

NOTE 6. See Note 24 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 7. I suppose "karaman," or some similar word, to be here understood, and the meaning to be, "Thou art the superior in generosity to me."

NOTE 8. The word which I have rendered "minnow" is "seereh." My sheykh merely states, that the seereh is "the smallest of fishes;" and I am unable to define its species. It has been differently described by different authors, as may be seen in De Sacy's "Relation de l'Egypte par Abd-allatif," pp. 278-288.

NOTE 9. The Lake of Károon (birket Károon) was at the southern extremity of Cairo, when that city had extended to about its present limits. El-Makreezee sufficiently points out its situation when he says, that the great dike called El-Jisr el-Aazam, which had in his time (early in the fifteenth century) become a great thoroughfare-street, leading from the Kal'at el-Kebsh to the two bridges called Kanátir es-Sibáa, divided this lake from that of the Elephant (Birket el-Feel). The extent which it occupied is doubtful, and its bed, I believe, has long since been entirely filled up.

NOTE 10. Northern Africa west of Egypt is called by the Arabs El-Maghríb and its inhabitants Maghrabees.

NOTE 11. This appellation is very commonly given to Maghrabees in Egypt, because great numbers of them pass through that country every year on pilgrimage.

NOTE 12. See Note 21 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 13. As Cairo contains so great a number of markets, I suppose the market of the Maghrabee merchants to be here meant.

NOTE 14. From this and some preceding passages, it appears that the story of Joodar was composed after the conquest of Egypt by the 'Osmánlee Turks, or that it has been altered by a copyist. During the seven days before mentioned, Joodar incurred a debt of a hundred and forty nusfs to the baker. He then took at least his usual daily quantity of bread, of the value of ten nusfs, and gave the baker a deenár, or piece of gold; and the baker still owed him the value of twenty nusfs. Now, towards the close of the Circassian dynasty in Egypt, the nuf became less than a quarter of a dirhem, and more than a hundred and twenty may have passed for a deenár. I do not know the precise period when a hundred and seventy nusfs passed for a deenár; but it must have been considerably later.

NOTE 15. Nearly all the Maghrabees are of the Málikee persuasion.—The names mentioned in the passage to which this note refers signify, respectively, "Servant of [the God of] Peace," "Servant of the One [God]," "Servant of the Eternal Lord," or "— of the Everlasting," &c., and "Servant of the Merciful;" and the name of the father, afterwards mentioned, signifies "Servant of the Loving."

NOTE 16. "El-Abtan" seems here to mean "the Most Profound."

NOTE 17. "Esh-Shamardal" signifies "the Tall," &c.

NOTE 18. "Er-Raad el-Kásif" signifies "the Loud-pealing, or the Breaking Thunder."

NOTE 19. Fás and Miknás (or Fés and Miknés, as the names are pronounced by the natives,) are the two cities called by our geographers "Fez" and "Mequinez." They seem to be regarded by our author as one city.

NOTE 20. See Note 13 to Chapter xvi.

NOTE 21. Kebáb is mutton or lamb cut into small morsels, which are roasted upon skewers.

NOTE 22. "Rahmeh" here signifies "a gift of God's mercy."

NOTE 23. See Note 65 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 24. See Note 12 to Chapter v.

NOTE 25. The stuffed gourds are generally of the size and shape of a small cucumber, and the stuffing usually consists of rice and minced meat, delicately seasoned with salt, pepper, and onions, and often with garlic, parsley, &c. They are boiled.—The stuffing of the lamb commonly consists of minced meat (of the same kind), with hazel-nuts or pistachio-nuts, &c.—Respecting kunáfah, Katáif, and bakláweh, see, respectively, Note 66 to Chapter iii., Note 23 to Chapter viii., and Note 99 to Chapter v.

NOTE 26. This is a common ejaculation of women.

NOTE 27. Here, in the original, some words are misplaced, and others repeated, by a mistake of a copyist or compositor.

NOTE 28. By "the Captain of the Sea of Es-Suweys," which is commonly called by us "Suez," is meant, the chief in command of the ships of the Red Sea.—That the free have sometimes (though very rarely) been sold as slaves, has been shewn in the last paragraph of Note 13 to Chapter i.

NOTE 29. "Záwiyeh" is a name given in Egypt to a small mosque.

NOTE 30. A kowwás is a sergeant, an officer whose business is to execute the commands of a magistrate or any person in authority.

NOTE 31. Shems-ed-Dóleh (thus commonly pronounced in the present day), like Joodar, is an imaginary person.

NOTE 32. Juddeh, vulgarly called Jiddeh, is the port of Mekkeh.

NOTE 33. The compassing of the Kaabe seven times is one of the chief ceremonies which are required to be performed by every person who enters Mekkeh, whether he be a pilgrim or not, before he attends to any worldly business.

NOTE 34. See Note 1 to the Introduction.

NOTE 35. My sheykh observes, in a marginal note on this passage, that when a person has eaten of the bread of another, the former becomes obliged to the latter, and among the duties which he owes him is that of taking leave of him when he is about to perform a journey. The reader may remember a former note on this subject.

NOTE 36. This is commonly said both by the master and by the servant, when the latter quits the former voluntarily, or is dismissed; and the reply given in each case is, "May God acquit thee of responsibility." The custom serves to illustrate some remarks in Note 26 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 37. If this title be not introduced by a copyist, we must suppose that the author referred the events described in this tale to the times of the Khaleefehs.

NOTE 38. The words "and took the two pairs of saddle-bags" I have transposed agreeably with an opinion of my sheykh, stated in the margin of the original.

NOTE 39. White garments are indicative of peace, as well as of joy.—See Note 78 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 40. My sheykh questions the propriety of inserting these verses, as uttered by a King.

NOTE 41. As a dress is given in token of honour or favour, one conferred upon an offender is a token of mercy.

NOTE 42. This is said as a compliment; for the dowry had not been paid.

NOTE 43. The Sheykh el-Islám is the chief Muftee (or Doctor of the Law), and Muftee of the capital. D'Ohsson states, that this title was first conferred by Mohammed II., when he conquered Constantinople, in 1453, and there established the seat of his empire.

NOTE 44. The district of El-Bundukáneeyeh was so called, according to El-Makreezee, because it contained a number of shops in which cross-bows were made. The same author relates that its shops and houses were destroyed by a great fire, in the year of the Flight 751. The name, slightly changed (to El-Bundukáneeyeh, which is synonymous with the former name, signifying "the cross-bow makers"), is still retained. The situation of this district is near the well-known Khán of El-Hamzáwee, and is between the quarter of the Jews and the principal street of the city.

NOTE 45. El-Makreezee states, that the quarter of El-Joodareeyeh, or (as the name is pronounced by the inhabitants of Cairo) El-Goodareeyeh, was so called after a particular division, thus named, of the army of the Khaleefehs of the house of Fátimeh. He does not mention that it was previously called the quarter of El-Yemáneeyeh; so I suppose this was not the case. It is situate not far from the Khán of El-Hamzáwee (mentioned in the note immediately preceding), towards the south-west.

NOTE 46. The period during which a widow must wait before she can contract a new marriage is here meant. It is four months and ten days.

NOTE 47. Next follows, in my original, the Story of 'Ajeeb and Ghareeb, a long tale, ending with part of the Six Hundred and Eightieth Night; much resembling the romance of Seyf Zu-l-Yezen. Its subjects, almost exclusively, are superhuman exploits in war, and other extravagant adventures of men and Jinn, related in such a manner that Von Hammer considers the story as an ironical satire upon the belief in genii sanctioned by the Kur-án, and upon the propagation of El-Islám by compulsion. In this point of view, he regards it as extremely curious, and it would, I doubt not, interest many English readers; but I consider it so inferior to most of the tales of the Thousand and One Nights, that I have no hesitation in omitting it. — Then follows a series of thirteen anecdotes, ending with part of the Six Hundred and Ninety-eighth Night. Of these I here insert only four.

The Lovers 'Otbeh and Reiyà

It is related that 'Abd-Allah the son of Maamar El-Keysee said, I performed the pilgrimage, one year, to the sacred House of God; and when I had accomplished my pilgrimage, I returned to visit the tomb of the Prophet (may God bless and save him!); and as I was, one night, sitting in the Ródah, between the tomb and the pulpit, I heard a gentle lamentation, uttered in a soft tone; so I listened to it, and the voice said,—

Hath the moaning of the pigeons of the lotetree saddened thee, and excited anxious thoughts in thy bosom?
Or doth the remembrance of a beauteous damsel, who hath caused thee troubles of mind, disturb thee?
O night, that art tedious to one constantly disordered, complaining of desire and of the failure of patience,
Thou hast rendered him sleepless who is suffering the fire of a love that burneth like red-hot coals!
The full moon beareth witness that I am engrossed by love of one who resembleth the full moon.
I thought not myself thus engrossed by love until I was afflicted when I was not aware of it.

Then the voice ceased, and I knew not whence it came to me; wherefore I was perplexed; and presently the complainer repeated the lamentation, and recited thus:—

Hath the phantom of Reiyà, visiting, saddened thee, in the thick darkness of black-haired night,
And hath love rendered thine eye sleepless, and the phantom-visitor agitated thy heart?
I exclaimed to my night, whose darkness resembled a sea in which swelling waves were dashing,
O night, thou art tedious to a lover unto whom there is no assister nor helper save the morning!
But the night replied, Complain not of my length; for love is the present cause of abjection.

I arose and went towards him on his commencing the recitation of these verses, proceeding towards the quarter whence the voice came, and he had not ended the verses before I was by him, when I saw a young man of the utmost beauty: the down of the sides of his face had not begun to grow, and tears had made two tracks down his cheeks. I said to him, An excellent young man art thou! He replied, And thou too. But who, he asked, is the man before me? I answered, 'Abd-Allah the son of Maamar El-Keysee. — Dost thou want any thing? said he. I answered, I was sitting in the Ródah and nought surprised me but thy voice. With my life would I ransom thee. What is it that thou sufferest? — He said, Sit. So I sat; and he said, I am 'Otbeh the son of El-Hobáb the son of El-Mundhir the son of El-Jamooth the Ansáree. I went in the morning to the Mesjid el-Ahzáb, and continued my inclinations and prostrations; after which I withdrew alone to occupy myself with devotion; and, lo, some women came along, walking with a vacillating gait, resembling moons, and in the midst of them was a damsel of surprising loveliness, of perfect beauty, who stopped before me, and said to me, O 'Otbeh, what sayest thou of union with the person who desireth union with thee? Then she left me and departed, and I have not heard any tidings of her, nor have I discovered any trace of her; and I am perplexed, removing from place to place. — Having said this, he cried out, and fell down upon the ground in a fit, and when he recovered, he was as though his cheeks were dyed with saffron; and he recited these verses:—

I see you with my heart from distant tracts.
Do you also see us with the heart from afar?
My heart and my eye are sorrowing for you:
my soul is with you, and you are ever in my mind.
I should not delight in life without seeing you, even were I in Paradise, or the Garden of Eternity.

Upon this I said to him, O 'Otbeh, O son of my brother, turn with repentance unto thy Lord and beg the forgiveness of thine offence; for thou hast to experience the dreadful trial of the judgment before God. But he replied, Far be it from me to do so! I shall not cease to love until the two karadh-gatherers return. — I remained with him until daybreak, when I said to him, Arise and accompany us to the Mesjid [el-Ahzáb]. And we sat there until we performed the noon-prayers; and, lo, the women came; but as to the damsel, she was not among them; and they said, O 'Otbeh, what thinkest thou of her who desireth union with thee? He said, And what of her? They answered, Her father hath taken her, and departed to Es-Semáweh. And I asked them what was the name of the damsel. They answered, Reiyá the daughter of El-Ghitreef Es-Sulamee. And he raised his head, and recited these two verses:—

O my friend, Reiyá hath hastened in the morning, and to the district of Es-Semáweh her caravan hath gone.

O my friend, I have fainted by reason of my weeping. Hath any one else, then, a tear that I may borrow?

I then said to him, O 'Otbeh, I have brought with me great wealth, with which I desire to protect the generous from disgrace. By Allah, I will expend it for thee, that thou mayest attain thy desire, and more than thy desire. Arise then and accompany us to the assembly of the Ansárees.—We therefore arose, and proceeded until we beheld their assembly, when I saluted them, and they returned the salutation courteously; after which I said, O assembly, what say ye of 'Otbeh and his father? They answered, Of the chiefs of the Arabs. And I said, Know ye that he hath been smitten with the calamity of love, and I desire your aid and company to Es-Semáweh. They replied, We hear and obey. So we mounted, and the party mounted with us, and we proceeded until we came in sight of the abode, of the Benec-Suleym, when El-Ghitreef became acquainted with our place, and came forth in haste and met us, saying, May ye live, O generous men! We replied, And thou, mayest thou live! We are thy guests.—And he said, Ye have alighted at a most hospitable, ample abode. And he alighted, and called out, O company of slaves, come down! So the slaves came down, and they spread the skins and placed the pillows, and slaughtered the cattle and the sheep. But we said, We will not taste thy food until thou shalt have performed our want.—And what, said he, is your want? We answered, We demand in marriage thy generous daughter for 'Otbeh the son of El-Hobáb the son of El-Mundhir, the high in nobility, the good in origin. And he replied, O my brothers, she whom ye demand in marriage is at her own disposal, and I will go in and inform her. Then he arose in anger, and went in to Reiyá. So she said, O my father, wherefore do I see anger apparent in thy countenance? And he answered, A party of the Ansárees have come to me, demanding thee of me in marriage. She replied, They are generous chiefs. I beg forgiveness for them of the Prophet, on whom be the most excellent salutations, and peace! And for whom among them, she asked, is the demand?—He answered her, For a youth known by the name of 'Otbeh, the son of El-Hobáb. She replied, I have heard of this 'Otbeh, that he performeth that which he promiseth, and attaineth that which he seeketh. But he said, I swear that I will never marry thee to him; for some of thy conversation with him hath been reported to me.—What was that? she asked. But, she added, I swear that the Ansárees shall not be rejected in a foul manner: so give them a fair reply.—How? said he. She answered, Make the dowry heavy to them; for then they will desist. And he replied, How excellent is that which thou hast said! Then he went forth in haste, and said, The damsel of the tribe hath consented; but she desireth a dowry like herself, and who can give it?—I, answered 'Abd-Allah. And he said, I desire for her a thousand bracelets of red gold, and five thousand dirhems of the coin of Hejer, and of burds and heberehs a hundred pieces, and five skins of ambergris.—Thou shalt have this demand, said 'Abd-Allah; then dost thou consent? He answered, I do consent.

'Abd-Allah therefore sent some persons of the Ansárees to the Illumined City, and they brought all that he had guaranteed to give. The cattle and the sheep were slaughtered, and the people assembled to eat the food.—We continued in this state, says 'Abd-Allah, forty days; after which El-Ghitreef said, Take ye your damsel. So we mounted her in a hódaj; and he furnished her with thirty camels laden with rarities. Then he bade us farewell, and departed; and we proceeded until there remained between us and the Illumined City one day's journey; whereupon there came forth against us a party of horsemen with intent to plunder, and I imagine that they were of the Benec-Suleym. So 'Otbeh the son of El-Hobáb charged upon them, and slew a number of men, and he turned away, wounded by a thrust of a spear. Then he fell to the earth; and assistance came to us from the inhabitants of that part, and they repelled from us the horsemen. But 'Otbeh had ended his days, and we said, Alas, 'Otbeh! The damsel therefore heard this, and cast herself down from the camel, threw herself upon him, and cried out in anguish and repeated these verses:—

I affected patience; but I was not patient: I only beguiled myself; for I am about to join thee.

Had my soul acted justly, it, rather than any of the creation, had gone before thee to destruction.

After me and thee, therefore, none will be just to a friend, nor soul agree with soul.

Then she uttered one groan, and her days were ended. So we dug for them one grave, and interred them, and I returned to the country of my people, where I remained seven years; after which I went again to the Hejáz, and entered the Illumined City to visit; and I said, By Allah, I will go again to the tomb of 'Otbeh. And I came to it, and, lo, over it was a tall tree, on which were red and yellow and green strips of stuff; and I said to the inhabitants of the [adjacent] halting-place, What is this tree called? They answered, The Tree of the Bridegroom and Bride. And I remained by the tomb a day and a night, and departed. This was the last that I knew of 'Otbeh. May God (whose name be exalted!) have mercy on him!

Generosity Rewarded

There was, in the days of the Prince of the Faithful, Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, a man named Khuzeymeh the son of Bishr, of the tribe of the Bence-Asad, who was distinguished by manifest generosity, and abundant wealth, and beneficence and kindness to his brethren. He continued thus until misfortune crippled him, so that he became in need of the assistance of his brethren towards whom he had exercised his generosity, and whom he had comforted; and they comforted him for a while; but after that they became weary of him. And when their altered conduct towards him appeared unto him, he went to his wife, who was the daughter of his paternal uncle, and said to her, O daughter of my uncle, I have experienced from my brethren a change of conduct, and I have determined to confine myself to my house until death shall come to me. So he closed his door upon himself, and proceeded to sustain himself by the provision that he had until it was consumed, when he became perplexed.

Now 'Ekriméh El-Feiyád, Er-Raba'ee the Governor of El-Jezeereh, knew him; and as he was in his hall of assembly, Khuzeymeh the son of Bishr was mentioned, and 'Ekriméh El-Feiyád said, In what state is he? So they answered him, He hath become reduced to a condition not to be described; he hath closed his door, and confined himself to his house. Upon this, 'Ekriméh El-Feiyád said, This hath happened to him only in consequence of his excessive generosity, and how is it that Khuzeymeh the son of Bishr findeth not a comforter nor a fulfiller of his duty?

They replied, He hath found nothing of the kind. — And when night came, he took four thousand pieces of gold and put them into one bag. Then he gave orders to saddle his beast, went forth secretly from his family, and mounted, attended by one of his young men carrying the money. He proceeded until he stopped at the door of Khuzeymeh, when he took the purse from his young man, and, having sent him to a distance from him, advanced to the door, and pushed it. So Khuzeymeh came forth to him, and he handed to him the bag, saying to him, Amend with this thy circumstances. He therefore took it, and he found it to be heavy; whereupon he put it down from his hand, and laid hold of the bridle of the beast, saying to 'Ekriméh, Who art thou? May my soul be thy ransom! — But 'Ekriméh replied, O thou, I came not to thee in such a time as this and desire that thou shouldst know me. Khuzeymeh rejoined, Then I will not release thee until thou inform me who thou art. So he said, I am a repairer of the slips of the generous. — And tell me more, said Khuzeymeh. — No, replied 'Ekriméh. Then he departed. And Khuzeymeh went in with the bag to the daughter of his uncle, and said to her, Rejoice at good tidings; for God hath brought speedy relief, and wealth; for if these be pieces of silver, they are many. Arise and light a lamp. — But she replied, There is no means of lighting the lamp. So he passed the night feeling the coins with his hand, and he felt the roughness of pieces of gold, yet believed not that they were pieces of gold. — As to 'Ekriméh, however, he returned to his abode, and found that his wife had missed him, and asked respecting him, and been informed of his having ridden forth; wherefore she suspected him for this conduct, and doubted of him, and said to him, The Governor of El-Jezeereh goeth not forth after a period of the night, without his young men, unknown to his family, save to a wife or a concubine. He replied, God knoweth that I went not forth unto either of those two. And she said, Tell me for what purpose thou wentest forth. He replied, I went not forth at this time save in order that no one should know it. But she rejoined, I must be informed. He said, Wilt thou conceal the thing if I tell thee? She answered, Yes. So he acquainted her with the state of the case, and with that which he had done; after which he said, Dost thou wish that I should swear to thee also? She answered, No, no; for my heart hath become at ease, and hath relied upon that which thou hast stated.

But as to Khuzeymeh, when he arose in the morning, he appeased the creditors, and put in order his affairs. Then he equipped himself, desiring to repair to Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, who was then sojourning in Falasteen; and when he stopped at his door, and begged permission of his chamberlains to enter, a chamberlain went in and informed the Khaleefeh of his being there. As he was celebrated for generosity, and Suleymán knew him, he gave him permission to enter; and on his entering, he saluted Suleymán with the salutation usual to Khaleefehs; whereupon Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik said to him, O Khuzeymeh, what hath kept thee so long from us? He answered, The evil state of my affairs.—And what, said the Khaleefeh, prevented thy having recourse to us? He answered, My infirmity, O Prince of the Faithful. The Khaleefeh said, Then how is it that thou hast come now?—Know, O Prince of the Faithful, he answered, that I was in my house, after a portion of the night had elapsed, and, lo, a man knocked at the door, and thus and thus did he.—And he acquainted him with his story from first to last; and Suleymán said, Knowest thou the man? Khuzeymeh answered, I do not know him, O Prince of the Faithful; for he was proud, and I heard not of his speech aught but his saying, I am a repairer of the slips of the generous. Upon this, Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik burned and anxiously longed to know him, and said, If we knew him, we would requite him for his kindness. Then he tied an ensign for Khuzeymeh the Son of Bishr, and appointed him Governor of El-Jezeeréh, in the place of 'Ekriméh El-Feiyád.

So Khuzeymeh went forth on his way to El-Jezeeréh, and when he drew near to it, 'Ekriméh came forth and met him, and the people of El-Jezeeréh also came out to meet him, and they saluted one another. They then proceeded all together until Khuzeymeh entered the city, and alighted at the government-house, when he gave orders that a guarantee should be taken on the part of 'Ekriméh, and that he should be called to account. He was, therefore, called to account, and Khuzeymeh found him to owe large sums of money, and required him to pay them; but he said, I have no means of paying aught.—They must be paid, said Khuzeymeh. 'Ekriméh replied, The money is not in my possession; so do as thou wilt. And Khuzeymeh gave orders to take him to prison, and sent to him again, requiring him to pay what he owed. But he sent back, saying to him, I am not of those who preserve their wealth by sacrificing their honour; so do as thou wilt. And Khuzeymeh ordered that his feet should be shackled with irons, and that he should be kept in prison; and he remained a month, or more, until that treatment emaciated him, and his imprisonment afflicted him.

Then information of his state reached the daughter of his uncle, and she was grieved thereat extremely, and, having called an emancipated female slave who had belonged to her, who was endowed with abundant intellect and knowledge, she said to her, Go immediately to the door of the Emeer Khuzeymeh the son of Bishr, and say, I have an admonition to give:—and if any one ask it of thee, reply, I will not tell it save to the Emeer. Then, when thou hast gone in to him, demand of him a private interview; and when thou art alone with him, say to him, What is this deed that thou hast done? Was the requital that the repairer of the slips of the generous should receive of thee nought save thy requiting him with severe imprisonment, and strait confinement in irons?—The female slave therefore did as she commanded; and when Khuzeymeh heard her words, he called out with his loudest voice, Alas, my baseness! Verily he is the person!—She replied, Yes. So he gave orders immediately to bring his beast, and it was saddled; and he summoned the chief men of the city, brought them together to him, and went with them to the door of the prison, and opened it. Khuzeymeh and those who were with him entered, and they saw 'Ekriméh sitting, changed in condition, the beating and affliction that he suffered having emaciated him; and when he beheld Khuzeymeh, the sight abashed him, and he hung down his head. But Khuzeymeh approached, and threw himself upon 'Ekriméh's head, kissing it. So 'Ekriméh raised his head towards him, and said to him, What hath occasioned this conduct of thine? He answered, Thy generous actions, and my evil requital. And 'Ekriméh replied, May God forgive us and thee! Then Khuzeymeh commanded the jailer to loose the chains from him, and ordered that they should be put upon his own feet; whereupon 'Ekriméh said, What is this that thou desirest to do? He answered, I desire that I may suffer like as thou hast suffered. But 'Ekriméh said, I conjure thee by Allah that thou do it not!—Then they all went forth, and proceeded until they arrived at the mansion of Khuzeymeh, when 'Ekriméh bade him farewell, and desired to depart. Khuzeymeh, however, prevented his doing so; and 'Ekrimah said, What dost thou desire? He answered, I desire to change thy condition; for my shame with respect to the daughter of thine uncle is greater than my shame with respect to thee. He then gave orders to clear the bath. So they cleared it, and they entered together, and Khuzeymeh himself served 'Ekrimah. After that, they went forth, and Khuzeymeh bestowed upon 'Ekrimah a sumptuous dress, mounted him upon a beast, and, conveying with him a large sum of money, went with him to his house, and begged his permission to excuse himself to the daughter of his uncle; and he did excuse himself to her; after which, he asked 'Ekrimah to go with him to Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, who was then staying at Er-Ramleh, and he consented to do so.

They both proceeded until they came to Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik, when the chamberlain entered, and acquainted him with the arrival of Khuzeymeh the son of Bishr; and this alarmed him, and he said, Doth the Governor of El-Jezeerah come without our order! This is on account of nought save a great occurrence! And he gave him permission to enter; and when he entered, he said to him, before he had saluted him, What tidings bringest thou, O Khuzeyr..eh? He answered him, Good, O Prince of the Faithful.—And what hath brought thee? said the Khaleefeh. He answered, I have got the repairer of the slips of the generous, and I wished to rejoice thee with him, having seen thine anxious desire to know him, and thy longing to behold him. The Khaleefeh said, And who is he? And he answered, 'Ekrimah El-Feiyád. So he gave him permission to approach; and he approached, and saluted him as Khaleefeh; and the Khaleefeh welcomed him, caused him to draw near to the place where he sat, and said to him, O 'Ekrimah, thy good action to him was nought but a trouble to thyself. Then Suleymán said, Write all thy wants, and every thing that thou requirest, in a note. And he did so; and the Khaleefeh gave orders to accomplish all that he required immediately. He gave orders also to present him with ten thousand pieces of gold, besides the needful things that he had written, and twenty chests of clothes, which were also an addition to the things that he had written; after which, he called for a spear, and tied for him an ensign, as Governor of El-Jezeerah and Irmeeneeyeh and Adhrabee-ján; and he said to him, The case of Khuzeymeh is submitted to thee: if thou wilt, thou shalt confirm him; and if thou wilt, thou shalt displace him. 'Ekrimah replied, Nay, I will restore him to his post, O Prince of the Faithful. Then they both departed from him; and they ceased not to be Governors under Suleymán the son of 'Abd-El-Melik as long as he was Khaleefeh.

[Of four anecdotes which I here omit, the last is that of Ibráheem El-Mósalee and the Devil, which I have already related, in page 1019 of this work.]

The Lovers of the Benec-'Odhráh

The Prince of the Faithful, Hároon Er-Rasheed, being troubled one night with exceeding restlessness, desired Jemeel the son of Maamar El-'Odhrée to relate to him a story, and the latter said,—

Know, O Prince of the Faithful, that I was fascinated by a damsel, enamoured of her, and I used often to visit her, as she was the object of my desire and ambition among the things of the world. Then her family removed with her, on account of the scarcity of pasture; and I remained a while without seeing her; after which, desire disquieted me, and attracted me to her: so my soul suggested to me a journey to her; and on a certain night, desire excited me to repair to her. I therefore arose, and girded my saddle upon my she-camel, bound my turban round my head, put on my old clothes, slung on my sword, armed myself with my spear, mounted my she-camel, and went forth to seek her. I journeyed quickly, and I was proceeding one night,—it was a night of thick darkness, yet notwithstanding that, I endured the difficulties of descending into the valleys and ascending the mountains.—and I heard the roaring of the lions, and the howling of the wolves, and the noises of wild beasts on every side. My reason was confounded, my mind was disordered, and my tongue desisted not from repeating the praises of God, whose name he exalted! And while I was proceeding in this state, sleep overcame me, and the camel conveyed me by a different way from that in which I was: sleep overpowered me, and, lo, something struck me upon my head. So I awoke alarmed and terrified; and, behold, there were trees and rivers, and birds upon the branches of those trees were warbling with their various tongues and notes, and the trees of that verdant spot were entangled, one with another. I therefore alighted from my she-camel, and took her halter in my hand, and ceased not to endeavour by gentle means to get clear until I led her forth from those trees to a desert tract; whereupon I placed her saddle right, and seated myself properly on her back.

I knew not whither to go, nor unto what place destiny would urge me; but I looked over that desert, and a fire appeared to me at its further extremity. So I struck my she-camel, and proceeded towards the fire until I arrived at it; and I drew near to it, and looked attentively, and, lo, there was a Bedawee tent pitched, with a spear stuck in the ground, and a beast standing, and horses, and pasturing camels. I therefore said within myself, Probably great importance attaches to this tent; for I see not in this desert any other. Then I advanced towards it, and said, Peace be on you, O people of the tent, and the mercy of God, and his blessings. And there came forth to me from it a young man, of the youths of nineteen years, who was like the full moon when it shineth, and courage was manifest in his countenance; and he said, And on thee be peace, and the mercy of God, and his blessings, O brother of the Arabs! Verily I imagine that thou hast wandered from the way. — I replied, The case is so. Direct me: may God have mercy on thee! — But he said, O brother of the Arabs, verily this our district is a place abounding with wild beasts, and this night is dark and dreary, exceedingly dark and cold, and I should not be without fear for thee lest the wild beast should tear thee; therefore alight and rest with me, and enjoy amplitude and ease; and when the morrow cometh, I will direct thee to the right way. — Accordingly I alighted from my she-camel, tied up one of her fore-feet with the end of her halter, and, having pulled off the clothes that were upon me, attired myself lightly, and sat a while. And, lo, the young man took a sheep and slaughtered it, and he kindled and lighted up a fire; after which, he entered the tent, and took forth some fine spices, and good salt, and began to cut off pieces of the meat of that sheep, and to roast them upon the fire, and give to me; sighing at one time, and weeping at another. Then he uttered a great groan, wept violently, and recited these verses: —

There remaineth not aught save a flitting breath, and an eye of which the pupil is confounded [in its vision].

There remaineth not a joint of any of his limbs but in it is a constant disease;

And his tears are flowing, and his bowels burning; but, notwithstanding this, he is silent.
His enemies weep for him in pity. Alas for him whom the exulting foe pitieth!

So I knew, upon this, O Prince of the Faithful, that the young man was a distracted lover, and none knoweth love but he who hath tasted it. I therefore said within myself, Shall I ask him? But then I consulted my mind, and said, How shall I attack him with inquiry when I am in his abode? So I restrained myself; and ate of that meat as much as sufficed me; and when we had finished eating, the young man arose, and entered the tent, and brought forth a clean basin, with a handsome ewer, and a napkin of silk, the ends of which were embroidered with red gold, and a sprinkling-bottle full of rose-water infused with musk. I wondered therefore at his elegance and delicacy, and said within myself, I knew not elegance in the desert. Then we washed our hands, and conversed a while; after which he arose, and entered the tent, and made a partition between me and him with a piece of red brocade, and said, Enter, O chief of the Arabs, and take thy place of repose; for thou hast experienced fatigue this night, and excessive toil in this thy journey.

So I entered, and, lo, I found a bed of green brocade, and thereupon I pulled off the clothes that were upon me, and passed such a night as I had never passed in my life; but all the while I was meditating upon the case of this young man until the night was dark, and eyes slept. Then suddenly I heard a low voice, than which I had never heard any more soft or delicate. I therefore raised the partition that was put between us, and, lo, I beheld a damsel, than whom I had never seen one more beautiful in face. She was by his side, and they were weeping, and complaining to each other of the pain of love and desire and ardent passion, and of the violence of their longing to meet each other. So I said, O Allah, how I wonder at this second person! For when I entered this tent, I saw not in it any one but this young man, and he had not any one with him. — Then I said within myself, No doubt this damsel is of the daughters of the Jinn; she loveth this young man, who hath segregated himself with her in this place; and she hath segregated herself with him. But afterwards I looked intently at her, and, behold, she was a human, Arab girl: when she uncovered her face, she put to shame the shining sun, and the tent was illuminated by the light of her countenance. So when I certified myself that she was his beloved,

I thought upon the jealousy of the lover; wherefore I let down the curtain, and covered my face, and slept. And when I arose in the morning, I put on my clothes, performed the ablution for my prayers, and acquitted myself of the divinely-ordained prayers that were incumbent on me; after which I said to the young man, O brother of the Arabs, wilt thou direct me to the right way? Thou hast bestowed favours upon me.—But he looked towards me, and answered, At thy leisure, O chief of the Arabs. The period of the entertainment of a guest is three days; and I am not one who will let thee go until after three days.

I therefore remained with him three days, says Jemeel; and on the fourth day, we sat to converse, and I conversed with him, and asked him his name and genealogy; whereupon he said, As to my genealogy, I am of the Benee-'Odhrah; and as to my name, I am such-a-one, the son of such-a-one, and my paternal uncle is such-a-one. And, lo, he was the son of my paternal uncle, O Prince of the Faithful, and he was of the most noble house of the Benee-'Odhrah. So I said, O son of my uncle, what induced thee to do as I see, segregating thyself in this desert; and how is it that thou hast forsaken thy comforts and the comforts of thy fathers; and how is it that thou hast forsaken thy male slaves and thy female slaves, and segregated thyself in this place? And when he heard, O Prince of the Faithful, my words, his eyes filled with tears, and he answered, O son of my uncle, I was in love with the daughter of my paternal uncle, fascinated by her, distracted with love of her, rendered insane by passion for her, unable to endure separation from her; and my passion for her became excessive. So I demanded her in marriage of my uncle; but he refused, and he married her to a man of the Benee-'Odhrah, who took her as his wife, and conveyed her to the place of his residence last year. And when she was distant from me, and I was prevented from seeing her, the burnings of love, and the violence of desire and ardent passion, induced me to forsake my family, and to quit my tribe and my friends and all my comforts, and I took up my abode alone in this tent in this desert, and accustomed myself to my solitude.—And where, said I, are their tents? He answered, They are near, on the summit of this mountain; and every night, when eyes sleep, in the stillness of night, she stealeth away secretly from the tribe, so that no one knoweth of her movement, and I accomplish my desire by discourse with her, and she accomplisheth her desire in like manner. I am remaining in this state, consoling myself with her during a period of the night, until God shall accomplish a thing that must come to pass, or my object be attained in spite of the enviers, or until God shall determine for me, and He is the best of those who determine.—So when the young man informed me, O Prince of the Faithful, his case grieved me, and I became perplexed by reason of the zeal that affected me thereupon. Then I said to him, O son of my uncle, shall I shew thee a stratagem that I would counsel thee to employ, wherein, if it be the will of God, thou wilt find the most advisable course, and the way to a right and successful issue, and by means of which God will dispel from thee that which thou darest? The young man answered, Tell me, O son of my uncle. And I said to him, When it is night, and the damsel hath come, put her upon my she-camel: for she is swift: and mount thou thy courser. I also will mount one of these she-camels, and proceed with you both all the night, and the morning will not have come before I shall have traversed with you deserts and wastes; so thou wilt have attained thy desire, and got possession of the beloved of thy heart. The expanse of God's earth is wide, and I, by Allah, will aid thee while I live with my soul and my wealth and my sword.—And when he heard this, he replied, O son of my uncle, wait until I consult her on this subject; for she is intelligent, prudent, having clear judgment.

But when the night became dark, and the time of her coming had arrived, and he was expecting her at the known period, she was behind her usual time; and I saw the young man go forth from the door of the tent, and open his mouth, and begin to inhale the breeze that blew from the quarter whence she came, smelling her odour; and he recited these two verses:—

O zephyr, thou bringest me a gentle gale from the place in which the beloved is dwelling.
O wind, thou bearest a token of the beloved.
Knowest thou, then, when she will arrive?

Then he entered the tent, and sat a while weeping; after which he said, O son of my uncle, verily something hath occurred to the daughter of my uncle this night, and some accident hath happened to her, or some obstacle hath prevented her from coming to me. He then said to me, Stay in thy place until I bring thee the news. And thereupon he took his sword and his shield, and after he had been absent from me for a period of the night, he approached bearing something upon his hands, and called out to me. So I hastened to him, and he said, O son of my uncle, knowest thou what hath happened? I answered, No, by Allah. And he said, Verily I have been afflicted with respect to the daughter of my uncle this night; for she was coming to us, and a lion opposed her in her way, and rent her, and there remained not of her aught save what thou seest. Then he threw down what was upon his hand; and, lo, it was the ends of the bones of the damsel, and what else remained of her bones. And he wept violently, and, having cast the shield from his hand, took in his hand a bag, and said to me, Go not hence until I come to thee, if it be the will of God, whose name be exalted! He then departed, and was absent from me a while; after which he returned with the head of the lion in his hand, and he threw it down from his hand, and demanded water. So I brought it to him; and he washed the mouth of the lion, and began to kiss it, and to weep. His mourning for her was excessive; and he recited these verses:—

O lion, who hast exposed thyself to destruction, thou hast perished, and hast roused up my grief for my beloved.

Thou hast rendered me solitary who was lately her companion, and made the bowels of the earth to be her grave.

I say to time, that hath afflicted me with her separation, God forbid that thou shouldst shew me a friend in her stead!

He then said, O son of my uncle, I implore thee by Allah, and by the claim of relationship and consanguinity that subsisteth between me and thee, that thou keep my charge. Thou wilt see me presently dead before thee; and thereupon do thou wash me, and shroud me together with these remains of the bones of the daughter of my uncle in this garment, and bury us both in one grave, and inscribe upon our grave these two verses:—

We lived upon the earth a life of comfort, united in fellowship, and in abode and home;

But fortune, with its changes, parted us from each other, and now the grave-clothes have united us.

Then he wept violently, and entered the tent, and was absent from me a while; after which he came forth; and he began to sigh and to cry out, and, uttering a deep groan, he quitted the world. So when I beheld him thus die, the event grieved me and afflicted me so that I almost joined him by reason of the violence of my sorrow for him. I then advanced to him, and laid him on the ground, and did with him as he had ordered me. I shrouded him with the remains of the damsel together, and buried them in one grave, and remained by their grave three days; after which I departed; and I continued for two years to visit them frequently.—Such were the events of their history, O Prince of the Faithful.

And when Er-Rasheed heard his story, he approved it; and he bestowed upon him a robe of honour, and conferred upon him a handsome gift.

[The next anecdote is that of the Bedawee and his Wife, related (though not so fully as it is told in the original) in page 1068 of the present work. Then follows an anecdote so nearly agreeing with the story of Ibn-Mansoor and the Lady Budoor that I think it needless to give a translation of it: the latter appears to me to be founded on the former; or perhaps the reverse may be the case. The next also I pass over for a similar reason: it is an anecdote of Is-hák El-Mósilee and the Devil, very similar (except in some particulars rather too free for translation and for insertion in this work) to that of Ibráheem El-Mósilee and the Devil, which I have before related, in page 1019.]

The Lovers Reunited

Is-hák the son of Ibráheem saith, I was entirely devoted to the Barmakees; and while I was one day in my abode, lo, my door was knocked: so my young man went forth, and he returned and said to me, At the door is a comely youth, asking permission to come in. I therefore gave him permission, and there entered a young man who bore traces of illness; and he said, Verily I have been for some time desiring to meet thee, and I have need of thine assistance.—And what is it that thou wantest? said I. And he took forth three hundred pieces of gold, which he put before me, saying, I request thee to accept them from me, and to compose for me an air to two verses that I have uttered. So I said to him, Recite them to me. And he recited, saying,—

By Allah, O mine eye, which hast oppressed my heart, extinguish with my tears the fire of my grief.

Fortune joins in reproving me on account of my beloved, and I shall not see her though I be wrapped in my grave-clothes.

I therefore composed for him an air of a plaintive kind, and sang it; whereupon he fainted, and I imagined that he had died.

He recovered, however, and said, Repeat it. But I conjured him by Allah, and said, I fear thou wilt die. He replied, Would that such an event happened! And he ceased not to humble himself and to supplicate until I had pity on him, and repeated it. And thereupon he fell into a fit more severe than the first, and I doubted not of his death; but I ceased not to sprinkle rose-water upon him until he recovered and sat up. So I praised God for his safety, and put his pieces of gold before him, saying to him, Take thy money, and depart from me. But he replied, I have no need of it, and thou shalt have the like of it if thou repeat the air. And my heart was dilated at the prospect of the money; wherefore I said to him, I will repeat it; but on three conditions: the first of them is, that thou shalt remain with me and eat of my food, in order that thy soul may be strengthened; and the second, that thou shalt drink of the wine as much as will restrain thy heart; and the third, that thou shalt relate to me thy story. And he did so, and said,—

I am a man of the people of El-Medeneh. I went forth for recreation, and proceeded by the way to El-'Akeek, with my brothers; and I saw a damsel, with girls who were like a branch covered with dew. She looked with two eyes whose glance was not withdrawn save with the soul that contemplated them; and they remained until the day closed, when they departed; and I found in my heart wounds slow to heal. So I returned endeavouring to obtain information of her; but found not any one to acquaint me; therefore I proceeded to seek diligently after her in the market-streets; yet found not any tidings of her. And I fell sick of grief, and told my story to one of my relations; but he said to me, No harm shall befall thee. These days of the spring are not ended, and the heaven will rain, and thereupon she will go forth. I also will go forth with thee, and do thou what thou wilt.—My soul therefore was tranquillized thereby until El-'Akeek flowed with water, and the people went forth. Thereupon I likewise went forth, with my brothers and my relations, and we sat in the same place as before; and we had not remained long when the women approached, running like two horses for a wager. So I said to a damsel of my relations, Say to this damsel, This man saith unto thee, Well did he express himself who uttered this verse:—

She smote me with an arrow which pierced the heart, and she withdrew, having left in it a wound and scars.

She therefore went to her, and said to her thus; and she replied, Say to him, Well hath he said who replied with this verse:—

We feel the like of that which thou bemoanest: so have patience: we may see relief that will soon heal our hearts.

And I abstained from speaking, in fear of disgrace, and rose and departed. On my rising, she also rose, and I followed her, and she looked at me until I knew her abode; and after this, she used to come to me, and I used to go to her. Thus we had interviews with each other, and our meetings were so frequent that the case became public and manifest, and her father knew of it. Yet I ceased not to be assiduous in meeting her, and complained of the case to my father, who thereupon collected our family, and went to her father to request her in marriage. He, however, said, Had that matter been known to me before he had disgraced her [by his visits], I had done as ye desire: but the thing hath become notorious, and I would not verify the assertion of the people.

So I repeated to him the air, says Is-hák, and he acquainted me with his abode; after which he departed; and we had become familiar with each other. Then Jaafar the son of Yahyà sat, and I presented myself as was my custom, and sang to him the verses of the youth; whereupon he was moved with delight, and drank some cups, and said, Wo to thee! Whose air is this?—I therefore told him the story of the youth, and he ordered me to ride to him, and to assure him of the attainment of the object of his desire. Accordingly I went to him, and I brought him, and Jaafar desired him to repeat the story; wherefore he related it to him; and Jaafar said, Depend upon me that I will marry thee to her. So his soul was comforted, and he remained with us. And when the morning came, Jaafar rode to Er-Rasheed, and related to him the story; and he admired it, and commanded that we should all present ourselves. He then desired the repetition of the air, and drank to it; after which he gave orders to write a letter to the Governor of the Hejáz, requiring him to send the father of the woman with her family in an honourable manner to his presence, and to expend upon them amply. And but a short time had elapsed before they came, when Er-Rasheed commanded to bring the man before him. So he came; and he ordered him to marry his daughter to the youth, and gave him a hundred thousand pieces of gold. Then the man returned to his family; and the youth ceased not to be one of the boon-companions of Jaafar until that happened which happened; whereupon the youth returned with his family to El-Medeeneh. — May God (whose name be exalted!) have mercy upon the souls of all of them!

[One more anecdote follows in the original; but it must be omitted here. — Then follows the story of the Crafty Deleeleh, which ends with part of the Seven Hundred and Ninetieth Night. I should hesitate to introduce it in the present collection of tales on account of its vulgarity; but it is rendered more objectionable by indecent incidents, and, without making many and great alterations, I could not offer it to the English reader. — The next story is that of Ardesheer and Hayát-en-Nufoos, ending with part of the Seven Hundred and Thirty-eighth Night. This also I pass over as it is little more than a repetition, word for word, of the story of Táj-el-Mulook and the Lady Dunyâ.]

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-THIRD

NOTE 1. Here, as in other instances, I have substituted "Sháh-Zemán" for "Shahramán."

NOTE 2. "Rudeynnee" is a relative adjective from "Rudeyneh," the name of a woman of Khatt Hejer, who, as well as her husband Semher, practised, and excelled in, the art of straightening spear-shafts. Hence the terms "Rudeynnee" and "Semherree" are often applied to a straight spear.

NOTE 3. I suppose the city here mentioned to be imaginary; and perhaps the sea may be imaginary also. The latter, however, may be the Caspian.

NOTE 4. "Jullanár" (vulgarly pronounced "Julnár") is from the Persian "gulnár," and signifies "Pomegranate-flower." In my original, by the erroneous addition of a point, the last letter is converted into z.

NOTE 5. "Sáleh" signifies "good," "just," "virtuous," &c.

NOTE 6. These people of the sea appear to me to be an inferior class of the Jinn termed "El-Ghowwásah," that is, the Divers, or Plungers, in the seas. They fly through the air; and fire, the element of which the Jinn were created, is said to have issued from the mouth of Jullanár's relations. Her people are often spoken of as men; but it does not appear that the author meant them to be considered as human beings in the literal sense of the term. Jullanár's son, however, evidently partook more of his father's than of his mother's nature.

NOTE 7. See Note 12 to Chapter xx.

NOTE 8. These cressets are described in Note 2 to Chapter xiii.

NOTE 9. "Bedr Básim" signifies "Smiling Full Moon."

NOTE 10. See Note 4 to Chapter xiii.

NOTE 11. "Jóharah" signifies "a Jewel."

NOTE 12. "Semendel" is a name of the salamander, and also of a bird of India and China, of which it is said, as of the salamander, that it is not burned by fire.

NOTE 13. This comparison has been made before, with respect to the hair of Sáleh. On this second occurrence of the expression, my sheykh has stated, in the margin, his disapprobation of it.

NOTE 14. Four different kinds of antelopes are thus called. The distinctive name, in Arabic, of the kind here mentioned is "maháh."

NOTE 15. These words, "God imposeth not," &c., are from the Kur-án, ch. ii. v. 286

NOTE 16. The "keerat," or carat (Gr. κεράτιον), is the weight of a bean, equal to four kamhahs (or wheat-grains), or very nearly three English grains. It is the twenty-fourth part of a mithkál, and hence is a term used to signify the twenty-fourth part of any thing. Thus the Arabs say of a person in whom they see no fault, "He is a perfect man of four and twenty keeráts;" as we say of gold, that it is so many carats fine.

NOTE 17. "Marseeneh" signifies "a myrtle."

NOTE 18. It appears that the ring which before preserved him from drowning he lost when he was transformed into a bird.

NOTE 19. In the original, the name "Láb" is interpreted as meaning in Arabic "Takweem esh-Shems;" but "Láb," which is a Persian word, signifies in Arabic simply "esh-Shems;" in English, "the Sun;" "Takweem esh-Shems," as a proper name, appears to me to be nonsense. The meaning of "takweem" is "rectification," "correction," &c.; "evaluation;" "an almanac;" "an astrological calculation," &c.

NOTE 20. The word here rendered "forms" also signifies "colours," and "species," or "kinds."

NOTE 21. The Queen Láb was an infidel, a worshipper of fire, as the tale afterwards shews.

NOTE 22. "'Abd-Allah" signifies "the Servant of God."

NOTE 23. "Saweek" is the meal of parched barley. It is made into a kind of gruel, or thick ptisan, but not too thick to be drunk.

NOTE 24. Mr. Keightley mentions a tale in the Pleasant Nights of Straparola, and also a popular story in Germany, having some resemblance to this incident, and likewise points of resemblance to the story of the Second Royal Mendicant. With respect to the incident in the story of Bedr Básim, he observes, "There is nothing said about the bridle in the account of the sale; but I am sure that, in the original tale, Bedr's misfortune must have been owing to his having parted with it. In Chaucer's Squier's Tale, the bridle would also appear to have been of some importance." He likewise observes, that "Queen Labe, with her lovers turned into various animals, reminds one strongly of the Homeric Circe;" and adds, that he thinks it "not at all impossible that the Grecian fable may have penetrated into Persia." He had before remarked upon the great differences between this tale and that of the Magic Horse; shewing the superior claims of the latter to be regarded as a Persian composition; but stating his opinion that the former "is possibly an ancient Persian tale also, though the Arabian narrator may have taken greater liberties with it."

NOTE 25. "Farásheh" signifies "a moth," and "a butterfly," and, according to my sheykh, "a locust."

NOTE 26. In the old version, it is said that "all the lovers of the magic queen resumed their pristine forms as soon as she ceased to live;" and that "they were all sons of kings, princes, or persons of high rank."

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-FOURTH

NOTE 1. In the original, this story has the following introduction, which I have transferred to this place because it seems to me to be of little interest, and calculated to induce expectations that will not be fully realized. The Breslau edition does not contain it.

How the Merchant Hasan learned the Night-Story of Seyf-el-Mulook

"There was, in ancient times, a King, of the Kings of the Persians, whose name was Mohammad the son of Sebáik, and who ruled over the countries of Khurásán, and every year he used to invade the countries of the infidels, in El-Hind and Es-Sind and China, and the regions that are beyond the River [Oxus], and other countries besides these, of the Persians and other nations. He was a just, brave, generous, liberal King. And this King was fond of conversations over the cup, and traditions and verses, and histories and tales, and night-discourses, and the lives of the ancients. Whoever preserved in his memory an extraordinary tale, and related it to him, he used to confer favours upon him. It is said that if a stranger came to him with an extraordinary night-discourse, and recited before him, and he approved of his tale, and his words pleased him, he used to bestow upon him a sumptuous robe of honour, give him a thousand pieces of gold, mount him upon a horse saddled and bridled, clothe him from head to foot, and give him magnificent gifts; and the man would take the things and go his way.

"Now it happened that an old man came to him with an extraordinary night-tale, which he related before him, and he approved of it, and his words pleased him; so he gave orders to present to him a sumptuous gift, comprising a thousand pieces of gold of Khurásán, and a horse completely equipped. Then, after this, the news of these actions of the King spread abroad throughout all the cities, and a man named the merchant Hasan, who was generous, liberal, learned, a poet, excelling in science, heard of him. And there was, with that King, an envious Wezeer, of inauspicious aspect, who loved not any one among all the people, neither the rich nor the poor; and whenever any one came to that King and he gave him aught, he envied him, and said, Verily this practice consumeth the wealth and ruineth the country; and this is the custom of the King:—these words proceeding not save from envy and hatred in that Wezeer. Then the King heard of the merchant Hasan; so he sent to him, and caused him to be brought; and when he came before him, he said to him, O merchant Hasan, the Wezeer hath acted with opposition and enmity towards me on account of the wealth that I give to the poets and the boon-companions, and the reciters of tales and verses. Now I desire of thee that thou relate to me a pleasant tale and an extraordinary story, such that I have never heard the like of it. And if thy story please me, I will give thee many tracts of land with their castles, and I will make them additional to thy fief: I will also place all my kingdom at thy disposal, and make thee the chief of my wezeers: thou shalt sit on my right hand, and govern my subjects. But if thou bring me not that of which I have told thee, I will take all that is in thy hand, and banish thee from my country.—To this the merchant Hasan replied, I hear and obey our lord the King. But the memlook desireth of thee that thou have patience with him for a year; then I will relate to thee a story the like of which thou hast not heard in thy life, neither hath any one beside thee heard the like of it, nor any story better than it.—And the King said, I grant thee a delay of a whole year. Then he called for a sumptuous robe of honour, and clad him with it, and said to him, Confine thyself to thy house, and mount not, nor go nor come, during the period of a whole year, until thou presentest thyself with that which I have demanded of thee. If thou bring that, thou shalt receive special favour; and rejoice thou in the prospect of that which I have promised thee. But if thou bring it not, thou shalt not be of us, nor will we be of thee.—And the merchant Hasan kissed the ground before him, and went forth.

"He then chose, of his memlooks, five persons, all of whom wrote and read; and they were excellent in science, intelligent, versed in polite literature, of the choicest of his memlooks. He gave to each of them five thousand pieces of gold, and said to them, I reared you not but for such a day as this: aid me then to accomplish the desire of the King, and save me from his hand. They said to him, And what desirest thou to do? For our souls shall be thy ransom.—He answered them, I desire that each of you journey unto some region, and that ye use your utmost endeavours to gain access to the learned, and the accomplished in polite literature, and the excellent in science, and the relaters of extraordinary talks and wonderful histories; and search ye for me to procure the story of Seyf-el-Mulook, and bring it to me. If ye find it with any one, excite his desire for its price, and whatsoever he demandeth of gold and silver give him it; even if he demand of you a thousand pieces of gold, give him what ye have ready and promise him the remainder, and bring it to me. Whichever of you findeth this story and bringeth it to me, I will bestow upon him sumptuous robes of honour and abundant favours, and there shall be unto me none dearer than he.—Then the merchant Hasan said to one of them, Go thou to the countries of El-Hind and Es-Sind, and their provinces and districts. And he said to another, Go thou to the countries of Persia and China, and their districts. And to another he said, Go thou to the countries of Khurásán, and its provinces and districts. To another he said, Go thou to the countries of the West, and its regions and its districts and its provinces and all its quarters. And he said to the other, the fifth, Go thou to the countries of Syria and Egypt, and their provinces and districts. The merchant then chose for them an auspicious day, and said to them, Set forth on your journeys this day, and strive diligently to accomplish my affair, and be not slothful though the case should require the sacrifice of your lives. So they bade him farewell, and set forth, and each of them went to the quarter to which he had commanded him to go. Four of them, however, were absent four months, and searched, and found not aught. Therefore the bosom of the merchant Hasan was contracted when the four memlooks returned to him, and informed him that they had searched the cities and the countries and the districts for the objects of their master's desire, and found not of it aught.

"But as to the fifth memlook, he journeyed until he entered Syria and arrived at the city of Damascus, and he found it to be a pleasant, secure city, with trees and rivers and fruits, and birds that proclaimed the perfection of God, the One, the Omnipotent, who created the night and the day. He remained in it some days, inquiring for that which his master wanted; but no one gave him information of it. He then desired to depart thence, and to journey to another place; and, lo, he saw a young man running, and stumbling upon his skirts: so the memlook said to him, Wherefore dost thou run, and art thou distressed, and whither repairest thou? And he answered him, Here is an excellent sheykh who every day seateth himself upon a stool at this time, and relateth pleasant tales and histories and night-stories, the like of which no one hath heard; and I am running that I may find for myself a place near unto him, and fear that I shall not obtain a place on account of the crowd. The memlook therefore said to him, Take me with thee. And the young man replied, Hasten in thy pace. So he closed his door, and hastened with him until he arrived at the place in which the sheykh recited amid the people, when he saw that sheykh to be a person of comely face, and sitting upon a stool reciting to the people. He seated himself near to him, and listened to hear his story; and when the time of sunset came, the sheykh ended the story, and the people, having heard what he had recited, dispersed from around him. And thereupon the memlook advanced to him and saluted him, and he returned his salutation with exceeding greeting and honour. The memlook then said to him, Verily, O my master the sheykh, thou art a comely, reverend man, and thy recitation is pleasant, and I desire to inquire of thee respecting a thing, and the sheykh replied, Inquire respecting what thou wilt. So the memlook said to him, Hast thou the night-story of Seyf-el-Mulook and Bedeea-el-Jemál? The sheykh said to him, And from whom heardest thou these words, and who is he who informed thee of this? The memlook answered, I heard not this from any one; but I am from a distant country, and have come seeking for this story, and whatsoever thou demandest as its price, I will give it thee, if thou have it and wilt bestow it as a favour and charity upon me, and in the generosity of thy nature wilt give it as an alms from thee. If my soul were at my disposal and I sacrificed it to thee for it, my heart would be pleased by doing so.— And the sheykh replied, Be of good heart and cheerful eye; for it shall be produced to thee; but this is a story which none relateth in the beaten way, nor would I give this story to every one. The memlook therefore said to him, By Allah, O my master, do not covetously withhold it from me; but demand of me whatever thou wilt. And the sheykh replied, If thou desire this story, give me a hundred pieces of gold, and I will give it thee; but on five conditions.

"So when he knew that it was in the possession of the sheykh, and that he consented to give it him, he rejoiced exceedingly, and said to him, I will give thee a hundred pieces of gold as its price, and ten as a gratuity, and receive it on the conditions that thou hast mentioned. And the sheykh replied, Go, bring the gold and receive what thou wantest. Wherefore the memlook arose, and kissed the hands of the sheykh, and went to his lodging joyful and happy. He took in his hand a hundred pieces of gold and ten, and put them into a purse that he had with him; and when the morning came, he arose and put on his clothes, and, taking the pieces of gold, went with them to the sheykh. He saw him sitting at the door of his house, and saluted him; and he returned his salutation. He then gave him the hundred pieces of gold and ten, and the sheykh, having received them from him, arose, and entered his house, taking the memlook in; and he seated him in a place, and brought to him an inkhorn and a pen and some paper; and he brought to him also a book, and said to him, Transcribe what thou seekest from this book of the night-story of Seyf-el-Mulook. The memlook therefore sat writing this story until he had finished the transcription of it, when he read it to the sheykh, and he corrected it; and after that, the sheykh said to him, Know, O my son, that the first condition is, that thou relate not this story in the beaten way; nor shalt thou relate it among women and slave-girls, nor among male black slaves and stupid persons, nor among boys; but thou shalt only recite it among emeers and kings and wezers, and persons of knowledge, such as expositors and others. And the memlook assented to the conditions, kissed the hands of the sheykh, bade him farewell, and departed from him. He set forth on his journey that day joyful and happy, and ceased not to prosecute his journey with diligence, by reason of the great joy that he experienced on account of his acquisition of the story of Seyf-el-Mulook, until he came to his country; and he sent his servant to convey the good news to the merchant, and to say to him, Thy memlook hath arrived safely, and attained his wish and desire. And when the memlook arrived at the city of his master, and sent to him the messenger of good news, there remained not of the period agreed upon between the King and the merchant Hasan more than ten days. He then went in to his master the merchant, and acquainted him with that which had happened to him; whereat he rejoiced greatly. The memlook rested in his private apartment, and gave to his master the book containing the story of Seyf-el-Mulook and Bedeea-el-Jemál; and when his master saw that, he bestowed on the memlook all the clothes that were upon him, and gave him ten excellent horses, and ten camels, and ten mules, and three black slaves, and two memlooks.

"The merchant then took the story, wrote it plainly in his own hand, and went up to the King, and said to him, O fortunate King, I have brought a night-story, and a pleasant, rare tale, the like of which no one hath ever heard. And when the King heard the words of the merchant Hasan, he ordered immediately that every intelligent emeer should come, and every learned man who excelled in science, and every one versed in polite literature, and each poet and sagacious person. Then the merchant Hasan sat and read this story before the King; and when the King and every one who was present heard it, they all wondered and approved of it. All who were present approved of it, and they showered upon him gold and silver and jewels; and the King gave orders to present to the merchant Hasan a sumptuous robe of honour of the most magnificent of his apparel, gave him a great city with its castles and its fields, made him one of the greatest of his wezers, and seated him on his right hand. He then ordered the scribes to write this story in letters of gold, and to place it in his private repositories; and the King used, whenever his bosom was contracted, to summon the merchant Hasan, and he read it."

NOTE 2. These names are Arabic ("Ásim" signifying "defending," &c.; and "Safwán," "clear and cold," applied to a day); and (notwithstanding the pretended scenes and age of the story) the manners and customs which it describes, and the dresses, when any kind is specified, are Arabian. The author evidently seems to have intended Cairo as the capital of the King. (See Note 18 below.)

NOTE 3. "Fáris" signifies "a horseman," &c.; and "Sáleh," "good," "just," &c.

NOTE 4. In the Breslau edition, and in Trébutien's version, the place of Suleymán's abode at this time is said to have been Sebá, of El-Yemen, the seat of government of Bilkees, "the Queen of Sheba" mentioned in the Bible.

NOTE 5. Here it appears that the phrase "to kiss the ground" is to be understood in its literal sense; but I believe that this is never the case when the act is said, in this work, to be performed by a Muslim.—See Note 15 to Chapter vi.

NOTE 6. "The same ceremony is still observed at the audiences which the Porte gives to Ambassadors. Oriental politeness requires that refreshments be presented to guests before inquiring the motive of their visit." (Note by Von Hammer, in Trébutien's version.)

NOTE 7. Mohammad did not profess to reach a new religion, but to restore the only true religion; and this is called "El-Islám," which signifies "resignation [to God]."

NOTE 8. By the "two prayers," it appears from what follows, that the prayers of noon and afternoon are meant.

NOTE 9. So in the Breslau edition: of the edition of Cairo, "two tunics;" but only one is mentioned afterwards.

NOTE 10. The words "with all his subjects" I have inserted on the authority of the Breslau edition.

NOTE 11. The word rendered "onion-sauce" is "takleeyeh." My sheykh explains it as "onions cooked in clarified butter, after which they are put upon other cooked food."

NOTE 12. See Note 67 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 13. "Such rejoicings" are still usual at Constantinople, under the name of 'dónánmah,' not only when the Sultanas are enceintes, but also when they are brought to bed. In 1803, the rumor of the pregnancy of a Sultana, being falsely spread, involved all the ministers at Constantinople in useless expenses, to prepare for a dónánmah which did not take place." (Note by Von Hammer, in Trébutien's version.)

NOTE 14. "Seyf-el-Mulook" signifies "the Sword of the Kings." In the Breslau edition and in Trébutien's version, the astrologers are here said to have cast the Prince's nativity, and to have foreseen various events which the tale afterwards relates.

NOTE 15. "Sá'ed" signifies "fore arm;" and hence it is applied to "a chief, upon whom people rely."

NOTE 16. In the Breslau edition, they are said to have been taught the Kur-án, &c.

NOTE 17. "Záwiyeh" has before been explained, as a name given in Egypt to a small mosque.

NOTE 18. "The Horse-course of the Elephant" here mentioned seems to be that of the Lake of the Elephant, which, according to El-Makreezee (as stated in his "Khitat"), was made towards the close of the seventh century of the Flight, and afterwards in the seventeenth year of the next century, became the site of stables. In the Breslau edition, the Horse-course is called "el-Meydán el-Adl" this I suppose to be a mistake for "Meydán El-'Adil" (or the Horse-course of El-'Adil); as El-'Adil was the surname of the King who made the Horse-course of the Lake of the Elephant. If so, we must infer (as I have observed in the second of these notes) that Cairo is intended as the capital of the King 'Ásim, notwithstanding the anachronism thus implied.

NOTE 19. A description of banquets of the kind here mentioned has been given in Note 7 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 20. I suppose either the outer curtains of the King's pavilion to be here meant, or the inner curtains of its vestibule.

NOTE 21. Von Hammer, in illustration of this passage, mentions the custom, still existing, of girding the sabre on the side of an eastern sovereign when he mounts the throne; and adds, that the girdle is found, upon their monuments, as one of the insignia of the ancient Kings of Egypt. Being adorned with most valuable jewels, like the crown, the girdle is still one of the insignia of many Eastern Kings.

NOTE 22. In my original is here added "and the signet" (muhr); and in the Breslau edition, "and the bow;" but neither of these things is mentioned before or after.

NOTE 23. In my original, the name of the father of Bedeea-el-Jemál is here written "Shemmákh," or "Shemákh," as in Trébutien's version; but he is often mentioned afterwards and always called "Shahyál."

NOTE 24. Respecting Bábil, and the Garden of Irem, see Note 14 to Chapter iii., and the anecdote commencing in page 1125.

NOTE 25. So in the Breslau edition and in Trébutien's version: in my original twenty thousand.

NOTE 26. "Faghfoor" is a common title given by the Muslims to Emperors of China. In my original, by the misplacing of a diacritical point and the omission of a letter, it is converted into "Kaafoo."

NOTE 27. In the original there is a play upon words; "sabr," the name of the aloe, signifying "patience." So also in the next verse.

NOTE 28. See the last paragraph of Note 5 to Chapter i.

NOTE 29. Here we have again "the Old Man of the Sea," whose nature and country (supposed to be Sumatra) have been considered in Note 64 to Chapter xx.; but in this instance we find him considered as a Márid, which is properly an evil Jinnee of the most powerful class. Some other incidents in the present tale will be found to be nearly the same as certain events in the Voyages of Es-Sindibád of the Sea; but it is inferior to those tales, and apparently in some measure copied from them, and from the romance of Seyf Zul-Yezen. I have, therefore, not referred to these coincidences in my notes to the Voyages of Es-Sindibád.

NOTE 30. See Note 39 to Chapter xx.

NOTE 31. These verses, I suspect, are by some Soofee poet. See Note 102 to Chapter x.

NOTE 32. Here, and afterwards, I read "kelek" (a raft), as in the Breslau edition, instead of "fulk," which signifies "a ship" or other vessel.

NOTE 33. In my original, "with the remaining memlook." I have corrected this passage, and another afterwards in the same manner, on the authority of the Breslau edition.

NOTE 34. Here again I adopt a reading of the Breslau edition.

NOTE 35. On this passage, my sheykh has written upon the margin of my original, "Were they Jews? If this were not in the time of Suleymán, it might be said that these apes were the Jews who were transformed on the day of their transgression with respect to the Sabbath." These are mentioned in the sixty-first verse of the second chapter of the Kur-án, and, as stated by Sale, were some dwellers at Eyleh (or Elath), on the Red Sea, who lived in the time of David, and were transformed into apes for catching fish on the Sabbath. After remaining in this condition three days, they were destroyed by a wind which swept them all into the sea.—But it appears from what is afterwards stated in Trébutien's version, that by these apes are meant the descendants of a remnant of the tribe of 'Ád. At the time of the general destruction of this tribe (mentioned in Note 37 to Chapter ii.), a company belonging to it had gone to Mekkeh to pray for rain; and the persons composing this company, or their descendants, were afterwards transformed by God into apes. (See Pocock's Spec. Hist. Arab., ed. 1806, pp. 36 and 37.)

NOTE 36. In my original "their islands."

NOTE 37. The words rendered "And an abandoned well, and a lofty palace," are from the forty-fourth verse of the twenty-second chapter of the Kur-án. They are either misunderstood or purposely misapplied, in the tale; the true meaning being, "And [how many] a well [hath been] abandoned, and [how many] a lofty palace!" Others, however, have misunderstood them, and given to them a particular application. "The Oriental geographers," observes Von Hammer, "state these places [called in Arabic 'el-Beer el-Mo'attalah' and 'el Kasr el-Mesheed'] to be in the province of Hadramót, and we wait for a new Niebuhr to inform us what are the monuments or the ruins thus called."—"Yáfith" and "Nooh" are the names which we write "Japheth" and "Noah."

NOTE 38. The word in my original is "eewán;" but this means here, as my sheykh has noted, what is now commonly called a "leewán." It has been described in Note 12 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 39. "Dólet," which signifies "fortune," "empire," &c., I suppose to be here the proper name; and "Khátoon" (i. e. Lady), a title subjoined in the Turkish manner.

NOTE 40. By "the city of Sarandeeb" we must understand the capital of the island of Ceylon.

NOTE 41. "El-Kulzum" is the ancient "Clysma," whence the Red Sea is called "the Sea of El-Kulzum."

NOTE 42. See Note 28 to Chapter x., and Note 6 to Chapter xxiii.

NOTE 43. From the sequel, as well as from what has been said above in Note 37, it appears that this is meant as a falsehood of the Jinnee, to deceive the lady.

NOTE 44. The words "and remaineth with me three days," &c., are omitted in the Cairo edition. I have supplied them from the edition of Breslau.

NOTE 45. "For, had she remembered her, probably she had come to her, as she was a Jinneeyeh."

NOTE 46. "Hátim" I suppose to be the name of the 'Efreet. In the Breslau edition it is written "Khátim."

NOTE 47. The word for which I write "coffer" is here, in my original, "tábak" or "tábik;" but afterwards, "táboot."

NOTE 48. Here again, as in the instances mentioned above, in Note 32, "fulk" is put in my original for "kelek."

NOTE 49. He put the sword between himself and the lady from a motive of modesty and respect.

NOTE 50. The word rendered "lying" is "sáke'." My sheykh supposes it to be a vulgar word derived from "sakeea," for "sakeea," which signifies "hoar-frost:" but I imagine that the word 'sáke'," i. e. "lying," or "a liar," had escaped his memory at the time of his reading this passage.

NOTE 51. This city and harbour I suppose to be imaginary. The name of the former is derived from "emáreh," which signifies "the being inhabited," &c.: that of the latter may be rendered "the lurking-place of the two seas," or "— of the province [of Arabia] called El-Bahreyn." In the Breslau edition, the city is called "Amár," and the harbour, "Beyn el-Bahreyn."

NOTE 52. This name, I rather think, should be "Ali-l-Mulk," or "the High in Dominion."

NOTE 53. "Mo'een-ed-Deen" signifies "the Aider of the Religion."

NOTE 54. "'Shoom' is a kind of tough wood of which are made small staves wherewith asses are driven." Sir Gardner Wilkinson informs me that it is ash.

NOTE 55. In Trébutien's version, this cannibal is here called (vol. ii. p. 168) "Goul-Eli-Fenioun;" and the following note by Von Hammer is subjoined. "There was no need of this similitude of name to prove that all this episode is a manifest imitation of the adventures of Ulysses in the cave of Polyphemus, and that this latter is the same as Goul-Eli-Fenioun: which induces the belief that the Arabs have been acquainted with the poems of Homer." But may not the story of Ulysses and Polyphemus have been of Eastern origin? See some remarks on the knowledge that the Arabs had of Homer, in the Review subjoined to this work.—Notes 39 and 52 to Chapter xx. will serve to illustrate the account of the Ghool in the present tale.

NOTE 56. In the Breslau edition, the ship is not wrecked, but conveys Sá'ed, with the other passengers, safely to the city where Seyf-el-Mulook finds him.

NOTE 57. Instead of "enchanting, cruel eye," we may, as my sheykh observes, read, "enchanting eye of a Jinneeyeh."

NOTE 58. For the story of Suleymán and Bilkees (whom I have mentioned above, in Note 4), see the twenty-seventh chapter of the Kur-án, and Sale's notes.

NOTE 59. The action here described is one indicative of extreme submission.

NOTE 60. In the Breslau edition, Shah-yál is here very properly made to say, "Dost thou not know that a single human being is, with God, better than a thousand Jinnees?"

NOTE 61. This sentence is from the Breslau edition.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-FIFTH

NOTE 1. The hero of this story is called in Dr. Scott's translation "Mazin of Khorassaun," or Khurásán. He is there said, in the commencement of the tale, to have "resided in the city of Khorassaun;" but afterwards, in "Bussorah," or El-Basrah. The story in Dr. Scott's version is short in comparison with that in my original; but in other respects, for the most part it agrees with the latter. I have before mentioned, that another tale of the Thousand and One Nights (that of Ján-sháh) is similar to this in its general character, and in the incidents upon which it is chiefly founded.

NOTE 2. In the Breslau edition, Hasan is said to have squandered away his wealth.

NOTE 3. There are various kinds of kohl, as mentioned in Note 34 to Chapter ii. Those which are used merely for the sake of ornament are black; but there are many other kinds of different colours employed for medicinal purposes.

NOTE 4. "That is," as my sheykh observes in a marginal note, "but few persons know it: and in this expression is a double meaning: it signifies also 'I know not that.'"

NOTE 5. I read "ke'áb" (plural of "kaab," "a cup,") for a word written in my original "kabbát," and in the Breslau edition "kaabán."

NOTE 6. "The Persian wrote these two verses, to denote that he had taken Hasan, and that he (the latter) would not return."

NOTE 7. This is not consistent with the sequel. The passage is perhaps corrupted by copyists. It should rather be said, "he used every year to take a Muslim and to sacrifice him in order to attain an object of his desire."

NOTE 8. The drum and plectrum here mentioned (called, respectively, in my original, "tabl" and "zakhmeh" or "zukhmeh") appear to be similar to those described in the following passage. "Darweeshes, in religious processions, &c., and in begging, often make use of a little tabl, or kettle-drum, called 'báz,' six or seven inches in diameter which is held in the left hand, by a little projection in the centre of the back; and beaten by the right hand, with a short leathern strap, or a stick." The term which designates the plectrum in my original is also applied to a stirrup-leather, or strap. The drum is generally of tinned copper, with a parchment face.

NOTE 9. This seems, from the sequel, to be the same palace near which they before passed. We may suppose that it was situate a little above the foot of the mountain, and that the Magian had pursued a very circuitous route (along a winding valley) in order to avoid passing close beneath it.

NOTE 10. So in the Breslau edition: in the Cairo edition, "rakhams," or aquiline vultures.

NOTE 11. There is an incident similar to this in the romance of Seyf Zu-l-Yezen, which work I have mentioned before. Misr, the son of Seyf Zu-l-Yezen, is sewed up in a camel's hide, and carried by a rukh to the top of a mountain, to obtain a treasure for a treacherous Magian, named Bahrám.—It is also remarkable that the story of Hasan of El-Basrah presents two other incidents which I have found described in the romance above mentioned. See Notes 15 and 16 below.

NOTE 12. These verses, except the last, have occurred before, in page 135. See the notes there referred to.

NOTE 13. The form of this prayer I have given in my work on the Modern Egyptians, vol. ii. ch. xv.

NOTE 14. "Mesheed" generally signifies "plastered" but here its meaning is "lofty."

NOTE 15. This is one of the incidents alluded to above, in Note 11. Seyf Zu-l-Yezen enters a forbidden closet in a palace, and ascends thence, by a flight of steps, to the roof.

NOTE 16. This is the last of the incidents that I have to notice as occurring in the romance of Seyf Zu-l-Yezen. The chief hero of this romance (Seyf himself) sees a number of beautiful damsels with clothing and wings of feathers, who fly like birds and come to a pool in a pavilion, near which he has concealed himself, in the midst of a garden. There they divest themselves of their dresses of feathers, and bathe; and Seyf, like Hasan of El-Basrah, becoming enamoured of the chief damsel, adopts the same plan as Hasan with the view of capturing her, and experiences the same result.—Trébutien mentions (vol. ii. p. 208) a similar incident in a German tale. "Il est assez remarquable qu'il existe en Allemagne une tradition à peu près semblable, et qui a fourni le sujet d'un des contes de Musæus, intitulé le Voile enlevé."—I also find that in the first volume of Mr. Keightley's "Fairy Mythology" is a Shetland legend of the same kind; but the vehicle is a seal-skin.

NOTE 17. See Note 43 to Chapter x.

NOTE 18. The new moon of the Festival of Ramadán (commonly called the Minor Festival) is anxiously watched for, and the sight of it gives delight, as it shews that the month of abstinence is ended. Hence there is a double reason for the comparison in the text.

NOTE 19. See Note 24 to Chapter xv.

NOTE 20. In the latter hemistich of this verse, in my original, a transposition is required for the sake both of the sense and the measure, as my sheykh has observed. For "wa-hwa fi-l-hobbi" we must read "fi-l-hobbi wa-hwa."

NOTE 21. "Mandharah" is here put in my original instead of "mak'ad."

NOTE 22. See Note 58 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 23. The words "an army" I have inserted on the authority of the Breslau edition. — Dr. Scott, in his sixty-eighth note, in illustration of a corresponding passage in the story of "Mazin of Khorassan," gives an extract from Barrow's Public Life of Lord Macartney (vol. ii. p. 23), in which his lordship, speaking of the Cossack soldiery, says, that there is one horde of them, consisting of about 30,000 fighting men, called the Cossacks of Zaporavia, whose women reside in certain islands of the Nieper in their neighbourhood, and are only visited by them at a particular season of the year. The male children, at a certain age, are delivered to the fathers, like whom they become hunters and warriors, while the females remain with their mothers.

NOTE 24. Thus Seyf Zu-l-Yezan, in the case above alluded to (in Note 16), is directed by a friendly Jinneeyeh to steal the feather-dress of his beloved.

NOTE 25. The "abááh" (vulgarly called "abáyeḥ") is a kind of woollen cloak, generally striped, brown and white.

NOTE 26. These words "and demanded," &c., are from the Breslau edition. In my original, the damsels are here said to have gone forth again to the chase, and to have caught the game mentioned immediately after in my translation. Among the game are particularized "wild oxen;" by which name, four different kinds of antelopes are called, by some: it is properly applied to bovine antelopes.

NOTE 27. That is, the hand of the deputy. See Note 39 to Chapter iv.

NOTE 28. This is a vulgar proverb, as my sheykh has observed in a marginal note.

NOTE 29. "Tohfeh" signifies "a present," and particularly "a rare," or "pleasing," or "a rare and pleasing, present."

NOTE 30. See Note 16 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 31. In my original, "the sixth," but this is an error, which my sheykh has noted in the margin; adding, that Er-Rasheed occasioned a proverb, which is applied to any person like that Khaleefeh in his actions, "Is he the fifth of the sons of El-'Abbás?" — meaning Er-Rasheed; for none of the 'Abbásees did like him; neither any before him nor any after him. — Is not this proverb, current in Egypt, sufficient to account for the frequent mention of Er-Rasheed in many of the tales of the Thousand and One Nights, without our supposing that these tales were written by a native of Baghdád, and a subject of the 'Abbásees?

NOTE 32. — On the Islands of Wák-Wák. These islands, which are called in my original "Wák," and in the Breslau edition "Wák el-Wák," are commonly called "The Islands of Wák-Wák" or "— of El-Wák-Wák." By some European writers they are supposed to be the Japan Islands: by Langlès, the Sunda Islands. But I rather think that the Arab geographers applied the name of Wák-Wák to all the islands with which they were acquainted on the east and south-east of Borneo. The following particulars respecting the islands thus called by them are derived from the works of El-Kazweene and Ibn-El-War-dee; but chiefly from the latter author.

These islands extend (or are contiguous to) the Islands (or Island) of Er-Ráij or Ez-Zánij (before identified with Borneo), and the navigation to them is by the stars. They are said to be one thousand and seven hundred in number, and governed by a woman, named Demharah, who wears a robe woven with gold, and has shoes (or sandals) of gold. No one walks in all these islands with any other kind of shoe: if he wear any other kind, his feet are cut. The Queen rides amid her slaves and troops with elephants and standards and drums and trumpets and beautiful female slaves. The place of her abode is an island called Amboobeh, the inhabitants of which are skilful in manufactures, so that they weave shirts of one piece each, sleeves and body together, and make great ships of small pieces of wood, and make houses of wood that move upon the face of the water. 'Eesà (or Moosà), the son of El-Mubárák, Es-Seeráfee, relates, "I went in to this Queen, and saw her sitting naked upon a couch of gold, with a crown of gold upon her head, and before her were four thousand maid-servants, beautiful virgins. They were of the Magian religion, with uncovered heads, and on the head of each of them was a comb of ivory, adorned with mother-of-pearl (or shells); some of them had two combs, or three, or four, or more, to the number of twenty." The people ornament themselves with cowries, which they also treasure up. Here too is a tree that bears fruits like women, with bodies, eyes, limbs, &c., like those of women: they have beautiful faces, and are suspended by their hair. They come forth from integuments like large leathern bags; and when they feel the air and the sun, they cry out "Wák! Wák!" until their hair is cut; and when it is cut, they die; and the people of these islands understand this cry, and augur ill from it. The land where these fruits grow is the best of lands, and the most abundant in odours and perfumes; and in it are rivers sweeter than hydromel and dissolved sugar; but it has no inhabitants except the elephants, some of which attain the height of eleven cubits; and it has abundance of birds. No one knoweth what is beyond it save God. From one of these Islands of Wák-Wák there issueth a great torrent like pitch, which floweth into the sea, and the fish are burnt thereby, and float upon the water. — The Islands of Wák-Wák contain gold in such abundance that the inhabitants make the chains of their dogs and other beasts, and the collars of their apes, of that metal; and the great men make bricks of gold, and build with them palaces and houses, well and skilfully. These islands also contain the ebony-tree. — Ibn-El-Wardee likewise mentions, among the islands of the same sea (the Sea of China), the Island of Women, in which there is not a single male inhabitant.

NOTE 33. It is a common custom of the Arabs to address an old woman by the appellation of "pilgrim," in Arabic "hájjah." This word, in my original, is here written (as it is usually pronounced) "hajjah."

NOTE 34. These were to be shewn to Hasan, on his return, as the graves of his wife and two children, as afterwards appears.

NOTE 35. I here read (as proposed by my sheykh) "neseem" (zephyr) instead of "nedeem" (boon-companion).

NOTE 36. The word which I have rendered "changeable" (namely "ghayoor") generally signifies "jealous;" but for giving it the former signification I have the authority of my sheykh, in a marginal note in volume i. page 360 of my original, where nearly the same verse occurs.

NOTE 37. For "semerin," in my original, my sheykh has substituted "saharin," and I have followed his reading.

NOTE 38. That is, she is like the full moon, which is fourteen nights old.

NOTE 39. "'Abd-El-Kuddos" signifies "the Servant of the Very Holy."

NOTE 40. An Arab often does thus when meditating; and thus, while He was sitting in the Temple (upon the floor), when the woman taken in adultery was brought before Him, "Jesus stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground." (John viii. 6.)

NOTE 41. Here, in my original, for the words signifying "the accursed Iblees," is put "Mo'een;" but afterwards, Abu-Ruweysh is called "son of the daughter of the accursed Iblees." He appears, however, to be a virtuous person.

NOTE 42. In my original, the birds are here called vultures ("nusoor").

NOTE 43. Ed-Deylem is a large province of Persia, bounding the Caspian Sea, on the south. — In the Breslau edition, instead of "here are soldiers of Ed-Deylem," we read "here is a great army."

NOTE 44. "Umm-ed-Dawáhee" signifies "Mother of Calamities."

NOTE 45. It seems that by the term "islands" here used, we are to understand peninsulas, which is often the case. The reader will observe, in the account of the islands of Wák-Wák here given, some inconsistencies which I cannot pretend to reconcile.

NOTE 46. I omit some passages &c. of my original in the paragraph to which this note refers.

NOTE 47. The youngest was his wife; but it appears afterwards that the eldest daughter bore a strong resemblance to her.

NOTE 48. "Noor-el-Hudà" signifies "the Light of Day."

NOTE 49. In my original, they are here said to be seven.

NOTE 50. "Menár-es-Senà" may be rendered "the Pharos of Splendour."

NOTE 51. The first and last of these names have been explained. The second signifies "the Star of the Morning"; the third, "the Sun of the Forenoon;" the fourth, "the Tree of Pearls;" the fifth, "the Food of Hearts;" and the sixth, "the Glory of Damsels."

NOTE 52. See Note 24 to Chapter xv.

NOTE 53. So in the Breslau edition: in the edition of Cairo, "to the place whence I had brought it."

NOTE 54. Thus in the Breslau edition: in the Cairo edition, "the Castle of the Birds." "The Islands of Camphor and the Castle of Crystal" have been mentioned in a former tale: see Note 1 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 55. The kind of cap here mentioned (in the Arabic, "tákeeyeh,") is a close-fitting skull-cap, which is worn next the head. It is generally of cotton. Sometimes the crown is composed of four or three triangular pieces, which are most commonly of different-coloured silks.

NOTE 56. The "jedeed" is a copper coin which, I believe, is now no longer current. My sheykh states, in a marginal note, that ten jedeeds were equivalent to a nusf faddah, vulgarly called nuss, respecting which see Note 17 to Chapter iii. The plural is "jided."

NOTE 57. "Zát-ed-Dawáhee" is similar in import to "Umm-ed-Dawáhee," which has been explained above.

NOTE 58. We must suppose (what is most probable) that the vessels of glass and China-ware fell upon a mattress extending along the side of the room, and therefore did not break.

NOTE 59. This verse, and others nearly agreeing with those which here follow it, have occurred before.

NOTE 60. "Nejdee" signifies "of Nejd" (the central and largest province of Arabia), which is famous for its excellent horses.

NOTE 61. In my original they are here said to be ten; but afterwards, whenever they are mentioned, seven.

NOTE 62. So before; but here, in my original, three.

NOTE 63. By the mother's side, as before stated, Abu-r-Ruweysh was the grandson of Iblees.

NOTE 64. See Note 5 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 65. Here, as in the instance pointed out in Note 54, I read "Castle of Crystal," agreeably with the Breslau edition, instead of "Castle of the Birds."

NOTE 66. These verses seem to be addressed to his mother; not to the seven damsels.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-SIXTH

NOTE 1. This is explained by Note 81 to Chapter v.

NOTE 2. The "bayád" is a fish of the genus silurus. It is common in the Nile.

NOTE 3. "Mo'allim" (vulgarly pronounced "M'allim") is a title usually given in Egypt and other Arab countries to any Christian or Jew; and also to a master in any art or trade. It signifies "teacher."

NOTE 4. The Arabs in general are extremely fearful of the influence of the evil eye upon articles of food, which, by many persons who deal in them, are consequently concealed from the public gaze.

NOTE 5. What is commonly called a "mowwál," but properly "mawáleeýà" according to some, or, according to others, "mawáliýà," is a kind of short poem. It generally consists of five lines, the measure of which is like a species of the "besect," admitting, however, of licences not allowed by the strict rules of prosody; and all these five lines, except the penultimate, end with the same rhyme. The language of the mowwál, if I may judge from all the poems of this kind that I have seen and heard, is a mixture of the classical and the vulgar.

NOTE 6. My original here presents an evident error, which I have corrected.

NOTE 7. In my original, this person is said to be "the Virgin," as though the dreamer were a Christian.

NOTE 8. Aboo Bekr received from Mohammad the surname of "the Very Veracious" (es-Siddeek) on account of his asserting the truth of the Prophet's miraculous Night-Journey.

NOTE 9. Perhaps "Sa'ádeh" (which signifies "felicity," "prosperity," &c.) was the name of the Jew's daughter, and from her he was called "Ábu-s-Sa'ádát;" though Khaleefeh supposed it to be the name of his wife.

NOTE 10. The words which compose the profession of the faith of El-Islám ("There is no deity but God: Mohammad is God's Apostle") are commonly called "the Two Sayings."

NOTE 11. Some readers may imagine that a Muslim, in his own country, could not be beaten at the command of a Jew; but Arabs have not unfrequently thus suffered both from Christians and Jews under the domination of the Memlooks and Turks.

NOTE 12. The Muslims believe that the number of the faithful is decreed by God, and that no act of man can increase or diminish it.

NOTE 13. It is said, at the close of the story, that Khaleefeh resided in a Khán; and the Breslau edition describes him as dwelling in a magazine of a ruined Khán. According to my original, his habitation seems to have been a closet adjoining a ruined saloon. The word which I have rendered "chamber" generally signifies "house."

NOTE 14. That is, his mind, under the influence of hasheesh, suggested to him the idea of stripping himself, &c. Most of Khaleefeh's oddities are such as might be the effect of hasheesh. See the fourth paragraph of Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 15. See above, Note 13.

NOTE 16. A "memrak" is generally a kind of small lantern for the admission of air, in the roof of a chamber: its form is octagonal; and its sides are of wooden lattice-work, supporting a cupola. But this term is also applied to a simple aperture in the roof, made for the same purpose, or to admit light.

NOTE 17. The "kamar" is a kind of belt containing a purse for money.

NOTE 18. By "Suleymán's prison" is meant one of the bottles of brass in which Suleymán confined the refractory Jinn, as mentioned in two former tales in this work.

NOTE 19. Here, and in the next sentence, I read "kóm" (a mound) instead of "karm," which signifies "a grape-vine."

NOTE 20. The "shemleh" is a kind of cloak, or wrapper, entirely enveloping the person.

NOTE 21. The "herám" (more properly "ehrá́m") is a kind of woollen sheet, mostly used by the western Arabs, both to envelop the body by day and as a night-covering. It is so called because it is similar to the covering of the body worn during the performance of the rites of pilgrimage.

NOTE 22. Imagining the fish to be from Paradise, he thought that this prayer would surely be answered.

NOTE 23. This is said ironically; for the commencement of the day was unfortunate, and its end seemed to be more unfortunate also.

NOTE 24. See Note 32 to Chapter v.

NOTE 25. The "shebbábeh" is a kind of flageolet, made of reed.

NOTE 26. My sheykh states that "shukeyr" is a diminutive form of "ashkar," which signifies "of a ruddy complexion," and also "tawny."

NOTE 27. "Kerish-en-Nukhál" may be rendered "Paunch of Bran." This nickname is applied by Khaleefeh to the Wezeer Jaafar.

NOTE 28. His case was like that of a peasant, who, on his demanding money due to him from the government for grain, or on some other account, is imprisoned for arrears of taxes due from his fellow-villagers; for tyrannical measures of this kind have been often practised.

NOTE 29. In my original, "that of Khaleefeh." I follow the reading which Trébutien's version shews to be that of Von Hammer's manuscript.

NOTE 30. Hamzeh was a brother of El-'Abbás, from whom the Khaleefehs of Baghdád derived their origin; and 'Akeel was a son of Aboo-Tálib, another brother of El-'Abbás.

NOTE 31. The meaning of this expression is, "I hope that thou hast good news to tell."

NOTE 32. That is, "to the Prince whose munificence is as a great river."

NOTE 33. "Nákhoodah" is a title of a master of a ship, and "zuleyt" is a term often applied to a low fellow.

NOTE 34. "Yásemeen" and "Narjis" (or Jasmine and Narcissus) are to be understood as the names of two female slaves, or, perhaps, two eunuchs, attendants of Koot-el-Kuloob.

NOTE 35. This is the Lawsonia inermis. See Note 22 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 36. This is to be understood as said in jest.

NOTE 37. I here read "mar'oob" (terrified) instead of "marhoob," which signifies "terrible."

NOTE 38. These words, "Verily God forgiveth," &c., are part of the fifty-fourth verse of the thirty-ninth chapter of the Kur-án.

NOTE 39. The next two stories in my original I omit. The first of these, which is "Mesroor and Zeyn-el-Mawásif," is a tale of the illicit amours of a Christian and a Jewess, who dupes her husband in various abominable ways. The husband, to separate her from her paramour, takes her with him on a journey; but she prefers a malicious suit against him to four judges, professing herself a Muslimeh, denying that she is his wife, and falsely accusing him of having defrauded her of fifteen thousand pieces of gold; and all the four judges, captivated by her beauty, decide in her favour. She receives the above-mentioned sum, and with other valuables, returns to her lover, who embraces El-Islám, and marries her. Her former husband also returns, and, by her direction, one of her female slaves informs him that she is dead, and shews him her pretended tomb: the Jew throws himself upon the tomb and faints, and while he is insensible, the female slave puts him into the tomb and closes it over him.—From this brief statement the reader will see that it is not a story fit to be included in the present series.

The other story is that of "Noor-ed-Deen and Maryam," which I omit because part of it is very similar to the story of "Alee Shér and Zumurrud," and part to that of "Alá-ed-Deen Abu-sh-Shámát," and neither of these two tales is among the best of the collection.

Then follow two anecdotes, of the latter of which I here give a translation. It commences with part of the Eight Hundred and Ninety-sixth Night, and ends with part of the Eight Hundred and Ninety-ninth.

The Man of Baghdád and his Slave-girl

There was in ancient times, a man in Baghdád, of the sons of the people of affluence, who inherited from his father abundant wealth, and he was enamoured of a slave-girl; wherefore he purchased her. She loved him as he loved her; and he ceased not to expend upon her until all his wealth passed away, and there remained not of it aught. He sought for some means of subsistence, but could not obtain it. And this young man, in the days of his riches, used to attend the assemblies of the scientific on account of his art in singing, in which he attained the utmost excellence; and he asked advice of one of his brethren, who said to him, I know not any occupation for thee better than thy singing with thy slave-girl; for by so doing thou wilt obtain much money, and eat and drink. But he and the damsel disliked that; and his slave-girl said to him, I have devised for thee a plan. And what, said he, is it? She answered, Thou shalt sell me, and we shall be delivered from this difficulty, I and thou, and I shall be in affluence, for none will buy such a one as myself but a person of affluence, and thus I may be a means of my return to thee. He therefore took her forth to the market, and the first person who saw her was a Hâshimee, of the people of El-Basrah, who was a well-bred man, polite, generous of soul; and he bought her for one thousand and five hundred pieces of gold.—But, says the young man, the owner of the slave-girl, when I had received the price, I repented and wept, I and the damsel, and I requested the cancelling of the sale. The Hâshimee, however, would not consent. So I put the pieces of gold into the purse, and I knew not whither to go; for my house was rendered desolate by her absence; and I wept and slapped myself and wailed as I had never done before. I entered one of the mosques, and sat weeping in it: and I was so stupefied that I became unconscious; and I slept, having put the purse beneath my head as a pillow. But I was not aware of it when a man pulled it from beneath my head, and departed with rapid pace. Then I awoke, alarmed and terrified, and found not the purse. I therefore rose to run after him; and, lo, my feet were tied by a rope: so I fell upon my face; and I proceeded to weep and to slap myself, saying to myself, Thy soul hath quitted thee, and thy wealth is lost!

My affliction was excessive; and I came to the Tigris, put my garment over my face, and cast myself into the river. But the persons present, perceiving me, said, Verily this is on account of a great trouble that hath befallen him!—and they cast themselves after me, and took me forth, and asked me respecting my case. I therefore informed them of the events that had befallen me, and they grieved thereat. Then a sheykh from among them came to me, and said, Thy wealth hath gone, and how would'st thou be the cause of the loss of thy soul, and become one of the people of the fire? Arise, and accompany me, that I may see thine abode.—And I did so; and when we came to my abode, he sat with me a while, until my feelings had become tranquil, and I thanked him for that. He then departed; and when he went forth from me, I was at the point of slaying myself; but I remembered the world to come, and the fire; and I went forth from my house, fleeing to one of my friends, and informed him of the events that had befallen me; whereupon he wept in compassion for me, and gave me fifty pieces of gold, saying, Accept my advice, and go forth immediately from Baghdád, and make use of this money for thy maintenance until thy heart shall be diverted from the love of her, and thou shalt cease to care for her. Thou art of the sons of the secretaries and writers, and thy handwriting is excellent, and thy polite attainments are surpassing: seek then whom thou wilt of the intendants, and throw thyself upon his generosity. Perhaps God will reunite thee with thy slave-girl.—And I attended to his advice. My resolution had become strengthened, and somewhat of my trouble of mind had quitted me; and I determined that I would repair to the province of Wásit; for I had in it relations.

Accordingly I went forth to the bank of the river, and I saw a moored vessel, the crew of which were transporting to it goods and costly stuffs: so I asked them to take me with them, but they replied, This vessel belongeth to a Hâshimee. We cannot take thee in this garb.—I however excited their desire for recompense; and thereupon they said, If it must be so, pull off these costly clothes that are upon thee, and put on the clothes of the sailors, and sit with us as though thou wert one of us. I therefore returned, and bought some sailor's clothes, and put them on, and came again to the vessel, which was going to El-Basrah. I embarked with the crew; and but a little while had elapsed when I saw my slave-girl herself, attended by two slave-girls to serve her. So the rage that I suffered became appeased, and I said within myself, Now I shall see her, and hear her singing, until we arrive at El-Basrah. And very soon came the Hâshimee, riding, and with him a party of people; and they embarked in that vessel. I proceeded down the river with them, and he caused the food to be brought forth, and ate with the damsel, while the rest ate in the midst of the vessel. The Hâshimee then said to the damsel, How long shall continue this abstaining from singing, and this constant mourning and weeping? Thou art not the first who hath become separated from the object of love.—So I knew what she felt with respect to her love of me. Then he put a curtain before the damsel at the side of the vessel, and, having called those who were by me, he sat with them, outside the curtain; and I asked respecting them, and, lo, they were his brothers. He caused the servants to bring out to them what they required of wine and dried fruits, and they ceased not to urge the damsel to sing until she called for a lute, and tuned it, and began to sing; and she sang these two verses:—

The company went away with my beloved at night, and forbore not from going with the desire of my heart;
 And in the heart of the enamoured, since their camels departed a fire like that of the ghadá hath raged.

Then weeping overpowered her, and she threw down the lute and ceased from singing. So the party were troubled, and I fell down in a fit, and the people thought that I had become possessed; wherefore one of them began to recite some words in my ear; and they ceased not to soothe the damsel, and to beg her to sing, until she tuned the lute again, and began to sing; and she sang this couplet:—

I stood and bewailed travellers who had departed. They are in my heart though they have gone far away.
 And I stood by the ruins, asking respecting them; and the house was desolate, and the abodes were uninhabited.

She then fell down in a fit, and a lamentation arose from the people. I, also, cried out, and fell down senseless; and the sailors were alarmed at me; and one of the pages of the Hâshimee said, How is it that ye have conveyed with you this madman? One of them therefore said to the others, When ye have arrived at one of the villages, turn him out, and rid us of him.

So great trouble affected me thereat, and painful torment of mind; but I hardened myself to the utmost, and said within myself, I have no resource by which to save myself from their hands except my informing her of my situation in the vessel, that she may not allow my going out. We then proceeded until we came near to a cultivated tract; whereupon the master of the vessel said, Go ye up with us to the bank. Accordingly the party landed; and it was eventide. I therefore arose and went behind the curtain, took the lute, and played several different airs, one after another, and I played an air that she had learned of me: then I returned to my place in the vessel. And after that, the people descended from the bank, and returned to their places in the vessel; and the moon shone upon the shore and the river: so the Hâshimee said to the damsel, By Allah I conjure thee that thou trouble not our life. She therefore took the lute, and touched it with her hand, and uttered a groan, whereat they imagined that her soul had quitted her. Then she said, By Allah, my master is with us in this vessel! The Hâshimee replied, By Allah, were he with us, I would not debar him from our society; for perhaps he might alleviate thy sorrow, and we should enjoy thy singing; but his being in the vessel is a thing far from truth. Upon this she said, I cannot strike the lute and play over different airs when my master is with us. The Hâshimee said, We will ask the sailors. And she replied, Do so. He therefore asked them, and said, Have ye taken any one with you as a passenger? And they answered, No:—and I feared that the inquiry would stop: so I laughed, and said, Yes; I was her master, and I taught her when I was her lord. And she said, By Allah, this is the speech of my lord! Therefore the pages came to me and took me to the Hâshimee; and when he saw me, he knew me, and he said, Wo to thee! What is this condition in which thou art, and what hath befallen thee that thou hast become in this state?—So I related to him the events of my case, and wept, and the wailing of the damsel was loud from behind the curtain, and the Hâshimee also wept, he and his brothers, with a violent weeping, in pity for me.

He then said, By Allah, I have not drawn near to this damsel, nor have I heard her sing, to this day! I am a man on whom God hath bestowed ample wealth, and I only came to Baghdád to hear singing, and to demand my pensions of the Prince of the Faithful. I had attained both objects; and when I desired to return to my home, I said within myself, I will hear somewhat [more] of the singing of Baghdád. I therefore purchased this damsel, and I knew not that ye were in this state. So I call God to witness that, when I arrive at El-Basrah, I will emancipate this damsel, and marry thee to her, and I will grant you allowances sufficient for you, and more; but on the condition that, when I desire to hear her sing, a curtain shall be suspended for her, and she shall sing behind the curtain; and thou shalt be of the number of my brethren and my boon-companions.—So I rejoiced thereat. Then the Hâshimee put his head within the curtain, and said to her, Will that content thee? And she betook herself to praying for him and thanking him. He then called for a page belonging to him, and said to him, Take the hand of this young man, pull off his clothes, and dress him in costly apparel, and perfume him with incense, and bring him to us. Accordingly the page took me, did with me as his master had ordered him, and brought me to him; and he put before me wine, like as he had put before them. The damsel then began to sing with the sweetest modulations, singing these verses: —

They reproached me for having shed my tears when the beloved came to bid farewell.
They have not experienced the taste of separation, nor the fire of sorrow that burneth my bosom.
Only the afflicted knoweth what is love; he whose heart is lost amid those dwellings.

— And the party were moved thereby with exceeding delight; and the joy of the young man so increased thereat that he took the lute from the damsel, played with it the sweetest modulations, and sang these verses: —

If thou ask a favour, ask it of the generous, who hath known, unceasingly, riches and opulence;
For asking of the generous is productive of honour, and asking of the base is productive of disgrace.

When abasement is a thing not to be avoided, meet with it by asking of the great.
Thine honouring the great is no abasement of thyself: it is only abasement to honour the little.

And the people (says the young man) rejoiced in me; their joy was excessive, and they ceased not to be in a state of joy and happiness, I singing a while, and the damsel a while, until we arrived at one of the ports.

The vessel moored there, and all who were in it went up on shore. I, also, went up; and I was intoxicated: so I sat, and sleep overcame me, and I slept; and the passengers returned to the vessel, which proceeded down the river with them, they not knowing of my absence; for they were likewise intoxicated; and I had given the money for my maintenance to the damsel, and there remained not with me aught. They arrived at El-Basrah; and I awoke not save by reason of the heat of the sun: and thereupon I arose and looked; but saw not any one; and I had forgotten to ask the Hâshimee his name, and where was his house at El-Basrah, and how he was known. I therefore became perplexed, and it seemed as though the state of joy in which I had been at finding the damsel had been a dream. I ceased not to remain in a state of perplexity until a great vessel passed by me, and I embarked in it and entered El-Basrah. I knew not in it any one, nor knew I the house of the Hâshimee; and I came to a grocer, procured from him an inkhorn and a piece of paper, and sat writing; and he admired my handwriting, and, seeing my dress to be dirty, asked me respecting my case. So I informed him that I was a stranger, a poor man; whereupon he said, Wilt thou reside with me, and receive every day half a piece of silver, and thy food and thy clothing, and manage for me the accounts of my shop? And I answered him, Yes: — and I resided with him, managed his affairs, and regulated for him his income and expenditure; and when a month had expired, the man saw his income to be increased, and his expenditure diminished. He therefore thanked me for that, and assigned me every day a piece of silver, until the year had passed, when he proposed to me that I should marry his daughter, and that he should make me his partner in the shop. And I gave him my assent thereto, took my wife, and kept to the shop. But I was broken in spirit and heart, with an aspect of grief. And the grocer used to drink, and invite me to do so; but I refused on account of my grief.

I remained in that state for a period of two years; and while I was in the shop, lo, there was a company having with them food and drink, and I asked the grocer respecting the matter, and he said, This is the day of the men of pleasure, when the people of mirth and sport, and the young men of affluence, go forth to the bank of the river, to eat and drink among the trees on the river of El-Ubulleh. And thereupon my soul invited me to divert myself with the sight of this thing, and I said within myself, Perhaps, when I see these people, I shall meet her whom I love. So I said to the grocer that I desired to do that; and he replied, Go forth with them as thou desirest. He then prepared for me some food and wine, and I proceeded until I came to the river of El-Ubulleh; but, lo, the people were departing. I therefore desired to depart with them; and, behold, there was the captain of the vessel in which were the Hâshimee and the damsel, he himself; and he was proceeding along the river of El-Ubulleh. So I cried out to him and his party; and he and those who were with him knew me, and they took me in among them, and said to me, Art thou living? And they embraced me, and asked me respecting my story; wherefore I acquainted them with it; and they said to me, We imagined that intoxication had overpowered thee, and that thou wast drowned. I then asked them respecting the state of the damsel, and they replied, When she knew of thy being lost, she rent her clothes, and burned the lute, and betook herself to slapping and wailing; and when we returned with the Hâshimee to El-Basrah, we said to her, Abstain from this weeping and mourning. But she replied, I will put on black apparel, and make me a tomb in the side of this house, and I will remain by that tomb, and repent of singing. And we allowed her to do so, and she hath remained in that state until now.

Then they took me with them; and on my arriving at the house, I saw her in that state; and when she saw me, she uttered a great groan, so that I imagined she had died; and I embraced her with a long embrace. The Hâshimee then said to me, Take her. I replied, Yes; but emancipate her as thou promisedst me, and marry me to her. And he did so, and gave us costly goods, and abundance of apparel, and furniture, and five hundred pieces of gold, saying, This is the amount of what I desire to allow you two every month; but on the condition of thy being my boon-companion, and of my hearing the damsel sing. After that, he appropriated to us exclusively a house, and gave orders to convey to it all that we required; and when I went to that house, I found it covered with furniture and stuffs, and I conveyed it to the damsel. Then I came to the grocer, informed him of all that had happened to me, and begged that he would absolve me of guilt in divorcing his daughter without her having committed any fault. I gave her her dowry, and what was incumbent on me; and I have remained with the Hâshimee in this state two years, and become a person of great affluence. The state in which I was with the damsel in Baghdâd was restored to me, and God, the Bountiful, hath dispelled our trouble, loaded us with abundant benefits, and made the result of our patience to be the attainment of our desire. To Him then be praise, first and last!—And God is all-knowing.

[Next follows the Story of "the King Jelee'âd and his Son and the Wezeer Shem-mâs," which ends with part of the Nine Hundred and Thirtieth Night. This is one of the two stories which El-Mes'oodee mentions as being similar to the Hezâr Afsâneh. Von Hammer, speaking of the tales which he regards as being of Indian origin, and among which he includes this story, says, "Sous le rapport de leur antiquité et de la morale qu'elles renferment, elles méritent la plus grande attention, mais d'un autre côté elles ne sont rien moins qu'amusantes;" and as I fully agree with him that the story of Jelee'âd is far from being amusing, I omit it. Much of it appears to me extremely puerile; and upon the whole I think it very inferior in interest to most of the tales in the present work.]

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-SEVENTH

NOTE 1. "Abou-Seer" is a modern Arabic corruption of the Coptic "Bousiri" or "Pousiri," the "Busiris" of the Greeks and Romans; but it is more properly written in Arabic "Booseer." It is the name of several villages in Egypt, the chief of which is in the Delta, on the eastern branch of the Nile.—The like may be inferred with regard to "Abou-Keer," commonly written by the French and English "Aboukir." The place so named (well known to my countrymen) marks the site of the ancient Canopus.

NOTE 2. As it is certain that most of the stories in this work were written at least half a century before the introduction of tobacco into the East (which happened about the close of the sixteenth century), this tale must have been altered by a copyist, or added to the original series: and I think it most probable that the latter was the case.

NOTE 3. See Note 21 to Chapter xi.

NOTE 4. Also called simply "nuf." See Note 17 to Chapter iii.

NOTE 5. Many a poor barber has a small cup of tinned copper, or of brass, instead of the large basin of tinned copper.

NOTE 6. In my original, the number of nuf faddahs is said to have been thirty; but this is at variance with what precedes.

NOTE 7. "Batárikh" is a mess composed of the roe of small salted fish, which are called "feseekh."

NOTE 8. After what I have observed above, in Note 2, it is perhaps unnecessary to notice the mention of coffee, which began to become a common beverage throughout Arabian countries about a century before the introduction of tobacco into the East.

NOTE 9. The chambers in Kháns containing no furniture, the lodger supplies a mat or two, or a carpet, and perhaps a mattress upon which to sit and sleep, with a few other portable things.

NOTE 10. That is, he set the streams of hot and cold water in motion.—A description of a public bath, and of the operations performed in it, has been given in Note 16 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 11. The bather, on entering the meslakh (the first apartment, or disrobing-room), commits his purse, and any other valuables that he has about him, to the bath-keeper, who locks them up in a chest, in which he also deposits the pay that he receives.

NOTE 12. The depilatory called the "dāwā" (or remedy), which is employed in the bath, is composed, as I have been informed, of quicklime with a small proportion (about an eighth part) of orpiment, or native arsenic. It is made into a paste, with water, before application; and loosens the hair in about two minutes, when it is washed off.

NOTE 13. This alludes to the questions put by the two angels Munkar and Nekeer who examine the dead and torture the wicked in the grave.

NOTE 14. "If a man's deeds are good, he is of good origin; but otherwise, he is not: and hence it is said, When a man's origin is [otherwise] unknown, his deeds indicate it."

NOTE 15. See the first note of the present series.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-EIGHTH

NOTE 1. The word rendered "minnow" is "seereh." See Note 8 to Chapter xxii.

NOTE 2. See Note 24 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 3. It appears that the fisherman lived in a quarter which had but one entrance.

NOTE 4. Though the man of the sea is here called a human being (in the original, "ádamee," a word derived from the name of our first parent), it appears afterwards that this species is different from that of the sons of Adam, properly so called.—See the fourth paragraph of Note 64 to Chapter xx.

NOTE 5. That is, wilt thou emancipate me with the desire of no other recompense than that of beholding the face of God? For this the Muslim holds to be the greatest happiness that can be enjoyed in Paradise. Hence this phrase is commonly used as meaning—"with the desire of God's recompense."

NOTE 6. The "shureyk" is a kind of bunn. A single bunn of this kind is called "keff shureyk." It is about the size of a man's hand, of an oblong form, with two longitudinal cuts along the top, and several oblique, cross cuts. It is composed of leavened dough and clarified butter (in the proportion of about two pounds of the latter to a ruba of the former), with a little sesame, and several aromatic and other substances, which are commonly called "reehat el-'ajeen;" as seed of the nigella, aniseed, cinnamon, rose-buds, absinthium (or artemisia arborescens), káfoorah, mahlab, and curcuma. Before it is baked, it is rubbed over with egg. The shureyk is made to be distributed to the poor at the periodical visits to the tombs, and is also made on various occasions of festivity.—A compound called reehat el-'ajeen is often added to bread. It generally consists of mahlab, káfoorah, absinthium, and some times seed of the nigella. This last is likewise, by some people, sprinkled upon the bread before it is baked and so is sesame.

NOTE 7. "Umm-es-So'ood" signifies "the Mother of Prosperities."

NOTE 8. That is, he imprecated upon them a fate like those of 'Ad and Thamood (two tribes of ancient Arabs, mentioned in Note 76 to Chapter x.); the former of whom, a few only excepted, were destroyed by a suffocating wind, and the latter, also with the exception of a few persons, by an earthquake, and a terrible noise from heaven.

NOTE 9. The litter here mentioned was of the kind called "takhtarawán," or "takht-ráwán," described in Note 8 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 10. Here the story in Trébutien's version differs, representing 'Abd-Allah of the Land as being induced by the King to break his agreement with his companion of the Sea. It closes by stating that 'Abd-Allah of the Land, "preferring to retain his place and the favour of the King, returned no more to the shore of the sea, and lived happily to the end of his days." Thus it wants the moral which is conveyed in my original.

NOTE 11. "'Abd-Allah" signifies "the Servant of God."

NOTE 12. "Teybeh" is one of the many names of the city in which the Prophet is buried, commonly called, by way of honour, "El-Medeeneh," i. e. "The City."

NOTE 13. "The Sacred House of God" is the Temple of Mekkeh.

NOTE 14. This name is perhaps imaginary. I do not know of any fish so called.

NOTE 15. This proverb is often mentioned by Arab peasants, with allusion to their rulers and themselves.

NOTE 16. From this point, I omit several passages in my original which are silly and tiresome, or otherwise objectionable.

NOTE 17. The kind of fish here mentioned (in the Arabic, "nakkár,") I suppose to be, like the "dendán," purely imaginary.

NOTE 18. The next story in my original, that of "the Merchant of 'Omán," which ends with part of the Nine Hundred and Fifty-second Night, I omit. A large portion of it is extremely objectionable, and, upon the whole, it is of little merit.

NOTES TO CHAPTER TWENTY-NINTH

NOTE 1. This tale relates to the times of Hároon Er-Rasheed; and may perhaps be founded on fact; for there was, in the reign of that Khaleefeh, an intendant of the tribute of Egypt named El-Khaseeb, the son of 'Abd-El-Hameed. Aboo-Nuwás has made honourable mention of him in the following verses:—

If our camels visit not the land of El-Khaseeb, what man after El-Khaseeb shall they visit?

For liberality hath not passed beyond him, nor hath it alighted behind him; but liberality goeth whithersoever he goeth.

He is a man who purchaseth eulogy with his wealth, and who knoweth that the periods of fortune revolve.

In our tale, El-Khaseeb is improperly called Lord, and Sultán, of Egypt.

NOTE 2. "Ghazáleh" is "a gazelle;" but here it is a proper name.

NOTE 3. "Jemeelah" signifies "beautiful," "lovely," "good," &c.

NOTE 4. "The gratuity for the key" (hulwán el-miftáh) is a fee which is still commonly given on hiring a house or chamber.

NOTE 5. See the fifth paragraph of Note 2 to the Introduction.

NOTE 6. The word rendered "Pearl" (namely "lu-lu-ah") also signifies "a wild cow," a species of bovine antelope. Each sense is appropriate if it be meant (as I suppose it is) to convey an allusion to the lady Jemeelah.

NOTE 7. Literally "around." I suspect that a copyist has altered this passage, imagining the word "sákiyeh" to signify here "a water-wheel for irrigation" when it was used in the sense of "a rivulet," and has therefore spoken of its "pots."

NOTE 8. I here read "marj" (a meadow) for "burj" (a tower), and am justified in doing so by Trébutien's version.

NOTE 9. When the gates of heaven are opened, prayer is sure to be answered. This is said to be the case on the night called Leylet el-Kadr, which is generally believed to be the night of the twenty-seventh of Ramadán; that is, the night preceding the twenty-seventh day.

NOTE 10. In this sentence, in my original, there seems to be an omission, which I have supplied by inserting the words "her performance was such (says Ibráheem)." The meaning I suppose to be this: she made my state to be like that of a man who ceases to be merry with intoxication, and begins to be careful lest his turban should fall from his head.

NOTE 11. See Note 71 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 12. The next three stories in my original I omit. — The first of these, which is that of "Abu-l-Hasan of Khurásán," is very similar, but inferior in interest, to "the Story told by the Sultán's Steward," in the fifth Chapter of my translation. — The second is "the Story of Kamar-ez-Zemán and the Wife of the Jeweller." This is extremely objectionable; far more so than the title might lead one to suspect. But one of the marginal notes with which my sheykh has illustrated it is too interesting to be omitted here with the story, especially as it confutes an opinion generally prevailing among my countrymen with respect to the morality of Arab women. The following is a translation of it. "Many persons reckon marrying a second time among the greatest of disgraceful actions. This opinion is most common in the country-towns and villages; and the relations of my mother are thus characterized, so that a woman of them, when her husband dieth while she is young, or divorceth her while she is young, passeth her life, however long it may be, in widowhood, and never marieth a second time." — The third story is that of "ʿAbd-Allah the son of Fádíl," which is one of the most entertaining tales in the work; but its chief and best portion is essentially the same as "the Story of the First of the Three Ladies of Baghdád." Instead of the three sisters, we have here three brothers; and instead of the young man, in the city of the petrified idolaters, a beautiful damsel. The story of ʿAbd-Allah the son of Fádíl therefore agrees also, in several points, with that of "the Second Sheykh and the Two Black Hounds," in the first Chapter of the present translation, repeating the chief incidents of the latter with slight variations. — Then follows "the Story of Maarroof," the last in the work.

NOTES TO CHAPTER THIRTIETH

NOTE 1. Cairo is generally called, as it is here in my original, "Misr [vulg. Masr] el-Mahrooseh;" i. e. "the Guarded [City of] Misr, or Masr."

NOTE 2. Maarroof signifies "kindness."

NOTE 3. "ʿOrrah" is a vulgar word, signifying "a wicked, mischievous shrew."

NOTE 4. Literally "like her [own] book, or page." Her actions being bad, the record of them was, figuratively speaking, black.

NOTE 5. Drip-honey (ʿasal katr) is a "fine kind of black honey," or treacle.

NOTE 6. See Note 78 to Chapter v.

NOTE 7. See Note 8 to Chapter ii.

NOTE 8. Literally, "the Sublime Gate" or "Porte."

NOTE 9. "Aboo-Tabak" is a vulgar appellation of a sergeant who arrests by order of a magistrate, because he often executes his commission with violence. It is derived from a verb vulgarly used in the sense of assailing with violence.

NOTE 10. "The ʿAdileeyeh" is the name of a mosque founded by El-Melik el-ʿAdíl Toomán Bey, in the year of the Flight 906 (A.D. 1501), outside the wall of Cairo, near the great gate called Báb en-Nasr; and the neighbourhood of that mosque is also called by the same name. This late date is worthy of remark; and it should also be observed, that the story of Maarroof is not related as one of ancient times.

NOTE 11. The Darb el-Ahmar is a street outside the gate called Báb Zuweyleh.

NOTE 12. The word here rendered "druggist" is "'attár." See Note 2 to Chapter ix.

NOTE 13. That is, a professor in a Collegiate Mosque.

NOTE 14. "Ikhtiyán," or, as it is afterwards written in my original, "Kheetán," appears to be a fictitious name; and so, perhaps, is the name which follows it, as my sheykh supposes; but, as we are left to supply the short vowels, I rather think that the latter is "El-Khutan" or "Khutan" (without the article), the name of a district of Tartary. It is more consistent, however, with the character of the story to regard this city as an imaginary place, the inhabitants of which agree, in every thing but dress, with the Arabs. In Trébutien's version, it is called "Khaïtan," the capital of the kingdom of Sohatan."

NOTE 15. This is the name of a deep dye.

NOTE 16. This is a vulgar form of speech, and signifies, "there came not to him what would profit him, nor what would rid others of him."

NOTE 17. By "the Rijál" are meant the Welees, or Saints; and probably that order of the Welees called "Rijál el-Gheyb," who, according to the Arabs, appear not to other men. In an account of the Muslims of India, the Rijál el-Gheyb are described as "a class of people who are mounted on clouds, and remain together each day in a different part of the hemisphere;" and they are said to have much influence upon the fortune of travellers.

NOTE 18. That is, he is suspected of lying in both cases.

NOTE 19. "Ash'ab was a very covetous man: so covetous that he said to a man who was making a dish, Enlarge it:—whereupon the man said to him, Wherefore?—and he answered, Perhaps something may be given in it to me."

NOTE 20. By "the Queen" is here meant the slave, as is afterwards shewn in the story.

NOTE 21. The mention of this title I regard as another evidence of the late date of this tale. See Note 43 to Chapter xxii.

NOTE 22. The Jink are a class of public dancers, young men and boys, generally Jews, Armenians, Greeks, and Turks. Their dress is partly male and partly female, and they wear long hair, which they plait, and in other respects also they assimilate their appearance to that of women.

NOTE 23. "Abu-s-Sa'ádát" signifies "the Father of Prosperities."

NOTE 24. By "brides" are often meant, as in this case, young and beautiful damsels; and by "the brides of the treasures," those enchanting females who are said to serve as guardians of some hidden treasures. Such were the ten damsels in the City of Brass.

NOTE 25. See Note 8 to Chapter viii.

NOTE 26. The ornaments here mentioned (called in Arabic "asákir") are of various shapes. The most common kind is a ball with a pointed head rising from it; the latter being with or without a crescent, and tapering either uniformly or otherwise.

NOTE 27. Here called, in my original, "Kheetán."

NOTE 28. Here, in my original, the word "atyas" (which signifies "stupid") is the epithet used; but this is evidently a mistake for "insee" ("human," or "a human being"). I suspected this to be the case before I referred to Trébutien's version, which has confirmed my conjecture. In the Arabic characters, "insee," if not plainly written, might easily be mistaken for "atyas."

NOTE 29. The word which I have rendered "nose-ring" is "khizám." My sheykh has stated in the margin that it is for the ear; but I believe that he has made this remark inadvertently, for I have never heard the term "khizám" applied to any thing but a nose-ring. This ornament, however, I have seen worn by few but women of the lower orders. Specimens of the khizám and other ornaments here mentioned are figured in my work on the Modern Egyptians, in Appendix A.

NOTE 30. The cup-bearer is generally a slave, and slaves are mostly of infidel parents.

NOTE 31. According to a map of the world, in a copy of Ibn-El-Wardee's geography in my possession, "the deserted quarter" (in Arabic "er-ruba el-kharáb") is a large portion of Africa, immediately on the south of the sources of the Nile.

NOTE 32. This she says assuming her husband to be dead; for otherwise, if he did not divorce her, she could not lawfully marry another. The period of widowhood is four months and ten days.

NOTE 33. These two verses are from El-Hareere (29th Makámeh); but transposed, and slightly altered.

NOTE 34. "That is to say, Thou wast the cause for my forsaking thee: so it was as though thou forsookest me. Otherwise, it was he who forsook her. But she was the cause. And this is like the saying of El-Mutaneabee, —

When thou departest from a people who are able to induce thee not to quit them, they are the departers."

NOTE 35. Literally, "a short sword of jewel." But the word here rendered "jewel" (namely "jóhar") has another sense, peculiarly applied to a weapon of steel: it signifies the wavy appearance seen in fine Eastern swords and daggers, and perhaps the steel itself that has that appearance.

NOTE 36. Elevations of this kind, in the East, have been innumerable; for, among the Muslims, there are few persons, even if they can neither read nor write, who can be truly called uneducated, — few who, from their infancy, have not received a moral education which (simple as it is) is equal to that of many of their compatriots holding high civil employments.
